Alſo it was alleged againſt the ſaid Empſon, that he had ſent forth precepts directed vnto diuerſe perſons, commanding them, vpon great penalties, to appeare befoze him, and other his aſſociats, at certaine daies and times within his houſe in S. Brides parith, in a ward of London, called ſtarrington without: where they making their appearances, according to the ſame precepts, were impleaded afoze him and other his ſaid aſſociats, of diuerſe murders, felonies, outlawries, and of the articles in the ſtatute of prouidoz contained; alſo of wilfull eſcapes of felonies, and ſuch like matters and articles appertaining to the ples of the crowne, and common lawes of the realme. And that done, the ſaid perſons were committed to diuerſe priſons, as the Fleet, the Towzer, and other places, where they were detained, till they had fined at his pleaſure, as well for the comoditie of the ſaid late king, as for the ſingular aduantage of the ſaid ſir Richard Empſon.

Moreouer, whereas the ſaid Empſon, being recorder of Countreie, and there ſate with the maiors and other iuſtices of the peace, vpon a ſpeciall gaole deliuerie within that citie, on the monday befoze the feaſt of ſaint Thomas the apoſtle, in the ſixteenth yeare of the late kings regnie; a priſoner that had bene indicted of felonie, for taking out of an houſe in that citie, certaine goods to the value of twente ſhillings, was arreigned befoze them. And becauſe the iurie would not find the ſaid priſoner gilty, for want of ſufficient euidence (as they after alleged) the ſaid ſir Richard Empſon, ſuppoſing the ſame euidence to be ſufficient, cauſed them to be committed to ward, wherein they remained foure daies togither, till they were contented to enter bond in forty pounds a pece, to appeare befoze the king and his counſell, the ſecond returne of the tearme then next enſuing, being Quindena Hilary. Whereupon they keeping their daie, and appearing befoze the ſaid ſir Richard Empſon, and other of the kings counſell, according to their bonds, were adiudged to paie exerie of them eight pounds for a fine, and accordingly he made payment thereof, as they were then thought well worthe ſo to do. But now this matter ſo long paſt, was ſtill kept in memorie, and ſo earnest ſome were to enforce it to the vttermoſt againſt the ſaid Empſon, that in a ſeſſions holden at Countreie now in this firſt yeare of this kings regnie, an indiſcment was framed againſt him for this matter, and thereof he was found gilty, as if therein he had committed ſome great and heinous offence againſt the kings peace, his crowne and dignitie.

Thus haue I thought good to ſhew what I find hereof, to the end ye may perceiue how glad men were to find ſome colour of ſufficient matter, to bring the ſaid ſir Richard Empſon, and maſter Edmund Dubleie, within danger of the lawes; whereby at length they were not onelie condemned by act of parlement, though malice of ſuch as might ſeeme to ſeake their deſtruction for priuat grudges; but in the end alſo, they were arreigned: as firſt the ſaid Edmund Dubleie in the Guildhall of London, the ſeuenteenth of Iulie; and ſir Richard Empſon at Northampton in October next enſuing; and being there condemned, was from thence brought backe againe to the Towzer of London, where he remained till the time of his execution: as after ye ſhall heare.

This yere the plague was great, and reigned in diuerse parts of this realme. The king kept his Christmas at Richmond. The twelfe of Januarie, diuerse gentlemen prepared to iust, and the king and one of his priue chamber called William Com ton, secretly armed themselves in the little parke of Richmond, & so came into the iustes, unknowne to all persons. The king neuer ran openlie before, and did exceeding well. Maister Compton chanced to be soe hurt by Edward Beuill esquier, brother to the lord of Aburgauennie, so that he was like to haue died. One person there was that knew the king, and cried; God saue the king: and with that, all the peo ple were astonied, and then the king discovered himselfe, to the great comfort of the people. The king some after came to Westminster, and there kept his shrouetide with great banquettings, danlings, and other iollie pastimes.

And on a time the king in person, accompanied with the earles of Essex, Wilshire and other noble men, to the number of twelue, came suddenlie in a morning into the queenes chamber, all apparelled in short coates of Kentish Kendall, with hodes on their heads & hosen of the same, euerie one of them his bow and arrowes, and a sword and a buckler, like outlawes, or Robin Hoods men. Whereat the queene, the ladies, and all other there were abashed, as well for the strange sight, as also for their sudden coming, and after certeine danles and pastime made, they departed. On Shrouetidaie the same yeare, the king prepared a goodlie banquet in the pa rlement chamber at Westminster, for all the ambal sadors, which then were here out of diuerse realmes and countries. The banquet being readie, the king leading the queene, entered into the chamber, then the ladies, ambassadours, and other noble men fol lowed in order.

The king caused the queene to keepe the estate, and then sate the ambassadours and ladies, as they were marshalled by the B. who would not sit, but walked from place to place, making cheare to the queene and the strangers: suddenlie the king was gone. And shortlie after, his grace, with the earle of Essex, came in apparelled after the Turkie fashion, in long robes of bandekin, powdered with gold, hats on their beds of crimsin veluet, with great rolles of gold, girded with two swordes called ciminteries, hanging by great bauderiks of gold. Then next came the lord Henric earle of Wilshire, and the lord Fitzwater, in two long gownes of yellow sattin, trauesed with white sattin, and in euerie band of white was a band of crimsin sattin after the fashion of Russia or Rus land, with furred hats of graie on their heads, either of them hauing an hatchet in their hands, and boots with pikes turned vp.

And after them came sir Edward Howard then admerall, and with him sir Thomas Parre, in dub lets of crimsin veluet, voided low on the backe, and before to the chanell bone, lased on the breast with chaines of siluer, and ouer that short cloakes of crimsin sattin, and on their heads hats after dan lers fashion, with feaunt feathers in them: they were apeared after the fashion of Russia or Spence.
The torchbearers were apparelled in crimsin sattin and greene, like spozeshoes, their faces blacke: and the king brought in a mummerie. After that the queene, the lords, & ladies (such as would) had plaied, the said mummers departed, and put off the same ap parell, and some after entered into the chamber in their vsuall apparell. And so the king made great cheere to the queene, ladies and ambassadours. The upper or banquet ended, and the tables voided, the king in communication with the ambassadours, the queene with the ladies took their places in their degrees.

Then began the danling, and euerie man took much heed to them that danced. The king perceiuing that, withdrew himselfe suddenlie out of the place, with certeine other persons appointed for that pur pose. And within a little while after there came in a dum and a sife apparelled in white damaske & greene bagpets, and hosen of the same sute. Then certeine gentlemen followed with torches, apparelled in blue damaske, purfelled with amts greie, fashioned like an albe, and hods on their heads, with robes and long tipets to the same of blue damaske, in bisards.
Then after them came a certeine number of gentle men, whereof the king was one, apparelled all in one sute of short garments, little beneath the points, of blue veluet and crimsin, with long sleeves, all cut and lined with cloth of gold. And the bitter part of the garments were powdered with castels and sheafes of arrowes of fine duckett gold; the vpper parts of their hosen of like sute and fashion; the nether parts were of skarlet, powdered with timbrels of fine gold, on their heads bonnets of damaske, with siluer flat women in the skole, & thereupon wrought with gold, and rich fethers in them, all with bisards.

After them entered sir ladies, whereof two were apparelled in crimsin sattin and purple, embzodered with gold, and by vniuersities ran flour delices of gold, with marvellous rich & strange tiers on their heads.
Then two ladies in crimsin and purple, made like long slops embzodered and fret with gold after an tike fashion: and ouer that garment was a short garment of cloth of gold scant to the knee, fashioned like a tabard all ouer, with small double rolles, all of flat gold of damaske, fret with frised gold, and on their heads skarfs and wappers of damaske gold, with flat pipes, that strange it was to behold. The other two ladies were in kirtels of crimsin & purple sattin, embzodered with a vniuersities of pomegranats of gold, all the garments cut compasse wise, hauing but demie sleeves, naked downe from the elbowes, and ouer their garments were bochets of pleafants, rolled with crimsin veluet, and set with letters of gold like characts, their heads rolled in pleafants and tipets like the Egyptians, embzodered with gold.
Their faces, necks, armes, and hands, covered in fine pleafants blacke: some call it Lumbardines, which is marvellous thin; so that the same ladies se med to be sligers or blacke spozes. Of these foresaid sir ladies, the ladie Marie sister vnto the king was one, the other I name not. After that the kings grace and the ladies had danced a certeine time, they depar ted euerie one to his lodging.

In this yere also came ambassadours, not onelie from the king of Arragon and Castile, but also from the kings of France, Denmarke, Scotland, and o ther places, which were highlie welcomed, and noble intertained. It happened on a daie, that there were certeine noble men made a wager to run at the ring and parties were taken, and which partie attained or toke awaie the ring offnest with certeine courses, shoulde win the wager. Whereof the kings grace hearing, offered to be on the one partie with sir com panions. The ambassadours hearing thereof, were much desirous to see this wager tried, and speciallie the ambassadours of Spaine, who had neuer sene the king in harnesse. At the daie appointed, the king was mounted on a goodlie courser, trapped in purple veluet cut, the inner side whereof was wrought with flat gold of damaske in the skole, and the veluet on the other side cut in letters: so that the gold appeared as though it had bene embzodered with certeine rea sons or posies. And on the veluet betwene the let ters were fastened castels and sheafes of arrowes of ducket bucket gold, with a garment, the sleeves compassed ouer his harnesse, and his bales of the same worke; with a great plume of feathers on his head pece, that came downe to the ardon of his saddle, and a great companie of fresh gentlemen came in with his grace richlie armed and decked, with manie other right gorgeouslie apparelled, the trumpets before them goodlie to behold, whereof manie strangers (but speciallie the Spaniards) much reioiced; for they had neuer seene the king before that time armed.

On the other side came in another band of gentlemen freshlie apparelled, and pleasant to behold, all apparelled in cloth of gold, checkered with flat gold of damaske, & powdered with roses; and so euerie man raie: but to conclude, the pise was given unto the king. Euerie man did run twelue courses, the king did beare away the ring fise times, and attained it there. And these courses thus finished, the Spanishe ambassadors desired to haue some of the badges of heretics, which were on the kings trapper. His grace therof knowing, commanded euerie of them to take thereof what it pleased them, who in effect took all of the more part; for in the beginning they thought they had bene counterfeit, and not of gold; as they were. On the next day then next following in the second yeare of his reigne, his grace being young, and willing not to be idle, rose in the morning verie earlie to fetch maie of Greene boughs; himselfe fresh & rich-lie apparelled; and clothed all his knights, squiers and gentlemen in white sattin, and all his gard and people in the colour of white sarcenet: and so went e-uerie man with his bow and arrowes shooting to the wood, and so repaired againe to the court, euerie man with a Greene bough in his cap.

Now at his returning, manie hearing of his going on making, were desirous to see him shot, for at that time his grace shot as strong and as great a length as anie of his gard. There came to his grace a certaine man with bow and arrowes, and desired his grace to take the muster of him, and to see him shot; for at that time his grace was contented. The man put the one foot in his bosome, and so did shoot, and shot a verie good shot, and well towards his marke: whereof, notwithstanding his grace, but all other greatlie marvelled. So the king gaue him a reward for his so doing; which person afterwards of the people, and of them in the court, was called, foot in bosone. The same yeare in the feast of Pentecost, holden at Greenwich, that is to say, the thursdaie in the same weeke, his grace with two other with him, challenged all commers, to fight with them at the barriers with target, and casting the speare of eight foot long; and that done, his grace with the said two aides to fight euerie of them twelue strokes with two handed swordes, with and against all commers, none excepted being a gentleman; where the king be-haued himselfe so well, and deliuered himselfe so ball-antlie by his hardie prowesse and great strength, that the praise and laud was given to his grace, and his aides: notwithstanding that diuerse and strong persons had assailed him and his aides.

From thence the whole court removed to Windsor, then beginning his progresse, & exercising himselfe dailie in shooting, singing, dancing, wrestling, casting of the barre, plateng at the recorders, flute, virginals, in setting of songs, and making of ballads; he did set two full masses, euerie of them fise parts, which were song oftentimes in his chappell, and afterwards in diuerse other places. And when he came to Woking, there were kept both iustes and turnies: the rest of this progresse was spent in hunting, hawking, and shooting. & Doctor Colet deane of Poules erected a free schoule in Poules church yard in London, and committed the ouersight thereof to the masters and wardens of the mercers, because himselfe was borne in London, & was sonne to Henrie Co-let mercer, sometime lord maior of the citie of London. On the thirde summer night, the king came principally into Cheape, in one of the cotes of his gard; and on saint Peters night, the king and queene came riding roiallie to the kings hed in Cheape, there to behold the watch of the citie.

Now when the said progresse was finished, his grace, the queene, with all their whole traine, in the moneth of October following, removed to Grenewich.
The king not minded to see young gentlemen dinerper in martiall feates, caused a place to be prepared within the park of Grenewich, for the queene and the ladies to stand & see the fight with battle axes that should be done there, where the king himselfe armed, fought with one Ciot a gentleman of Al-maine, a tall man, and a good man of armes. And then after they had done, they marched alwaies two and two together, and so did their feats and enter-pises euerie man verie well. Albeit, it happened the said Ciot to fight with sir Edward Howard, which Ciot was by him stricken to the ground. The morow after this enterprize done, the king with the queene came to the Towre of London. And to the intent that there should no displeasure nor malice be borne by anie of those gentlemen, which fought with the argainst other; the king gaue unto them a certeine summe of gold, valued at two hundred markes, to make a banquet among themselves withall. The which banquet was made at fishmongers hall in Thames street, where they all met to the number of foure and twentie, all apparelled in one sute of liuerie, after Al-maine fashion; that is to say, their bitter garments all of yellow sattin, yellow hosen, yellow shoes, girdels, scabbards, and bonnets with yellow feathers, their garments and hosen all cut & lined with white sattin, and their scabbards wound about with sattin.
After their banquet ended, they went by torchlight to the Towre, & presented themselves before the king, who took pleasure to behold them.

From thence the eight day of November, his grace removed to Richmond, and willed to be declared to all noble men and gentlemen, that his grace with two aides, that is to wit, maister Charles Brandon, and maister Compton, during two daies would answer all commers; with speare at the tilt one daie, and at turnie with sword the other. And to accomplish this enterprize, on the thirtieth day of November, his grace armed at all peeces with his two aides entered the field, their bales and trappers were of cloth of gold, set with red roses, wrought with gold of broderie. The counterpart came in freshlie apparelled, euerie man after his deuise. At these iustes the king brake more fraues than anie other, & therefore had the pise. At the turnie in likewise, the honour was his. The second night were diuerse strangers of Maritiman the emperours court and ambassadors of Spaine with the king at supper. When they had supped, the king willed them to go into the queenes chamber, who so did.

In the meane season, the king with sixene other, & roiall apparelled in Almaine iackets of crimson and purple sattin, with long quartered sleeves, and hosen of the same sute, their bonnets of white velvet, wrapped in flat gold of damaske, with visards and white plumes, came in with a munimie; and after a certeine time that they had played with the queene and the strangers, they departed. Then suddenly entered sir minors richlie apparelled, plaieng on their instruments; and then followed fourtene persons, gentlemen, all apparelled in yellow sattin, cut like Al-maine, braving torches. After them came sir disgui-sed in white sattin and Greene, embroidered and set with letters and cassels of fine gold in bullion, the garments were of strange fashion, with also strange cuts, euerie cut knit with points of fine gold, and tassels of the same, their hosen cut and tied in likewise, their bonnets of cloth of siluer wond with gold. The first of these sir was the king, the earle of Essex, Charles Brandon, sir Edward Howard, sir Thomas Baneet, and sir Henrie Guilford.

Then part of the gentlemen bearing torches departed, and hostlie returned, after whom came in sir ladies, appavelled in garments of crimfin sattin embodered and trauesed with gloth of gold, cut in pomegranats and pokes: stringed after the fashion of Spaine. When the said sir men danced with these sir ladies: and after that they had danced a season, the ladies took off the mens visors, whereby they were known: whereof the quene and the strangers much passed the king, and ended the pastime: It is to be noted, that at this time the quene was great with child, & hostlie after this pastime, she took her chamber at Richmond, for the which cause the king kept his Christmase there. And on the twelfth daie the first daie of Januarie the quene was belivered of a priue to the great gladnesse of the realme, for the honour of whome fiers were made, and diuerse vessels with wine set for such as would take thereof in certeine streets in London, and generall processions thereupon to laud God. As touching the preparation of the princes chylfening, I ouerpass, which was honorable done, whose godfathers at the font were the archbishop of Canturburie, and the earle of Surreie, & godmother the ladie Katharine countesse of Deuonshire, daughter to king Edward the fourth: his name was Henrie.

Against the twelue daie of the date of the Epiphanie at night, before the banket in the hall at Richmond, was a pageant deuised like a mounteine, glistering by night as though it had bene all of gold and set with stones, on the top of which mounteine was a tree of gold, the branches and bonghes frised with gold, spreading on euerie side ouer the mounteine with roses and pomegranats, the which mounteine was with vices brought vp towards the king, and out of the same came a ladie appavelled in cloth of gold, and the chylzen of honour called the benchmen, which were freshlie disguised, and danced a morrice before the king; and that done, reentred the mounteine, which then was drawn backe, and then was the wastall or banket brought in, and so brake vp Christmase. Hostlie after and before the quenes churching, the k. rode to Wallingham. The quene being churched or purified, the king and the remoued from Richmond to Westminster, where was preparation for solemne iusts in the hono: of the quene; the king being one, and with him thre aides: his grace being called Cure loial, the lord William erle of Deuonshire called Bon voloire, sir Thomas Baneet named Bon espoir, sir Edward Peuill called Valiant desire, whose names were set vpon a goodlie table, & the table hangd in a tree curiouslie wrought, and they were called Les quater cheualiers de la forest saluigne, these foure to run at the tilt against all comers, with other certeine articles compised in the said table.

A place in the palace was prepared for the king and quene, richlie hangd, the inner part with cloth of gold, & the utter with rich cloth of arras. These iusts began the thirteenth daie of Februarie. Now after that the quene with hir traine of ladies had taken their places, into the palace was conueied a pageant of a great quantitie, made like a Forrest with rockes, hills, and dales, with diuerse sundrie trees, flowers, herbes, fernes, and grasse, with sir foxesters standing within the same Forrest, garnished in cotes and hoods of greene beluet, by whome laie a great number of speares; all the trees, hearbs, and flowers of the same Forrest were made of greene beluet, greene damaske, & silke of diuerse colours, as sattin & sarcenet. In the midst of this Forrest was a castell standing made of gold, and before the castell gate sat a gentleman freshlie appavelled, making a garland of roses for the quene. This Forrest was drawn as it were by strength of two great beastes, a lion and an antelope; the lion flozshed all ouer with damaske gold, the antelope was wrought all ouer with siluer of damaske, his beames or hories and tuskes of gold.

These beastes were led with certeine men appavelled like wild men, or woodhouses, their bodies, heads, faces, hands, and legs couered with greene silke flozshed: on either of the said antelope and lion sat a ladie richlie appavelled, the beastes were tied to the pageant with great chaines of gold, as hostles be in the cart. When the pageant rested before the quene, the forenamed foxesters blew their hories, then the deuise or pageant opened on all sides, and out issued the foresaid foure knights armed at all peeces, euerie of them a speare in his hand on horsebacke with great plumes on their heads, their bales and trappers of cloth of gold, euerie of them his name embodered on his bale and trapper. On the other part with great noise a swell of trumpets as of drums entered into the field, the erle of Essex, the lord Thomas Howard with manie other cleane armed, their trappers and bales all of crimfin satin embodered with branches of pomegranats of gold and pokes; with manie a fresh gentleman riding before them, their footmen well appavelled: and so the iusts began and endured all that daie.

The morrow, being the thirteenth of Februarie after dinner, at time conuenient, the quene with the ladies repaired to see the iusts, the trumpets sounded, and in came manie a noble man and gentleman richlie appavelled, taking vp their horses; after whom followed certeine lords appavelled, they and their horses in cloth of gold and russet tinsell: knights in cloth of gold and russet beluet; and a great number of gentlemen on foot in russet sattin and pellow, and peomen in russet damaske and pellow, all the nether part of euerie mans hosen scarlet and pellow caps. Then came the king vnder a pavilion of cloth of gold and purple beluet embodered, and powdered with y. and k. of fine gold, the compasse of the pavilion above embodered richlie, and balansed with flat gold, beaten in wire, with an imperiall crowne in the top of fine gold, his bales and trappers of cloth of gold, frettyed with damaske gold, the trapper pendant to the taile. A crane and chaftron of Steele, in the front of the chaftron was a goodlie plume set full of musers or trembling spangles of gold. After followed his thre aides, euerie of them vnder a pavilion of crimfin damaske and purple, powdered with y. and k. of fine gold, balansed and fringed with gold of damaske: on the top of euerie pavilion a great k. of goldsmiths worke.

The number of the gentlemen and peomen attending on foot, appavelled in russet and pellow, was an hundred thre score and eight. Then next these pavilions came twelue chylzen of honour, sitting euerie of them on a great courser richlie trapped and embodered in severall deuises and fashions, where lacked neither beverie nor goldsmiths worke, so that euerie childe and horse in deuise and fashion was contrarie to other, which was goodlie to behold. Then on the contrarie part entered sir Charles Brandon, first on horsebacke in a long robe of russet sattin, like a recluse or religious person, and his horse trapped in the same lute, without drum or noise of minstrelsie, putting a bill of petition to the quene, the effect where

After that his request was granted, then he put off his said habit, and was armed at all peeces with rich bases and horse also richly trapped, and so did run his horse to the tilt end, where diuerse men on foot appaelled in russet sattin waited on him.

Next after came in alone yong Henrie Guilford esquier, himselfe and his horse in russet cloth of gold and cloth of siluer, closed in a deuise, or a pageant made like a castell or a turret, wrought of russet saycenet florence, wrought and set out in gold with his word or posie, and all his men in russet sattin & white, with hosen to the same, and their bonets of like colour, demanding also licence of the queene to run; which to him granted, he took place at the tilts end. Then came next the marquess Dowset and sir Thomas Bullen like two pilgrims from saint James, in taberds of blacke velvet, with palmers hats on their helmets, with long Jacobs staves in their hands, their horse trappers of blacke velvet, their taberds, hats, and trappers set with scalop shels of fine gold, and strips of blacke velvet, euery strip set with a scalop shell, their seruants all in blacke sattin with scalop shels of gold in their breeches. Some after came in the lord Henrie of Buckingham earle of Wiltshire, himselfe and his horse appaelled in cloth of siluer, embroidered with his posie or word, and arrowes of gold in a posie, called La maison du refuge, made of crimson damaske bordered with roses & arrowes of gold, on the top a greibound of siluer, bearing a tree of pomegranats of gold, the branches whereof were so large that it ouersped the pageant in all parts.

Then entered sir Giles Capell, sir Rowland with many other knights richly armed and appaelled. And thus began the tilts, which was valiantly achieved by the king and his aids, among whom his grace attained the prize. These tilts finished, euery man withdrew, the king was disarmed, and at time convenient he and the queene heard euensong, and that night all the ambassadoes supped with the king and had a great banquet. After supper, his grace with the queene, lords & ladies came into the White hall within the said palace, which was hangd richly, the hall was scaffolded and railed on all parts. There was an enterlure of the gentlemen of his chapel before his grace, and diuerse fresh songs: that done, his grace called to him a great man, or a lord of Ireland called O neall, whom in the presence of the said ambassadoes he made knight: then the minstrels began to plaie, the lords & ladies began to danse. Now in the midst of this pastime, when all persons were most attentue to behold the danfing, the king was suddenly gone, unknown to the most part of the people there, unlesse it were of the queene and certaine other. Within a little while after his departing, the trumpets at the end of the hall began to sound.

A pageant deuised to run upon wheeles.

Then was there a deuise or a pageant upon wheels brought in, out of the which pageant issued out a gentleman richly appaelled, that shewed how in a garden of pleasure there was an arbor of gold, where in were lords and ladies, much desirous to shew pastime to the queene & ladies, if they might be licensed so to do: who was answered by the queene, how she & all other there were verie desirous to see them and their pastime. Then a great cloth of arras that did hang before the same pageant was taken away, and the pageant brought more nere. It was curiously made and pleasant to behold, it was solemne and rich; for euery post or pillar thereof was couered with frised gold, therein were trees of bathorne, eglantine, roses, vines, and other pleasant floures of diuerse colours, with gilliflowers, and other hearbs all made of sattin, damaske, siluer and gold, accordingly as the naturall trees, hearbs, or floures ought to be.

In this arbor were six ladies, all appaelled in white sattin and greene, set and embroidered full of gold and siluer, knit together with laces of gold of damaske, and all their garments were replenished with glittering spangles gilt ouer, on their heads were bonets all opened at the foure quarters, overfrised with flat gold of damaske, the orlelets were of rolles, twetted on lampas dancke holow, so that the gold shewed through the lampas dancke; the hells of their head set full of new deuised fashions. In this garden also was the king and five with him appaelled in garments of purple sattin, all of cuts with gold and siluer, euery edge garnished with frised gold, and euery garment full of posies, made of letters of fine gold in bullion as thicke as they might be, and euery person had his name in like letters of masse gold. The first Cure loial, the second Bon voloir, the third Bon espoir, the fourth Valiant desire, the fifth Bon foy, the sixth Amour loial, their hosen, caps, and coats were full of posies, with gold and siluer of fine gold in bullion, so that the ground could scarce appeare, & yet was in euery void place spangles of gold. When time was come, the said pageant was brought forth into presence, and then descended a lord and a lady by couples, and then the minstrels which were disguised also danced, and the lords and ladies danced, that it was a pleasure to behold.

In the meane season the pageant was conueyed to the end of the palace, there to tarie till the dances were finished, & so to haue receiued the lords & ladies againe; but suddenly the rude people ran to the pageant, and rent, tare, and spoiled the pageant, so that the lord steward nor the head officers could not cause them to abstaine, except they should haue foughten and dauen bloud, and so was this pageant broken. When the king with the queene and the ladies returned to his chamber, where they had a great banquet, and so this triumph ended with much glories. At this solemnitie a shipman of London caught certaine letters, which he sold to a goldsmith for three pounds fourtene shillings & eight pence; by reason whereof it appeared that the garments were of a great value. After this great toy came a sorrowfull chance, for the yong prince which was borne upon shewe peares day last past, upon the two and twentieth daie of february, being then the euen of saint Matthe, departed this world at Richmond, and from thence was caried to Westminster and buried. The king like a wise prince took this dolorous chance wondrous wifely; and the more to comfort the queene he dissembled the matter, and made no great mourning outwardly: but the queene, like a naturall woman, made much lamentation; howbeit, by the kings good perswasion and behauiour, his sorrow was mitigated, but not shorted.

In the moneth of februarye this yeare came ambassadoes from the king of Arragon and Castile, to require an aid of fiftene hundred archers to be sent to the same king, hauing at that time war against the Moors, enemies of the christian faith. The king hearing their message gentlie granted their request. And because the lord Thomas Darcie a knight of the garter, made humble sute to the king to be generall of the crue that should be thus sent into Spaine, the king upon trust of his approued ballance granted his desire. There were appointed to go with him the lord Anthoine Greie brother to the marquess Dowset, Henrie Guilford, Weston Boloue, and William Stone esquiers of the kings house, sir Robert Constable, sir Roger Hastings, and sir Rafe Elderton, with other gentlemen to be captiues.

8. 2. 3. In this second yere, the king being forth on his progreſſe, heard euertie daie moze & moze complaints of Empſon and Doble, ſet forth and advanced no doubt by the drift of their deable entymies. Wherefore, he ſent toxts to the ſheriffes of London, to put them to execution, and ſo the ſeuenteenth daie of Auguſt, they were both beheaded at the Tower hill, and both their bodies and heads buried, the one at the White friers, and the other at the Blacke friers. The king about this ſeaſon was much giuen to plaiſe at reſuſite, and at the diſe, which appetite certeine craftie perſons about him perceiving, brought in Frenchmen and Lombards to make wagers with him, & ſo loſt much monie; but when he perceived their craft, he eſqued their companie and let them go.

On the first daie of Maie the king accompanied with manie lustie batcheiers, on great and well doing horses rode to the wood to fetch Maie, where a man might haue sene manie a horse raised on high with carrier, gallop, turne, and stop, meruellous to behold: where he & thre other, as sir Edward Howard, Charles Brandon, and Edward Penill, which were challengers with the king, shifed themselves into coats of greene sattin garded with crimsin velvet. On the other part the earles of Essex, of Devonshire, the margarett Dowset, & the lord Howard were all in crimsin linn, garded with a pounced garb of greene velvet. And as they were returning on the hill, a ship met with them vnder saile: the maister hailed the king and that noble companie, and said that he was a mariner, and was come from many a strange port, and came thither to see if anie deeds of armes were to be done in the countrie, of the which he might make true report in other countries. An herald demanded the name of his ship: he answered she is called Jfame, & is laden with good Renowme: then said the herald, If you will bring your ship into the baie of Harbinelle, you must double the point of Gentlenesse, and there you shall see a companie that will meddle with your merchandize. Then said the king, Siftens Renowme is their merchandize, let vs buie it if we can. When the ship shot a peale of guns, and sailed forth befoze the kings companie, full of flags and banners, till it came to the tilt yard.

At after noone, the king and his thre fellowes entered into the field, their bardes and bafes of crimfin and blue veluet, cut in quozdant cuts, embzodded full of pomegranats, and all the wafters in filke of the fame colour. The other partie were in crimfin fatten and greene veluet. When began the trumpets to found, and the hozfles to run, that manie a fpeare were burft, and manie a great ftripe giuen: and fo, a truth the king excēded in number of ftaues all other euerie daie of the thre daies. Wherefore on the third daie, the queene made a great banket to the king and all them that had yfte: and after the banket done, the gaue the chiefe paffes to the king, the fecond to the earle of Effer, the third to the earle of Devonfhire, and the fourth to the lord marquess Dorset. Then the heralds cried: My lordz, for your noble feats in armes, God fend you the loue of your ladies that you moft defire. The king euer defirous to ferue Mars, began another iusts the fifteenth daie of the faid moneth. The king's his band were all in greene filke, and the earle of Effer and his band in blue, garned with gold, and all the fpeares were painted of the fame colours. There was god running and manie a fpeare buyt: but for all the fpozt euerie man feared leaft fome ill chance might happen to the king, and faine would haue had him a looker on rather than a dmer, and fpake thereof as much as they durft: but his courage was fo noble that he would erer be at the one end.

pointed to the viage against the Moors, made such diligence, that they and all their people were ready at Plinimouth by the midnes of Maye, and there mustered their soldiers before the lord Wake, and other the kings commissioners. The lord Darcie as capitaine generall, ordeined for his prouost marshall Henrie Guilford esquire, a lustie yong man, & welbeloued of the king, for his manifold good seruice. On the mondate in the Rogation weeke, they departed out of Plinimouth hauen with foure ships roiall, and the wind was so favourable to them, that the first date of June, being the euen of the feast of Pentecost, he arriued at the port of Calis in south Spaine; and immediatlie by the aduise of his counsell, he dispatched messengers to the king, whom they found before the citie of Cinth where he then laie, and declared to him, how the lord Darcie by the king their masters appointment, was come thither with sixtē hundred archers, and laie still at Calis to know his pleasure. The king of Castile answered them gentlie, that the lord Darcie and all other that were come from his louing sonne were welcome, and hartlie thanked them of their paines, requiting the messengers to returne to their capitaine, and tell him that in all hast he would send certeine of his counsell to him.

¶ Hereupon they departed from the king, and made report to the lord Warcie, which kept his ship in great estate, and would not land, but onlie suffered such as were sicke and feeble, and few other to go a land. The Englishmen which went a land, fell to drinking of hot wines, & were scarce maisters of themselves, some ran to the fletches, some bake hedges and spoiled orchards and vineyards, and oranges before they were ripe, and did manie outrageous deeds: wherefore the chiefe of the towne of Calis came to complaine to the lord Warcie in his ship, which sent forth his prouost marshall, who scarcelie with paine restrained the peoman archers, they were so hot and wilfull, yet by commandement & policie they were all brought on board to their ships.

60 He therefore required the lord Warcie to be contented to returne home againe, promising him wages for all his soldiers; and if it should please him to come to the court, he should receive high thanks of the king, and such there as there could be made him. The lord Warcie was nothing pleased with this declaration, but sith he saw there was no remedie, he said, that whatsoever the king had concluded, he could not be against it, considering he was sent to him: but suerlie it was against his mind to depart home, without doing anye thing against Gods enemies, with whome he had euer a desire to fight. And as for his comming to court, he said, he could not leaue his men whome he had brought out of their countrie, without an head; and as for the kings banquet, it was not the thing that he desired.

In this second yeare, the king being forth on his progresse, heard euerie daie more & more complaints of Empton and Doble, set forth and advanced no doubt by the drift of their deadlie enemies. Wherefore, he sent writs to the Sherriffes of London, to put them to execution, and so the seventeenth daie of August, they were both beheaded at the Tower hill, and both their bodies and heads buried, the one at the White friers, and the other at the Blacke friers. The king about this season was much giuen to plate at tennis, and at the dise, which appetite certeine craftie persons about him perceiuing, brought in Frenchmen and Lombards to make wagers with him, & so lost much monie; but when he perceiued their craft, he eschued their companie and let them go.

¶ On the first daie of Maie the king accompanied with manie lustie batcheles, on great and well doing horses rode to the wood to fetch Maie, where a man might haue seene manie a horse raised on high with carrier, gallop, turne, and stop, meruellous to behold: where he & thre other, as Sir Edward Howard, Charles Brandon, and Edward Perrell, which were challengers with the king, thifted themselves into coats of greene sattin garded with crimson velvet. On the other part the earles of Essex, of Devonshire, the marquisse Dorset, & the lord Howard were all in crimson satin, garded with a pounced gard of greene velvet. And as they were returning on the hill, a ship met with them vnder saile: the maister hailed the king and that noble companie, and said that he was a mariner, and was come from many a strange port, and came thither to see if anie deeds of armes were to be done in the countrie, of the which he might make true report in other countries. An herald demanded the name of his ship; he answered she is called Flame, & is laden with good Renoume: then said the herald, If you will bring your ship into the baie of Hardinesse, you must double the point of Gentlesse, and there you shall see a companie that will meddle with your merchandize. Then said the king, Shewens Renoume is their merchandize, let vs bue it if we can. Then the ship shot a peale of guns, and sailed forth before the kings companie, full of flags and banners, till it came to the tilt yard.

At after none, the king and his thre fellows entered into the field, their bards and bases of crimson and blue velvet, cut in quadrant cuts, embzodered full of pomegranats, and all the waiters in silke of the same colour. The other partie were in crimson sattin and greene velvet. Then began the trumpets to sound, and the horses to run, that manie a speare was burst, and manie a great stripe giuen: and so a truth the king excceeded in number of stanes all other euerie daie of the thre daies. Wherefore on the third daie, the queene made a great banket to the king and all them that had iusted: and after the banket done, she gaue the chiefe pisse to the king, the second to the earle of Essex, the thirde to the earle of Devonshire, and the fourth to the lord marquisse Dorset. When the heralds cried; My lords, for your noble seats in armes, God send you the loue of your ladies that you most desire. The king euer desirous to serue spars, began another iusts the sixteenth daie of the said moneth. The king & his band were all in greene like, and the earle of Essex and his band in blue, garded with gold, and all the speares were painted of the same colours. There was good running and manie a speare burst: but for all the sport euerie man feared least some ill chance might happen to the king, and saue would haue had him a looker on rather than a doer, and spake thereof as much as they durst: but his courage was so noble that he would enur be at the one end.

pointed to the biage against the Mores, made such diligence, that they and all their people were readie at Wlhimmouth by the middes of Maie, and there mustered their soldiers before the lord Brooke, and other the kings commissioners. The lord Darcie as capteine generall, ordeined for his prouost marshall Henrie Gullford esquier, a lustie young man, & wel beloued of the king, for his manifold god seruice. On the mondaie in the Rogation weeke, they departed out of Wlhimmouth haueu with foure ships roiall, and the wind was so fauourable to them, that the first daie of June, being the euen of the feast of Pentecost, he arriued at the port of Calis in south Spaine; and immediatlie by the aduise of his counsell, he dispatched messengers to the king, whom they found beside the citie of Ciuill where he then late, and declared to him, how the lord Darcie by the king their maisters appointment, was come thither with sixteen hundred archers, and late still at Calis to know his pleasure. The king of Castile answered them gentlie, that the lord Darcie and all other that were come from his louing sonne were welcome, and hartlie thanked them of their paines, requiting the messengers to returne to their capteine, and tell him that in all hast he would send certeine of his counsell to him.

¶ Hereupon they departed from the king, and made report to the lord Darcie, which kept his ship in great estate, and would not land, but onelie suffered such as were sicke and feeble, and few other to go a land. The Englishmen which went a land, fell to drinking of hot wines, & were scarce maisters of themselves, some ran to the stables, some brake hedges and spoiled orchards and vineyards, and oranges before they were ripe, and did manie outrageous deeds: wherefore the chiefe of the towne of Calis came to complaine to the lord Darcie in his ship, which sent forth his prouost marshall, who scarcelie with paine restrained the peoman archers, they were so hot and wilfull, yet by commandement & policie they were all brought on board to their ships.

He therefore required the lord Darcie to be contented to returne home againe, promising him wages for all his soldiers; and if it should please him to come to the court, he should receiue high thanks of the king, and such chere as there could be made him. The lord Darcie was nothing pleased with this declaration, but sth he saw there was no remedie, he said, that whatsoeuer the king had concluded, he could not be against it, considering he was sent to him: but suerlie it was against his mind to depart home, without doing anie thing against Gods enemies, with whome he had euer a desire to fight. And as for his coming to court, he said, he could not leaue his men whome he had brought out of their countrie, without an head; and as for the kings banket, it was not the thing that he desired.

On the next daie in the morning, monie was sent to paie the souldiers their wages for their conduct on againe into England, with diuerse gifts giuen to the lord Darcie, and other gentlemen, yet notwithstanding, he was highlie displeased: howbeit, like a wise man he dissembled the matter. The same daie, being the fourteenth daie of June, and fridaie, there chanced a fraie to be begun in the towne of Calis, betwixt the Englishmen, and them of the towne; by reason that an Englishman would haue had for his monie a loafe of bread from a maid that had bene at the bakers to buie bread, not to sell, but to spend in his mistress house. Howbeit the Englishman followed him, as making proffer not to be denied, in so much that the maid perceiuing what he went about, cried out; A force, a force. Then was the common bell rung, and all the towne went to harnesse, and those few Englishmen that were a land, went to their bowes. The Spaniards cast darts, and the Englishmen shot. But the captains of England, and the lords of the counsell for their part, took such paine, that the fraie was ceased; and but one Englishman slaine, though diuerse were hurt: and of the Spaniards diuerse were slaine. Thus of a sparkle was kindled a flame to the spoiling of manie; which is no rare thing to see, according to the scripturall:

After this, upon request made by the lords of Spaine, the lord Darcie and all his men the same night went aboard their ships, but Henrie Guilford, Weston Bolone, and William Sidonie, young and lustie esquiers, desired licence to see the court of Spaine: which being granted, they went thither, where they were of the king highlie interteined. Henrie Guilford and Weston Bolone were made knights by the king, who also gaue to sir Henrie Guilford a canton of Granada, and to sir Weston Bolone an eagle of Sicill on a chefe, to the augmentation of their armes. William Sidonie so encouraged himselfe, that he was not made knight. When they had sojourned there a while, they took their leaue of the king and quene, and returned through France into England.

The duchesse of Sanote se-

Henrie for aid against the duke of Gelders.

During which season, the lord Darcie made saile toward England, and arriuing at Plimmouth, came to the king at Windsor, and so this tournee ended. During the time that the lord Darcie was in Spaine, the ladie Margaret duchesse of Sanote, and daughter vnto Maximilian the emperor, and gouernour of Flanders, Brabant, Holland, Zeland, and other the low countries appertaining to Charles the young prince of Castile, sent in the end of Maie to the king of England, to haue sixtene hundred archers, to aid him against the duke of Gelders, which sore troubled the countries aforesaid. The king tenderlie regarding the request of so noble a ladie, most gentlie granted his request, and appointed sir Edward Poynings, knight of the garter, and comptroller of his house, a valiant capteine and a noble warrior, to be lieutenant and leader of the said sixtene hundred archers.

This gentleman accompanied with his sonne in law the lord Clinton, sir Mathew Bolone, sir John Digbie, John Werton, Richard Whethill, and Schelleie esquiers, with other gentlemen and yeomen, to the foresaid number of sixtene hundred, took their ships a mile beside Sandwich, the eighteenth daie of Iulie, and landed at Armele the nineteenth daie, not without some trouble, by reason of a little storme. From thence they were conducted to Barlowe, whither the ladie Regent came to welcome them. On the sundae, being the seuen & twentieth of Iulie, they departed to Rossendale, and on thursdaie the last of Iulie they came to Bulduke. And the next daie the whole armie of the Almans, Flemings, and other appertaining to the said ladie met with the English, men without Bulduke, where they set forth in order, the ladie Regent being there present, which took his leaue of all the captains, and departed to Bulduke.

The armie, to the number of ten thousand, beside the sixtene hundred English archers, passed forward; and the tenth daie of August, being saint Laurence daie, came before a little castle, standing on the higher side of the Mase, called Westmoist, belonging to the ballard of Gelderland. The same night, Thomas Hert, cheefe gouernour of the ordinance of the English part, made his approach; and in the morning, made batterie, so, that the assault thereupon being giuen, the castle was worne, and the capteine with eighte and six men were slaine, and nineteene taken; of the which, eleven were hanged. John Foxton, capteine of one hundred Englishmen, and one Guiot an esquier of Burgognie, crying saint George, were the first that entered; at which assault, there was but one Englishman slaine. On thursdaie, the fourteenth of August, the armie ferried ouer the river of Mase into Gelderland. The next daie, they came to a little towne called Aiske.

The people were fled, but there was a little castle raised, and cast towne, which was newlie built by on the side of the said river. Upon the twentieth daie of August, they burnt the foresaid towne of Aiske, and all the countrie about it, and came at the last to a towne called Straulle, being verie strong, double diked and walled. Within it were three hundred & fiftie god men of war, beside the inhabitants. At the first, they shewed good countenance of defense but when they saw their enemies approach nere vnto them with rammers and trenches, they yielded by composition, so that the souldiers might depart with a little sicke in their hands. But the townsmen refused prisoners, at the will of the prince of Castile. And so on s. Bartholomewes day the admerall of Flanders, and sir Edward Poynings entered the towne with great triumph.

On the fir and twentieth daie, the armie came before Wenlow, and sent an herald called Arthois, to summon the towne; but they within would not heare but shot guns at him. On the eight and twentieth daie, the armie remoued vnto the north side of Wenlow, and part went ouer the water, and made trenches to the water, & so besieged the towne as straitlie as their number would giue them leaue; but yet for all that they could do without, they within kept one gate euer open. At length, the English captains perceiuing that they laie there in vaine, considering the strength of the towne, and also how the armie was not of number sufficient to enuiron the same on each side, wrote to the king, who willed them with all speed to returne, and so they did. Sir Edward Poynings went to the court of Burgognie, where he was receiued right honozable of the young prince of Castile and of his aunt the ladie Margaret.

John Foxton, John Fog, John Scot, and Thomas Linde, were made knights by the prince. And the ladie Margaret perceiuing the souldiers coates to be worne and foule with lieng on the ground (for euerie man laie not in a tent) gaue to euerie peoman a coate of wollen cloth of pealowe, red, white, and graine colours, not to his little land & passe among the Englishmen. After that sir Edward Poynings had bene highlie feasted and more praised of all men for his valiantnesse and good order of his people, he returned with his crue into England, and had lost by war and sicknesse not fallie an hundred persons. When the Englishmen were departed, the Gelders issued out of the gates of Wenlow, daily skirmished with with the Bargognions, and asked for their archers, and herewith winter began sharple to approach, and the river of Paze by abundance of raine rose so high, that it drowned up the frenches: so that all things considered, the captains without determined to raise their siege, and so they did, and after they had wasted all the countrie about Aenlow, they returned euerie man to his home.

In June the king being at Leicester, heard tidings, that one Andzew Barton a Scottishman and pirat of the sea, sailing that the king of Scots had warre with the Portingals, robbed euerie nation, and stopped the kings streames, that no merchant almost could passe. And when he took Englishmens goods, he bare them in hand that they were Portingals goods, and thus he haunted and robbed at euerie hauens mouth. The king displeased herewith, sent sir Edward Howard lord admerall of England, and lord Thomas Howard, sonne and heire to the earle of Surrie in all hast to the sea, which battell made readie two ships, and taking sea, by chance of weather were seuered. The lord Howard lying in the downes, perceluted where Andzew was making toward Scotland, and so fast the said lord chased him, that he ouertoke him; and there was a soze battell betwixt them. Andzew ever blew his whiffle to encourage his men, but at length the lord Howard and the Englishmen did so ballantie, that by cleane strength they entered the maine decke. The Scots fought soze on the hatches: but in conclusion Andzew was taken, and so soze wounded, that he died there. Then all the remnant of the Scots were taken with their ship called the Lion.

All this while was the lord admerall in chase of the barke of Scotland, called Jennie Piruine, which was went to saille with the Lion in companie, & so much did he wish other, that he laid him aboard: and though the Scots manfully defended themselves, yet the Englishmen entered the barke, slue manie, and took all the residue. Thus were these two ships taken, and brought to Blackewall the second of August [and all the Scots were sent unto the bishop of Poxhes place, where they remained at the kings charge, till other direction was taken for them. After this, the king sent the bishop of Winchester, and certaine of his counsell, to the archbishop of Poxhes place, where the Scots were prisoners: and there the bishop rehearsed to them, whereas peace was yet betwene England and Scotland, that they contrary to that, as theues & pirats, had robbed the kings subiects within his streames. Wherefore they had deserved to die by the law, and to be hanged at the low water marke. Then said the Scots; We acknowledge our offense, and aske mercie and not the law. Then a preest which was also a prisoner, said; My lords we appeale from the kings iustice to his mercie.

When the bishop asked him if he were authorized by them to saie so, and they cried all; Yea, yea. Then (said he) you shall find the kings mercie aboue his iustice. For where you were dead by the law, yet by his mercie he will rentue you; wherefore you shall depart out of this realme within twentie daies, by paine of death, if you be found after the twentieth daie; and praise for the king: and so they passed into their countrie. Thus was their captiuitie converted into libertie, and their liues saved by the kings mercie. The king of Scots hearing of the death of Andzew Barton, and the taking of the two ships, was wonderfull wroth, and sent letters to the king requiring restitution, according to the league and amitie. The king wrote to the king of Scots againe with brotherlie salutation, of the robberies done by the said Andzew, and that it became not a prince to laie breach of peate to his confederat, for doing iustice vpon a pirat and these: and that all the Scots that were taken, had deserved to die by iustice, if he had not extended his mercie. And with this answer the Scottish herald departed.

About this season, the French king made sharpe warre against pope Iulie: wherefore the king of England wrote to the French king, that he should leaue off to vex the pope in such wise, being his friend and confederat. But when the French king seemed little to regard that request, the king sent him word to deliuer him his lawfull inheritance both of the duchie of Normandie and Guien, and the countie of Anjou & Maine, and also of his crowne of France; or else he would come with such a power, that by fine force he would obtaine his purpose: but notwithstanding those writings, the French king still pursued his warres in Italie. Whereupon the king of England, joining in league with Maximilian the emperor, and Ferdinando king of Spaine, with diuerse other princes, was resolved by aduise of his counsell to make warre on the French king and his countie, and made preparation both by sea and land, setting forth ships to the sea for safegard of his merchants.

The foresaid pope Iulie, the kings confederat, was (before his aduancement to the popedom) cardinal of saint Petri ad Vincula, a man mightie in friends, reputation, and riches, who had giuene to him the voices of so manie cardinals, that entering the conclaue, he was with an example all new and without shutting the conclaue, elected pope the verie same night following the deceasse of his predecessor pope Pius (those that were of the contrarie opinion not daring to oppose against him.) He, either hauing regard to his first name Iulie, or (as coniectures were made) to signifie the greatnesse of his conceptions, or lastlie because he would not giue place to Alexander, no not in the excellencie of name, took vpon him the name of Iulie, the second of that name. Amongest all the popes that had passed, it was wondered that by so great consent, they had created for pope, a cardinal who was knowne to be of a disposition rigozous and terrible, and in whome was no expectation of rest and tranquillitie, hauing consumed his youth in continuall trauels, offended manie by necessitie, and exercised hatreds against manie great personages; a man to whose wit nothing was more familiar, than the inuention of trouble, faction, and conspiracie.

But on the other side, the causes of his election to that degre appeared clerelie, and surmounted all other difficultes: for he had bene of long time a cardinal of great power and might, & with his magnificence, wherein he had alwayes excelled the residue, and with the greatnesse of his spirit, by the which he did great things, he had not onelie made himselfe mightie in opinion and friends; but by times and degrees had erected high his authoritie in the court of Rome, bearing the name, title, and dignitie of the principall defensor of the ecclesiastike libertie. But that which serued most to his aduancement, was the promises immoderate and infinite which he made to the cardinals, princes, and barons, and to all others whome he might make profitable to him in that action. Besides, he had the meane to distribute monie, benefices, and spirituall dignities, as well such as were his owne, as those that were the rights of others; for that such was the hute & renoume of his liberalitie, that manie made willing offers to him to dispose as he best liked of their treasures, their names, their offices, and benefices.

They considered not that his promises were farre too great, than that being pope he was either able or ought ought to oblerue, for that he had of so long continuance intioed the name of iust and vpright, that pope Alexander himselfe (his greatest enimie) speaking ill of him, in all other things could not but confesse him to be true of his word. A praise which he made no care to defile and flaine, to the end to become pope; knowing that no man more easilie beguileth an other, than he that hath the custome and name neuer to be false anie. Which practise of dissimulation was much frequented of those that aspired & possessed the popedom; in so much that the same was in Alexander the first so notable, that it was a proverbe ordinarie in Rome, that the pope did neuer the thing which he said, and his sonne the duke of Valentinois seldome spake that which he ment. Which kind of people (pretend they what they will) are excluded from the rest of Shion, as the psalmist saith:

Quem fraudis expers simplicitas inuauat, Vrgétque rectum propofiti tenax, Nec mente fauus grata blandam Edocuit fimulare linguam, Perpetua requie fruétur.]

In this yeare he requir'd his Christmasse at Greenwich, where was such abundance of viands serued to all comers of anie honest behaviour, as hath bene few times sene. And against Ietoveres night was made in the hall a castell, gates, towers, and dungeon, garnished with artillerie and weapon after the most warlike fashion : and on the front of the castell, was witten Le fortresse dangereux, and within the castell were six ladies, clothed in russet sattin, laid all ouer with leanes of gold, and euerie one knit with laces of blew silke and gold. On their heads, colles, and caps all of gold. After this castell had bene caried about the hall, and the queene had beheld it, in came the king with five other, apparelled in coats, the one halfe of russet sattin, spangled with spangles of fine gold, the other halfe of rich cloth of gold, on their heads caps of russet sattin, embroidered with works of fine gold bullion.

These first assaulted the castell. The ladies seeing them so lustie and couragious, were content to solace with them, & upon further communicatton, to yeeld the castell and so they came downe & danced a long space. And after the ladies led the knights into the castle; and then the castell suddenlie vanished out of their sights. On the daie of the Epiphanie at night, the king with eleven other were disguised, after the manner of Italie, called a masque, a thing not sene before in England: they were apparelled in garments long and broad, wrought all with gold, with visors and caps of gold. And after the banquet done, these maskers came in, with fir gentlemen disguised in silke, bearing staffe torches, and desired the ladies to dance; some were content, and some refused. And after they had danced, and communed together, as the fashion of the masque is, they took their leave and departed, and so did the queene, and all the ladies.

The five and twentieth daie of Ianuarie began the parlement, where the bishop of Canturburie began his oration with this verbe In iustitia et pax osculata sunt. Upon which wordes he declared how iustice should be ministred, and peace should be nourished, and by what meanes iustice was put by, and peace turned into warre. And thereupon he shewed how the French king would doe no iustice in ressoying to the king his right inheritance: therefore for lacke of iustice, peace of necessitie must be turned into warre. In this parlement was granted two fifths of the temporall, and of the clergie two tenths. After that it was concluded by the whole bodie of the realme in the high court of parlement assembled, that warre should be made on the French king and his dominions. Whereupon was wonderfull speed made in preparing all things necessarie both for sea and land.

In this parlement was sir Robert Sheffield knight, sometime recorder of London, speaker for the commons. During this parlement, in the moneth of March, a yeoman of the crowne, one of the kings gard, named Newbolt, due within the palace of Westminster a seruant of maister Willoughbies, for the which offense the king commanded to be set by a new paire of gallowes in the same place where the said seruant lost his life; and vpon the same the said Newbolt was hanged, and there remained on the gallowes by the space of two daies. A notable example of iustice, whereby the king verified the report that was commonlie noised abroad of him; namelie that he could not abide the shedding of mans blood, much lesse wilfull murder. Wherein he shewed how tender he was ouer his subiects, and also how seuer against malefactors, specialie mankillers; whome he thought vnworthy of life, that had bene the instruments of others death; according to the law:

—oculos oculis & dentibus esse

¶ In this season one Jerome Bonuiffe, which was borne in Luke, and was factor in London for merchants of that nation, and had plaied bankrupt, and was conuicted out of the realme for debt, was now in such fauour with pope Iulie, that he made him his collector; and pector in England: & so he kept a great post, and refoited to the king and his counsell for the popes affaires (which then was soe troubled by the French king) so that he knew both the popes counsell and the things, and falselie and vnturilie refoited by night to the French ambassadours lieng in London, and to them discouered what the king and the pope intended, which was not so closelie done, but the king knew it: and so he was laid for, & was taken communicating with one of the said ambassadours by on London wall at midnight, and brought to the Tower, where he remained untill by the sute of his friends he was deliuered, and thostlie for shame vnderde the realme.]

The king of Aragon also, hauing at that time in warre with the French king, wrote to his sonne in law king Henrie, that if he would send ouer an armie into Bilkaie, and so to inuade France on that side, for the recouerie first of his duchie of Guien; he would aid them with ordinance, horsemen, beasts, and cariages, with other necessaries appertaining to the same. The king and his counsell putting their assistance in this promise of king Ferdinando, prepared a noble armie all of footmen, and small artillerie, appointing the noble lord Thomas Grete Mar-quesse Dorset to be cheefe conductour of the same. The king dalleie finding to set forth his warre which he had begun against the French king, caused sir Edward Howard his admerall with diligence to make readie diuerse goodlie tall ships, as the Soueraigne and others, to the number of eightene, beside other smaller vessels.

Thereof he having in his companie sir William Broune, Griffith Dohie, Edward Cobham, Tho-ton, Pharris Sherborne, Stephan Wall, George Wiltwange, John Hopton, William Gunning, Thomas Dwyer, Edmund Coke, John Barret, and divers others, he took the sea, and following the same, about the middle of Maie he came before Dorchester. About the very selfe time the lord mar-raiment of Wilske, as the lord Howard sonne and apozis Berkeleie, sir William Sands, the baron of Burford, sir Richard Cornetwall brother to the said baron, William Hulleie, John Melton, William Kington elquiers, sir Henrie Willoughbie, and di-uerse others, with souldiers to the number of ten thousand.

Amongst these were five hundred Almans clad all in white, under the leading of one Guiot a gentleman of Flanders, all which (with the residue above-named) came to Southampton, and there mustered their bands which were appointed and trimmed in the best manner. On the firste daye of Maie they were all bestowed aboard in Spanish ships furnished with bittels, and other necessaries for that iournee. The wind serued so well for their purpose, that they came all in safetie on the coast of Biskaye at the port of Bassaghy southwesterly of Fonterabie; and so the third daye of June they landed, and took the field, imbattelling themselves for their safegard right strong-lie. Within three daies after that the armie was thus aland, there came to the marquesse an earle and an other noble man, to welcome him and his companye.

Then the lord capteine removed his field, & took an other place nearer to Fonterabie, where he laie a long time, looking euerie daie to haue aid of horsemen and artillerie of the king of Aragon, but none came. Sir John Stile caused to be bought two hundred mules and asses of such price as the Spaniards gained greatlie, and when they were put to carie and draw, they would not serue the turne, for they were not exercised thereto before that time; and so for want of beasts to draw such ordnance as the Englishmen had there with them, they lost the doing of some great exploit against the Frenchmen on the frontiers of Gascoigne, for they might haue run a great waite into that countrie, being as then destitute and improuided of men and munitions.

On a daie the Frenchmen made a skrie toward the English campe, but the Englishmen perceiuing them, passed the riuer that was betwixt them, and with arrowes chased the Frenchmen; so that for hast manie of their horses foundered, and fell, per they came to Baion: if there had bene anie horsemen amongst the Englishmen, they had soze indamaged their enemies. The king of Navarre doubting least the Englishmen were come into those parties for no good meaning towards him, sent to the lord mar-quesse a bishop, and diuerse other, offering to minister bittels vnto the Englishmen for their monie, if it should stand so with his pleasure. The lord mar-quesse thanked him for the offer, and promised that if they of Navarre would bittell his people, they should paye them well and trulie for the same.

He said also that he would warrant their passing and repassing in safetie, and that by the Englishmen no preiudice should be done to his realme. Hereupon were the Englishmen bittelled out of Navarre, to their great comfort. After that the armie had laine thirtie daies in the second campe, there came from the king of Aragon a bishop and other nobles of his councell. This bishop was the same that made the answer to the lord Marcie at Calis the last yeare.
The effect of his message was, to desire the lord capteine and his people to take patience for a while, and they should see that such preparation should be made for the furnishing of their enterpryse, as should stand with the honour of his maister and their advancements.

The Englishmen soze discontented with their idle leng tye in the field, misliked with his excuses, supposing the same (as they proued in deed) to be nothing but delates. In the meane time that the Englishmen thus lingered without attempting any exploit, their bittels were much part garike, & they eating thereof with all their meats, and drinking hot wines, & feeding also on hot fruits, procured their blood to boile within their bellies, that there fell sicke thre thousand of the sir: & thereof died an eightene hundred persons. The lord marquesse perceiuing this mischefe, sent to the king of Spaine certeine of his capteins to know his pleasure. The king told them that shoulde the duke of Alua should soine with them, bzinging with him a mightie power; so that they might the moze assuredlie proceed in their en-terpryse. With this answer they returned to the lord marquesse, who liked it neuer a deale; because he susged that the king meant but to dzyne time with him, as after it proued.

In the meane time there began a mutinie in the English campe thorough a false report, contriued by some malicious person; which was, that the cap-teins should be allowed eight pence for euerie common souldier; where the truth was, that they had allowed to them but onelie six pence. The lord generall aduertised that the souldiers began to gather in companies, found meanes to apprehend the chiefe beginner, and deliuered him vnto William Kingston elquier, then prouost marshall; and so was he put to death to the terrour of all other. Whilist the Englishmen laie thus in campe on the borders of Biskaye towards Guen, the archers went oftentimes a foraging into the French confines almost to Baion, and burnt manie pretie villages. The king of Spaine raised an armie, and sent south the same under the leading of the duke of Alua, which came forward as though he meant to haue come to the Englishmen; who being aduertised of his approach, were maruellouslie glad thereof, in hope that then they should be imploted about the enterpryse for the which they were come.

But the duke intending an other thing, when he was advanced south within a daies iournee of them, suddenlie removed his armie toward the realme of Navarre, and entering the same, chased out of his realme the king of that land, and conquered the same to the king of Spains vse, as in the historie of Spaine more plainelie it doth appeare. After that the king of Spaine was thus possessed of the kingdome of Navarre, he sent vnto the lord marquesse, promising to soine with him shoulde, and so to inuade the borders of France; but he came not.
Wherefore the Englishmen thought themselves not well vsed: for it graued them much, that they should lie so long tye, with there was so great hope conceiued at their setting south, that there should be some great exploit atchieued by them, thorough the aid that was promised by the king of Spaine.

Thus whilist the armie lingered without remouing, there chanced an affraie to rise betwixt the Englishmen and the townes-men of Sancta Maria, a village so called, whereunto such Englishmen as fell sicke, had their resort; and theret-on the alarms, brought into the campe, the Englishmen and Almans ran in great furie to the succour of their fellowes: and notwithstanding all that the capteins could do to stalle them, they slue and robbed the people without mercie. The Bis-taines that could get awaie, fled ouer that water into Guen. The capteins yet so ordered the matter, that all the pillage was restored, and one and twentie souldiers were condemned, which were apprehended as they were fleeing awaie with a bo-tie of ten thousand ducats into Gascoigne; seauen of them were executed, and the residue pardoned of life, at the sute of certeine lords of Spaine, which were as then present.

The Frenchmen hearing of this riot came south of Basen, to see and vnderstand the maner thereof: but perceiuing that the Englishmen had desiered them, suddenly they returned. The Englishmen followed, & coming to the towne of S. Jehan de Lucie, they burnt and robbed it, & slue the inhabitants. Diuerse other villages they spoiled on the borders of Guien; but because they wanted both hosties of seruice, and hosties to draw forth their ordnance, they could not do anie such damage as they might and would haue done, if they had bene furnished according to their desires in that point. Thus continued the English armie in such wearisome sort till the moneth of October, and then fell the lord marquisse sick, and the lord Howard had the chiefe gouernance of the armie.

Then were sent from the king of Spaine diuerse lords of his priue counsell vnto the said lord Howard, to excuse the matter for that he came not according to his promise, requiring them, that sith the time of the peare to make warre was past, it might please them to breake vp their campe, and to diuide themselves abroad into the townes and villages of his realme till the spring time of the yeare, that they might then go forward with their first pretended enterprise. The lord Howard shewed well in words that the Englishmen could not thinke well of the king of Spaines falsh excuses, and unprofitable delays, to his much hono<sup>r</sup> & their great hinderance & losse, hauing spent the king their maister so much treasure, and done so little hurt to his aduersaries. The Spaniards gaue faire words; and so in courteous maner departed.

dispersed into diuerse villages.

Then about the end of October. it was agreed amongst all the lords of the English host that they should breake vp their campe, and so they did. The lord marquisse and his people went to saint Sebastian, the lord Howard and his retinue to Hendre, the lord Willoughbie to Castilang, and sir William Sands with manie other capitaines repaired to Fotherable, and so euery capitaine with his retinue was placed in one towne or other. The king of England aduerted of the king of Spaine this meaning, sent an herald called Windsor with letters vnto his armie, willing his men there to tarry, & promising to send ouer to them right shortly a new supply, vnto the guiding of the lord Herbert his chamberlaine.

An appeare-ble rage a-mongest the English soldiers.

When this letter was read, and the contents thereof notified, the soldiers began to be so highly displeased, and spake such outrageous words, as it was maruell to heare: & not contented with words, they were bent to haue done outrageous deeds; insomuch that in their furie they had slaine the lord Howard and diuerse others, if they had not followed their intents: and hereupon they were glad to hire ships, and so imbarried themselves in the moneth of Nouember. When the lord marquisse was brought aboard, he was so weake and feeble of remembrance though sickened, that he asked where he was. In the beginning of December they landed here in England, and were glad to be at home, and got out of such a countrey, where they had little health, little pleasure, and much losse of time. The king of Spaine seemed to be sore discontented with their departure, openly affirming, that if they had tarried vntill the next spring, he would in their companies haue invaded France.

The lord ad-
mirall in Britaine.

About the same time that the marquisse went in to Spaine, that is to wit, about the middell of spate, sir Edward Howard lord admirall of England, being on the sea afoze Portsmouth, made south againe to the sea, and directing his course towards Britaine on Trinitie sundae arrived at Berthram baie with twentie great ships, and suddenly set his men on land, and there was a bulwoke, which the Britains kept and defended a while, but being overcome, fled out of their hold, & left it to the Englishmen. When the lord admirall passed leauen miles into the countrey, burning and halting townes and villages, and in returning, skirmished with diuerse men of armes, and slue some of them: and notwithstanding that the Britains fought valiantlie in defense of their countrey; yet they were put to the worse, and so the lord admirall returned to his ships.

On the thre & twentieth daie of spate being mon, daie, he landed in the morning, and commanded to burne the house of the lord Piers Hoguns, with the towne of Conquet, & diuerse other places, and chased the Britains into the castell of West: and notwithstanding all the assemblies and shewes that the Britains made, yet they suffered the English peace, able to returne with their priues and hosties. The first of June the Englishmen took land in Croston baie, and then the lords of Britaine sent word to the lord admirall, that if he would abide, they would giue him battell. The admirall rewarded the messenger, and willed him to say to them that sent, that all that day they should find him in that place tarieng their coming.

Thereto encourage diuerse gentlemen the more earnestlie to shew their valiancie, he dubbed them knights; as sir Edward Brooke, brother to the lord Cobham, sir Griffith Dohne, sir Thomas Windham, sir Thomas Lucie, sir John Burdet, sir William Winton, sir Henrie Shirborne, and sir Stephan Bull. When the lord admirall saw the Frenchmen come, he comforted his men with pleasant words, therby the more to encourage them. The whole number of the Englishmen was not much above 25 hundred, where the Frenchmen were at the least ten thousand; and yet when they saw the order of the Englishmen, they were suddenly astonished.

Then a gentleman of good experience and credit amongst them, aduised the other capitaines not to fight, but to retire a little and take a strong ground, there to remaine till the Englishmen returned to ward their ships: and then to take the advantage. And so the capitaines began to retire, which when the commons saw, they all ran apace as fast as they might, supposing that the capitaines had some unknowne kind of great perill at hand, because they were not priue to the purpose of their capitaines. The lord admirall seeing what happened, when the night came departed to his ships. After this the gentlemen of Britaine sent to the admirall for a safe conduct for diuerse persons, which they meant to send to him about a treatie. The lord admirall was of his gentleness content to grant their request. Then certaine lords of Britaine took a bote, and came to the ship of the lord admirall, where he was set with all his counsell of the armie about him.

The request of the Britains was, that it might please him to increase his retell kind of warre, in burning of townes and villages: but the admirall plainlie told them, that he was sent to make warre and not peace. Their they required a truce for six daies, which would not be granted; and to their reproof, the admirall told them, that gentlemen ought to defend their countrey by force, rather than to sue for peace. And thus making them a banquet he sent them apace. And after hearing that there was ships of warre on the seas, he coasted from thence along the countrey of Normandie, still scotoring the sea, so that no enemie durst appeare. And at length he came and late by the Ile of Wight, to see if anie enemies would appeare. During which time, diuers ships were kept in the north seas, vnder the conduct of sir Edward Schingham, John Welwes, John Louedale, and others.

about the cou men North
the french

a Sinaime

The French king, in this meane while had prepared a manie offshottine nine saile in the haven of West, and for these he ordeined a great Carrike of West, appertaining to the queene his wife, called Conquerer, a verie strong ship, and verie well appointed. This manie sett forth out of West the tenth of August, and came to Brittain bate, in the which the same day was the English fleet arrived. When the Englishmen perceived the Frenchmen to be issued forth of the haven of West, they prepared themselves to battell, and made forth towards their enemye, which came sterke forwarde; and comming in sight each of other, they shot off their ordnance so terrible together, that all the sea coast sounded of it. The lord admirall made with the great ship of Dèpe, and aided him; sir Henrie Gilford and also sir Charles Brandon made with the great Carrike of West, being in the Souveraigne, and laid them to stein to the Carricke; but by negligence of the master, or else by smoke of the ordnance, or otherwise, the Souveraigne was cast at the sterne of the Carrike, with which advantage the Frenchmen fought for long.

40

The king of England hearing of the losse of the Regent, caused a great ship to be made, such a one as the like had neuer bene sene in England, and named it Henrie grace de Dieu. The French king about the same time sent to a knight of the Rhodes called Dniour Jehan, a Frenchman bozne, of the countrie of Guien, requiring him to come by the streits of Sparracke into Britaine: the which he did, bringing with him three gallies of force, with diuerse foists and roge-gallies, so well ordinaed and trimmed, as the like had not bene sene in these parties before his comming. He came laine on the coasts of Barbarie to defend certeine of the religion, as they came from Tripolie. This yeare in the moneth of Nouember the king called his high court of parlement, in the which it was concluded, that the king himselfe in person with an armie of all shuld inuade France, whereupon notice being giuen to such as shuld attend, they made their purueiance with all diligence that might be. In this parlement was granted to the king twelff fiftens, and foure demies, and head monie, of euery duke ten markes, an earle five pounds, a lord four pounds, a knight four markes, & euerie man rated eight hundred pounds in goods, to paie foure markes and so after that rate, till him that was valued a fortie shillings, paid twelue pence, and euerie man that toke fortie shillings wages twelue pence, and euerie man and woman of fiftene yeares or byward foure pence. The steeple and lanterne of Wol church in Cheape was this yeare finished. By this yeare a great part of the kings palace of Westminster, and the chappell in the Towler of London and manie other places in England were burned. In Aprill, the king sent a great nauie of twelue thousand thousand men to the sea. On Maie euen, Edmund de la Pole was beheaded on the Tower hill, his brother Richard was after slaine in France.]

After this parlement was ended, the king kept a solemne Chiffenaffe at Greenwiche, with dances and mummings in most princelike maner. And on the twelffe daie at night came into the hall a mount, called the rich mount. The mount was set full of rich flowers of silke, and especiallie full of bryarne slips full of cods, the branches were greene sattin, and the flowers flat gold of damaske, which signified plantagenet. On the top stood a goodlie beaçon giuing light, round about the beaçon sat the king and queene other, all in cotes and caps of right crimsin velvet, embroidered with flat gold of damaske, their cotes set full of spangles of gold. And foure woodhouses drew the mount till it came befoze the queene, and then the king and his companie descended and danced. When suddenly the mount opened, and out came six ladies all in crimsin sattin and plunket, embrode-red with gold and pearle, with french hoods on their heads, and they danced alone. When the lordes of the mount toke the ladies and danced together: and the ladies reentered, and the mount closed, and so was conquered out of the hall. When the king shewed him, and came to the queene, and sat at the banquet which was verie sumptuous.

Sir Charles
F. Gordon cre-

Lille.

The naui set cut again.

The English
naue purposing to set vp on the french in the hauen, are defeated
by a mischance.

After Candlemasse, the king created sir Charles Brandon vicount Lisle. In March following was the kings naue of ships totall & other set forth to the number of fortye and two, beside other balangers vnder the conduct of the lord admerall, accompanied with sir Walter Deuerent, lord Ferrers, sir Mol- tan Wyborne, sir Edward Ingtham, sir Antonie Pointz, sir John Wallop, sir Thomas Wilmadam, sir Stephan Bull, William Fitz Williams, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidneie esquires, and diuerse other noble and balliant capteins. They failed to Portsmouth, and there late abiding wind, and when the same serued their turne, they weied anchor, & making saile into Britaine, came into Berthram baie, and there late at ancho; in sight of the French naue, which kept it selfe close within the haueu of Wexf. without proffering to come aboard.

The English perceiuing the maner of the French men, determined to fet on them in the haven, and making forward in good order of battell, at their first encounter one of their ships, whereof Arthur Plantagenet, was captaine, fell on a blind rocke, and burst in sunder, by reason thereof, all the other staid: and the English captaine perceiuing that the haven was dangerous to enter without an expert lordesman, they cast about, and returned to their harborowgh at Worcham baie againe. The Frenchmen perceiuing that the Englishmen meant to assaile them, moored their ships so nere to the castell of Bzelt as they could, and placed bulwarks on the land on euerie side, to shoot at the Englishmen. Also they frayed together foure and twentie great hulkes that came to the baie for salt, and set them on a row, to the intent that if the Englishmen had come to assaunt them, they would haue set those hulkes on fire, and haue let them dyue with the streame amongst the English ships.

Prior Jehan also laie still in Blanke sable baie, and plucked his gallies to the shoze, setting his bassilikes and other ordinaunce in the mouth of the baie, which baie was bulwarked on euerie side, that by water it was not possible to be wone . The lord admerall perceiuing the French naute thus to lie in feare , wrote to the king to come thither in person, and to haue the honour of so high an enterprisc: which writing the kings counsell nothing allowed, for putting the king in teopardie vpon the chance of the sea.

Therefore the king wrote to him Charlie againe, commanding him to accomplish that which appertained to his dutie: which caused him to adventure things further than his wisdom would he should (as after ye shall heare) to his utter vndoying and casting awaie, God hauing ordeined the means by his prouidence, which the pagans implied (though wanting the light of grace) in the name of deslinie, of them counted inuitable. [A deslinie lamentable considering the qualitie of the person, with the manner of his dieng. wherein although manie baineite dispute, that fortune led him to so miserable an accident: yet if we will lift vs to our considerations to God, we shall find that he hath reserved such a prerogative ouer all things which he hath created, that to him onelie belongeth the authoritie to dispose all things by the same power where with he hath created them of nothing.] And yet the foolish world (doting in blind ignorance, but pretending a singular insight in matters of secretie) bluseth not to falseth rather to asseuer, casualtie, chance, meerie, misfortune, and such like foolish imaginations: whereas indeed the prouidence of God compasseth all things thatsoener, for nothing can be pruilleged from the amplenesse of the same.

Prizor Zehan keeping him still within his hold, as a prisoner in a dungeon : did yet sometime send out his small foists to make a sloop before the English maue, which chased them to the baie. But becaue the English ships were mightie vessels, they could not enter the baie : and therefore the lord admirall caused certeine boats to be manned forth, which tooke one of the best foists that Prizor Zehan had, and that with great banger: for the gallies and bulwokes shot so freshlie all at one instant, that it was maruell how the Englishmen escaped. The lord admirall perceiving that the Frenchmen would not come aboard, called a councill, wherein it was determined, that first they would assaile Prizor Zehan and his gallies lieng in Blanche sable baie, and after to set on the residue of the French fleet in the haven of West. When first it was appointed, that the lord Ferrers, sir Stephan Bull, and other, should go along with a conuenient number to assaile the bulwokes, while the admirall entered with xvj. barges and little gallies into the baie, and so should the Frenchmen be assailed both by water and land.

The lord admerall by the counsell of a Spanissh knight called sir Alfonse Charant, affirming that he might enter the baie with little leoparde, called to him William Fitz Williams, William Cobbe, John Colleie, and sir Wolstan Bzotone, as his cheefe and most trustie freends, making them ppytie to his intent; which was to take on him the whole enterprise, with their assistance. And so on S. Marcs daie, which is the five and twentieth of Aprill, the said admerall put himselfe in a small row barge, appointing three other small rowing ships, and his owne ship bote to attend him; and therewith upon a sudden rowed into the baie, where Don Sebastian had moored by his gallies iust to the ground: which gallies with the bulwokes on the land, shot so terrible, that they that followed were afraid. But the admerall passed forward, & as some as he came to the gallies, he entered & droue out the Frenchmen. William Fitz Williams within his ship was sore hurt with a quarell. The baie was shallow, and the other ships could not enter, so the tide was spent.

Which thing the Frenchmen perceiving, they entered the gallies againe with moris pikes, and fought with the English in the gallies. The admerall perceiving their approach, thought to have entred againe into his rove barge, which by violence of the tide was driven downe the Streame, and with a pike he was the lord Howard over the board, and so drowned, and also the renowned Alphonse was there slain: all the other boats and vessels escaped verie hardlie awaie: for if they had taried, the tide had failed them, and then all had bene lost. The lord Ferrers and the other captains were right sorrowfull of this chance: but when there was no remedie, they determined not to attempt anie further, till they might understand the kings pleasure, and so they returned into England.

The Frenchmen perceiuing that the English fleet departed from the coasts of Britaine and drew towards England, did come forth of their hauens, and the lord Jehan set forth his gallees and foists, and drawing alongst the coasts of Normandie and Bri-taine, coasted ouer to the borders of Souther with all his companie, and there landed, and set fire on certaine poze cotages. The gentlemen that dwelt nere, raised the countie, and came to the coast, and drew the lord Jehan to his gallees. The king was right sozie for the death of his admerall; but sorrowfullie not when the chance is past. Therefore the king hearing that the French nauie was abroad, called to him the lord Thomas Howard eldest brother to the late admerall, and sonne and heire apparant to the earle of Surrie, whome he made admerall, willing him to reuenge his brothers death. The lord Howard humbly thanked his grace of the trust that he put in him, and so immediatlie went to the sea, and scowred the same, that no Frenchman durst shew himselfe on the coast of England, for he fought with them at their owne ports.

The king hauing all his prouisions readie for the warre, and meaning to passe the sea in his owne person, for the better taining of the losse Frenchmen, appointed that worthy counsellor and right redoub-ted cheffaine, the noble George Talbot earle of Shrewsburie, high steward of his household, to be captaine generall of his foreward; and in his com-panie were appointed to go, the lord Thomas Stanleie earle of Derby, lord Deuolweie prior of saint Johns, sir Robert Kitchiffe lord Fitzwater, the lord Hastings, the lord Cobham, sir Alice ap Thomas, sir Thomas Blunt, sir Richard Sacherell, sir John Digbie, sir John Alketo, sir Lewes Bagot, sir Thomas Coznewall, and manie other knights, equiers, and souldiers; to the number of eight thousand men. These passed the sea, and came all to Calis about the middle of Maie.

The lord Herbert called sir Charles Summer-set, lord chamberleine to the king, in the end of the same moneth followed the said earle of Shrewsbu-rie, with sir thousand men: in whose companie were the erls of Northumberland and Berrie, of Kent Greie, of Wilshire Stafford, the lord Mable, the lord De-lauiere, and his sonne sir Thomas West, sir Edward Huseie, sir Edward Dimmoche, sir David Owen, with manie other knights, equiers, and gentlemen. After they had sojourned certine daies in Calis, and that all their necessaries were readie, they issued forth of the towne, so to begin their campe. And first the earle of Shrewsburie and his companie toke the field, and after him the lord Herbert with his retinues in manner of a reerward.
Then followed that valiant knight sir Alice ap Thomas, with five hundred light horsemen and archers on horsebacke, who ioined himselfe to the foreward, a gentleman of such spirit and hardinesse, that he is named the floure of the Welshmen, as the poet saith:

— Ricus Thomas flus Cambrobritanum.

These two lords thus imbattelled did remoue the seventeenth of June to Sandifield, and on the eighteenth they came to Marguison, on the further side of the water, as though they would haue passed straight waies to Bullongne. But they meaning an other thing, the next daie toke an other waie, and so coasted the countie with such diligence, that the two and twentieth of June they came before the strong citie of Teronan, and pight their tents a mile from the towne. The same night (as certine captains were in councell within the lord Herberts tent) the baron Carew was slain with a bullet shot out of the towne; which sudden aduenture much dismayed the assemblie, but the lord Herbert comforted them with manlie words, and so his death was passed ouer. All the countie of Artois and Picardie fortified their holds, and made thewes as the English armie passed, but they durst not once assaile them.

The citie of Terrouan was stronglie fortified with walles, rampiers, bulwarks, and large ditches.
The lord Pontremie was gouernour within it, hauing with him sir hundred horsemen, and 2500 Al-mans, besides the inhabitants. The walles and towers were full of ordinance, which oftentimes did much displeasure to the Englishmen. The earle of Shrews-burie planted his siege on the north west side of the towne, and the lord Herbert on the east side, causing great trenches to be made to coner his people with-all: for on that side there was no hill to succour or defend him. The Frenchmen and Almans would di-uerse times issue out, but the archers were cuer readie to beat them into the citie againe. The earle of Shrewsburie got into an hollow ground or ballie nere to the citie, and likewise the lord Herbert (by reason of his trenches) approached likewise verie nere to the ditches.

The seven and twentieth daie of June being mordaie, sir Nicholas Taur and sir Edward Belknap, hauing with them foure hundred and thre score men set from Guines to conduct foure and twentie carts laden with vittels towards the siege at Terrouan; but the duke of Glendosme lieutenant of Picardie with eight hundred horsemen set on them as they passed through Ard, and found them so out of order, that notwithstanding all that the English captains could do to bring men into arraie, it would not be:
for the Frenchmen set on so readilie, that they kept the Englishmen in sunder. Yet the horsemen of Guines, being not past foure and twentie in all, toke their speares and ioined with the Frenchmen right manfullie, and likewise thre score archers shot freshlie at their enemies; but the Frenchmen were so manie in number, that they obtained the place, slue eight gentlemen, and diuerse archers. Sir Nicholas Taur and sir Edward Belknap fled toward Guisnes.

Thus were the vittels lost, and yet the Frenchmen went not awaie with cleere hands: for those few archers that closed together, shot so egerlie, that they slue and hurt diuerse Frenchmen; and on the field laie foure score and seuen great horses, which died there in the place, and neuer went further. On the fiftenth day of June the king departed from Crene-wich, taking his iourneie towards Douer, whither he came by easie iournies, and the quene in his com-panie. After he had rested a season in the castell of Douer, and taken order for the rule of the realme in his absence, he toke leave of the quene, and entring his ship the last daie of June, being the daie of saint Panle: he sailed ouer to Calis, where he was recei-ued with great top by the deputie sir Gilbert Talbot and all other there. At his entring into Calis, all the banished men entred with him, and were restored to the libertie of the towne. The king laie in Calis a certine time, till all his prouisions were readie, but the armie laie in campe at Pelwatham bridge.

On the one and twentieth of Julie, the kings maiestie passed forth of Calis, and toke the field, din-ding the armie which he had there with him into three battells. The lord Lisle marshall of the host was captain of the foreward, and under him three thousand men: sir Richard Carew with three hundred kept on the right side of the same foreward as a wing there: to: and the lord Darcie with other three hundred men was a wing on the left hand. The fore-riders of this battell were the Northumberland men on light geldings. The earle of Essex was lieutenant general of the speares, and sir John Perchie was vicegovernour of all the horsemen, and sir John Burdet standard-bearer to the kings speares. An eight hundred Almans went on a plume by themselves before the kings battell, and the duke of Buckingham with six hundred men was on the kings left hand, equall with the Almans, in like manner as sir Edward Poynings was on the right hand, with other six hundred men equall with the Almans.

was afterward carbin-
nall.

In the kings battell, there was the standard of the armes of England borne by sir Henrie Guilford, there were three thousand; & the lord of Aburgauenie with eight hundred men was wing on the right hand, and sir William Compton with the retinue of the bishop of Winchester, and of maister * Wolfe the kings almoner, being in number eight hundred was in manner of a reere-gard. Sir Anthony Dugher and sir John Penill with the kings speares that followed were four hundred, and so the whole armie contained eleven thousand and three hundred men. The number of the carriages were thirtene hundred, and the number of them that attended the same were nineteen hundred men, and all these were reckoned in the battell: but of good fighting men & soldiers appointed for the purpose, there were not full nine thousand. In this order the king with his armie marched forward through the confines of his enemies to the siege of Terrouan, entering into the French ground the five and twentieth of Julie being mondaie. On the morrow after as the armie marched forward, by negligence of the carters that mistooke the waie, a great curtall (called the John Cuanellist) was overthrowne in a deepe pond of water and could not quicklie be recovered.

armie appro-cheth, & their number.

The king being advertised that the Frenchmen approached to fight with him, left the gun (because the maister carpenter undertooke to weie it thorowly out of the water) & set forward, passing on by Tornohan, which he left on his right hand, and a little beyond pitched downe his field abiding for his enemies, the which (as he was informed) were not far off. On the morrow after being wednesdaie, the reliefe of the speares brought word that they had ascried the French armie comming forward in order of battell, to the number of eleven thousand footmen, and four thousand horsemen. Captains of this armie were the lord de la Palice, the lord de Biennes, the duke of Longueville, the earle of S. Paule, the lord of Floranges, the lord of Cleremont, & Richard de la Pole a banished man, son to John duke of Suffolke. They came within two miles of the kings armie, and there the footmen scaled, and came no further.

The northern pickers place
the men.

But certeine of the horsemen to the number of three thousand came forward, and at the end of a wood shewed themselves in open sight of the English armie. And thus they stood countenancing the Englishmen. Some of the northern pickers made to them, and in skirmishing with them, took some of them prisoners. About none the same daie, that valiant Welsh knight sir Rice ap Thomas with his retinue of horsemen being departed from the siege of Terrouan came to the king, and freightwaies was sent to the earle of Essex, which with two hundred speares was laid in a scale, if the Frenchmen had come nearer. When they were joined together, they drew about the hill, having with them sir Thomas Guilford, with two hundred archers on horsebacke, meaning to set on the Frenchmen: which perceiving that, and doubting least more companies had followed, they suddenlie drew backe, and joined them with their great battell.

Then the earle of Essex and the English horsemen followed them, till they came nere to the armie of France, and then scaled and sent forth light horsemen to view the demeanour of the Frenchmen. When the Frenchmen of armes were returned to their battell, then both the horsemen and footmen withdrew in order of battell, and still the English curraes followed them for the space of three leagues, and then returned to the earle, making report to him of that they had seen, who then brake up his scale, and came to the king, declaring to him how the Frenchmen were gone backe. This was called the daye wednesdaie; for the daie was wonderfull hot, and the king with his armie stood in order of battell, from six of the clocke in the morning till three of the clocke in the afternoon. And some died for lacke of moisture, and generallie euerie man was burned about the mouth with heat of the stomack; for drinke lacked, and water was not nere.

After this the king remoued toward Terrouan, and as he was setting forward, the lord Malon of Flanders came to him with his horsemen, which were already in the kings wages. As the armie passed, by negligence the same daie in a lane was overthrowne one of the kings bombardes of iron, called the red gun, and there left. The king lodged that night two miles from saint Omers on the north side of the towne. On the thursdaie, being the eight and twentieth of Julie, the maister carpenter with an hundred carpenters and labourers, without knowledge of the marshall, went to weie up the great gun that was in the pond (as ye haue heard) and by force of engines drew it up, and carted it ready to bring to waie: but suddenlie there came an eight hundred Frenchmen with speares, crossbowes, and hand-guns, which set on the labourers so fiercely, that notwithstanding their manfull defense, the most part of them were slaine and the residue taken, and both they and the peece of ordinance conveyed to Bullangne.

The Frenchmen glad of this chance, assembled a great number to fetch the other gun, which lay yet in the lane. But the lord Werners being captaine of the pionsers, and hearing all these things, prepared to recover that gun; and so in the morrow went to fetch it. There were appointed to go backe to see him safe conducted, the earle of Essex with his company of speares, sir Rice ap Thomas with his retinue, and sir John Penill with the Northumberland men. The Almans also were commanded to retire backe to the succours of them that were gone for the gun. The Almans went forth, till they came within two miles of the place where the gun lay, and further they would not go. The Frenchmen to the number of nine or ten thousand men (as some esteemed) were abroad, and came toward the place where the Englishmen were carting the peece of ordinance.

The Northumberland horsemen having espied them, gave knowledge to the residue of the Englishmen; who prepared themselves to defend their ground against the enemies: and the earle of Essex sent to the lord Malon, willing him with his company to come to his aid: but the lord Malon sent word againe, that he was come to serve the king of England more than for one daie, and therefore he wished that all the Englishmen would returne, with the great power of France they were not able to match. This answer was much displeasing to the earle of Essex and the other captains. In this manner time the foreriders of the French part were come to the hands of the Englishmen, and so they fell in skilfully very hottly: but at length all things considered, and speciallie the small number of the Englishmen, being not above seven hundred hoisemen, it was thought best that they should returne and follow the gun, which they had sent forward.

Whereupon they retreated in order, and not in any hasty manner, still following the gun. The Frenchmen perceiving that, picked forward to the number of two thousand horsemen; & came in to the backs of the Englishmen, who there with cast about, and made return to the Frenchmen. Sir William Eller and Sir John Sharpe were the first that charged, and after all the other Englishmen. The Frenchmen fled immediately so fast backe, that happie was he that might be foremost. The whole host seeing their horsemen thus had in chase, suddenly returned: The earle of Eller with drew to an hill, and there caused his trumpet to blow to the standard for feare of subtle dealing; and when his men were come in, and gathered together, he returned. On the same daie being fridaie, the nine and twentieth of Julie, the king came to Arkes, & there incamped; whither the earle of Eller came to him, and declared what had bene done that daie, the king thanking him and other the captains for their paines and diligence.

The king late here at Arkes till mondaye the first of August, and then removed to a village midwaie betwixt Teruaine and saint Omers, where he lay till thursdaie the fourth of August, and came that daie in good order of battell before the citie of Teruaine, & there pight vp his tents and pauillions in most roiall manner, sending his campe right strangle with ordnance and other warlike deuises. [The king for himselfe had a house of timber with a chimney of iron, and for his other lodgings he had great and goodlie tents of blew water tooke garnished with yelow and white, diuerse comes within the same for all officers necessarie. On the top of the pauillions stood the kings beaues holding fances, as the lion, the dragon, the greihound, the antelope, the dun cow : all within the lodging was pointed full of the sunnes rising, the lodging was one hundred and five and twentie fote in length.]

The king lieng befoze Terwine, his great ordnance did foze beat the towne walles, & they with in likewise shot ordnance out of the towne, and due diuerse Englishmen in the trenches, among which shots they had one gun that euerie date and night was ordinarilie shot at certeine hours without faile: this gun was of the Englishmen called the whiffing gun, but it neuer did harme in the kings fielde. The siege thus lieng befoze the citie of Terwine, sir Alexander Baintam a capteine of the miners, caused a mine to be enterprised to enter into the towne: but the Frenchmen perceiuing that, made a countermine, and so destroyed the other mine, and diuerse miners slaine within the same. The french armie hauered euer a farre to take the Englishmen at advantage, as they went a foraging; and manie a skirmish was done, and manie good scates of armes achieved on both sides, and diuerse prisoners taken. Among the Frenchmen were certeine light horsemen called Stradiots, with short stirraps, beuer hats, small speares, and swords like cimeteries of Turkie: diuerse times the notherne light horsemen vnder the conduct of sir John Penill skirmished with these Stradiots and took diuerse of them prisoners, and brought them to the king.

While the king laie thus before Terwine, the captaine of Bullongne knowing by his espials, that manie of the garrison of Calis were with the king at the siege, and also that vittells were daillie brought out of England to Calis to succour the campe, imagined a great enterprize, and sent for all the men of warre vnder his dominion and rule, and declared to them what honour they should obtaine if they hurted or spoiled the out parts of Calis, the king of England on that side of the sea. The men of warre perceiving the good courage of the capitaine, assented to his purpose, and so with all diligence they, to the number of a thousand men, in the evening set forward, & came to Stewards bridge by three of the clocke in the morning, and found the watchmen that kept the bridge asleepe, & so entered the buttooke and slew the watchmen, and toke the ordinance of the bridge, and then let the bridge fall, so that all entred that would.

The capitaine of Bullongne kept six hundred men for a skale at the bidge, & sent the other into the marshes and medowes to fetch a towate the beafts and cat-tell which they shoulde find there. This was done, and some of them came to nere the walles of Calis, that they were scleried. And about a six-score coupers, bakers, shipmen & other which laie without the towne, hearing the alarme, got together, & setting on those Frenchmen which were advanced to nere the towne, slue them downe that abode, chased them that fled euen into Petronam bidge, and recouered the same, and put backe their enemies. About fise of the clocke in the morning, the gate of Calis called Bullongne gate was opened, and then by permission of the deputie, one Tulpeper the vnder-marschall with two hundred archers vnder a banner of saint George issued forth.

All these in great hast came to Betonsam byzde, where they found the other Englishmen that had twone the byzde of the Frenchmen, and so altogether set forward to assaile the Frenchmen that kept the scale, and taried till the residue of their compaignes which were gone foraging onto Calis walles were come : for the other that had spoiled the marchers were returned with a great bovie. At the first, when the Frenchmen saw the Englishmen approach, they thought they had bene their owne fellows. But when they saw the banner of saint George, they perceived how the matter went, and so determined to defend themselves against their enemies; but the Englishmen set so fiercelie on, that finalie the Frenchmen were discomfited, and foure and twentie of them slaine, beside twelve score that were taken prisoners, and all the ordnance and bovie againe recovered.

These prisoners were brought to Calis, & there sold in open market. [Among all other, a couper of the towne of Calis bought a prisoner of this botie that dwelt in Bullongne, and had of the prisoner an hundred croins for his ranfome. When the monie was paid, the Frenchman praid the couper to see him safe deliuered, and to condua him out of danger. The couper gentille granted, and without anie knowledge of his friends, all alone went with the Frenchman till he came beyond the caufete, & there would haue departed: but the Frenchman perceiving that the couper was aged, and that no rescue was nie, by force toke the couper prisoner, and caried him to Bullongne, & made him paie two hundred croins for his ranfome: thus thorough follie was the poore couper decelued. Wherefore it is iudgement for a man to hold fast his possession, and to fupplie his want of strength by subtiltie; imitating therein the fox, which although in force he be inferior to the lion, as not able to beare the perking of his taile, or a pelt of his paw; yet in craft he goeth beyond that boisterous beaft, and so elapeth danger, which otherwife he might fuffeine.]

The emperor
Heriman
and the king
met.

Alre. The king prepared all things necessarie to meet with the emperor in triumph. The noble men of the kings campe were gorgeously apparelled, their courters barded with cloth of gold, of damaske and byzerie, their apparell all tissue, cloth of gold and silver, and goldsmiths worke, great chains of hauberkes of gold, and belles of bullion: but in especiall the duke of Buckingham, he was in purple sattin, his apparell and his bard full of antelops and swans of fine gold bullion, and full of spangles, & little bels of gold marvellous costlie and pleasant to behold. The duke was in a garment of great riches in jewels and stone, he was armed in a light armour. The master of his horse followed him with a spare horse, the henchmen followed bearing the kings peces of harnesse, euerie one mounted on a great courser.

The kings
harnesse and furniture.

The one bare his helmet, the second his grangard, the third his speare, the fourth his are, and so euerie one had something belonging to a man of armes. The apparell of the nine henchmen were white cloth of gold, and crimson cloth of gold, richlie embroidered with goldsmiths worke, the trappers of the courters were mantell harnesse coulered, and in euerie bent a long bell of fine gold, and on euerie pendent a deepe tassell of fine gold in bullion, which trappers were verie rich. The king and the emperor met betwene Alre and the campe, in the foulest weather that lightlie hath bene sene. The emperor gentlie intertelled the king, and the king likewise him, and after a little communication had betwene them, because the weather was foule, they parted for that time. The emperor & all his men were at that date all in blacke cloth, for the emperesse his wife was lately deceased.

A letter of defiance sent by the Scottish king to king Henric.

Within a day or two after this interuiew, and that the king was returned to his campe, thither came a king at armes of Scotland called Lion, with his cote of armes on his backe, who within short time was by Cartier king of armes brought to the kings presence, where he being almost dismayd to see the king so noble accompanied, with few words & meetlie good countenance, deliuered a letter to the king, which his grace received and read it himselfe; and therewith hauing conceiued the whole contents thereof, made his answer immediatly to the herald.

Englands
speech to the Scottish
kings herald bittered without premeditation.

Now we percelue the king of Scots our brother in law, and your master to be the same person whom we euer take him to be, for we neuer esteemed him to be of anie truth: and so now we haue found it. For notwithstanding his oth, his promise in the word of a king, and his owne hand and seale; yet now he hath broken his faith & promise to his great dishonour and infamie for euer, and intendeth to invade our realme in our absence, which he durst not once attempt, our owne person being present. But he sheweth himselfe not to be degenerat from the conditions of his forfathers, whose faiths (for the most part) haue euer bene violated, and their promises neuer obserued, further than they list. Therefore tell thy master, first, that he shall neuer be comprised in anie league wherein I am a confederat; and also that I suspecting his truth (as now the deed proueth) haue left an earle in my realme at home, which shall be able to defend him and all his power. For we haue prouided so, that he shall not find our land destitute of people as he thinketh to do: but this saie to thy master, that I am the very owner of Scotland, & that he holdeth it of me by homage. And inasmuch as now, contrarie to his bounden dutie, he being my vassall, doth rebell against me, with Gods helpe I shall at my returne expell him his realme, and so tell him.

to my souereigne: but your letters, with your honours sent, may declare your pleasure, for I may not say such words of reproch to him, to whom I owe onelie mine allegiance and faith. Then said the king, wherefore came you hither & will you receiue no answer? Yes said Lion, but your answer requirith doing and no waiting, that is, that immediatly you should returne home. Well said the king; I will returne to your damage, and not at thy masters summoning. Then the king commanded Cartier to take him to his tent, and to make him good cheare, which he did, and cherisshed him well: for he was sore abashed.

After he was departed, the king sent for all the capteins, and keshe them and his counsell caused the letter to be read, the contents wherof were, that king Henric had not dealt with him by rightlie in sundrie points, as in maintaining of those which had laine his people of Scotland by sea, and also in succouring bassard Heron with his complices, which had (under trust of daies of meeting for iustice) laine his warren. Also his twines legacie was by him withheld: & moreover, where first he had desired him in fauour of his dere cousin the duke of Gelder, not to attempt anie thing against him; yet had he sent his people to invade the said dukes countrie, which did what in them lay to destroe and dishonour the said duke, that had nothing offended against him.

And now againe, where he had made the like request for his brother & cousin the most christian king of France: yet notwithstanding, had the king of England caused him to lose his duchie of Aquitaine, and at this present invaded his realme with all his puissance, to destroe him and his subiects, whereas yet the said king of France had bene euer friend to him, & neuer giuen him occasion thus to do. In consideration of which iniuries receiued in his owne person, and in his friends, he must needs seeke redress, and take part with his brother and cousin the said king of France. Wherefore he required him to desist from further invasion and destruction of the French dominions, which to do if he refused, he plainlie declared by the same letters, that he would do what he could to cause him to desist from further pursuit in that his enterprise, & also giue letters of marque to his subiects for the deniall of iustice made to them by the king of England.

The letters thus sent to the king of England, were dated at Edinburgh the six and twentieth daie of Iulie, and giuen vnder the signet of the said Scottish king. When the king had thus caused these letters to be read, and thoroughlie considered of them as appertained, he sent them straight to the earle of Surrie, which then late at Bonnet, and caused other letters to be deuised to the king of Scots, the effect whereof was; that although he well perceived by the kings letters, which he had receiued from him, in what sort, vnder colour of contriued occasions and feined quarrelles, he meant to breake the peace, he did not much maruell thereat, considering the ancient accustomed manners of some his progenitors.

Whombeit, if loue and dread of God, nightnesse of blood, honour of the world, law and reason had bound him, it might be supposed, that he would neuer so farre haue proceeded; wherein the pope and all principall christned might well note in him dishonorable demeanour, which had dissembled the matter, whilst he was at home in his realme; and now in his absence thus went about vpon forged causes to utter his old rancor, which in covert manner he had long kept secret. Peruerselesse, vpon mistrust of such vnfedfastnesse, he had put his realme in a readinesse to resist his enterprises, as he doubted not through Gods fauour, and the assistance of his confederats, he should be able to resist the malice of all chisnatikes, and their adherents, being by generall counsell expellie excommunicated & interdicted, trusting in time con venient to remember his friends, & requite his foes.

Whereover, he willed him to let before his eyes the example of the king of Navarre, who for assistance given to the French king was now a king without a realme. And as touching answers to be made to the manifold griefs in the Scottish kings letters sur mised, if law or reason could haue removed him from his sensual opinions, he had bene manie times al readie answered sufficientlie to the same; vntlesse to the pretended griefs therein amongst other compai sed, for denying of a safe conduct to the Scottish an balladour to haue bene lastly sent vnto him. Where vnto thus he answered; that the same safe conduct had bene granted, if the Scottish herald would haue taken it with him.

And finally, as touching the Scottish kings re quest, to desist from further attempting against the French, he signified to him, that he knew him for no competent iudge of so high authoritie, as to re quire him in that behalfe, and therefore God willing he went with the aid and assistance of his confede rats & allies to prosecute his begun attempt. And as the Scottish king should doe to him, & to his realme, so it should be hereafter remembred and acquitted.
These letters were written in the campe before Teruine the twelfe of August, and given vnder the kings signet, and therewith deliuered to Lion king of armes, who had of the king 100 angels in reward.

Then departed he with his letters into flan ders, there to take ship to saile into Scotland, but per he could haue a desell and wind for his purpose, his maister was laine, as after ye shall heare. In this meane while the Frenchmen being assembled and lodged in campe at Blangie on this side Antenna, the French king appointed that all the hoisemen to the number of eight thousand (as Paulus Iopius recoz deth) should go with vittels vnto Teruine, and put the same into the towne, if by any means they might, for that those within stood as then in great necessitie for want of vittels.

The charge of this conuete was committed vn to Monsieur de Piennes, because he was lieutenant of those marches: notwithstanding there were a mongst the number, other noble men of more high degree in honor, and also of great prouesse, fame, and experience, furnished with sundrie bands of men at armes of long appoyued valancie, and used to go a waie with victorie in manie a dangerous conflict and battell, wanting at this present nothing but their old accustomed god fortune. Whiles the Frenchmen were thus prepared to come with vittels to Ter uine, the emperor Maximilian came from Aire to the kings campe before Teruine the twelfe of Au gust, wearing a crosse of saint George as the kings souldier, & receiuing of him salarie for seruice; which Anglorum praelia noteth as noteworthie, saieing:

Subrege Anglorum magnus meret induperator.

The emperor was honourable received, and lod ged in a rich tent of cloth of gold prepared for him, according as was conuenient for his estate. He tar ried until sundae being the fourteenth of August, and then returned to Aire: and on the morrow after came againe being mondaie the fiftenth of August, on which daie there chanced a great frate betwixt the Almans of the kings campe, and the Englishmen, insomuch that manie were laine. The Almans ran to the kings ordinance and toke it, and imbattelled themselves, and bent the ordinance against the king and his campe. The English prepared their bowes, and the Almans made redie their pikes; but the cap tains toke such paines in the matter, that the fraie was appeased.

How as this trouble was in hand, the emper our came from Aire, and saw all the demeanour of both parts, and was glad to behold the discret behaviour of the capitains. After that the emperor was thus come to the kings field, the king called a counsell, at the which the emperor was present, where it was de bated, by what means they might best constraene them within to deliuer vp the towne, and especial lie how to keepe them from vittels & other succours, which the French armie (as it was knowne) meant verie shortly to minister vnto them. Some were of this mind, and namelie the emperor; that bridges should be made ouer the riuer, to passe ouer a part of the armie to besiege the towne on that side; where o therwise the French armie might hit tell the towne at their pleasures.

Others were of a contrarie mind, doubting what might happen, if the armie should be so diuided, least the Frenchmen setting on the backe of the one part of the armie, and they within the towne to fallie out in their faces, some misfortune might happen per the other part could passe the riuer to the succour of the fellowes. Yet at length the former purpose was al lowed as most necessarie; and therefore commande ment was given to the maister of the ordinance, that in all hast he should cause fise bridges to be made ouer the water for the armie to passe. The car penters so applied their worke that night, that the bridges were made by the next morow, and all the hoisemen first passed ouer, and then the king with his whole battell, and the great ordinance followed and passed ouer to the other side of the water. This was on the sixteenth daie of August being tuesday.

On the same morning the Frenchmen were com ming with their conuete of vittels to refresh the towne, hauing appointed one part of their troops to keepe on that side the riuer where the English armie was first incamped, and where the earle of Shrewes burie still kept his field; that in offering the skir mish on that side, the residue of the hoisemen might with more ease and safetie put the vittels and other necessarie things into the towne on the other side.
Here might a man haue sene of what force in wars sudden chance is oftentimes. For the king thus with his battell passing the riuer, meaning to besiege the towne on euerie side, and the Frenchmen at that same instant hauing also passed the riuer with other carriages laden with vittels, purposing to releue the towne on that side, caused no small doubt to be conceiued of ech others meaning, on both parts, least that the one, hauing knowlege of the others purpose, had bene prepared for to hinder the same.

And yet was it nothing so, for neither the king knew of the Frenchmens approach that daie, neither they of his passing ouer the water. But when the king had aduertisement given him (by the light hoisemen that were sent abroad to discover the countrie) how the Frenchmen were at hand; he pre pared himselfe to the battell, and first set forth his hoisemen, and then followed himselfe with his bat tell of footemen. The French capitains being hereof advised, determined not to fight without their foot men; and therefore with all speed sent backe their carriages, and staid with their hoisemen, until the carriages might haue leasure to get out of danger.
In the meane time the Englishmen advanced for ward, and their hoisemen mounted by the hill, where the French hoisemen were in troope, with thirtie and thre standards sped, & might see the Eng lishmen coming, and the kings battell marching forward with the Almans.

There were amongst the Frenchmen certeine companies of Estradiots, which being placed before the French host, as they came downe the hill to skirmish with the Englishmen saw where the banners of the English horsemen were coming, and the kings battell following upward, weening verelie that all had bene horsemen, whereupon they cast themselves about and fled. The Frenchmen were so fast in arraie, that the Estradiots could not enter; and so they ran still by the ends of the Frenchmens ranks. Here with the English horsemen set on, and about an hundred archers on horse-backe, being lighted beside their horses, and set by an hedge all alongest a village side called Bomie, shot freshlie at their enemies; & also certeine culuerings being placed on the top of an hill were discharged amongst the thickest prease of the Frenchmen; so that finalie the French were discomfited: for those that were behind saw the fall of some of their standards, which the Englishmen overthrew, and their Estradiots also (in whome they had great confidence) returne.

throw given to the French, king Henrie in person being present.

They that were furthest off fled first, and then the Englishmen & Burgognian horsemen, which were with them, egerlie followed the chase, in the which were taken the duke of Longuile, brother to the earle of Dunois that had married the daughter and heire to the marquesse of Rothlois, the lord of Cleremort, capteine Baiard, monsieur de Buse, and other, to the number of twelue score prisoners, and all brought to the kings presence with six standards, which were likewise taken. The Burgognians brought not their prisoners to fight. Monsieur de la Palice, and monsieur de Imbrecourt being taken of them and knowne, were put to their ransomes, and licenced maintenanthe to depart vpon their word. Thus was the power of the French horsemen by the sharpe encounter of the English horsemen, and full flight of the battels of the footmen, following in arraie at the backs of the horsemen, and the discharging of certeine culuerings amongst them, quickelie put to flight without anie great resistance.

courageously his Almans to play the men.

The emperor Maximilian was present with the king, and wore saint Georges crosse, greatlie incouraging the Almans to shew themselves like men, sith the place was fortunate to him and them, to trie the chance of battell in: as they might call to remembrance by the victorie there obtained against the Frenchmen a foure and twentie yeares past. This encounter chancing thus on the sixteenth daie of August, being tuesday, in this fift yeare of king Henryes reigne, which was the yeare after the incarnation 1513, was called the battell Des espours, by the Frenchmen themselves, that is to saie, the battell of spurs: forsomuch as they in stead of sword and lance used their spurs, with all might and maine to prick their horses to get out of danger; so that in them was verified the old proverbe, One paire of heles is worth two paire of hands.

spurs.

That wing of the horsemen also, which was appointed to skirmish with the Englishmen on the other side the river, whilest the other might have conveyed the vittels into the towne, was fiercelie beaten backe by the martiall prowesse of the valiant erle of Shrewesburie, sir Alice ap Thomas, and other worthy capteins, which laie on that side the water. The duke of Alancon, the earle of saint Paule, and monsieur de Florences, had the leading of those Frenchmen. They within the towne were in great hope of succour this daie, and when they saw the French power approach, they sallied forth on that side where the lord Herbert laie, and skirmished with his people verie proudly, but they were repelled to the gates of their towne, and manie of them slaine by the high valiancie of the said lord Herbert and his capteins.

After that the Englishmen were returned from the chase of the Frenchmen, whome they had followed a thre long miles from the field, the king made sir John Peddie a baneret, and John Carr knight, which was sore hurt: sir John Peddie had his gubdon taken, and diuerso of his men hurt, they followed so farre in the chase. After this overthrow of the French horsemen, the king compassed the towne more streitlie on each side, and the batterie was brought so nigh the walls as might be, wherewith breaches were made in sundrie places, by meanes whereof the lord Pontremie despairing any long time to keepe the towne, fell to a composition, and yielded it vp to the kings hands. This encounter and overthrow, with the giving vp of Teruine, is extant to the knowledge of foreyn nations (to be read) recorded as followeth:

*Francorum pugnax equitatus praelia miscet, succurrit inique suis, sed frustra infirmior arma Turba capit; palmam bellando potentior Anglus Aufert, lathifera transfusus hostilibus hasta.
Diruta turris fragis bombardis mania praebeant Britigena ingressum facilem, Gallique timorem Injuunt, tandem Terronana deditur Angli.*

Notwith this yielding vp of the said towne was with condition, that the souldiers might depart with horse and armour, & that such townesmen as would there remaine, might haue their liues and goods saved. Thus (I saie) was the citie of Teruine deliuered vp to the king of England, with all the ordinance and munitions then being found within the same. This was on the eighteenth of August. The earle of Shrewesburie entered the same night, and caused the banner of saint George to be set vp in the highest place of the towne in signe of victorie. When the lord Pontremie, and all the souldiers were departed, and that the earle of Shrewesburie had searched all the towne to see that euerie thing was sure, he called the townesmen afoze him, and swore them to be true to the king of England. The foure and twentieth of August the king himselfe entered the towne with great and roiall triumph, and dined in the bishops palace. At after none he returned to his campe, and on the six and twentieth daie of August he removed againe to Cutingate, where he first incamped after the chase of the French horsemen.

Here it was determined in counsell, that the walls and fortifications of Teruine should be razed, which was done, and the towne burned; except the cathedrall church and the palace. All the ordinance was sent to Aize to be kept there to the kings vse. After this, it was concluded that the king should laie siege to the citie of Coimate; whereupon he set forward in thre battels: the earle of Shrewesburie leading the backward, the king and the emperor governing the battell, and the lord Chamberleine following with the reerward. The first night they incamped beside Aize. Diuerse Englishmen tarieng behind at Teruine for pilage, were surprised by the Frenchmen, which slew some of them, & cast some into the fire. Those that fled escaped verie narrowlie. The king with his armie passed forward towards Coimate, and by the waie visited the young prince of Castile and the ladie Margaret, gouernors of the prince, in the towne of Lille, whilest his armie laie abroad in the fields beyond Pont Audanien.

There was appointed to attend the king vnto Lille the duke of Buckingham, the lord marquesse Dorset, the earle of Essex, and the lord Aile, with diuerse other; the charge of his campe he committed for the time to his counsell. Then mounted the king vpon a conser, his apparrell & hard were cloth of siluer of small quadrant cuts trauersed and edged with cut cloth of gold, and the bozard set full of red roses, his armour fresh & set full of iewels. The maister of his horse sir Henrie Guilford, and the henchmen followed followed (as you haue heard before) and the coursers righte apparelled, and so were manie captains that waited on the king: by the waie met the king the lord Kasselstern with manie noble men. And a mile without the towne there met with him the burge ses of Lille, and presented to him the keyes of the towne, saleng, that the emperour their soueraine lord had so commanded them to do.

The king praised their obedience to their soue reigne, and thanked the emperour and them for so high a present as the keyes of such a towne. Fewer thelike, he had such confidence in them, that he trust ed them no lesse than his owne subjects, and so deli uered the keyes to the prouost of the towne, which was well accompanied. Then met the king a great number of nobles of Flanders, Brabant, Holland, and Henand, which noble received him. After them came the countie Palatine or Palsgrau, one of the electors of the empire, with thirtie hoyses, all his men gorgeouslie apparelled after the fashion of his countrie, and humbly saluted the king. At the gate of Lille the capitaine of the towne stood with a gar rison in armes: well appointed, all the streets were set on both sides with burning torches and diuerse god lie pageants pleasant to behold. Thus he passed thro ugh the towne with his sword and maces borne be fore him, and alighted at the hall doze with his sword borne, where met with him the emperour, the prince of Castile, and the ladie Spargaret, and humbly salu ted him.

Then for reuerence of the emperour, the king caused his sword to be put vp, and his maces to be laid downe; & so was the king and all other nobles lodged and seated according to their degrees. In the towne of Lille was a noise that thre gunners with handguns should haue slaine the king: for which ru mor manie were attached, but nothing proued. But when these tidings came to the campe, they were ne uer merrie till they saw the king againe. Great was the chere, with bankets, plates, comedies, maskes, and other pastimes that were shewed to the king in the court of Burgognie, and so in solace he sojourned there fundate and mondaie the nineteenth daie of September. On the twentieth daie he sent word that his armie should remoue toward Cozaine, and so they remoued to a place conuenient betwene Coz aine and Lille, and certeine capitaines were appoin ted to keepe the passage at the bridge of Auandien.

After that the king had taried at Lille thre daies, and had well repoted himselfe, he toke his leave, and thanked the emperour and the young prince, the la die Spargaret & all the ladies for all his high chere and solace; and about six of the clocke at night, he de parted out of Lille, and the noble men brought the king forth and so returned, and then the capitaine shut the gates. When the king was a mile and moze out of the towne, he asked where his campe laie: And no man there could tell the waie, and guide had they none, the night was so darke & mistie. Thus the king taried a long while, and wist not whither to go; at last they met with a bitteler comming from the campe, which was their guide and brought them thither. The maister of the ordinance shot diuerse peeces of ordi nance, but they were not heard; but in safetie the king with all his companie returned.

On the one and twentieth daie of September the king remoued his campe toward Cozaine, and lod ged within thre miles of the citie, on a sojne ground by the riuer. On which night came to the king the emperour and the Palsgrau, which were lodged in rich tents, and noble serued of all viands and things necessarie. The people about Cozaine were with their gods fled to the citie, and yet the citie had no men of warre to defend it, but with multitude of in habitants the same was well replenished. The king commanded Sir Rice and his hoysmen to vnto one quarter, and the earle of Essex and his companie an other quarter; and the lord Mallon and the lord Lignie the other quarters. Then the two and twen tith daie of September, these foure capitaines at one time were sone openlie with banners displaid be fore the towne, and there made a long scale, and re turned.

Then the king sent Cartier king of armes to sum mon them to yeld it ouer into his hands, to whome they made answer, that they received no citie of the king of England to keepe, nor anie would they ren der him, with which answer he departed. Then they fortified their walls, and made prouision for vittels, corne, wine, and artillerie, and for all fortifications that might be gotten. And the citie of it selfe was strong, well walled, and furnished with god bul works and defences. But when they saw the king with such a puissance draw nere the citie, they were soze abashed, and called a generall counsell. Then the prouost said; Wethzen, you know how that the king of England sent an herald to summon vs to render vp to him this citie, or else he would put it and vs to the sword, fier, and blood. We answered we would be at defense. Now he is come in our sight to fulfill the message sent by the herald, & now is come the time of our defense.

Howbeit in this matter standeth thre mischees, one is our bounden duetie and allegiance that we owe to our soueraine lord king Lewes of France; the second the liues of vs, our wiues, children, and neighbozs; the third how to defend the small destruc tion of this ancient citie, now likelie to fall, which citie was neuer conquered. Now our citie is whole, your liues in safetie, your gods your owne; deter mine whether you will haue war or peace. Then the common people cried all; War, war, war. Then said the prouost, Take compassion of wiues and children and of the old folke; consider if you haue no quicke rescue, you cannot continue against ponder pus sance, although your courages were neuer so great, this the wisest of the citie and I haue considered.
Then suddenlie was there in the counsell a vaunt parler, a botcher, which hearing this, called a great number of his affinitie, and went out of the counsell and so out of the gates, and set fire of the suburbs on all sides. When the counsell saw the minds of the commons, and that their waies might not be follo wed, they comforted the people, and maintained them for their defense.

After this the king approached the citie with his whole armie, and they of the citie issued forth to pro fer the skirmish: but the archers beat them backe.
Also the carriage men that came with the herbin gers, saw where certeine wagons were entring the citie, unto the which they ran, and toke some of them.
At this skirmish the hoyle of the lord John Grate was slaine vnder him, as he came to defend the car riage men; but he himselfe had no hurt. The king with his battell planted his siege on the north side the citie. The earle of Shrewsburie with the fore ward lodged toward the south side of the riuer, and there laie that night. The lord Herbert with the rear ward incamped himselfe on the west side, and beat the walls and towers of the citie with the great ordi nance. The next daie after their comming thither, being the thre and twentieth of September, the earle of Shrewsburie with the foreward passed the riuer, & planted his siege on the southside of the citie, stre ching to the east end, and bent his ordinance against the walles. And thus was the citie of Cozaine besie ged on all parts.

king receiued letters from the earle of Surrie with the Scottish kings gantlet, whereby he was certified of the slaughter of the said king, and how all things had bene handled at the battell of Floddon, whereof hereafter ye shall find further mention. The king thanked God of the newes, and highlie commended the prowesse of the earle, and other the captiues: howbeit he had a secret letter, that Welshmen and other fled from sir Edmund Howard in the battell, which letter caused great hartburning, and manie words: but the king toke all things in good part, and would that no man should be dispaised. On the six and twentieth daie, fiers were made in the hoast, in token of that victorie against the Scots, and on the seauen and twentieth daie being tuesday, masse was song by them of the kings chappell, with Te Deum, and the bishop of Rochester made a sermon, declaring the death of the king of Scots, and lamenting his euill hap and pericure. But now to our purpose of the siege of Tournai.

The citie of Tournai on all sides besieged.

The king of England lieng afront before Tournai, caused his great ordnance to be planted round about the citie, and diuerse trenches were cast, and rampiers made, and the lord Lisle and the lord Willoughbie were appointed to mainteine the ordnance with their bands, and the earle of Kent was lodged before the gate called port Valencien: so that the citizens could not issue out, nor no aid could come in. The ordnance baslie beat the gates, towres, & wals, which made a great batterie: and a few Englishmen assaulted the port coquerell, but they were too few in number: and if they had bene more in number, they had taken the towne, as the Tournaisins confessed after. The citizens of Tournai considering their estate came together to council, and there the prouost said in effect as followeth. Friends and brethren of this noble citie, I cannot too much praise your trust and fidelitie to your soueraigne lord the king of France, considering how manfully you haue defended this citie since the beginning of this siege.

But alas! although it be written on the gates grauen in stone, Iammes ton ne a perdu ton pucelage, that is to saie; Thou hast neuer lost thy maidenhead: yet if this citie had not bene well furnished and euery at the daie appointed sure of rescue, it could not haue continued. Now you see that rescue faileth, our gates be rased, our towres beaten downe, our chiefe towre like to fall, so that if this perillous siege continue, or else if our enemies assault vs, we be not able to defend vs: wherefore now, all these things considered, I would know whether you will treat with the king of England or abide the chance. Then they which at the last council cried War, war; now cried Peace, peace: yet all were not agreed. Then one wise man said, Sirs if the towne be assaulted once againe with a great number, suerlie it will be taken: you saw the experience at the last assault, and then consider if it be taken by force, who is there that can saie he is sure of his life: but by intreatie, the king of England is so mercifull that we may fortune to saue both life and goods. When finally all agreed to treat.

Then the prouost sent to the king a trumpet, bearing a safe conduct for him & certaine other to come and to speake with him: which request was to him granted. Then the prouost of the citie, accompanied with eleuen with him of the best of the citie, came to the armie, & spake with the lords of the council, and after were led to the kings presence. The prouost kneeled downe and all his companie, and said: Right high and mightie prince, although the citie of Tournai is strong, well walled, well replenished with people, bittels, artillerie, yea and the people in feare and dread of nothing: yet we know that against your great puissance it can not continue long, although it were ten times as strong as it is. Wherefore we knoting by report your honor, your wisdom, your iustice, & noble hart, are content to become your subiects & vassals, so that we may haue and enjoy our old lawes, customes, liberties, and franchises, vnder you; as we haue before this done vnder other princes.

Then said the king; We haue well heard your petition, we will common with our council & make you answer. And when he had communed with his council, he answered saieing: Sirs, he that asketh mercie of vs, shall not be denied; and seeing you come to treat, we remit you to our council. Then they went into the tent of council, & there the Tournaisins fell at a point, and in conclusion they yielded the citie and ten thousand pounds sterling for the redemption of their liberties, and so departed to the citie, making relation of the king and his noble courage. On thursdaie the nine and twentieth daie of September, the king was in his rich tent of cloth of gold vnder his cloth of estate, to whome came the citizens of the citie, and were sworne to him, and became his subiects.

Then the king appointed the lord Lisle, the lord Burgaunetie, & the lord Willoughbie to take possession on which with six thousand men entered the citie, and toke the market place and the wals, and searched the houses for feare of treason. Then maister Thomas Wolseie the kings almoner called before him all the citizens yong and old, and swore them to the king of England, the number whereof was foure score thousand. Thus the king of England by conquest came to the possession of the citie of Tournai. On saturday the second daie of October, the king entered the citie of Tournai at port founteine, and foure of the chiefe of the citie ouer him bare a canopie with all the armes of England. Euery person was in his best apparell, the ladies & gentlewomen late in the windowes beholding the king and his nobilitie, euery citizen had in his hand a staffe torch. The king himselfe was richlie apparelled in rich armour on a barbed courser, his henchmen bearing his peeces of war, as ar, speare, and other, their coursers were barbed with the armes of England, France, Ireland, and other the kings dominions all richlie brodered. Thus the king with his nobilitie all richlie apparelled with his sword borne before him, his heralds and sergeants of armes with trumpets and minstrelsie entered the citie, and came to our ladie church, and there Te Deum was song.

Then the king called to his presence, Edward Gifford, William Fitz William, John Dantie, William Ellier, John Sharpe, William Husse, John Saunage, Christopher Garnish, and diuerse other balliant esquires, and gaue to them the order of knight hood, and then went to his lodging, and at after none he came to the market place, where was prepared for him a rowne. Then he caused a proclamation to be made in his name king of England & France, that no man should greve the citizens. During which proclamation the Tournaisins scarce looked by, nor shewed once to him any amiable countenance, which was much marked. The crie finished, the king departed to his campe, leaving the citie in safe keeping. This weeke the king rode to see the castell of Apoton, and there his grace toke great pleasure. The king remembering the great chere that the prince of Castile and the ladie Margaret had made him at Lisle, which was but twelue miles English from Tournai, desired the said prince & ladie, with diuerse others to come to him to his citie of Tournai, and made preparation for the same, and appointed a fass, whereof he himselfe would be one, and caused a tilt to be made in the market place.

While these things were preparing, the king and his

the sea, as others. First the lord Clifford, the lord Conyers, the lord Latimer, the lord Scrope of Up-sall, the lord Dgle, the lord Lomlie, sir Nicholas Appleyard master of the ordnance, sir Stephan Bull, sir Henrie Shirburne, sir William Sidneie, sir Edward Ichingham, sir William Bulmer, with the power of the bishopricke of Durham, sir William Calcoigne, sir Christopher Ward, sir John Curingham, sir Thomas Metham, sir Walter Griffith, and manie others.

Of the wing on the right hand of the fore-ward, was capteine sir Edward Howard knight marshall of the host, & with him Brian Lunsall, Rafe Wear-ton, John Laurence, Richard Bold, esquires: sir John Booth, sir Thomas Butler, knights: Richard Done, John Bigod, Thomas Fitz Williams, John Clarnis, Brian Stapleton, Robert Marcop, Richard Cholmele, with the men of Hull, and the kings tenants of Hatfield, and others. Of the wing on the left hand, was capteine sir Parmaduke Constable, with his sonnes and kinsmen, sir William Persie, and of Lancashire a thousand men. Of the rere-ward was capteine the earle of Surreie himselfe, and with him the lord Scrope of Bolton, sir Philip Elmeie, sir George Darcie, sir Thomas Berkleie, sir John Koclfie, sir Christopher Pike-ring, Richard Tempell, sir John Stanleie, with the bishop of Elies seruants, sir Brian Stapleton, Lionell Persie, with the abbat of Whitbies tenants, Christopher Clapham, sir William Calcoigne the panger, sir Guie Dawneie, maister Hagmus, maister Dalbies seruants, sir John Popmanulle, the citi-zens of Porke, sir Pinian Parkanulle, sir John Willoughbie, with others.

Of the wing on the right hand, was capteine the lord Darcie with his power. Of the left hand wing, was capteine sir Edward Stanleie knight, with the residue of the power of the two counties palantire of Glesster and Lancaster. Thus was the host appoint-ed and divided into wards and wings at the first, though afterward (upon occasion) this order was somewhat altered. And now that euerie man knew what to do, the earle of Surreie with his power com-ming toward the place where he thought to find the Scottish host, was informed how king James be-ing remoued six miles from Foxham, late imbat-telled upon a great mountaine called Floddon, a place of such strength, as it was not possible for the Englishmen to come nere him, but to their great disadvantage: for at the foot of the same hill on the left hand, there was a great marshy ground full of red and water.

On the right hand it was defended with a riuer called Till, the course thereof being so swift, and the chanell in some places so deepe, that it might not con-nientlie be passed. On the backe halfe there were such craggie rocks and thicke woods, that it was not possible to assaile him to anie aduantage that waie forth. And on the forepart of the campe, where na-ture had left anie easie entrie for men to come to the same, all his ordinance was planted aloft upon the sides of such trenches, as he had caused to be cast for defense on that part. The earle of Surreie hereupon, considering with himselfe, that unless he might de-uide some policie to cause the Scottish armie to de-scend the hill, it were not possible for him to accom-plish his desire, he called about him his counsell, and with them tooke aduise in this point.

At length it was concluded and determined a-mong other things, to send Rouge Crosse, purseuant at armes, with a trumpet to the king of Scots, with a message and certeine instructions: which in sub-stance was, to shew and declare vnto the said king of Scots, that where he (contrarie vnto his oath and league, and vnnaturallie against all reason and con-science) had entered and inuaded this his brothers realme of England, and done great hurt to the same, in casting downe castles, towers, and houses, bur-ning, spoiling, and destroing the same, and cruellie murdering the king of England his brothers sub-jects; he the said earle would be readie to trie the rightfulness of the matter with the king in battell, by firstaie next comming at the furthest, if he of his noble courage would giue him tarieng and abode. And the same did the said earle promise, as he was a true knight vnto God & the king of England his maister.

And before Rouge Crosse should depart with the said instructions, the lord admerall gaue him in cre-dence to shew the said king of his comming, and part of his companie from the sea with him, and that he had sought the Scottish nauie then being on the sea, but he could not meet with them, because they were fled into France by the coast of Ireland. And in as much as the said king had diuerse and manie times caused the said lord to be called at daies of truce, to make redresse for Andrew Barton a pirat of the sea, long before that vanquished by the same lord admer-all, he was now come in his owne proper person, to be in the vant-gard of the field, to iustifie the death of the said Andrew against him, and all his people, and would see what could be laid to his charge the said daie.

Furthermore, that he no none of his companie should take no Scottish noble man prisoner, no anie other; but they should die if they came in his danger, unless it were the kings owne person; for he said he trusted to none other courtesie at the hands of the Scots. And in this manner he should find him in the vant-gard of the field, by the grace of God, and saint George, as he was a true knight. Yet before the de-parting of Rouge Crosse, with the said instructions and credence, it was thought by the earle & his coun-cell, that the said king would faine and imagine some other message, to send an herald of his with the same, onelie to view and ouersce the manner and or-der of the kings rofall armie, ordinance, and artillerie then being with the earle; whereby might haue ensued great danger to the same.

And for the eschuing thereof, he had in comman-dement, that if anie such message were sent, not to bring anie person comming therewith within thre or two miles of the field at the night, where the said earle would come, and heare what he would saie. And thus departed Rouge Crosse, with his trumpet, appar-elled in his coat of armes. On mondaie the first daie of September, the earle took his field at Bol-ton in Glendale, as he had appointed, where all the noble men and gentlemen met him with their retinues, to the number of six and twentie thousand men. And about midnight next ensuing came the trumpet which went to Rouge Crosse, and declared how the king of Scots, after the message done to him by Rouge Crosse, according to his instructions, the said king detained him, & sent one Flaie an herald of his with him vnto the earle, to declare to him the kings pleasure; to whom the earle sent Porke herald at armes, to accompanie the said Flaie, at a billage cal-led Aplo, two miles from the field, untill the com-ming thither of the said earle the next morow.

On the first daie of September, earlie in the mor-ning, the earle accompanied with the most part of the lords and knights, and gentlemen of the field, euerie man hauing with him but one seruant to hold his horse, rode vnto the place: and so the said herald met with the earle, and with blunt reuerence decla-red to him that he was come from his maister the king of Scots, which would know whether the earle sent sent anie such message by Kouge Crosse. The earle notified the same, saing further; that Kouge Crosse had the same message of him in writing, signed with his owne hand. Whereunto the said Flaie said: As to the abiding for battell betwene that and fridaie then next following, the king his maister bade him shew to the earle, that he was as welcome as anie noble man of England vnto the said king, and that if he had bene at home in his towne of Edinburgh, there receiuing such a message from the said earle, he would gladlie haue come, and fulfilled the said earles desire.

And the herald assured the earle, on the king his maisters behalfe, that the same king would abide him battell at the date prefixed. Whereof the said earle was right iolous, and much praised the honorable agree- ment of the said roiall king, and esteemed the same to proceed of an high and honorable courage, promising the herald, that he, and good suertie with him should be bound in ten thousand pounds sterling, to keepe the said date appointed; so that the king would find an earle of his, and thereto a good suertie with him to be bound in like summe, for the performance of the same. And furthermore the earle bade the herald to saie vnto his maister the king; that if he for his part kept not his appointment, then he was content that the Scots should battell him, which is a great reproch among the Scots, and is vfed, when a man is openlie perjured, and then they make of him an image pain- ted, reuerfed, with his heeles vpward, with his name, wondering, crieng, and blowing out on him with hornes, in the most despitesfull manner they can, in token that he is worthe to be eriled the companie of all good creatures. Then Flaie deliuered to the earle a little schedule written with the kings secreta- ries hand vnsigned, as followeth.

The tenor of the said schedule.

AS to the causes alledged of our comming into England against our band and promise (as is alled- ged) thereto we answere; our bro- ther was bound as farre to vs, as we to him. And when we sware last before his ambassador, in presence of our counsell; we expressed especiallie in an othe, that we would keepe to our brother, if our brother kept to vs, and not else. We sweare our brother brake first vnto vs. And since his breach we haue required diuers times him to amend; & latelie we warned our brother, as he did not vs, yet he brake. And this we take for our quarrell, and with Gods grace shall defend the same at your affixed time, which with Gods grace we shall abide.

The Scottish king's letter to the earle of Surrie.

And forsomuch as the king kept Kouge Crosse with him, who was not yet returned, the same earle caused the same Flaie to be in the keeping of Sir Humfrie Little and Porke herald in the same vil- lage; untill the time that a seruant of the same Flaie might ride in all hast to the king of Scots, for the deliuering of the said Kouge Crosse. Then the earle iolous of the kings answer, returned to his campe, and set forward five miles, to a place called Woller Hangh, in such order of battell, as euen then he should haue fought, and there lodged for that night, three little miles from the king of Scots. And be- twene the king & him was a goodlie & large comen field called Spilfield, which was a conuenient & faire ground for two hostes to fight on: there either host might perceiue other. The earles desire was to pro- cure the Scots to descend the hill into some euen ground, where he might fight with them without dis- aduantage of place.

But the king, though he had a great desire to fight, yet vpon diuerse considerations, by aduise of his counsell he still kept his ground, and meant not to remoue at all out of his strength. Wherevpon the earle of Surrie not able long to continue in such grounds of disadvantage, by reason of mires, and marishes, amongst the which he lodged with his ar- mie that was almost famished for lacke of sufficient vittels, which could not be recovered in such a barren countrie, determined to seke all waies possible, if he might constrain the Scottish king to come downe beside the hill. He therefore raised his campe, and leauing his enimies on the left hand, and passing ou- er the water of Till, he drey into a more com- dious ground, at the end of Barmoze wood; to the end he might refresh his souldiers somewhat hereby after they had bene toiled for the space of thre daies together in cloggie mires, and foule filthie waies, to their disease and wearinesse.

The earle of Surrie being thus lodged, the wa- ter of Till ran betwixt the two campos of Scots and Englishmen, diuiding them in sunder: and still by reason the one was within the shot of a culuering of the other, they ceased not to bestow shot and pou- der either at other, though without doing anie great hurt at all. For the English campe on that part which late toward the Scots, was couered with an hill rising from the hither banke of Till water, with an easie steepenesse to the height of a miles space or thereabouts. Thomas lord Howard sonne and heire to the earle of Surrie, from the top of this hill beholding all the countre on euerie side about him, declared to his father, that if he did effoons remoue his campe, and passe the water of Till againe in some place a little aboue, and by fetching a small com- passe come & shew himselfe on the backe halfe of his enimies, the Scottish king should either be enforced to come downe forth of his strength and giue battell, or else be stoped from receiuing vittels or anie other thing out of Scotland.

The earle of Surrie desirous of nothing so much as to ioine with the Scots in battell; after he vnder- stood that his sonne had informed him nothing but truth, he raised his field: and marching a thre miles vpwrd by the riuer side, passed ouer his armie in two parts at two seuerall brydges, all at one time. King James when he saw this manner of his eni- mies, and perceiuing what their meaning was, by coniecture of their doings, thought it stood not with his hono: to sit still, and suffer himselfe to be forestal- led with of his owne realme: and againe, that it might soe diminish the opinion of his princelie pow- er, if he seemed to remaine as it were besieged with in a fortesse, hauing more confidence in strength of the place, than in the manhod of his people: where- vpon immediatlie he raised his campe, and got an hill, which he doubted least the enimie should haue ta- ken before him.

But by such diligence as he vfed, and by reason of the great smoke which was raised and spread ouer all the countrie, by burning of the litter and cabbins wherein the Scots had lodged, purposelie set on fire to the same intent, he was got to the place whither he intended, before the Englishmen knew for anie cer- teintie that he was dislodged, though they were as then within a mile of him. Thus king James keep- ing the tops of the hills, the earle of Surrie with the English armie came to the foot of the same hills, and staing there a while, for so much as he saw how the hill both what necessitie there was for them to thew their manhood, and what iust causes they had also to fight against those enemies, that against both the laies of God and man had most cruellie inuaded the reime of England, in the quarrell of a schismaticke, and one that was accursed and excommunicated by the censures of the church. The Englishmen kindled with desire to fight, the more thorough those words of the earle, required incontinentlie to be led forth against the Scots, that they might shew what earnest wills they had to be reuenged; not onelie of new receiued wounds, but also of ancient iniuries; for there should neither height of hill, nor ante other obstacle hinder them, but they would either returne victorie, or else lose their liues in the paine.

The ordering of the English armie.

The earle of Surrie conceiued no small hope of victorie in this chearefull readinesse of his soldiers, and thereupon with all speed (as the occasion then moued him at that instant) diuided his armie into three battels, or rather sours: vnto the vant-gard whereof, the lord Howard was capteine, his brother sir Edmund Howard was ioined as a wing; the earle himselfe led the mible-ward, and the rere-ward was guided by sir Edward Stanleie, afterwards created lord Mounteagle. The lord Dacres with a number of horsemen was set apart by himselfe to succor where need should seme to appeare. The ordinance was placed in the front of these battels, & in places betwene, as was thought expedient. In this order, forward they made with manlie courages towards the Scots a good marching pace.

kings thought at the view of
armie.

In the meane time, king James beholding all the demeanour of the Englishmen, from the height of the hill, thought with himselfe, that there was offered him that daie a goodlie occasion of victorie, if he might come to fight with the enemies at such aduan-tage of place and number. And therfore, being hast-ned forward through the strenable force of destinie, or rather Gods ordinance, he commanded his standards to be raised and sped, and euerie man to resort to his appointed place, that they might forthwith in-counter the enemies, that presumed thus to seke battell. And herewith turning him to the lords and cap-teins that stood about him, he spake vnto them manie comfortabie words touching the occasion offered them at that present, to gaine both a famous victo-rie, and to reuenge so manifold iniuries and displeasures, as they had susteined diuerse waies forth at the Englishmens hands.

King James
and all the rest alight from horsebacke.

He had scarce made an end of his tale, but the soldiers with great noise and clamor cried; forward, vpon them; shaking their weapons in signe of an earnest desire they had (as then they shewed) to bukile with the Englishmen. Whereupon, without de-laie, king James putting his horse from him, all other as well nobles as meane men did the like, that the danger being equall, as well to the greatest as to the meaneest, and all hope of succour taken awaie, which was to be looked for by sight, they might be the more willing to shew their manhood, with their safe-gard onelie rested in the edges and points of their weapons. Then was the whole armie diuided into fue wards or regiments, to this intent, that the battell therein the king himselfe stood with his standard, might be inclosed as it were with two wings, on either side one. In the right wing, the earles of Hunt-leic, Crawford, and Montrose, were placed as chiefe leaders thereof; and in the left, were the earles of

The order of Lenor, and Argile, with the lord Hume, lord cham-berleine of Scotland, being men of great skill in warlike affaires, as was reported.

Moreover, in euerie band (almost generallye thro-roughout) there was a knight appointed for capteine and guider, and amongst them certaine French cap-teins, the which king Lewes had sent ouer into Scotland latelie before, to traine the Scots in the practise of warres. The ordinance was lodged in places most conuenient; though by reason they marched downe the hill, their shot did small damage to the English men comming bytowards towards them, and yet they bestowed it freshlie on either side one vpon another.
Herewith sir Edmund Howard with his wing was got by on the hill side, with whome the lord Hume and the two foresaid earles of Lenor and Argile in-countered with such violence, that this battell of Scots with yeares on foot on that part, beat downe and broke that wing of the Englishmen, in such wise that sir Edmund Howard was in maner left alone, and felled to the earth, that (had not bassard Heron come to his succours at that instant) he had bene slaine there without all remedie.

On the other part, the lord Dacres watching to aid where need appeared, came in on the sides of the Scots, & gaue a charge on them with his horsemen, whereby sir Edmund Howard being some what relieued, escaped to the English vant-gard, which was led (as before is mentioned) by his brother, lord Howard, who being now also got aloft on the hill, pressed still forward to renew the battell, & to succour those whome he saw put to the worse, so that thereby they toke new courages, & laid about them againe. Herewith the earles of Crawford & Montrose came with their battell of speares also on foot, and incounting with the said lord Howard, after soe fight on both sides continued, with more malicious hatred than force of the parties, both the said earles were slaine, besides a great number of other; the whole battell which they led being put to flight and chased out of the field, maimed, wounded, and slaine. And though they did what they could to the bittermost resistance, in hope to haue bathed their blades in English blood; yet the contrarie came to passe, as in soyles is left recozded, to the honour of the English; namelie:

Sustinet infictos duris umbonibus ictum,

Inbuat ex gladiis manante cruore Britannia.

On the left hand at the same instant, sir Edward Stanleie hauing begun to incounter with the Scots on that side, forced them to come downe into a more euery ground; and brought to that point with such incessant shot of arrowes as his archers bestowed amongst them, that to auoid the danger of that force and sharpe storme, the Scots were constrained to breake their arrate, & to fight not closed together in order of battell, but insunder one separated from another, so that their standards began to thinke here and there. Which thing when sir Edward Stanleie perceiued, forthwith byrning about three bands; which he had kept in store for such like purpose; he in-uaded the open sides of his enemies by a fresh onfet, and put them in such disorder, that they were not able ante longer to abide the violence of the Englishmen mightilie pressing vpon them: so that taking themselues to flight, and running headlong downe the stepe descent of the mountaine, they escaped to the woods and there saued themselves. But the earles of Argile and Lenor, doing what they could to save their people from running awaie, were slaine in the same place.

In the meane time, the king, who a little before had ioined with the earle of Surrie, perceiuing that the wings of his battell were distressed, and that his enemies began to inclose him on eith side, he bathed nothing at the matter, but with assured countenance exhorted those that were about him to sticke to him, and to remember their worthie ancestors, in committing nothing that might anie waies forth sound to their reproch. And herewith rushing against his en-mies, a new battell moze egre than the first began to arise; for that battell being well appointed and armed passed little for the Englishmens arrowes, in so much that percing the earles battell, they entred well nere so farre within the same, that they were at point to haue ouerthrowne his standards.

There were on either part a number of fall men of bodie, chosen forth of purpose by the captaine, for the good opinion conceiued of their hardie valiance, the battell betwixt them seemed long time doubt-full and variable, now one while fauourable to the one part, and an other while to the other. The king himselfe on foot euen in the foremost ranke, fought right ballantie, encouraging his people, as well by example as exhortation, to do their deuoirs. Per-ther did the earle of Surrie for his part faile in the dutie of a right worthie generall. But while the battell was thus foughten in most earnest wauer about the standards with doubtfull chance of victorie, the lord Howard and sir Edward Stanleie hauing ban-quished the enemies in either wing, returned to the middle-ward, and finding them there thus occupied, they set on, in two parts severallie, with great violence.

At the same time, the lord Dacres came with his hoyemen upon the backs of the Scots; so that they being thus assailed behind and before, and on either side, were constrained (as mistrusted about) to fight in a round compasse. King James as he beheld sir Adam Forman his standard-bearer beaten downe, thought suerlie then, there was no waie for him but death, and that euen out of hand. Wherefore to deli-uer himselfe from such despitefull reproch, as was like to follow, he rushed forth into the thickest prease of his enemies; and there fighting in most desperat wise, was beaten downe and slaine. And a little beside him, there died with like obstinate wilfulnesse, or (if ye list so to terme it) manhood, diuerse honorable prelats, as the archbishop of saint Andrews, and two other bishops, besides foure abbats; also of lords and knights of honoz a six and thirtie.

The lord Hume and the earle of Huntleie got hoyles, and escaped awaie together with certaine bands, placed in two the hindermost wards, which of all that daie neuer came to handstrokes, but stood still and gaue the looking on. Thus thorough the pover of God, on fridaie being the ninth of September, in the yeare 1513 was James the fourth of that name, king of Scots, slaine at Bannockton, and his armie discomfited by the earle of Surrie, lieutenant to Henrie the eight king of England, which a little before had woone the towne of Teruine, and was then preparing to go to besiege Cornate. There were slaine in this battell on the Scottish part, of all sorts, the number of eight thousand persons at the least: some saie twelue thousand, besides prisoners that were taken, as sir William Scot, chancelor to the said king, and sir John Forman his sergeant porter, with diuerse others. Also in manner, all the Scottish enignes were taken, and a two and twentie peeces of great ordnance, amongst the which were seauen culuerings of a large assise, and verie faire peeces.
King James named them (for that they were in making one verie like to an other) the seauen sisters.
This conflict with egernesse on both sides was continued thre full houres, as Anglorum praelia saith: Iam tres integras pugnatum est communis horae.

Though the victorie thus remained with the Englishmen, yet they bought it dere, losing no small number of their people, as well of those that were slaine in the field, as of others that were taken prisoners; for the Scots fought verie stoutlie, and gaue it not ouer for a little, inso much that there were taken and slaine about fiftene hundred men, as appeared by the booke of wages, when the soldiers were paid.

Manie Englishmen that followed ouer rashlie in the chase of the Scots, went so farre, that they wist not which waie to returne, and so were taken of the Scots that were in the two battels that went awaie with cleare hands, and neuer fought. Also, diuerse were taken by the lord chamberleine, which fought with the wing of sir Edmund Howard, and were caried awaie by him and his companie into Scotland, as John Fittoun esquier, and others. During the time of the fight, and the night after, manie Englishmen lost their hoyles, and such stoffe as they left in their tents and pavillions, by the robbers of Tindale and Tuidale.

When the field was done, and that the skouts brought word that there was no moze appearance of the Scots, but that they were all auoided and gone, the earle gaue thanks to God, and called to him certaine lords and gentlemen, and them made knights; as sir Edmund Howard his sonne, the lord Scrope, sir William Perrie, sir Edward Gorge, and diuerse others. The earle and the lord admerall departed to Bermar wood, & there lodged that night, leauing sir Philip Thorne knight and diuerse other worthie cap-teins, with a conuenient power of men, to keepe the place where the field had bene fought, for safegard of the ordinance. The bodie of the king of Scots was not found untill the next daie, and then being found and knote by the lord Dacres, there appeared in the same diuerse deadlie wounds, and speciallie, one with an arrow, and an other with a bill. But some saie he died of two, both which were inflicted upon him to his deadlie bane (and well worthie for truce-breaking) by the sword; as Anglorum praelia reporteth: Vulneribus Scotus acceptis cadit ense duobus, Perfidia meritis fusi dans sanguine penas.

The same daie, there appeared some Scots on a hill, but one William Blackenall that had the cheefe rule of the ordinance, caused such a peale to be shot off at them, that the Scots fled; or else the lord admerall, which was come to view the field, had bene in great danger; as was supposed. But now that the Scots were fled, and withydwone, all the ordinance was brought in safetie to Cistill, and there remained for a time. After that the earle of Surrie had taken order in all things, and set the forth parts in good quiet, he returned to the queene with the dead bodie of the Scottish king cered. When the king was returned into England from his conquest made in France of the cities of Teruine and Cornate, he forgot not the good seruice of those that had bene with the earle of Surrie at the battell at Bannockton: wherefore he wrote to them his louing letters, with such thanks and fauourable words, that euerie man thought himselfe well rewarded.

On the daie of the Purification of our ladie, at Lambeth, the king created the earle of Surrie duke of Roxfolke, with an augmentation of the armes of Scotland, and sir Charles Brandon vicount Lisle he created duke of Suffolke, and the lord Howard high admerall he created earle of Worcester: and after this, he also made sir Edward Stanleie (for his good seruice shewed at Bannockton) lord gounteaigle: and in March following was master Thomas Wolle the kings almoner, consecrated bishop of Exeter. This man was bozne at Ipswich, wolle describ'd, and was a good philosopher, verie eloquent and full of wit; but passinglie ambitious, as by his doings it well appeared. In the time of king Henrie the seanenth it was agreed betwixt the said king and Philip king of Castile that Charles king Philips eldest son should marrie the ladie Marie, daughter to the said king Henrie, with a dowry to be appointed: but for want of sufficient assurance of the dowry, the rest of covenants were made void, and yet had the king byghtie provided for the sending of hir ouer, now after his coming from Tournay.

Incloures of the fields about London, cast downe & ouerthrowne.

This yere the citizens of London, finding themselves greued with the inclosures of the common fields about Hylington, Horton, Shoriditch, and other places nere to the citie, whereby they could not be suffered to exercise their bowes, nor other pastimes in those fields, as before time they had bene accustomed, assembled themselves on a morning, and went with spades and shouels into the same fields, and there (like diligent workemen) so besetted themselves, that within a short space, all the hedges about those townes were cast downe, and the ditches filled. The kings councell comming to the graie friers, to vnderstand what was meant by this doing, were so answered by the mayo: and councell of the citie, that the matter was dissembled: and so when the workemen had done their worke, they came home in quiet maner, and the fields were neuer after hedged.

George Donor for this yere Mayo: of London, of his goodlie disposition reedified the decayed steeple of the parish church of Walthamstow, in the countie of Essex, adding thereunto a side Ale, with a chappell, where he lieth buried. And on the northside of the churchyard there, he founded a faire large almshouse for an almshouse priest or schoolmaster, and thirtene poore almes folke, eight men, and five women, appointing to the said almes priest or schoolmaster for his yearelie wages, six pounds thirtene shillings four pence; and to euerie one of the said almes folke seven pence a weeke, and five pounds to be bestowed yearelie amongst them in coles. And ordeined that the said almes priest should on sundaies and festiual daies, be helping and assistant to the vicar or curat there in celebration of diuine seruice, & on the weeke daies frelie to applie and teach yong children of the said parish, to the number of thirtie, in a scholehouse by him there builded for that purpose. Moreover, he gaue to the parish cleark there for the time being, a yearelie stipend of twentie six shillings eight pence, for ever, and a chamber by the said almes house, to the intent he should helpe the said schoolmaster to teach the said children. And hath giuen faire lands and tenements in the citie of London, for the perpetual maintenance of the premises to Gods glorie for ever. He also for the great commoditie of travellers on foot, made a continuall canlie of timber ouer the marshes from Walthamstow to Lockesbridge towards London.

Edw. Hall in Hen. 8. fol. 46.
The king and the new duke of Suffolke defenders at the tilt against all commers.

In the moneth of Maie, the king and the new duke of Suffolke were defenders at the tilt against all commers. The king was in a scolaparie mantle, an hat of cloth of siluer, and like a white hermit, and the duke apparelled like a blacke hermit, all of blacke velvet, both their berds were of damaske siluer: and when they had ridden about the tilt, & shewed themselves to the quene, then they threw off their apparell, and sent it to the ladies for a largesse. Then was the king in blacke, and the duke in white, with blacke stauens, on the stauens was written with white letters, Who can hold that will away: this posie was indged to be made for the duke of Suffolke, and the duchesse of Sanoie. At these tiltes were the duke of Longuile, & the lord Cleremont, and there the king & duke did so valiantlie, that they obtained the prise. At these tiltes were broken an hundred and fourtene speares in a short space. The king at this season sent againe into Flanders, for the performance of the marriage of the yong prince of Castile, and the faire ladie Marie his sister, and shewed how he had prepared all things necessarie and conuenient for such an high estate. The councell of Flanders answered, that they would not receiue hir that yere, with manie subtil arguments; by reason whereof, the perfect loue betwene England and the low countries was much flaked.

On the nineteenth daie of Maie was receiued into London a cap of maintenance & a sword, sent from pope Iulie, with a great compantie of nobles and gentlemen, which was presented to the king on the Sunday then next ensuing, with great solemnitie in the cathedrall church of saint Paule. Touching this pope (saith Guicciardine) disappointed of so manie popes, we may laie him in comparison with that which is written by the poets of Anteus, that being famed by the forces of Hercules, as often as he was throlone to the ground, so often did appeare in him a greater strength and courage; such waning had the pope amidst his aduersities, for when he seemed most abused and oppressed, it was then that he did most lift by him selfe with a spirit more constant and resolute, promising better of his fortune than euer.

After he had plaied all his troublesome pageants, and had got by sundrie aspiring praides I wot not what perelless primasie, he fell sicke. And happlie he was then more full of high conceits and travelling thoughts than at anie time before: for notwithstanding he had brought his fortune to be equal with his desires, & obtained the thing he aspired vnto, yet his deuises and plots did nothing diminish, but grew increasing by the same meane which should haue satisfied them. He had determined in the beginning of the spring and first opening of the yere, to send to the enterprize of Ferrara which he so much desired, and his opinion was, that that state was able to make no resistance, both for that it was naked of all succours; and because the Spanishe armie was to ioin with his companies: he had secretlie bought of Cesar for the price of thirtie thousand duckets, the citie of Sienna for the behoofe of the duke of Arbin, to whome (except Desera) he would neuer giue anie thing of the estate ecclesiastike, to the end to referue to himselfe the whole glorie to haue simple and one lie studied for the exaltation of the church. He agreed to lend to Cesar fortie thousand duckets, receiuing Spodona in gage. He threatened them of Lincouie, who in the heat of the affaires of the duke of Ferrara, were become lords of Caragnana; making in France that they would deliver it to him.

He was out of conceit with the cardinal of Medici, for that he thought him to cleaue more to the king catholike, than to him. And because he knew he was not able to dispose of the citie of Florence as he thought, he studied alreadie new plots, and new practises to alter that estate: He was ill contented with the cardinal of Sion, from whome he toke the name of legat; and intoided him to come to Rome, for that in the duchie of Milan he had appropriated to himselfe a yearelie rent of more than thirtie thousand duckets, of the estates and goods of diuers persons. The better to assure the duke of Arbin of Sienna by intelligences of his neighbours, he had of new taken into his pate Charles Bailion, to chafe out of Verona John Paule, who by amitie was verie nere ioined to the sonnes of Pandolfe Petrucchio successors to the greatnesse of their father. He would of new create duke of Genes, Dauian Fregosa, deposing Janus from that dignitie: an action whereunto did consent the others of the house of Fregosa, because for the degre that his ancestors held in that state, it seemed best to appertene vnto him.

An. Reg. 5.

He studied continually either how he might take out of Italie the Spanishe armie, or cut it in pieces by the aid of the Swizzers, whom above all others he exalted and embraced. In this deuise he had this intention, that the kingdome of Naples being occupied by him, Italie should remaine free from strangers; a speech that often passed out of his mouth: and to that end he had hindered that the Swizzers did not confederate with the king catho-like. And yet, as though it had bene in his power to batter all the world at one time, he continued his accustomed rigour against the French king. And notwithstanding he had had a message from the queene, yet he stirred by to make warre, the king of England, to whom he had transferred by publike decree of the councell of Lateran, the name of Christianissimo, whereof there was already a bull written, and in it likewise was contained the pination of the dignitie & name of the king of France, giving his kingdome to who could occupie it.

In these conceptions, no lesse strange for their varietie, than great for the importance they drew, and perhaps in other thoughts more secret and singular (for in a mind so fierce and terrible, all sorts of imaginings, how great and basine so euer they be, are not incredible) after the continuation of his sick-nesse for manie daies, he declined towards death: and feeling the end of his mortalitie to hasten on, and the same to prevent the execution of his high thoughts, he caused to call together the consistorie, which albeit he could not assist in person by reason of his disease; yet by the authoritie of it, he caused to be confirmed the bull which he had published before against such as by simonie would clime by vnto the pope-dome. He declared, that the election of his successor appertained to the college of cardinals, and not to the councell: and that the cardinals schisma-tikes could haue no presence or communitie there, to whom he protested there to pardon the injuries they had done him, and prayed to God to forgive them the wrongs they had done to his church. After this he besought the college of cardinals, that in his fauor, and for his sake, they would grant to the Duke of Arbin his nephew, the citie of Pescara in patronage or vicarage, alledging the consideration, that by meane of the Duke it had bene recovered to the church after the death of John of Arce. In no other matter he expessed anie private or particular affection.

Inasmuch as Madame Felice his daughter (toning with hir the petitions of manie others) beseech-ing him with great importunitie, to create cardinal Guido de Montfalcon being hir brother by the mothers side, he answered roundlie, that he was not worthie of that degree. He made not his affections conformable to their desires. In that last action of life he shewed no parcialitie in worlde causes: his present debilitie could diminish nothing of his ancient resolution, but expessed in all things the same constancie and seueritie, together with that iudge-ment and force of mind which he had before his sick-nesse: in which firme estate and disposition of spirit, he receiued deuoutlie the offices of the church, and the one and twentieth daie of February he ended his course of these mortall and present paines. He was a prince of incredible constancie and courage; but so full of furtie & brutish conceptions, that the reverence that was borne to the church, the discord of princes, the exhortations of times, did more to rule him from his crime, than either his moderation or his discretion: wothie no doubt of great glorie, if either he had bene a prince secular, or if that care and intention which he had to raise the church into temporall great-nesse by the meane of warre, had bene imployed to exalt it by the meane of peace in matters spirituall.

Heuerthelesse, he was lamented about all his predecessors, & no lesse esteemed of things, who having either lost the true consideration of things, or at least ignorant how to distinguish and pefe them rightlie, iudged it an office more due to appertaining to popes to increase the insidition of the see apostolike by armes and blood of christians, than by god example of holie life and due curing and correction of corrupt maners, to trauell for the sauing of those soules, for whom they glorie so much that Iesus Christ had named them his vicars in earth: and therefore it is a god consequent that he is a brand or rather a brand of the diuell, as one concludeth against him, saying:

Impius est igitur natus eadomone papa, Turpibus & genys est homicida satum.

About the same time the warres yet continuing betwene England & France, Prior Jehan (of whom ye haue heard before in the fourth yeere of this kings reigne) great capteine of the French nanie, with his gallies and foists charged with great basillikes and other artillerie, came on the borders of Souther in the night season, at a poze village there called Wighthelmston, & burnt it, taking such goods as he found.
But when the people began to gather, by firing the becons, Prior Jehan sounded his trumpet, to call his men aboard, and by that time it was daie. When cer-teine archers that kept the watch folowed Prior Jehan to the sea, and shot so fast, that they beat the gallie men from the shore, and wounded manie in the foist, to the which Prior Jehan was constrained to waide and was shot in the face with an arrow, so that he lost one of his eyes, and was like to haue died of the hurt: and therefore he offered his image of war before our ladie at Bullongne, with the English arrow in the face for a miracle.

The lord admerall offended with this proud part of the Frenchmen, in making such attempt on the English coasts, sent sir John Wallop to the sea with diuers ships, which sailing to the coasts of Normandie, landed there, and burnt one and twentie villages and totones, with diuerse ships in the haven of Trepont, Staples, and other where. Men marvelled greatlie at the manfull doings of sir John Wallop, considering he had not past an eight hundred men, and toke land there so often. In June sir Thomas Louell was sent ouer to Calis with six hundred men to strengthen that totone, and other the fortresses within the English pale, for doubt of anie sudden attempt to be made by the Frenchmen; because monsieur de Pontremis, with a mightie armie and great ordnance was come downe nere to Arde: howbeit he taried not long, but raised his campe within a while after his comming thither, and returned without anie more doing. The French king perceluting what losses he had sustained by the warres against England; and doubting least one euill lacke should fall follow in the necke of an other, determined to make sute for peace; and first agreeing with pope Lea, desired him to be a meane also for the procuring of some agreement betwixt him and the king of England.

well by the present and gréne memoire of the baloe of his late father, as for an vniuersall reputation that went of his owne inclinations and liberalities. To this estimation was ioined a generall opinion of his continencie and life not atteinted, together with a glad some hope, that by the example of his father, he would be a furtherer of learning, and beare saue to wits disposed to studie and knowledge. So that vnto these hopes was much helping the manner of the election, being made in his person sincerelie, and without simonie or suspicion of other corruption.

Coronation
the tenth.

The first act of this new pope was his coronation, which was represented according to the vage of his predecessors in the church of saint John de Lateran. The pompe was so great both of his familie and his court, and also of the prelates and multitudes that were there, together with the popular and vniuersall assemblies of people, that by the opinion and iudgement of men, the pride and maiestie of that action did farre surpasse all the celebrations done in Rome since the tyrannies of the Goths and sauage nations. In this same solemnitie the Consalon of the church was caried by Alfonso de Este, who hauing obtained a suspension of his censures & paines, was come to Rome, with great hope, that by the clemencie and facilitie of the pope, he should be able to compound for his affaires. The Consalon of the religion of Rhodes was borne by Julius de Medici mounted vpon a statelie courser armed at all points: by his nature he bare an inclination to the profession of armes; but by destinie he was drawen to the life ecclesiastike, in which estate he made serue as a wonderfull example of the variation of fortune.

Pope Leo a poore prisoner the verie same date twelve moneth of his election and in thronization.

One matter that made the memoire of that date wonderfull, was this consideration; that the person who then in so high & rare pompe was honozed with the most supreme and soveraigne dignitie of the world, was the père before, and on the verie same date miserable made prisoner. The great magnificence that appeared vpon his person, and his expenses, confirmed in the generalitie and multitude of men, the expectation that was had of him; euerie one promising that Rome should be happye vnder a pope so plentifulle inued with the vertue of liberalitie, whereof that date he had given an honorable experience, his expenses being aboue an hundred thousand duckats. But wise men desired in him a greater grauitie and moderation: they iudged that neither such a maiestie of pompe was conuenient for popes, neither did the condition of the present time require, that he should so vnproffitablely disperse the treasures that had bene gathered by his predecessour to other vles.

concluded.

The vessell of amitie betwene the king of England & the French being first broched by this popes letters, the French king by an herald at armes sent to the king of England, requiring of him a safe conduct for his ambassadors, which should come to intreat for a peace and attonement to be concluded betwixt them and their realmes. Upon grant obtained thereof, the French king sent a commission with the president of Rome and others, to intreat of peace and alliance betwixt both the princes. And moreover, because they understood that the marriage was broken betwene the prince of Castile and the ladie Marie, they desired that the said ladie might be ioined in marriage with the French king, offering a great dowrie and forties for the same. So much was offered, that the king moued by his counsell, and named by Wolseye the bishop of Lincolne, consented vpon condition, that if the French king died, then the should if it stood with his pleasure returne into England againe with all his dowrie and riches.

After that they were accorded vpon a full peace, and that the French king should marrie this young ladie, the indentures were drawen, ingrossed, & sealed, and peace therevpon proclaimed the seventh daie of August; & the king in presence of the French ambassadors was sworn to keepe the same: and likewise there was an ambassage sent out of England to see the French king sweare the same. The dowrie that was assigned vnto the bride to be receiued after his husbands decesse, if she suruiued him, was named to be 32000 crownes of yearelie reuenues, & to be receiued out of certeing lands assigned for; therefore during all his naturall life. And moreover, it was further agreed & couenanted, that the French king should content and paie yearelie vnto king Henrie, during the space of five yeares, the summe of one hundred thousand crownes. By conclusion of this peace was the duke of Longueil with the other prisoners deliuered, paying their ransoms, and the said duke assied the ladie Marie in the name of his maiester king Lewes.

In September following, the said ladie was conueied to Douer by the king his brother & the queene, and on the second daie of October she was shipped, and such as were appointed to giue their attendance on her, as the duke of Suffolke, the marquisse Dorset, the bishop of Durham, the earle of Surreie, the lord de la Ware, the lord Berners, the lord Spontangle, the four brethren of the said marques, sir Spaurice Berkleie, sir John Pechie, sir William Sands, sir Thomas Wulleine, sir John Car, and manie other knights, esquiers, gentlemen and ladies. They had not sailed past a quarter of the sea, but that the wind arose and seuered the ships, diuining some of them to Calis, some into Flanders, and his ship with great difficultie was brought to Bullen not without great seopardie at the enterling of the hauen, for the maiester ran the ship hard on shoze.

But the boats were readie, and receiued the ladie out of the ship, and sir Christopher Garmith stood in the water and toke her in his armes, and so caried her to land, where the duke of Wandolme, and a cardinall, with manie other great estates receiued her with great honor. From Bullen with easie iourneis she was conueied vnto Abulle, & there entered the eighth of October [where she was receiued by the Dolphin with great honor, she was apparelled in cloth of siluer, her hoshie was trapped in goldsmiths worke be-ric richlie. After her followed 6 ladies all their palfries trapped with crimsin velvet embrodered. After them followed one chariot of cloth of tissue, the second cloth of gold, & the third crimsin velvet embrodered with the kings armes & hers, full of roses. After them followed a great number of archers, and then wagons laden with their stuffe. Great was the riches in plate, iewels, monie, apparell, and hangings that this ladie brought into France.]

On the morrow following being mondaie, and s. Denise day, the marriage was solemnized betwixt the French king and the said ladie, with all honour, joy, & roialtie, both apparelled in goldsmiths worke. When a great banquet and sumptuous feast was made, where the English ladies were honorable entertained, according to the dignitie of the persons, and to the contentment of them that had no deges of malice or misliking settled in their hearts. For vnpossible it is, that in a great multitude meeting together, though all about one matter, be it of pleasure and delight, there should not be one of a repugnant disposition, and (though not apparantie perceived) trauelling with grudge, malignant mind; as we see some apples vniuersally and other some wormeaten, albeit one bough beare them, and one tree giue them sap. a great sorrow for them, for some had served hir long in hope of preferment, & some that had honest comes less them to serue hir, and now they were without service, which caused them to take thought, in so much some died by the waie returning, and some fell mad, but there was no remedie. After the English lords had done their commission, the French king willed them to take no longer paine, and so gaue to the god rewards; and they toke their leaue of the queene and returned. Then the Dolphin of France called lord Francis duke of Alais, and by his wife duke of Britaine, for the moze honour of this marriage before the Englishmen departed from Abouille, caused a solemne iusts to be proclaimed, which should be kept at Paris in the moneth of Nouember next ensuing.

Amelie, that he with his nine aids should answer all commers, being gentlemen of name and of armes. First to run five courses at the tilt with pe-ces of aduantage, & also five courses at random with sharpe speares, and twelue strokes with sharpe swords; and that done, he and his aids to fight at the barriers with all gentlemen of name and of armes.
First fir foines with hand speares, and after that eight strokes to the most aduantage if the speare so long held, and after that twelue strokes with the sword: and if anie man be vnholsted or felled with fighting on foot, then his houlle and armour to be re-dered to the officers of armes: and euerie man of this chalenge must set vp his armes and name vpon an arch triumphant, which shalbe made at the place where the iusts shalbe, and further shall write to what point he will answer, to one or to all.

When this proclamation was reposed in England by the noble men that returned from the ma-riage: the duke of Suffolke, the marquesse Dorset, and his foure byetheren, the lord Clinton, fir Edward Penell, fir Giles Capell, Thomas Cheney, and other sued to the king to be at the chalenge, which request he grationlie granted. Then the lords and knights prepared all things necessarie for their enterprise, and shipped there houlles and harnesse, and did so much by tourneie, that they came to Paris at the end of October, which were hartlie welcomed of the king and the Dolphin: but most of all of the French queene which then late at saint Denise, and was not yet crowned nor entered into Paris. The Dolphin desired the duke of Suffolke and the lord marquesse Dorset, to be two of his immediat aids, which thereto assented.

Wherefore was erected an arch of widdnesse at the tornels beside the street of saint Anthonie, breacie before the bassell, on the which were set foure targets of scutcheons, the one siluer, and he that let his name vnder that shield, to run at tilt according to the articles. He that put his name vnder the golden target should run with the sharpe speares and fight with sharpe swords. They that put their names to the blacke shield, should fight on foot with speares and swords for the one hand. And he that touched the sa-nie shield should cast a speare on foot with a target on his arme, and after to fight with a two hand sword.
On this arch aboue stood the armes of the king & the queene, and beneath them stood the armes of the Dolphin and his aids, and underneath stood the foure scut-cheons that you haue heard of, and vnder them all the armes and names of such as set their names to anie of the said foure scutcheons.

While all these things were preparing, the ladie Marie of England the first daie of Nouember, then being sun-dae, was with great solemnitie crowned queene of France in the monastrie of S. Denise, and the Dolphin all the season held the crowne ouer his head, because it was of great weight to his gre-uance, at which coronation were the lords of England, all according to their degrees well intertel-ned. On mon-dae the first daie of Nouember, the said queene was receiued into the citie of Paris after the order that followeth. First the gard of the citie met with hir without saint Denise all in coats of goldsmiths worke, with ships gilt, and after them met hir all the priestes and religious, esteemed to be three thousand. The queene was in a chaire couered about (but not ouer hir person) in white cloth of gold; the houlles that went with, in cloth of gold; on hir head a coronall all of great pearles, hir necke and brest full of iewels.

Before hir went a gard of Almans after their fashion, and after them all noblemen, as the Dolphin, the duke of Alanson, the duke of Bourbon, the duke of Wandosme, the duke of Longeville, and the duke of Suffolke, the marquesse Dorset, five cardinals, and a great number of estates; about hir person rode the kings gard, which were Scots. Thus was this queene receiued into Paris, and so conueied to the cathedraall church, and there offered, & from thence to the palace, where she offered at the holie chappell; and from thence she went to hir lodging for that night: for whome was provided a great supper, and the heralds cried a largesse, and had to them giuen a ship of siluer and gilt, and other plate, to the value of two hundred marks, and after supper began dancing and pastime. On the morow began the iusts, and the Dolphin with his aids entered the field, the apparell and barbs were cloth of gold, cloth of siluer, and crimsin beluet hanteled together all in one sute, they shewed themselves before the king and queene, who were on a goodlie stage, and the queene stood so that all men might see hir, and wondered at hir beautie: but the king was feeble & laie on a couch for weakenesse.

When entered the counter part by a raille for combing the place. These iusts continued three daies, in the which were answered three hundred and five men of armes, and euerie man ran five courses, and with sharpe speares; bluerse were slain & not spoken of.
At the random and turneie the duke of Suffolke hurt a gentleman, so that he was like to die. The Marques Dorset stroke monsieur Grue an Albanois with his speare, peried his headpiece, and put him in iecopardie. The duke of Suffolke in the turneie ouerthrew a man of armes, houlle & man; and so did the lord Mar-quesse another, and yet the Frenchmen would in no wise praise them. At this turneie the Dolphin was hurt in the hand, so that he could not performe his chalenge at the barriers, and put one of his aid in his roume. The next daie after began the fight at the barriers. And because the Dolphin was not present, the duke of Suffolke and the lord Marques Dorset that daie began the field, and toke the barriers with speares in his hand abiding all commers.

The Dolphin brought a man secretlie, which in all the court of France was the tallest & the strongest man, and he was an Alman, and put him in the place of an other person to haue had the duke of Suffolke rebuked. The same great Alman came to the bars secretlie with face hid, because he would not be knowne, and bare his speare to the duke of Suffolke with all his strength, and the duke him receiued and for all his strength put him by strong strokes from the barriers, and with the but end of the speare strake the Alman that he staggered: but for all that the Alman strake stronglie and hardlie at the duke, and the iudges suffered manie moze strokes to be foughten than were appointed; but when they saw the Alman reele and stagger, then they let fall the raille betwene them. The lord marquesse Dorset at the same time, even at the same barre fought with a gentleman of France that he lost his speare, and in maner withdrew. When the raille was let fall, these two noble men put by their visers and toke afe, and with swords, the points and edges abated, they came to the barriers.

The Alman fought soze with the duke, which imagined that he was a person set on for the nonce, but the duke by pure strength toke him about the necke, and pomeled him so about the head that the bloud issued out of his nose, and then they were parted, and the Alman was conuicted by the Dolphin least he should be knowne. These two noblemen of England that daie fought valiantlie diuerse feats, and the Frenchmen likewise noblie them defended. But it happened the lord Marquesse on a time to put for his aid his yongest brother called the lord Edward Greie of the age of nineteene yeare, and to him was put a gentleman of France of great stature and strength, to the intent to plucke him ouer the barres, but yet the yong lord was of such strength, power, & policie, that he so stroke his aduersarie that he disarmed him, all the face bare. Thus were these enterprises finished to the land of all parties, & the Englishmen receiued much honoz and no spot of rebuke, yet they were pitulie set at & in manie ieopardies.

For the declaration of this triumph, he that saw it can tell how goodlie the couriers trotted, bounded, and quicklie turned: how valiantlie the men of armes behaued themselves, and how the duke of Burbons band was apparrelled and balled in fawnie beluet, and cloth of siluer clondie, the band of the earle of saint Paule apparrelled and barded in purple beluet all to cut on purple sattin, the infant of Arragon, sonne to Frederike last king of Naples, and his band all in cloth of gold and siluer paled. This lord was but yong, but yet verie toward. The duke of Wandosme and his band in cloth of gold and pluncket beluet. The Dolphin and his aids were euerie daie new apparrelled at his cost, one daie in siluer and gold, another in crimson beluet and yellow beluet, and another daie in white beluet and greeng, some daie mixed with sattin, some daie embzodered, some daie pounced with gold, and so euerie daie in change as the workers fantasie could deuise, but the Englishmen had euer on their apparrell red crosses to be knowne for loue of their countrie.

At this triumph the countie Galeas came into the place on a genet trapped in blew sadden, and he himselfe likewise apparrelled, and ran a course with a speare, which was at the head five inches on euerie side square, that is twentie inches about, and at the butt nine inches square, that is six and thirtie inches, this speare was massie timber, and yet for all that he ran cleane with it a long course and slightlie avoided it to his great honour. Also there was another gentleman called Antonie Bounarine, which came into the field all armed, and on his bodie brought in eight ten speares, that is to wit, three speares set in euerie stirrop forward, and vnder euerie thigh two speares upward, and vnder his left arme was one speare backward, and the tenth in his hand; and when he came before the queene, he let his horse run, and neuer stopped till he had taken euerie speare after another and broken it on the ground, and he neuer stopped his horse till all were broken. This gentleman was highlie praised, and so he was worshiped. When all this great triumph was done, the lords of England toke their leaue, and were highlie thanked of the king, queene, Dolphin, and all the lords, and so departed and came into England before Christmas. In Nouember the queene was deliuered of a prince which liued not long after.]

Touthing the accord of peace betwene England and France, you shall heare the report of Guiccardine, which to this place maketh passage to knowledge, as oile giueth maintenance of light to the lampe. [At the first opening of this practice for peace, there fell out manie difficulties, for that the king of England demanded Bullongne in Picardie, with a great summe of monie: but at last all the differences fell vpon the towne of Lozmaie, the king of England struing to retaine it, and the French obiecing some difficultie: in so much as the king of England dispatched in post to the French king the bishop of Tricarco, whome he charged, without imparting in what nature of particularitie consisted the difficultie, to declare to the king from him, that in regard of so great a benefit, he should not stand vpon so manie subtle difficulties, but to consider that in a prince reason should heare more imperie than passion.

The French king, because he would neither do wrong to his crowne, nor ill content his people, the towne of Lozmaie being verie noble and tollall to the crowne of France, caused the matter to be debated in full counsell, wherein was an assistance of the principals of his court, who advised him with one voice to imbrace peace, yea vnder the condition offered. And yet in that time the king catholike did what he could to breake it, offering the king manie plots and deuises, but speciallie to minister to him all his means and fauours to conquer the duchie of Spillan. But the answer being returned into England, that the French king stood content with the resolution of Lozmaie, the peace succeeded & was concluded in the beginning of August betwene the two kings during their liues, & a yeare after their death.

In the capitulation it was expessed, that Lozmaie should remaine to the king of England, to whom the French king should paie six hundred thousand crownes, and that in such sort of distribution, that the French king should make payment of an hundred thousand frankes euerie yeare, untill the full payment was satisfied: that they should be bound to defend their estates mutuallie and reciprocally with ten thousand footmen if the warre went by land, and with six thousand onelie if the warre were made by sea: that the French king should be bound to serue the king of England in all his affaires with twelue hundred lances, and the king of England likewise to minister to his seruices with ten thousand footmen: the expenses to be defraied by either of them that should haue need of the men: both the one and the other of them named the Scotish king, the archduke, & the emperie: but Cesar and the king catholike were not named: the Switzers had a nomination, but it bare a condition, that wholoener would defend against the French king, the estate of Spillan. Venes, or Als, should be excluded out of the nomination.

This peace, which was made with a wonderfull readinesse, was confirmed by the marriage of the kings sister of England with the French king, vnder condition, that he should acknowledge to haue receiued foure hundred thousand crownes for his dowrye: the contract of handfastings were made in England, where the king catholike ambassador was not in presence, for the great hatred the king of England bare to the king his maister. And euen vpon the conclusion and resolution of this peace, came to the court of France the instrument of ratification which Cesar had made, together with his commission, and the king catholike, for conclusion of the marriage that was solicited betwene Ferdinando de Austria and the second daughter of France not yet foure yeares of age: but the practise of that marriage vanished presentlie by reason of the peace that was now established: and the French king to satisfie better the king of England, gaue order that the duke of Suffolke, capteine generall of the lance knights that were in his paie, should depart the dominions of France, in whome the honours and recompenses compenseth that the king made to him, overcame all occasions of discontentment, the bountie and liberality of the one being no greater than the affabilitie and disposition of the other.]

In December, one Richard Hun a merchant tailor of London, that was laid in Lollards tower by commandement of the bishop of London, called Richard Fitz James, and his chancelloz doctor Hordle, was found dead, hanging by the necke in a girdle of silke within the said tower. That ye male understand the cause of his imprisonment, the beginning was this. The same Hun had a child that died in his house, being an infant; the curat claimed the bearing thereof for a mortuarie. Hun answered, that the infant had no propertie in the sheet. Whereupon, the parson assented him in the spirituall court. He taking to him counsell, sued the curat in a premunire: and when this was knowne, meanes was found, that Hun being accused of heresie, was attached, and laid in Lollards tower, where he was found dead, as ye have heard. Much adoe was made about his death, for the bishop and the chancelloz said, that he hanged himselfe.
But manie of the tempozaillie affirmed, that he was murdered, greatlie lamenting the case: for he was well beloved, and namelie of the poore, which cried out against them that were suspected to haue made him awaie. He was a good almes-man, and greatly relieved the needie. The question of his death was so farre put forth, that upon the suspicion he should be murdered, twelve men were charged before the coroner. After they had taken view of the bodie, the same was burned in Smithfield by the bishopps appointment: notwithstanding the coroners quest indicted doctor Hordle, with one John Spalding, otherwile called Belringer, and Charles Fogge the summoner of the murdered; howbeit, upon his arraignment, through great lute and corruption of monie (as manie iudged) the kings attorneie declared doctor Hordle not to be guiltie.
This Christmasse on Newyears night, the king, the duke of Suffolke, & two other were in mantels of cloath of siluer lined with blew velvet, the siluer was pounst in letters that the velvet might be seene thorough, the mantels had great capes like to the portingall hoods, and all their hosen, dublets, and coats were of the same fashion cut, and of the same stufte. With them were foure ladies in gowns, after the fashion of Sauoie, of blew velvet, lined with cloath of gold, the velvet all cut, and mantels like tipets knit together all of siluer, and on their heads bonets of burned gold, the foure torch-bearers were in sattin white and blew. This strange apparell pleased much euerie person, and in especiall the queene. And thus these foure lords & foure ladies came into the queenes chamber with great light of torches, and danced a great season, and then put off their visors, and were all well knowne, and then the queene hartlie thanked the kings grace for hir goodlie pastime and disposet.
Likewise on the Twelue night, the king and the queene came into the hall of Greenwich, & suddenlie entered a tent of cloath of gold; and before the tent stood foure men of armes, armed at all points with swordes in their hands; and suddenlie with noyse of trumpets entered foure other persons all armed, and ran to the other foure, and there was a great and a fierce fight. And suddenlie came out of a place like a wood eight wildmen, all appareled in greene molle, made with leued silke, with ouglie weapons & terrible visages, and there fought with the knights eight to eight; and after long fighting, the armed knights drove the wild men out of their places, and followed the chase out of the hall: and when they were departed, the tent opened, and there came out six lords and six ladies richlie appareled, and danced a great time: when they had danced their pleasure, they entered the tent againe, which was conueried out of the hall; then the king & the queene were serued with a right sumptuous banquet.

On the third day of Februarie, the king made a solemn iusts, and he and the marquesse Dorset would answer all comers, their apparell and barres were of blew velvet and cloath of siluer, all to cut in subtil knots, richlie embroidered, all the scrutours in white & blew silke. The counterpart, which were foure, seene in number, richlie appareled in velvet, cloath of gold, and embroidery, euerie man after his owne devise. The king was that date highlie to be praised, for he brake thre and twentie speares beside atteints and bare downe to ground a man of armes and his horse: the lord marquesse and all other did valiantlie, and had much praise, for euerie man did passing well, which is selldome seene in such a case. But the king for a suertie exceeded all other.
On the fourth date of October, the king removed to Lambeth, and on the morow began the high court of parlement, sir Thomas Penill was then speaker. In this parlement were diuerse acts made, but in especiall two, which were much spoken of: the one was the act of apparell, and the other act for labourers: of these two acts was much communing, and much businesse arose. For the labourers would in no wise labour by the date, but all by taske & in great, and therefore much trouble fell in the countrie, and in especiall in harvest time, for then husbandmen could scarce get workemen to helpe in their harvest. This parlement continued untill Easter, in the which diuerse subsidies were granted to the king, toward his great costs and charges that he had bene at in his viage roiall to France.
After Easter the nineteenth date of the moneth of Aprill, the king deliting to set forth yong gentlemen, called Nicholas Carew, and Francis Winton, and caused diuerse other yong gentlemen to be on the counterpart, and lent to them horse and harness to incourage all youth to seeke deeds of armes. This yeare died at Rome by poison (as was reported) the archbishop of Poike and cardinall, called doctor Benbrike, who was the kings ambassadour there: this was a wiseman and of a tollie courage. The king then gaue the said archbishop like to Thomas Wolle, then bishop of Lincolne, who at that time bare all the rule about the king, and what he said was obeyed in all places. Now when he was once archbishop, he studied daie and night how to be a cardinall, and caused the king, and the French king to write to Rome for him, and at their request he obtained his purpose, as you shall heare afterward.
At this time was much communing, and verelie (as it appeared) it was intended, that the king in person would passe the sea to Calis, and there on the marches of the same, the French king and queene to come and see the king their brother: and for the same iournie manie coslie woorks were wrought, much rich apparell prouided, and much preparation made against the next spring: but death which is the last end of all things let this iournie. For before the next spring the French king died at the cite of Paris, the first date of Januarie, when he had bene married to the faire ladie Marie of England foure score and two daies (whom he so feruentlie loued, that he gaue himselfe ouer to behold too much hir excellent beautie bearing then but eightene yeares of age, nothing considering the proportion of his owne yeares, nor his decayed complexion; so that he fell into the rage of a feauer, which drawing to it a sudden stup, ouer came in one instant the life, that nature gaue ouer to preferue anie longer. He was a king iust & much beloued of his people, but touching his condition, neither before he was king, nor after he had the crowne he neuer found constancie nor stabilitie in either fortune.

For, rising from a small duke of Orleans with great happinesse to the crowne, and that by the death of Charles yonger than he, and two of his sonnes, he conquered with a verie great facilitie the duchie of Millan and the kingdome of Naples, and almost all the residue of the regions of Italie, being gouerned for manie yeares by his direction: he recovered with a verie great prosperitie, the state of Genes that was in rebellion: and vanquished with no lesse glorie the armie of the Venetians, being in person at both those victories. But on the other side, euen when he was in his youth and best disposition of bodie, he was then constrained by king Lewis the eleuenth to marrie his daughter that was both barren and deformed; and yet could neuer get the good will nor countenance of his father in law.

And after his death, such was the greatnesse of the loue of Bourbon, that he could neuer get the institution of the new king, being then in minority, being almost compelled to retire himselfe into Brittain: where being taken in the battell of saint Aubin, he liued two yeares in the calamitie of a prisoner. To these afflictions maie be added the siege and famine of Pauarte, the manie discomfites he had in the realme of Naples, the losse of the estate of Millan, Genes, and all the townes which he had taken from the Venetians: and lastlie the greuous warre he had in France against verie mightie enemies, his eyes beholding into what lamentable perills his realme was brought: neuertheless, before he died it seemed he had conquered all his aduersities, and fortune shewed good tokens of his reconciliation, both for that he had defended his kingdome against mightie enemies, and also established a perpetuall peace and alliance with the king of England, with whom by how much his amitie was great and assured, by so much it gaue him hope to be able to reconquer the duchie of Millan.]

The king of England being aduertised of the French kings death, caused a solemne obsequie to be kept for him in the cathedrall church of S. Paule, with a costlie hearfe: at which manie nobles were present. After this he sent a letter to comfort the queene his sister, requiring to know hir pleasure, whether she would continue still in France, or returne into England. And when he was aduertised of hir mind (which was to returne into England) the duke of Suffolke, sir Richard Wingfield deputie of Calis, and doctor West, with a goodlie band of gentlemen and yeomen, all in blacke, were sent into France, and comming to Paris, were well receiued of the new French king, Francis the first of that name [who was the next heire male of the blood roiall and of the same line of the dukes of Orleans: he was preferred to the succession of the kingdome before the daughters of the dead king by vertue and disposition of the law Salike, a law verie ancient in the realme of France, which excludeth from the roiall dignitie all women; so long as there is anie issue male of the same line,

The world had such a hope in his vertues, and such an opinion of his magnanimitie, and such a conceipt of his iudgement and wit, that euerie one confessed, that of verie long time there was none raised by to the crowne with a greater expectation. He was made the more agreeable to the fancies of men, by the consideration of his age bearing then but two and twentie yeares; his excellent stature and proportion of bodie, his great liberalitie, and generall hu-manitie, together with the ripe knowledge he had in manie things. But speciallie he pleased greatly the nobilitie, to whom he transferred manie singular and great fauours. Unto this king Francis de Angoulême did the foresaid English nobilitie declare the effect of their commission, which was to receiue the queene Dowager, according to the contents of the marriage.]

The councill of France (by the kings appointment) assigned forth hir dowrie, and the duke of Suffolke put in officers, and then was the queene deliuered to the duke by indenture, who behaued himselfe so towards hir, that he obtained hir good will to be hir husband. It was thought, that when the king created him duke of Suffolke, he perceiued his sisters good will towards the said duke; and that he meant then to haue bestowed hir vpon him; but that a better offer came in the waie. But howsoever it was now, he won hir loue; so as by hir consent, he wrote to the king hir brother, makelie beseeching him of pardon in his request, which was humble to desire him of his good will and contentation.

The king at the first said, but after long sute, and speciallie by meane of the French queene his selfe, and other the dukes friends, it was agreed that the duke should bring hir into England vnmarrried, and at his returne to marrie hir in England: but for doubt of change he married hir secretly in Paris at the house of Clugnie, as was said. After he had receiued hir with hir dower appointed, & all hir apparell, iewels, and household stuffe deliuered, they toke leave of the new French king, and so passing thorough France, came to Calis; where she was honorable interteined, and after openlie married with great honour vnto the said duke of Suffolke. Doctor West (as then nominated bishop of Elie) remained behind at Paris, to go thorough with the full conclusion of a new league betwixt the king of England, and the new French king.

The court lieng at Grénewich, the king and the queene, accompanied with manie lords and ladies, rood to the high ground of Shoters hill to take the open aire; and as they passed by the waie, they espied a companie of tall yeomen, clothed all in greene with greene hoods, and bowes and arrowes, to the number of two hundred. Then one of them, which called himselfe Robin hode, came to the king, desiring him to see his men shot; and the king was content. When he whistled, and all the two hundred archers shot and lofed at once; and then he whistled againe, and they likewise shot againe; their arrowes whistled by craft of the head, so that the noise was strange and great, and much pleased the king, the queene, and all the companie. All these archers were of the kings gard, and had thus apparelled themselves to make solace to the king.

Then Robin hode desired the king and queene to come into the greene wood, and to see how the outlawes liued. The king demanded of the queene a hir ladies, if they durst aduenture to go into the wood with so manie outlawes. When the queene said, that if it pleased him she was content. When the hornes blew, till they came to the wood vnder Shoters hill, & there was an arbor made of boughes with a hall, and a great chamber; and an inner chamber verie well made and covered with flowers & sweet hearbs, which the king much praised. Then said Robin hode; Sir, outlawes breakfasts is venison, and therefore you must be content with such fare as we vse. When the king and queene sat downe, and were serued with venison and wine by Robin hode and his men, to their great contentation.

Then the king departed and his companie, and Robin hode and his men them conducted; and as they were were returning, there met with them two ladies in a rich chariot drawn with four horses, and every horse had his name on his head, and on every horse sat a lady with his name written. On the first courser called Cande, sat Humidite, or Humide. On the second courser called Spermon road lady Mer. On the third called Pheton sat lady Vegetive. On the fourth called Kimphon sat lady Pleasant. On the fifth called Lampace sat Sweet Odour. And in the chaire sat lady Haic, accompanied with lady Floza, richly apparelled, and they saluted the king with diuerse goodlie songs, and so brought him to Crænewich. At this making was a great number of people to behold it to their great solace and comfort.

The same after none, the king, the duke of Suffolke, the marquesse Dorset, and the earle of Essex, their barbes and bases of greene beluet and cleyth of gold, came into the field on great coursers, on whome waited diuerse gentlemen in silke of the same colour. On the other side entered sirtene lords and gentlemen, all apparelled richly after their deuises, and so valiantly they ran their courses appointed: after that, they ran volant one as fast as he might overtake another, which was a goodlie sight to see: and when all was done they departed, and went to a goodlie banquet. This summer the king took his progress westward, and visited his townes and castles there, and heard the complaints of his poore communitie, and ever as he roode he hunted and liberalitie departed with venison.]

This yeare in September, the king being at his manour of Oving, after his returne from his progress which he made that yeare into the west parts, the archbishop of Yorke came thither to him. Whilste he sojourned there, a letter was brought to the said archbishop from Rome, aduertising him that he was elected cardinall, which letter incontinentlie he shewed to the king, disabling himselfe in wordes, though his intent was otherwise; and so the king did incourage him, and willed him to take that dignitie upon him, and called him from thenceforth my lord cardinall. But his hat, bull, nor other ceremonies were not yet come. In Nouember, the king assembled his high court of parlement at Westmynster, wherein, diuerse acts made in the first yeare were reformed and altered, and especiallie the act of apparell, and the act of labourers, as by the booke of statutes more plainelie appereth.

At the end of this parlement, doctor Warham archbishop of Cantuarie, and as then lord chancellor, perceiving how the new lord cardinall medled further in his office of chancelorship than he could well suffer, except he should adventure the kings displeasure; for this and for other considerations gave up his office of chancelor into the kings hands, and deliuered to him the great seale, which incontinentlie was deliuered by the king vnto the lord cardinall, and so was he made lord chancellor. He was no longer in that office, but he directed forth commissions into euerie shire, for the execution of the statutes of apparell and labourers, and in all his doings shewed himselfe more loslie and presumptuous than became him. And he himselfe on a daie called a gentleman named Simon Fitz Richard, and took from him an old sack of crimsin beluet and diuerse haches, which extreme doing caused him greatlie to be hated and by his example manie cruel officers for malice euill intreated diuerse of the kings subiects, in so much that one spinning, mayor of Rochester, set a young man on the pillorie for wearing of a riuen or gathered shirt.]

In the end of Nouember, the cardinals hat was sent into England, which the gentlemen of Kent received, and brought to London with such triumph, as though the greatest prince in Europe had bene come to visit the king [much like that of the people at Rome in the yeare 1515, when were scene in the said citie two elephants, a nature of creatures which haplie had not bene scene in Italie since the triumphs and publike plaies of the Romans. Emanuel king of Portugal sent to pope Leo the tenth a verie honorable ambassage, and withall presented him with these huge and statelie elephants, which his ships had brought by sea from India; their entring into Rome was celebrated with a verie great concourse of people, some wondering at the strange forme and stature of the beasts, some marrelling to what uses their nature inclined them, and some conjecturing the respects and purposes of such a present, their ignorance making their wonder farre greater than their reason.]

No lesse adu was there at the bringing of the cardinals hat, who on a sundae (in St. Peters church at Westmynster) received the same, with the habit, the pillar, and other such tokens of a cardinall. And now that he was thus a perfect cardinall, he looked about all estates, which purchased him great hatred and disdain on all sides. For his ambition was no lesse discernable to the eyes of the people, than the sunne in the firmament in a clere and cloudlesse summer daie; which procured against him the more hatred among the noble and popular sort; for that his base linage was both noted and knowne, in so much that his insatiable aspiring to supereminent degrees of dignitie kindled manifest contempt and detestation among such as pretended a countenance of god will and honorable dutie vnto him, though in verie deed the same parties (if frellie and without cheeke they might haue spoken their fanthe) would haue intitled him a proud popeling; as led with the like spirit of swelling ambition, wherewith the table of popes haue bene bladder like puffed and blowne vp: a diuelish and luciferian vice, in the iudgements of men abominable, and in the sight of God most damnable; as the poet in this dishon tralie witnesseth:

Dij superi fastum, fastum mortales abhorrent, Hæc homini leuitus displicet atque Deo.

Gu. Ha.

After the end of the parlement, sir Edward Poynings laboured to be discharged of the keeping of Rozaie, because he could not haue health there: and so he was discharged, and sir William Blunt lord Mountjoy was sent thither to haue that roome, and for marshall was appointed sir Sampson Boston. Immediatlie vpon their coming thither chanced a great riot, raised by the souldiers, so that to appeale them, the lord Mountjoy was put in jeopardy of his life. In conclusion, to quiet them sir Sampson Boston was banished the towne for ever, but what the matter was I haue not found rehearsed by anie writer. After that the citie was appeased, and euerie thing thought to be forgotten, diuerse of the offenders were executed, and diuerse banished the towne, some fled, and were confined both out of England and the towne.

After the parlement was ended, the king kept a solempne Christmasse at his manor of Eltham; and on the Twelue night in the hall was made a goodlie castell, wonderouslie set out; and in it certeine ladies and knights, and when the king and queene were set, in came other knights and assailed the castell, where manie a good stripe was giuen; and at the last the assailants were beaten awaie. And then issued out knights and ladies out of the castell, which ladies were rich and strangelie disguised: for all their apparell was in braids of gold, set with mooring spangles of siluer and gilt, set on crimsin sattin kose and not fastned: the mens apparell of the same sute made like Julis of Hungarie; and the ladies heads and

This yere the new league accorded betwixt king Henrie & the French king was openly proclaimed through the cite of London by a trumpet. Margaret queene of Scots eldest sister to the k. came this yere into England, & at Harbottell castell was deliuered of a daughter, begot by hir second husband the lord Archembald Dowlglaſſe earle of Angus. This daughter was called at the fontſtone after hir mother Margaret. The said queene after the death of hir late husband king James married the said earle of Angus, without consent of hir brother king Henrie, or other of hir friends; chādē (as some haue thought) for hir sonnes sake, doubting if she should not haue taken hir choise at home, she should haue married in some other place, and so haue bene sequestred from hir sonne, whose bringing vp appertained now chādē unto hir. But such contention rose thotlie after in Scotland amongst the lords, that both she and hir husband were glad to seeke succor in England at hir brothers hand, who was contented to releue them, assigning them the said castell of Harbottell to lie in, with apparell and all other necessities, till his further pleasure should be knowne. The eighteenth daie of februarie this yere, the ladie Marie, daughter to king Henrie the eight was bozne at Crēnewich. This was she that afterwards was queene of this realme, & married the king of Spaine. This yere also died the king of Aragon, father to the queene; for whom was kept a solemne obsequie in the cathedrall church of Paules.

As ye haue heard the last yere how the queene of Scots with hir husband was come for succor into England, and late at Harbottell in Northumberland, till the kings pleasure was to send for them; so now know you that he (like a naturall brother) sent for hir and hir husband to come to his court for their solace; for the which kindnesse the earle humble thanked the king, and promised to giue his attendance on the queene his wife to the court. Whereupon the king sent William Blacknall esquier, clerk of his spicerie with silver vessel, plate, and other things necessarie for the conuenance of hir, and sent to hir all manner of officers for hir estate contentment. Now when she was ready to depart, she asked for hir husband, but he was departed into Scotland, and left hir alone; nothing remembryng his promise. Which sudden departing much made hir to muse; howbeit, the lords of England greatly encouraged hir to kepe hir promise with the king hir brother.

Now when she was somewhat appeased, she set forward; and in enerie towne she was well received, & so on the third day of Maie she made hir entrie into London, riding on a white palfrey (which the queene of England had sent unto hir) behind sir Thomas Parre richly beset, and with a great companie of lords and ladies she rode through the cite to Watnards castell, and from thence she was conueied to Crēnewich, and there receiued iouissance of the king, the queene, the French queene hir sister, and highlie was the feasted. And when the king heard that the earle of Angus hir husband was departed, he said it was done like a Scot. This queene sometime was at the court, and sometime at Watnards castell, and so she continued in England all this yere.

The king for the honour of his sister the nineteenth and twentieth daie of Maie prepared two solemne daies of iusts: and the king himselfe, and the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Essex, and Nicholas Carew esquier, toke on them to answer all comers. The apparell of them and their horses was blacke velvet, couered all ouer with branches of honye-suckles of fine flat gold of damaske of lose worke, euerie leafe of the branch mooring, the embroderie was verie cunning and sumptuous. On the king was attending in one sute on horsebacke, the lord marquisse Dorset, the earle of Surrie, the lord Aburgauennie, the lord Hastings, sir John Pechie, the lord Ferrers, sir William Fitz Williams, and twelue other knights. All these were in frockes of blew velvet, garded with rich cloth of gold, and their horse trappers of blew velvet fringed with gold: and on foot were fortye persons all in blew sattin garded with cloth of gold. And so they entred the field with trumpets, drummes and other minstrelle. When in came the counterpartie richly apparelled, to the number of twelue; and on that daie euerie man did well, but the king did best, and so was adiudged; and so at night they ceased, and came to supper.

The king the next daie and his companie were apparelled (horse and all) in purple velvet, set full of leaues of cloth of gold ingrailed with fine flat gold of damaske embrodered like to rose leaues, and euerie leafe fastned to other with points of damaske gold, and on all their borders were letters of gold bullion. And on the king waited five lords, fourtene knights in frockes of yelloze velvet, garded and bound with rich cloth of gold: and thirtie gentlemen were in like apparell on foot, and fortye officers in yelloze sattin edged with cloth of gold. Thus with great triumph they entred the field. Then the counterpartie entred all clothed and barbed in white sattin trauesed with cloth of gold richly. This daie was manie a great stripe giuen. The king and sir William Kingston ranne together; which sir William Kingston was a strong and a tall knight, & yet the king by strength ouerthrew him to the ground. And after that the king and his alds had performed their courses, they ranne volant at all comers, which was a pleasant sight to see. And when night approached, they all disarmed them, and went to the queenes chamber, where was a great banket for the welcome of the queene of Scots.

In this moneth of Maie were sent out of England twelue hundred masons and carpenters, and three hundred labozers to the cite of Rome; for the king and his counsell considered that the garrison that was kept there was chargeable: and therefore it was determined that there should be builded a castell to chastise the cite if they rebelled, and to minish the garrison. And therefore these workemen were sent thither, which this yere began a strong castell, and wrought still on it. In this yere, by the cardinall were all men called to accompt that had the occupying of the kings monie in the warres or elsewhere, not to euerie mans contentation: for some were found in arrearages, and some saved themselves by policie and byberie, and waxed rich, and some innocents were punished. And for a truth, he so punished perurie with open punishment, and open papers wearing, that in his time it was lesse used. He punished also lords, knights, and men of all sorts, for riots bearing and maintaining in their countries, that the poore men liued quietlie: who perceiving that he punished the rich, complained without number, and brought manie an honest man to trouble and vexation.

Now when the cardinall at the last perceived their vntreue firmnes, and seiued complaints for the most part, he then waxed wearis of hearing their causes, and ordered by the kings commission diuerse vnder courts to heare complaints by bill of poore people. The one was kept in the White hall, the other before the kings almoner doctor Stokelleie, a man that had moze learning than discretion to be a iudge, the third was kept in the lord treasurers chamber beside the starr chamber, and the fourth at the rols at the after none. These courts were greatlie haunted for a time: but at the last the people perceived that much delaie was vsed in these courts, and few matters ended, and when they were ended, they bound no man by the law, then euery man was werie of them and reioyced to the common law.

It was strange to see the cardinall (a man not skilled in the laws) sit in the seat of iudgement and pronounce the law, being aided at the first by such as (according to the ancient custome) did sit as associats with him: but he would not sticke to determine sum-dry causes, neither rightlie decided nor adiudged by order of law. And againe, such as were cleare cases, he would sometime prohibit the same to passe, call them into iudgement, frame an order in controuer-sies, and punish such as came with vntrue surmises afore the iudges, & sharpelie repproue the negligence of the iudges themselves, which had receiued such surmises, and not well considered of the controuer-sies of the parties. And such was the administration of the cardinall vnder a colour of iustice at the first: but because the same seemed at length to be but a vertishadow of colour in deed, it quicklie banished awaie, he taking vpon him the whole rule himselfe, for that he saw the king made small account of anie other but onlie of him.

Whereby it came to passe, that manie of the pères and high estates of the realme withdrew them from the court; as first the archbishop of Canturburie, and the bishop of Winchester, which got them home into their diocesses. But yet before their departure (as good fathers of their countrie) they instantlie besought the king that he would not suffer anie seruant to erre and passe his maister: hoping that sentence out of the gospell of saint John, where our Sa-uiour speaking to his disciples, saith to them, Where-lie, verelie, I say vnto you, the seruant is not greater than his maister. Wherevnto the king, knowing that they meant this by the cardinall, made this answer, That he would diligentlie see, that euery seruant should obeye, and not command. But the cardinall notwithstanding (during the time of his flattering felicitie) held out, thinking to come to be countermanned; behauing himselfe more like a prince, than a prelat, so blinded was he with baine glozie, and doun-ken with the transitorie delights of the world: obliuious to the permanent ioies of heauen, as the poet saith:

Delicias mundi fragiles qui mente sequitur, perdidit aeterni certissima gaudia cali.

After this, the duke of Suffolke departed home into his countrie, and last of all the duke of Suffolke also followed the other. For he hauing spent liberal-lie in his iournies when he went as ambassadoe into France, also in the solemnization of his marriage, and in housekeeping since he was married, borrowed great summes of monie of the king, which he hoped should haue bene forgiven him: but the cardinall would not haue it so, to the intent that the duke being behind hand in debt, should be the more at commandement. For as wealth maketh men lottie, so debt want make them lowlie. In the moneth of October, in this eight yeare of king Henrie, at that time bishop of Sion or Sittin, a cardinall commonlie called the cardinall of the Swizes, came into England from the emperor Maximilian.

At the contemplation of this cardinall, the king lent to the emperor a great summe of monie. But the chiefest matter that moued the king to be so free to Maximilian, was because the same monie should be imploied on men of warre against the French king, towards whome the king (or rather cardinall Wolseley) of late had conceived a grudge, as thus.

True it is, that the king bestowed the reuenues of the see of Coznaie vpon the cardinall, at what time that see came into the kings hands: and therefore the cardinall being desirous to assure to himselfe the same, made sute to the French king, that he would prouide Guillard the former bishop of Coznaie of some other bishopricke in France, so that he might resigne the bishopricke of Coznaie clearelie into his hands. The French king, perceiuing how much this should make against his purpose, that vpon occasion hoped euer to recouer the possession of Coznaie, would not gratifie the cardinall herein.

Wherevpon the cardinall turning the kings mind at his pleasure, perswaded him, that the next way to abate the French kings puissance (which in the beginning of his reigne had recouered Milan, and grew euery daie in power more than other) should be to mainteine the emperor with monie against him, so as the Frenchmen should be chastised without the trauell of him or his people. Wherevpon was Richard Dale sent first into Germanie with a great summe of monie to wage the Swizes, which vnder the conduct of the emperor Maximilian inuaded the duchie of Milan; but without anie great gaine returned from thence, leaving Milan in the Frenchmens hands at that time. And now for a new reliefe was this cardinall of Sion sent from Milan, at whose instance monie was assigned to be deliuered, and certaine Genouaies undertooke the exchange, which made not payment thereof at the day, although they had receiued it of the king.

In this yeare the king kept his Christmase at his manor of Greenwich, & on the Twelue night, according to the old custome, he and the queene came into the hall: and when they were set, and the queene of Scots also, there entered into the hall a garden arti-ficiall, called the garden of Esperance. This garden was towred at euery corner, and railed with railles gilt, all the bankes were set with flowers artificiall of silke and gold, the leaues cut of greene sattin, so that they seemed verie flowers. In the midst of this garden was a pillar of antique worke, all gold set with pearles and stones; and on the top of the pillar, which was six square, was a lower or an archembolued, crowned with gold: within which stood a bush of roses red and white, all of silke and gold, and a bush of pomegranats of like stuffe. In this garden walked six knights, and six ladies richlie apparelled; and then they descended and danced manie goodlie dances, and so ascended the garden againe, and were conueied out of the hall, and then the king was serued of a great banquet. After this Christmase the king exercised himselfe much in hauking.

This yeare, and about this time, Richard For-bush of Winchester builded and founded Corpus Christi college in Oxford, and minded to haue appointed the same for a house of monks: but Hugh Aldom then bishop of Excester changed his mind from that purpose by these meanes. This Hugh Aldom albeit he were not the best learned of himselfe, yet verie much and well affected towards learning and learned men; and was minded to haue enlarged Excester college. But being denied the preferment of a scholer, which stood then in election for a rone, his good will was withdrawne from that college, and he would haue joined with William Smith bishop of Lincolne, who then was in building of Walsenrofe college; but it took no effect. And then being aduertised that Richard Forbush of Winchester was in hand to build Corpus Christi college, he did send his letters vnto him, and offered to ioint with him therein, who was verie glad thereof and well contented. Now these two bishops conferring together what maner of house they should build, and to what end and purpose.

Bishop Dildom of Exeter is bitterlie against ffor's intnd to found a college for monks.

Bishop ffor was of the mind and determination to haue made the college for religious men. But bishop Dildom (whether it was because he fauoured not those sects of cloistered monks, or whether he foresaw anie fall towards of those sects) dissuaded bishop ffor what he could from that his purpose and opinion, and said vnto him; What my lord, shall we build houses, and prouide liuelodes for a compa-10 nanie of bustling monks, whose end and fall we our selues maie lue to see? No, no, it is moze meet a great deale, that we should haue care to prouide for the increase of learning, and for such as who by their 11 learning shall doe good in the church and commonwealth. To this bishop ffor at length yelded, and so they proceeded in their buildings. Wherein Dildom reseruing to ffor the name of the founder, was contented with the name of a benefactor, and berie libe-12 rallie did contribute great masses of monie to the same: and since (according to his wish and desire) the same college hath bene and is the nurse of manie notable god scholars.]

Dildom giueth ffor the name of founder, & contenteth himselfe with the name of benefactor.

About this season there grew a great hartburning and malicious grudge amongst the Englishmen of the citie of London against strangers; and namelie the artificers found themselves sore grieved, for that such numbers of strangers were permitted to resort hither with their wares, and to exercise handie crafts to the great hinderance and impouertising of the kings liege people. Besides that, they set nought by the rulers of the citie, & bare themselves too bold of the kings fauor, whereof they would insolentlie boast; upon presumption thereof, & they offered manie an in-13 surious abuse to his liege people, insomuch that among other accidents which were manifest, it fortu-14 ned that as a carpenter in London called William, son had bought two stockdowes in Cheape, and was about to pay for them, a Frenchman toke them out of his hand, and said they were not meate for a carpenter.

Hall in H. 8. fol. lix.

The diuelish malice of the Frenchmen.

Well said the Englishman I haue bought them and now paid for them, and therefore I will haue them. Paie said the Frenchman I will haue them for my lord the ambassadour. And so for better or worse, the Frenchman called the Englishman knave, and went awaie with the stockdowes. The strangers came to the French ambassadoz, and sur-15 mised a complaint against the poze carpenter. And the ambassadoz came to the lord maior, and said so much, that the carpenter was sent to prison: and yet not contented with this, so complained to the kings counsell, that the kings commandement was laid on him. And when sir John Baker knight and other two shipfull persons sued to the ambassadoz for him, he answered by the bodie of God that the English knave should lose his life, for he said no Englishman should denie that the Frenchmen required, and other answer had they none.

There was also a Frenchman that had slaine a man, and should abiure the realme, and had a crosse in his hand. Then suddenlie came a great sort of Frenchmen about him, and one of them said to the constable that led him; Sir is this crosse the price to kill an Englishman. The constable was somewhat 16 affonted & answered not. Then said another Frenchman, On that price we should be banished all by the masse. This saying was noted to be spoken spiteful-17 lie. Howbeit, the Frenchmen were not alonellie oppressors of the Englishmen. For a Lombard called Francis de Ward, entised a mans wife in Lombard street to come to his chamber with his busshoppes plate, which thing she did. After, when his husband knew it, he demanded his wife, but answer was made he should not haue her: then he demanded his plate, and in like maner answer was made that he should neither haue plate nor wife. And then he had sued an action against the stranger in the Guildhall, the stranger so faced the Englishman, that he saue man for his wifes word, while he kept her from his husband in his chamber.

This abuse was much noted, so that the same and manie other oppressions done by them, increased such a malice in the Englishmens hearts, that at the last it burst out. For amongst other that sore grudge at these matters, there was a broker in London called John Lincolne, that busied himselfe so farre in the matter, that about Palme sondaie in this eight yeare of the kings reigne, he came to one doctor Henrie Standish with these wordes; Sir I vnderstand that you shall preach at the sandinarie 20 spittle on mondaie in Easter weeke, and so it is, that Englishmen, both merchants and other are vndone, for strangers haue moze libertie in this land than Englishmen, which is against all reason, and also against the common-weale of the realme. I beseech you therefore to declare this in your sermon, and in so doing you shall deserue great thanks of my lord maior, and of all his brethren: and herewith he offered vnto the said doctor Standish a bill, containing this matter moze at large.

But doctor Standish (wiselie considering that there might moze inconuenience rise thereof, than he would wish, if he should deale in such sort) both wiselie refused the bill, and told Lincolne plainlie, that he ment not to meddle with anie such matter in his sermon. Whereupon the said Lincolne went vnto one doctor Beale a chanon of the foresaid spittle, that was appointed to preach likewise upon the 30 tuesdaie in Easter weeke at the same spittle, whome he perswaded to read his said bill in the pulpit. Which bill in effect containede how miserablie the common 40 artificers liued, and scarce could get anie worke to find them, their wifes & children: there were such a number of artificers strangers that toke awaie all their lining in manner. And also how the English merchants could haue no utterance, for the mer-45 chant strangers bying in all likes, cloth of gold, wine, oile, iron, and such other merchandize, that no man almost buieth of an Englishman.

Furthermore, they carie out so much English wool, tinne, and lead, that Englishmen who aduenture 50 outward can haue no lining: which things (said Lincolne) hath bene shewed to the counsell, and cannot be heard. And further (said he) the strangers com-55 passe the citie round about, in Southwarke, in Westminster, Temple barre, Holboyne, saint Martins, saint Johns street, Algate, Tower hill, and saint Bartharins, and foreshall the market, so that no god thing for them cometh to the market: which is the cause that Englishmen want and starue, & they lue 60 abundantlie in great pleasure. Wherefore (said Lincolne) maister doctor, sith you were borne in London, and see the oppression of the strangers, and the great miserie of your owne native countrie, exhort all the citizens to ioine in one against these strangers, rau-65 ueners, and destroyers of your countrie. Paister doctor hearing this, said he much lamented the case, if it were as Lincolne had declared.

Nes said Lincolne, that it is, and much moze. For the Dutchmen bying ouer iron, timber, leather, and 70 tweincot readie wrought; also nalles, locks, baskets, cupboards, tables, chests, girdles, with points, saddles & painted clothes, so that if it were wrought here, Englishmen might haue some worke and li-75 uing by it. And besides this, they grow into such a multitude, that it is to be looked vpon: for I saw on a sondaie lundaie this Lent, six hundred strangers shooting at the poppingale with crossbowes, and they keepe such as-semblies and fraternities together, and make such a gathering to their common box, that euerie botcher will hold pte with the cite of London. Well said the doctor, I will do for a reformation of this matter as much as a prest maie do, and so recruited Lincolns bill, and studied for his purpose. Then Lincolne berie solous of his enterpryse, went from man to man, saieng that thozlie they should heare news, and dai-lie excited yong people and artificers to beare malice to the strangers. When Easter came, and doctor Bele should preach the tuesday in Easter weeke, he came into the pulpit, and there declared, that to him was brought a pitifull bill, and read it in this wise.

The tenor of the bill of complaint which doctor Bele read in open audience at the Spile.

I call you the worshipfull lords & maisters of this cite, that will take compassion ouer the poze people your neighbours, and also of the great importable hurts, losses, and hindrances, whereof proceedeth the extreame pouertie to all the kings subiects, that inhabit within this cite and suburbs of the same. For so it is, that the aliens & strangers eat the bread from the fatherlesse childzen, and take the lining from all the artificers, and the intercoure from all merchants, whereby pouertie is so much increased, that euerie man bewaileth the miserie of other; for craftsman be brought to beggerie, and merchants to nardinesse.
Wherefore the premisses considered, the redresse must be of the commons, knit and nited to one part. And as the hurt and damage graeueth all men, so must all men set to their willing power for remedie, & not to suffer the said aliens so highlie in their wealth; & the naturall bozne men of this region to come to confusion. Of this letter was more, but the doctor read no further.

When he had read this letter, of the chiefest part thereof, comprehending (as ye haue heard) much seditious matter, he began with this sentence, Celum cali- Domino, terram autem dedit filijs hominum, and upon this text he intreated, how this land was giuen to Englishmen. And as birds defend their nests, so ought Englishmen to cherish and mainteine themselves, and to hurt and grieue aliens for respect of their common-wealth. And upon this text Pugna pro patria, he brought in, how by Gods law it was lawfull to fight for their countrie. And thus he subtilly moued or rather vniuersitie prouoked the people to rebell against strangers. By this wolkly sermon, manie a light person toke courage, and openlie spake against strangers. And as vnhap would, there had bene di-uerse euill parts played of late by strangers, in and about the cite of London, which kindled the peoples rancour the more furiously against them.

Now as the diuell would, the sundaie after at Grantwich in the kings gallerie was Francis de Bard, who (as ye haue heard) kept an Englishmans wife and his goods, and yet he could haue no remedie; and with him were Domingo, Anthony Caweler, and manie more strangers, and there they talking with sir Thomas Palmer knight, iested and laughed how that Francis kept the Englishmans wife, saieng that if they had the maiors wife of London they would keepe hir. Sir Thomas said, Sirs you haue too much fauour in England. There were diuerse English merchants by, who heard them laugh, and were not content, in so much as one William Bolt a mercer said; Well you whoreson Lombards, you reioise and laugh, by the masse we will one daie haue a sting at you, come when it will. And that saieng the other merchants affirmed. This tale was reported about London, and the yong and euill disposed people said they would be reuenged on the merchants strangers as well as on the artificers strangers. On monday the morow after, the king removed to his manor of Richmond.

On the eight and twentieth daie of Aprill, diuerse yong men of the cite piked quarels to certeine strangers as they passed by the streets, some they did strike, some they buffeted, and some they threw into the kennell: wherefore the maior sent some of the Englishmen to prison, as Stephan Studleie Kitchner, Bets, Stephanison, and diuerse other. Then sudden-lie rose a secret rumour, and no man could tell how it began, that on Paies daie next the cite would rebell and sea all the aliens, inso much that diuerse strangers fled out of the cite. This bruite ran so into euerie mans eares, that it came to the knowledge of the kings counsell, whereupon the lord cardinall sent for the maior, and other of the counsell of the cite, gi-uing them to vnderstand what he had heard.

The maior, as one ignorant of the matter, told the cardinall that he doubted not but so to gouerne the cite, as peace should be obserued. The cardinall wot-ted him so to do; and to take good heed, that if arie such riotous attempt was intended, he should with good policie prevent it. The maior came from the car-dinalls house at foure of the clocke in the after none on Paie euen, and in all hast sent for his brethren to the Guildhall; yet was it almost seuen of the clocke yer the assemble was set. Upon conference had of the matter touching the rumour that was spzed abroad of the rebellon against the strangers, some thought it necessarie that a substantiall watch should be set, of the honest citizens householders which might withstand the euill doers, if they went about arie miskule.

But other were of this opinion, that it was dangerous to raise men in armour, because it was hard to tell whome they might trust; but rather they thought it best that commandement should be giuen to euerie man through euerie ward, to shut in his doyes, & to keepe his seruants within. Before eight of the clocke the recorder was sent to the cardinall with these opinions; who hearing the same, allowed the latter for best and most sure. And then the recorder and sir Thomas More (late vnderthiriffe of London, and now of the kings priue counsell) came to the Guildhall halfe an houre before nine of the clocke, and there shewed the pleasure of the Kings counsell; whereupon euerie alderman sent to his ward, that no man should stirre after seaden of the clocke out of his house, but to keepe his doyes shut, and his seruants within, till nine of the clocke in the morning.

After this commandement giuen, in the evening, as sir John Spundie (an alderman) came from his ward, and found two yong men in Cheape playing at the bucklers, and a great masse of yong men lo-king on them (for the commandement was then scarle knowen) he commanded them to leaue of. And for that one of them asked, why he would haue had him to the Counter. When all the yong prentises stept to, and resisted the alderman, taking the yong fellow from him, & cried; Prentises and clark. Then out at euerie doore came clubs and weapons. The alderman fled and was in great danger. Then more people arose out of euerie quarter, and forth came seruimgmen, watermen, courtiers, and others; so that by eleven of the clocke, there were in Cheape, sir or seven hundred; and out of Pauls churchyard came three hundred, which knew not of the other. So out of all places they gathered, & brake by the counters, took out the prisoners that the maior had thither committed for hurting the strangers, and came to Pelwgate, and took out Stundele and Petit committed thither for that cause.

The raging madnesse of the mutiners.

The maior and shiriffes were present there, and made proclamation in the kings name, but nothing was obeyed. Herewith being gathered in plumpes, they ran thorough saint Nicholas shambles, and at saint Martins gate there met with them sir Thomas Poze, and others, desiring them to go to their lodgings. And as they were thus intreating, and had almost persuaded the people to depart, they within saint Martins threw out stones, bats, and hot water; so that they hurt diuerse honest persons that were there with sir Thomas Poze, persuading the rebellious persons to cease, inasmuch as at length one Nicholas Downes a sergeant of armes being there with the said sir Thomas Poze, & soze hurt amongst others, in a furie, cried; Downe with them. And then all the misruled persons ran to the 2 yies and winndowes of the houses with saint Martins, and spoiled all that they found.

hurt.

After that, they ran headlong into Coznehill, & there likewise spoiled diuerse houses of the French men that dwelled within the gate of master Petras house called Créne gate. This master Petras was a French boyne, and reputed to be a great bearer of Frenchmen in their occupiengs and trades, contrarie to the lawes of the citie. If the people had found him, they would surely haue striken off his head; but when they found him not, the watermen and certeine young preests that were there fell to riling, and some ran to Blanchapelson, and brake by the strangers houses, and spoiled them. Thus from ten or eleven of the clocke, these riotous people continued in their outrageous doings till about three of the clocke, at what time they began to withdraw, and went to their places of resort: and by the waie they were taken by the maior and the heads of the citie, and sent some of them to the Tower, some to Pelwgate, and some to the Counters, to the number of three hundred.

The rioters malicious purpose against one Petras.

Ande fled, and speciallie the watermen, preests, & seruimgmen, but the prentises were caught by the backs and had to prison. In the meane time, whilst the hottest of this ruffling lasted, the cardinall was aduertised thereof by sir Thomas Parre: whereupon the cardinall strengthened his house with men and ordinance. Sir Thomas Parre rode in all haste to Richmond, where the king laie, and informed him of the matter; who incontinentlie sent forth basilie to London, to understand the state of the citie, and was truelie aduertised how the riot was ceased, and manie of the misdoers apprehended. The lieutenant of the Tower sir Roger Cholmeleie (no great friend to the citie) in a frautike furie, during the time of this uprore, shot off certeine peeces of ordinance against the citie. And though they did no great harme; yet he wan much enill will for his hastie doing, because men thought he did it of malice, rather than of any discretion.

Certeine
lords with their powers come to London about this riot.

About five of the clocke the earles of Shreshyre and Surrie, Thomas Dokerie lord of saint Johns, George Hewill lord of Aburgauennie, and others, which had heard of this riot, came to London with such strength as they could make upon that sudden, and so did the Juries of court. But before they came, whether with feare of the buite of their coming, or otherwise, the riotous assemblie was broken by, and manie of the misdoers taken (as ye haue heard.) Then were the prisoners examined, and the sermon of doctor Beke called to remembrance, and he taken and sent to the Tower. Herewith was a commission of oler and determiner directed to the duke of Norfolk, and to diuerse other lords, to the lord maior of London, and the aldermen, and to all the iustices of England, for punishment of this insurrection. [The citie thought the duke bare them a grudge for a lewd preest of his, which the yeare before was slain in Cheape, inasmuch that he then in his furie said; I praise God I maie once haue the citizens in my danger! And likewise the duke thought that they bare him no good will; therefore he came into the citie with thirtene hundred men in harnelle to keepe the oler and determiner.

Now upon examination it could neuer be proued of any meeting, gathering, talking, or conuenticle, at any date or time before that date; but that the chance so happened without any matter preposed of any creature saving Lincoln, and neuer an honest person in maner was taken but onelie he. Then proclamations were made, that no women should come together to babble and talke, but all men should keepe their homes in their houses. All the streets that were notable and full of harnessed men, which spake manie opprobrious words to the citizens, which grieved them sore; and if they would haue bene reuenged, the other had had the worse: for the citizens were two hundred to one, but like true subjects they suffered patientlie. Now for the due correction (according to law) of this disorder, all the iustices with all the kings counsell learned in the lawes, assembled at the house of sir John Finch lord chiefe iustice of England nere to saint Wides by Fleetstreet, to take advise, and conclude upon the order which they should follow in this matter, and first there was read the statute of the third yeare of Henrie the first, the effect whereof insuch in these words following.

The statute made in anno tertio of Henrie the first.

Because that diuers nations comprised within the truces concluded as well by our souereigne lord the king that now is, as by his right noble father, haue bene robbed and spoiled by the kings lieges and subjects, as well on the maine seas as within the ports and coasts of England, Ireland, & Wales, by reason whereof, the truces and safe conducts haue broken and violated, to the damage, dishonour, and slander of the king, and against his dignitie, & the manslaughter, spoilers, robbers, & violaters of the same truces and safe conducts (as before is declared) haue bene recetted, procured, countelled, upholden, and maintained by diuerse of the kings liege people upon the coasts: our said souereigne lord the king by the aduise and assent abovesaid, and at the prayer of the said commons, hath ordeined and established, that all such manslaughterers, robbers, spoilers, breakers of truces, and safe conducts granted by the king, and the willfull recetters, abettors, procurers, countellers, susteiners and maintainers of such persons, hereafter in time to come, being anie of the lieges & subiects of this realme of England, Ireland, & Wales, are to be adiudged and determined as guiltie of high treason committed against the crowne & dignitie of the king. And further, in euerie haven and port of the sea, there shall be from hence forth made and assigned by the king, by his letters pattents, one lawfull officer named a conseruator of truces and safe conducts granted by the king, which officer shall dispend at the least ten pounds in land by yeare, &c: as in the statute moze at large is expessed.

The which statute being read and well considered of, because there was diuerse leagues of truces betwixt the king and diuerse other princes, as one betwixt him and the French king, and another betwixt him and the archduke of Burgognie, and another betwixt him & the king of Spaine (all the which truces were violated by the said insurrection) it was determined by the whole councell there assembled, that the kings sergeants and attournies should go to the lord chancellor, to haue a sight of all the said leagues and charters of truces, to the intent they might frame their indictments according to the matter. And note that iudge Fineur said, that all such as were parties to the said insurrection, were guiltie of high treason, as well those that did not commit anie robbery, as those that were principall doers therein themselves, because that the insurrection in it selfe was high treason, as a thing practised against the regall honour of our soueraign lord the king.

And the same law holdeth of an insurrection (said Fineur) made against the statute of laborers. For so (said he) it came to passe, that certeine persons within the countie of Kent began an insurrection, in disobedience of the statute of laborers, and were attainted therfore of high treason, and had iudgement to be drawne, hanged, and quartered. He shewed where and when this chanced. It was further determined by the said Fineur, and all the iustices of the land, that upon the said commission of oier and terminer in London, the iustices named in the said commission, might not arreigne the offenders, and proceed to the trial in one selfe daie, no moze than might the iustices of peace. But iustices in oier might do so, as well as the iustices of gaole deliuerie: and as the sufficiencye of the iurors within the cite to passe betwixt the king and the said traitors, the iustices determined, that he that had lands, and goods, to the value of an hundred marks, should be inabled to passe upon the said indictments. And this by the equitie of the statute of Anno undecimo Henrici septimi, the which will, that no man be admitted to passe in anie inquest in London in a ple of lands, or other action, in which the damages shall passe the value of fourtie shillings, except he be worth in lands or goods the value of an hundred markes.

On saturdaye the second of Apraie, in this ninth yeare, all the commissioners, with the lord maior, aldermen, and iustices, went to the Guildhall, where manie of the offenders were indicted, as well of the insurrection, as of the robberies by them committed against the truces. Whereupon they were arreigned, & pleading not guiltie, had day giuen till monday next ensuing. On which daie being the fourth of Apraie, the lord maior, the duke of Norfolk, the earle of Surrie and others came to sit in the Guildhall, to proceed in their oier and terminer as they were appointed. When the lords were set, the prisoners were brought through the streets tied in ropes, some men, and some lads of thirtene yeres of age. Among them were diuerse not of the cite, some pylets, some husbandmen, and labourers. The whole number amounted unto two hundred thre score and eightene persons.

This daie was John Lincolne indicted as a principall procurer of this mischievous insurrection, and thereupon he was arreigned, and pleading not guiltie, had daie giuen ouer till wednesdaye, or as Hall saith till thursday next ensuing. He was charged with such matter (as before ye haue heard) concerning his late unto doctor Standish, and doctor Beke, for the reading of this bill in their sermons, and opening the matter (as before ye haue heard) all which matter with the circumstances he had confessed on fundaie the third of Apraie, unto sir Richard Cholmeie, sir John Danie, & sir Hugh Skeneington. Winters other were indicted this mondaie, and so for that time the lords departed. The next daie the duke came againe, & the erle of Surrie with 2000 armed men, which kept the streets. When the maior, the duke, the earles of Shrewesburie and Surrie were set, the prisoners were arreigned, and thirtene found guiltie, and adiudged to be hanged, drawne, and quartered. For execution whereof were set by eleuen paire of galloves in diuerse places where the offenses were done, as at Algate, at Blanchapellon, Grations streete, Leaden hall, and before euerie counter one, also at Newgate, at saint Martins, at Aldersgate, and at Bishopsgate.

Then were the prisoners that were iudged brought to those places of execution: and executed in most rigorous maner, in the presence of the lord Edmund Howard son to the duke of Norfolk, & knight marshall, who shewed no mercie, but extreme crueltie to the poore younglings in their execution: and likewise the dukes seruants spake manie opprobrious words, some bad hang, some bad draw, some bad set the cite on fire, but all was suffered. On thursdaie the twentieth of Apraie, was Lincolne, Skirwin, and two brethren called Wets, and diuerse other adiudged to die. Then Lincolne said, My lords, I meant well: for if you knewe the mischief that is insued in this realme by strangers, you would remembre it, & manie times I haue complained, and then I was called a buisse fellow: now our Lord haue mercie on me. They were laid on hardels, & drawne to the standard in Cheape, and first was John Lincolne executed. And as the other had the ropes about their neckes, there came a commandement from the king to respite the execution. When the people cried, God saue the king, and so was the oier and terminer deferred till another daie, and the prisoners sent againe to ward: the armed men departed out of London, and all things set in quiet.

On the eleuenth daie of Apraie, the king came to his manor of Greenwich, where the recorder of London and diuerse aldermen came to speake with his grace, and all wore gownes of blacke colour. And when they perceiued the king comming out of his priuite chamber into his chamber of presence, they knaeled downe, and the recorder said: Our most naturall, benigne, and soueraigne lord, we knowe well that your grace is displeased with vs of your cite of London, for the great riot late done: we ascerteine your grace, that none of vs, nor no honest person were condescending to that enormitie, and yet wee, our wiues, and children, euerie houre lament that your fauour should be taken from vs. And forsomuch as light and sole persons were the doers of the same, we most humbly beseech your grace to haue mercie of vs for our negligence, and compassion of the offenders for their offense and trespass.

Trulie said the king, you haue highlie displeased and offended vs, and you ought to waille and be sorie for the same. And where as you saie that you the substantial persons were not consenting to the same, it appeareth to the contrarie. For you neuer moved to let them, nor stirred once to fight with them, which you say were so small a number of light persons. Wherefore we must thinke, and you can not denie, that you did winke at the matter, but at this time we will grant to you neither our fauour nor good will, nor to the offenders mercie, but resort to the cardinal our lord chancellor, and he shall make you an answer, and declare our pleasure. And with this answer the Londoners departed, and made relation to the maior.

On the eighteenth day of this moneth, the quene of Scots, which had bene at the court, and at Bathnards castell, a whole yeare at the kings charge, and was richlie appointed of all things meet to hire estate, both of ieiwels, plate, tapistrie, arras, coine, hories, & all other things of the kings gift & liberalitie, departed out of London toward Scotland with great riches, albeit she came into England with great povertie, and she entered into Scotland the thirtieth date of June, whome hir husband receiued at Berwick, but the Englishmen smallie regarded him. All hir charges within the realme, comming to the court and returning, were of the kings purse.

The quene of Scots returned toward Scotland.

The king cometh to Westminster hall, and there sitteth in iudgement himselfe.

The kings gracious and generall pardon.

The blacke wagon that followed all this date.

On thursdaie the two & twentieth date of Maye, the king came into Westminster hall, for whome at the upper end was set a cloth of estate, and the place hang'd with arras. With him was the cardinal, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolke, the earles of Shrewsburie, of Essex, of Wiltshire, & Surrie, with manie lords and other of the kings counsell. The maior & aldermen, with all the chiefe of the citie were there in their best luerie (according as the cardinal had appointed them) by nine of the clocke. Then the king commanded that all the prisoners should be brought forth, so that in came the poore ponglings and old false knaues bound in ropes all along, one after another in their shirts, and euerie one a halter about his necke, to the number of foure hundred men, and eleuen women. And when all were come before the kings presence, the cardinal soze laid to the maior and communalitie their negligence, and to the prisoners he declared that they had deserued death for their offense. When all the prisoners together cried; Mercie gracious lord, mercie. Herewith the lords altogether besought his grace of mercie, at whose sute the king pardoned them all. When the cardinal gaue vnto them a good exhortation, to the great gladnesse of the hearers.

Now, when the generall pardon was pronounced, all the prisoners shouted at once, & all together cast vp their halters into the hall rose, so that the king might perceiue they were none of the discreetest sort. Here is to be noted, that diuerse offenders, which were not taken, hearing that the king was inclined to mercie, came well apparelled to Westminster, and suddenlie stripped them into their shirts with halters, and came in among the prisoners willinglie, to be partakers of the kings pardon. By which doing, it was well knowne, that one John Nelson yeoman of the crowne was the first that began to spoile, and exhorted other to do the same: and because he led and was not taken, he came in with a rope among the other prisoners, and so had his pardon. This companie was after called the blacke wagon. Then were all the gallows within the citie taken downe, and manie a good praiser said for the king, and the citizens toke more heed to their seruants. But the kings mercie ministered abundant matter of communication, euerie one (speciallie the pardoned and their allies) founding the benefit of his roial clemencie, whereby of dead men they became liuing, and had sustained the seuer sentence of law, had not mercie remitted the fault and the punishment, which beareth the force of iudgement, as the poet trulic saith: Indignus nervus frangit miseratio clemens.

In June the king had with him diuerse ambassadors, for solace of whome he prepared a collie lutes, he himselfe & twelue more against the duke of Suffolke and other twelue. His bace and bard was the one halfe cloth of siluer, & the other halfe blacke tinsell. On the siluer was a curious lose worke of beluet imbodered with gold, cut on the siluer, and euerie cut ingrailed with gold, so that that side was gold, siluer, and beluet. On the blacke tinsell side was blacke beluet imbodered with gold, and cut, and euerie cut was ingrailed with flat gold of damaske. The bace and bard were bodered with great letters of massie gold bullion, full of pearles and stones, marvellous rich: all his companie were in like sute, sauing that they had no ieiwels. The king had on his head a ladies heue full of diamonds. On the king attended gentlemen, armourers, and other officers, to the number of an hundred and twentie five persons, all in white beluet and white sattin, hose and harnesse for horsemen, caps and hosen for footmen, all white, at the kings cost. Thus roiallie the king and his companie with his waiters came to the tilts end.

Then entered the duke of Suffolke, with the marques Dorset, the earls of Essex and Surrie, and eight other of his band, in bards and baces of white beluet and crimson sattin lousenged, set full of letters of C. M. of gold, for Charles and Marie, and they toke the other end of the tilt. Then the trumpets blew, and the king and the duke ran fiercely together, and brake manie speares, and so did all the other, that it was hard to saie who did best. But when the courses were run, they ran volent one at another, so that both by the report of sir Edward Clifford maister of the armourie, and also of the iudges and heralds, at these lutes were broken five hundred and six speares: and then the king the same night made the ambassadors a sumptuous banquet, with manie ribbels and much pastime. After this great triumph, the king appointed his ghefts for his pastime this summer; but suddenlie there came a plague of sicknesse, called the sweating sicknesse, that turned all his purpose.

This maladie was so cruell, that it killed some within three houres, some within two houres, some merrie at dinner, and dead at supper. Marie died in the kings court, the lord Clinton, the lord Grafton, the lord Clinton, and manie knights, gentlemen, and officers. For this plague Michaelmasse tearme was adiourned. And because that this maladie continued from Iulie to the midd of December, the king kept himselfe euer with a small companie, and held no solemne Christmasse, willing to haue no resort for feare of infection: but much lamented the number of his people, for in some one towne halfe the people died, and in some other towne the third part, the sweat was so feruent and infectious. By the extremitie whereof, and the multitudes with such suddennesse and present mortalitie dropping auaie: it should seme that they little remembered, or at least, wise neglected the preseruatiue remedie vied in the first great sweating sicknesse in king Henrie the seuenths time, whereby as then manie a mans life was saued, so now the like benefit (by applying of the same wholesome meanes) might haue redounded to the patients.]

In the beginning of this yeare, Trinitie tearme was begun at Orenford, where it continued but one date, and was againe adiourned to Westminster. This yeare came to Callis from pope Leo, a legat De latere, called Laurence Campeius borne in Bologna.

logne la Grasse, commonlie called cardinall Cam-peius, to require the king of aid against the Turke.
At the request of the king of England, and also of the french king (which sought now to be receiued into friendship with the king of England chieflie by cardinall Wolles meanes) pope Leo constituted the said cardinall Wolles his legat in England, joining him in commission with the said Campeius, the which said at Calis untill the bulles were brought from Rome touching that matter. There was also an other cause that said Campeius at Calis, & that was a sute which cardinall Wolles had moued for the obtaining of the bishopricke of Bath, which benefice cardinall Adrian Castilian inioied by the collation of king Henrie the seventh.

This cardinall Adrian being fallen in the popes displeasure, withdrew out of the court of Rome to Venice: and in the meane time cardinall Cam-peius, at the instance of cardinall Wolles, wrote to the pope, that cardinall Adrian might be deuiued of that bishopricke, to the end that cardinall Wolles might haue the same. Which request was accomplished, and the bulles sent vnto Calis; so that then cardinall Campeius, after he had remained at Calis three moneths, came ouer into England, and was receiued with all pompe & honour that might be de-uised. & Inasmuch that cardinall Wolles had sent to the legat (whilest he laie at Calis) red cloth to cloath his seruants, which at their coming to Calis were but meanelie appareled. And when all things were readie, he passed the sea and landed at Dover; and so kept forth his iourne toward London.

At euerie towne as they passed, he was receiued with procession, and accompanied with all the lords & gentlemen of Kent. And when he came to Blacheheath, there met him the duke of Suffolke, with a great number of prelates, knights, & gentlemen, all richly appareled. And in the waie he was brought into a rich tent of cloth of gold, where he shifted himself into the robe of a cardinall, edged with ermins; and so toke his mule riding towards London. The night before he came to London, the cardinall of Bozke, to furnish the carriages of the cardinall Campeius, sent to him twelue mules with emptie coffers couered with red: which twelue mules were led thorough London amongst the mules of Cam-peius, which were but eight; and so these twentie mu-lets passed thorough the streets, as though they had bene full of treasures, apparell, & other necessities.

Now when they came into Cheape, one of the mu-lets brake from his keeper, and ouerthrew the chests, and ouerturned two or three other mules carriages, which fell with such a violence, that diuerse of them vnbloked; & out of some fell old hosen, broken shoes, and roasted flesh, peeces of bread, egges, and much byle baggage. At which sight the boies cried; See, see my lord legats treasure: and so the mulesters were ashamed, and toke vp all their trusse and passed forth.
About three of the clocke in the after none on the twentie ninth day of Iulie the said legat entered the cittie, and in Southwoker met him all the clergie of London, with crosses, censors, and copes, and censured him with great reuerence. The maiors and aldermen, with all the occupations of the cittie in their best liues stod in the streets, and him highlie honoured: to whome sir Thomas More made a brieue oration in the name of the cittie.

Now when he came to Paules, there he was recei-ued with bishops mitred, and vnder a canopie entered the church: which canopie his seruants toke for their fees. And when he had offered, he gaue his benediction to all the people, & toke againe his mule, & so with all his traine aforesaid was conueied to Bath place, and there rested: where he was welcommed of cardinall of Bozke. On sundae next insuing, these two cardinals as legats toke their barges, & came to Grenewich, each of them had besides their crosses two pillars of siluer; two little ares gilt, and two cloake-bags embroidered, & the cardinals hats borne before them. And when they came to the kings hall, the cardinall of Bozke went on the right hand: and there the king roiallie appareled and accompanied, met them euen as though both had come from Rome and so brought them both vp into his chamber of presence.

Then a solemne oration was made by an Italian, declaring the cause of the legacie to be in two articles, one for aid against Gods enemies, and the second for reformation of the clergie. And when masse was done, they were had to a chamber, and serued of lords and knights, with much solemnitie: and after dinner they toke their leaue of the king, and came to London, and rode through the citie together, in great pompe and glorie to their lodgings. This cardinall Campeius for his friendship shewed in helping the cardinall of England to the bishopricke of Bath, was considered (besides other great rewards) with the bishopricke of Salisburie, the profits whereof he receiued, untill the act was established, that no forrenner should inioie any spirituall benefice within this realme. But for the chiefe errand that this cardinall Campeius came, he could haue no towarde answer: which was (as you haue heard) to haue leaued a summe of monie by waie of tenths in this realme, to the maintenance of the waite in defense of the christian confines against the Turke.

There were at the same time other legats sent into other parts of Christendome about the same matter, as into France, Spaine, and Germanie. For pope Leo calling to remembrance, that the feare con-ceiued of the Turkes had brought no small gainnes to diuerse of his predecessors, he began to feare so. But for that such feare was now too well knowne to be fed as an ordinarie thist of the popes, when they stood in need of monie, this practise was at this time v-se in vaine; so that Campeius hearing that it toke not place in other parties, left off his earnest sute about it, and with great rewards receiued of the king and cardinall, returned to Rome, not without hope yet (by reason of promises made vnto him by his friends) that the popes request might hereafter be granted, according to his motion. There attended him to Rome one John Clarke a lawier, as an ambassador from the king.

This man obtained for the cardinall, authoritie to dispense with all men for offenses committed against the spirituall lawes, which part of his poluer legantine was verie profitable and gainefull. For then he set vp a court, and called it the court of the legat: in the which he proued testaments, and heard causes, to the great hinderance of all the bishops of this realme. He visited bishops, and all the clergie exempt and not exempt, and vnder colour of reformation he got much treasure. For though by lyes & rewards, notorious offenders were dispensed with, so that nothing was reformed, but came to more michefe. The example of his pride, caused prelates and all spirituall persons to war so proud, that they rubbed it out in velvet and silks, which they wore both in gounes, iackets, doublets, and shoes. They vfed open lecherie, and bare themselves so stout by reason of his authorities and faculties, that no man durst reproue any thing in them. So that we see here verie fied in proue how forcible the examples of great men be in the inferior sort; as the wise man truelie saith; Qualis erit princeps, talis prefectus habetur, Nobilis qualis, plebs quoque talis erit.

accidents, it were good to heare a full discourse, for the exact understanding of the popes affaires, whereabouts he addrested so manie cardinals into so manie parts of christendome, as solicitors to obtaine succour against the Turke. ¶ Now followeth (saith mine author) the yeare 1518, in which the regions of Italia, contrarie to the precedent of manie yeares before, felt not the least impression or motion of war, yea there appeared the selfe same disposition in all other princes of christendome, betwene whome by the operation of the pope, though haply more with faire reason, than with substantiall counsels, was solicited an universall expedition of all christendome against the pride of Selim prince of the Turkes.

This man the yeare before, had so enlarged and extended his greatnesse, that comparing with his power, his ambition to be greater, pushed on with manie helpes of nature, it was worthe to be doubted, that if he were not prevented by the invasions of the christians, he would in his pride lift up his victorious hands against them. For Selim discerning that Basileth his father, reduced to extreme old age, sought to establish the succession of the empire in the person of Acomath his elder brother, drew into rebellion against him, and by force of armes, concurring the corruption of the souldiours of his gard, constrained him to resigne up to him the authoritie of the government: and not suffering his ambition to stae there, it was believed of all men, that for his more absolute assurance he took awaie his life by poison: and afterwards giving an overthrow to his brother in an incounter of a battell, he confirmed fullie the seat of his empire, by depriving him of his life in publick shew, exercising the like rage of crueltie upon Corcu the yongest brother of all. And being not satisfied according to the tyrannie of the house of Atomanni, with the blood and slaughter of all his nephues, or anie others that remained of that line and stocke, he was in thought oftentimes (by the rage and furie of his disposition) to take awaie the life of Soliman his onelie sonne.

Of these beginnings breeding one warre upon another, after he had subdued the Aduliti, a people of the mountains, he passed over into Persia against the Sophi, to whom he gave battell and overthrow him, and in that felicitie of warre he took the citie of Tauris the soueraine seat of that estate, together with the greatest part of Persia which he was constrained to abandon, not through the valour of his enemies, who for their disability to support their army were retired into the mounteins and places desert, but for the universall dearth and barrennesse of that yeare, he fell into an extreme want of vittells: he returned home after this expedition to Constantinople, where after he had done execution upon certaine souldiers seditious, and for certaine moneths had refreshed his armie, he gave out that he would shortly returne to make warre upon Persia. But indeed he turned his forces against the Soldan king of Sozia and Aegypt, a prince not onelie of most ancient reverence and dignitie for that religion; but most mightie for the amplitude of dominion, most rich in tributes, and verie glorious by the discipline of the Hammelukes, of whose armes and forces that state was possessed with great reputation three hundred yeares.

For that empire, being ruled of the Soldans, they not by succession but by election ascended to it, and to the supreme seat of government were not preferred but men of manifest vertue, and confirmed by all the degrees of warre, in the administration of provinces and armies, and also the finewes and strengthes of their forces stood not upon souldiours mercenarie and foraine, but of men elected, who taken of children in the provinces adjoining, and trained up by succession of yeares in hardnesse of fare, in suffering of labour and toile, and in the exercise of armes and all customes appertaining to the discipline and law of warre, they ascribed and intolled them in the order of the Hammelukes. There succeeded from hand to hand in this order, not the sons of the Hammelukes that were dead, but others, who being taken of children for slaves, had their rising by the same discipline, and by the same industrie and artes, by the which their predecessours had passed from hand to hand.

These not being in number above seventene or eightene thousand, held subiected under a most heauie yoke, all the people of Aegypt and Sozia, whom they spoiled of the vse of all armes, and practised to manage horses: yea such was their fiercenesse and valour, that oftentimes they made warre of themselves, for that of their numbers and by their election were chosen the Soldans, and in their power reserved all authoritie to distribute the honours, offices, and profits of that most rich empire. By the opportunity of which, hauing subdued manie nations adjoining, and reduced to obedience the Arabians, and maintained manie warres with the Turkes, they were manie times victorious, but verie seldom or neuer vanquished of others. Against these people did Selim convert his forces, whom he overthrow in manie battells fought in plaine field, wherein was slaine the Soldan, and afterwards in another battell was taken prisoner the other Soldan his successor, whom he caused to be publickly murdered with an unworthie kind of torment. Thus hauing satisfied his bloudie humour with such great slaughters, and also waisted the name of the Hammelukes, he proceeded to the invasion of Cairo a most populous citie, wherein were resident the Soldans, and in short time subdued under his iurisdiction all Sozia and Aegypt.

These drew unto him so great an increase of impetie, such amplification of tribute and revenue, and removing the impediments of so mightie enemies, and of so great reputation, that with great reason he was to be feared of the christians. A feare which took his degrees of increasing by his consideration, that to so great a power and valour was joined a settled impression of ambition to beate rule, & by manie victories, to make glorious his name to all posterities: wherein reading oftentimes the legends and actions of the great Alexander, and Julius Cesar, he seemed to suffer griefe and perplexitie of mind, that his actions & exploits of warre could in no wise hold comparison with so manie great triumphs and victories. In which humour, returning continuallie his armies, and building of new a great number of ships, and leuieing all provisions necessarie for the warre, it was feared when his preparations were accomplished, that he would invade Rhodes, the bulwark of the christians in the east parts, or else the kingdome of Hungaria, made fearefull by the valour of the inhabitants to the nation of the Turkes, which at that time was in division amongst themselves, and made weak by the minority of their king, who was gouerned by the priests and barons of the realme.

Others were of opinion, that he had addrested all his thoughts to the invasion of Italia, taking his encouragement upon the discord of the potentates and naturall princes, whom he knew to be much shaken with the long warres of those regions. To this was joined the memorie of Mahomet his grandfather, who with a power farre lesse than his, and with a small name sent upon the coasts of the realme of Naples, had wonne by assault the citie of Aronto: and (sauiug he was prevented by death) had both opened the way, and established the meane to per-cute the regions of Italie with continuall herati-ons: so that the pope together with the whole court of Rome being made astonished with so great successe, and no lesse proud to eschew so great a danger, making their first recourse unto the aid and succour of God, caused to be celebrated through Rome most devout inuocations, which he did assist in presence bare-footed.

And afterwards calling upon the helpe of men, he wrote letters to all christian princes, both admonishing them of the perill, and perswading them to lay aside all ciuill discords and contentions; and attend specially to the defense of religion & their common safetie, which he affirmed would more and more take increase of most grievous danger, if with the unitie of minds, and concordances of waer, they sought not to transference the warre into the empire of the Turkes, & invade the enimie in his owne coun-trie. Upon this aduise and admonition, was taken the examination and opinion of men of warre, and persons skillfull in the discouerie of countries, the disposing of prouinces, and of the nature and vsage of the forces and weapons of that kingdome, and thereupon a resolution was set downe to make great leuies of monie by voluntarie contributions of princes, and vniuersall imposts of all people of christen-dome.

It was thought necessarie that Cesar accompanied with the horsemen of Hungaria and Polonia, nations warlike, and practised in continuall warre against the Turke, and also with the footmen of Ger-manie, should saile along Danubi into Bosnia called ancientlie Hissa, and from thence to Pracia, and so to drate neare Constantinople, the seat of the empire of Ottomanes: that the French king with all the forces of his kingdome, the Venetians, and the other potentates of Italie, accompanied with the infanterie of Swizzerland, should passe from the port of Brindisi in Albania, a passage verie easie & short, to invade Grece, a countrie full of christian inhabitants, and for the intollerable yoke of the Turkes, most readie to rebell: that the kings of Spaine, of England, and Portugall, assembling their forces together in Cartagena, and the ports thereabouts, should take their course with two hundred ships full of Spanish footmen and other souldiers, to the streit of Galipoli, to make rodes by to Constantinople, hauing first of all subdued the castles and forts standing vpon the mouth of the streit: and the pope to take the same course, imbarcking at Ancona, with an hundred ships armed.

With these preparations, seeming sufficient to couer the land, and ouerspread the sea, it was thought that of a warre so full of deuotion and pietie, there could not be but hoped a happie end, speciallie adding the inuocation of God, and so manie feuerall inua-sions made at one time against the Turkes, who make their principall foundation of defense, to fight in the plaine field. These matters were solicited with no small industrie, and to stop all matter of imputation against the office of the pope, the minds of princes were thoroughlie founded, and an vniuersall truce for foure yeares betwene all the princes of christen-dome, published in the consistorie, vpon paine of most grieuous censure to such as should impugne it.
So that the negociation continuing for all things appertaining to so great an enterpryse, he assigned ambassadors to all princes: to the emperor he sent the cardinall S. Sisso, to the French king he dispatched the cardinall of S. Maria in Portico, the cardinall Giles to the king of Spaine, and the cardinall Campeius to the king of England.

All cardinals of authoritie, either for their experience in affaires, or for opinion of their doctrine, or for their familiaritie with the pope. All which things albeit they were begun with great hope and expectation, and the vniuersall truce accepted of all men, and all men with no little ostentation and bzaurric of words, made shew of their readinesse with their forces to aduance so good a cause: yet, what with the consideration of the perill esteemed vncerteine and farre off, and extending more to one prince than to another, and what by the difficulties and long tract of time that appeared, to introduce a zeale and vnion so vniuersall, priuat interests and respects particular seemed to preuaile more, than the pietie of the expedition: insomuch that the negociation stood not one-lie naked of all hope and issue, but also it was followed verie lightlie, and as it were by ceremonie.

This being one propertie in the nature of men, that those things which in their beginnings appeare fearefull, do daillie take such begreases of diminution and vanishing, that vnles the first feares be reniued by new accidents, they lead men in proceesse of time to securitie. Which propertie of negligence, both touching the affaires publike, and affection of priuate and particular men was well confirmed by the death that succeeded not long after to Helim, who, bating by a long maladie suspended the preparations of the warre, was in the end consumed by the passions of his disease, and so passed into the other life, leauing so great an empire to Soliman his sonne, young in yeares, and iudged to beare a wit and mind not so disposed to the warres, although afterwards the effects declared the contrarie.

At this time appeared betwene the pope and the French king a most great and strict contention: for the king gave to wife to Laurence his nephew, the ladie Agadoalen noble descended of the bloud and house of Bullognie, with a yearelie reuenue of ten thousand crownes, whereof part was of the kings gift, and the residue rising of his owne patrimonie.
Besides, the king hauing borne to him a sonne, the pope required that in his baptisme, he would impose vpon him his name. By which occasion Laurence making preparations to go to marrie his new wife, for his more speed, performed his iourne by post into France, where he was receiued with manie ami-ties and much honour of the king, to whom he became verie gracions and of deare account, the rather for that (besides other generall respects) he made a dedication of himselfe wholie to the king, with promise to follow in all accidents, his fortune.]

And now to returne to cardinall Wolse, who grew so into exceeding pride, that he thought himselfe equall with the king. For when he said masse (which he did oftener to shew his pompe, rather than for anie deuotion) he made dukes and earles to serue him of wine, with a say taken, and to hold to him the bason at the lauatorie. Thus was the pride of the cardinall and other priests so past the compasse of reason, that in maner all good persons abhorred and disdained it (as altogether degenerating from the example of Christ & his pore traine, of whome in name and title they seemed to be professors, but of their manners and trade of life open defiers; yea in such manifest sort, both in apparell and diet, as also in all other respects, that few there were (if they perceiued anie thing by discretion) but saw the euident abuses of their behauiours, tending greatlie to the disho-nour of the place which they possessed, as also to the no small offense of the modest sort of the cleargie, whereof some did so well like of this ruffling and making presbyterie, that they abhorred it as strong poison in their bosome.]

It fortuned that the archbishop of Canturburie wrote to the cardinall, anon after that he had recei-ued

ned his power legantine, the which letter after his old familiar manner he subscribed thus: Your brother the William of Canturburie. With which subscription, because the archbishop wrote him brother, he was so much offended, as though the archbishop had done him great iniurie, that he could not temper his mood, but in high displeasure said, that he would so wroke within a while, that he should well understand how he was his superiour, and not his brother. When the archbishop (being a sober wise man) heard of the messenger that bare the letter, how the cardinal took it not well, but so as it might seeme there was a great fault in the letter, and reported the tale as one that disliked the cardinals presumption herein: Peace (said the archbishop) knowest thou not how the man is become mad with too much ioy. And thus the cardinal forgetting to hold the right path of true land and praise, sought to be feared rather than beloved of all good men.

In this meane time the French king greatlie urgeth to redeeme the citie of Lornate out of the hands of the king of England, and knowing that he must make waite thereunto thorough the cardinals friendship, called not with high gifts to win his good will, and moreover in often writing to him, exalted him with titles of honor, and so magnified him, that the cardinal, as one tickled with vaine-glorie more than can be imagined, thought that he could not do pleasure enough to the French king, that did esteem so much of him. Hereupon the French king hoping to compass his desire, after he perceived the cardinals good will towards him, signified his meaning unto the said cardinal; who found meanes to breake thereof to the king, in such wise as he was contented to heare the French kings ambassadoys, that should be sent hither to talke of that matter.

Ambassadoys
from the French king.

The French king then understanding the king of England his pleasure, sent over the lord Montuet high admerall of France, and the bishop of Paris as chiefe ambassadoys, accompanied with a great sort of lustie gentlemen of the French kings court, to the number of foure score and above, on whome attended such a companie of other of the meaner sort, that the whole number amounted to twelue hundred one and other, which were thought to be manie for an ambassage. ¶ On mondate the twentieth seuenth daie of September, the earle of Surrie high admerall of England, in a coat of rich tissue cut on cloath of siluer, on a great courser richlie trapped, and a great whistle of gold, set with stones and pearle, hanging at a great and massie chaine baudycke wise, accompanied with an hundred and firtie gentlemen, richlie appareled, on goodlie horses came to Blackheath, and there amiable received the ambassadoys of France. The yong gallants of France had coats garded with one colour, cut in ten or twelue parts verie richlie to behold: and so all the Englishmen ac-coupled themselves with the Frenchmen loniglie together, and so road to London. After the two ad-meralls followed foure and twentie of the French kings garr, accompanied with foure and twentie of the English garr. And after them a great number of archers, to the number of foure hundred. And in this order they passed thorough the citie to sailloys hall, and there the chiefe ambassadoys were lodged, and the remnant in merchants houses about.

ambassadoys
come to the court.

When these lords were in their lodgings, then the French harder men opened their wares, & made the sailloys hall like the pound of a mart. At this doing manie an Englishman grudged, but it auailed not. The last daie of September, the French ambas-sadoys toke their barge, and came to Grenewich.
The admerall was in a gowne of cloath of siluer rail-sed, furred with rich fables; and all his companie almost were in a new fashioned garment, called a shemew, which was in effect a gowne cut in the middle.

The gentlemen of France were brought into the kings presence, where the bishop of Paris made a solemne oration; which being ended, & answer made thereto, the king highlie interteined the admerall and his companie, and so did all the English lords and gentlemen.

The ambassadoys after this were dailie in coun-cell, till at length an agreement was concluded, under pretence of a marriage to be had betwene the Dolphin of France, and the ladie Marie, daughter to the king of England: in name of whose mariage monies Lornate should be delivered unto the French king, he paying to the king of England for the castle which he had made in that citie, fix hundred thousand crownes, to be paid in twelue yeares space, that is to saie, fiftie thousand euerie yeare during that terme. And if the marriage chanced not to take effect, then should Lornate be againe redoyed to the king of England. For performance of which article, hostages should be delivered: that is to wit, monsieur de Montmorancie, monsieur de Montpesac, monsieur de Poie, monsieur de Porret. Moreover the French king should paie to the lord cardinal of England a thousand marks of yearelie pension, in recompense of his reuenues before time received of the bishopricke of Lornate: and likewise to other of the kings counsell he should also giue certeine summes of monie as yearelie pensions, in like maner as his ancestors had done to the counsellors of the kings of England before time.

The French is agreed to call backe the duke of Al-banie out of Scotland, that the suertie of Is. James might the better be provided for, and lesse occasion of trouble ministred to the king of England. And further the French king was contented that the said king James should be receiued as a confederat in this peace. When all things were concluded, the king and the ambassadoys road to the cathedrall church of saint Paule in London from Durham place, where the cardinal of England sang the masse in most pompous maner: and after that masse was ended, doctor Pace the kings secretarie made an eloquent oration in praise of peace: and that done, the king and his nobles with the ambassadoys went to the bishops palace, and there dined, and after dinner, the king rode againe to Durham place. That night the cardinal of Poike made to the ambassa-doys a solemne banquet, and them accompanied manie lords and ladies of England. And when the ban-ket was done, in came six minstrels, richlie disguised, and after them followed thre gentlemen in wide and long gones of crimson sattin, euerie one hauing a cup of gold in their hands.

The first cup was full of angels and roials, the second had diuerse bales of dice, and the third had cer-teine paires of cards. These gentlemen offered to plaie at murchance, and when they had plaied the length of the first boyd, then the minstrels blew up, and then entered into the chamber certeine ladies disguised, on whome attended twelue knights disguised bearing torches. All these thirtie & six persons were in one sute of fine greene sattin, all covered ouer with cloth of gold, under tied together with laces of gold, and masking hoods on their heads: the ladies had tiers made of bzards of damaske gold with long haire of white gold. All these maskers dancd at one time, and after they had dancd, they put off their visors, and so were they all knowne. The admerall and lords of France hartilie thanked the king, that it pleased him to visit them with such disposit. Then the king & his companie were banketed, and had high chere: and so they departed euerie man to his lod-

1511. Reg. 10.

The eight of October at Greenwich, was long a solemn masse by the bishop of Durham, and after masse, docto Winstall, maister of the colles, made an eloquent proposition in praise of the matric. All that daie were the strangers feasted, and at night they were brought into the hall, where was a rocke full of all manner of stones, verie artificiallie made, and on the top stood five trees, the first an olive tree, on which hangd a shield of the armes of the church of Rome; the second a pineapple tree, with the armes of the emperour; the third a roser, with the armes of England; the fourth a branch of lillies, bearing the armes of France; and the fifth a pomegranat tree, bearing the armes of Spaine: in token that all these five potentates were ioined together in one league against the enemies of Christs faith.

In and upon the middelt of the rocke sat a faire ladie, richlie apparell'd with a dolphin in hir lap. In this rocke were ladies and gentlemen apparell'd in crimson sattin, couered ouer with floures of purple sattin, embrodered upon with wrethes of gold, knit together with golden laces, and on euerie floure a hart of gold mouing. The ladies apparell was after the fashion of Inde, with kerchifes of pleasance, hatd with fine gold, and set with letters of Græke in gold of brillant; and the edges of their kerchifes were garnished with hanging perle. These gentlemen and ladies sat on the nether part of the rocke, and out of a cane in the said rocke came ten knights, armed at all points, and fought together a faire tournee. And when they were seuered and departed, the disguisours descended from the rocke, and danced a great space: and suddenly the rocke moued and receiued the disguisours, and immediatlie closed againe.

Then entered a person called Report, apparell'd in crimson sattin full of towngs, sitting on a sieng hourse with wings and feet of gold called Pegasus. This person in French declared the meaning of the rocke, the trees, and the tournee. After this pastime ended, the king and the ambassadours were serued at a banquet with two hundred and sixtie dishes, and after that a boorde of spices with sixtie spice plates of silver and gilt, as great as men with ease might beare. This night the cupbord in the hall was of twelue stages all of plate of gold, and no gilt plate. When that euerie man had bene plentifully serued, the tables were taken vp, and the king with the quene and all the strangers departed to their lodgings.

After diuerse iusts & feasts made for the said ambassadours by the king and lords: sir Thomas Cromwel masior of London made to them a collie dinner at Goldsmiths hall, which dinner they highlie praised, it was so well ordered. And when the time came, they toke their leaue of the king, the quene, and the kings counsell, and deliuered into the kings possession their foure hostages (as you haue heard before). At which departing the king gaue to the admerall of France a garnish of gilt vessel, a paire of couered basens gilt, twelue great gilt boles, foure pates of great gilt pots, a standing cup of gold, garnished with great pearles: and to some other also, he gaue plate, to some chains of gold, to some rich apparell, and to some great hourses with rich bards, so that euerie gentleman was well rewarded; which liberalitie the strangers much praised: and after that all their trusles were readie they departed towards the sea, and toke ship and landed at Bullogne.]

Shortlie after their departure, the earle of Worcester, lord chamberleine, the bishop of Cle, the lord of saint Johns, sir Nicholas Maur, sir John Pechie, sir Thomas Bullen, as ambassadours from the king of England, accompanied with three score and ten knights, gentlemen and yeomen, to the number of foure hundred and aboue, passed the sea to Calis, and so from thence went to Paris, where they were noblely receiued, & being brought to the French kings presence, the bishop of Cle made a solempne oration touching the mariage and peace concluded, & to intertaine the English ambassadours and gentlemen; the French king had made a banquetting house in the bastill of Paris betwene foure old walles. This house was couered with cords streined by craft, and euerie cord was wound about with bar, and so laid crosswise one ouer an other in fret, and at the meetings a great knop gilt with gold foile.ouer their cords was streined wollen cloaths of light blew: this rose was foure score fot high, and on euerie side three stages high: all the pillars of the stages were couered with antike works, & the breasts of the stages curiouslie wrought with armes, vincts, and branches: the rose was set full of starres gilt & furnished with glasse betwene the frets. In this house was two hundred and twelue branches gilt hanged, & on euerie branch a great number of lights of white war.

Diuerse sorts of masks were shewed also that night: and at euerie side of the palace a great cupbord of masse plate of much greatnesse was set, the French king welcomning the lords and ambassadours with good countenance. ] Here is to be remembred, that immediatlie after the conclusion of the marriage, a rumoz was raised, that the Dolphin was dead before, and that this mariage was but a colourable pretext, deuised of the Frenchmen for a policie to come by their purpose: and therefore, after that the English ambassadours had bene feasted and intertained with banquetting and princelie pastime, the bishop of Cle, with sir Thomas Bullen, and sir Richard Weston, were appointed to go vnto Contacke to see the Dolphin, where they were honorablely receiued, and brought vnto the presence of the Dolphin, being a goodlie young child, whome they kissed and embraced in most louing wise.

The earle of Worcester, and with him sir Nicholas Maur, sir John Pechie, sir Edward Belknap, and diuerse others at the same time, toke leaue of the French king, and rode to Lornate to see the citie deliuered to the Frenchmen. Whereupon, the eight of February, the lord Chatillon came thither with one and twentie hundred men; and after some controuersie moued about the deliuerie of his commission, and sealing an indenture, which the earle had there readie ingrossed, containing the articles of agreement, in consideration whereof it was deliuered, the capteine sir Richard Feringham was discharged, and the Frenchmen suffered to enter with drummads and minstrells, but not with standards nor banners, which the Englishmen caused them to roll vp greatlie against their wils. Before they came to the gates, they sealed the indenture, confessing how they receiued the citie as a gift, and not as a right, and deliuered their commission, whereby they were authorized to receiue it, which at the first they refused to do, affirming that it was sufficient for them to shew it.

Thus was Lornate deliuered in this tenth yere of the kings reigne, on the eight daie of February, & the Englishmen returned into England, soe displeased in their minds. For thereby manie a tall yeoman lacked liuing, the which would not labour after their returne, but fell to robbing, pilfering, shifting, and other extraordinarie meanes of maintenance, whereas before they were staied vpon a certaintie of hope, so long as they had allowance by the king. So that this resignation of Lornate, though it were answerable to the desire of the French king, and commodious for his people, yet that benefit of theirs byed fol. lxvii.

The light and mistaken demeanour of duerle yong gentlemen of England & the French king.

During this time remained in the French court duerle yong gentlemen of England, and they with the French king rode daillie disguised through Paris, throwing egges, stones, and other foolish trifles at the people, which light demeanour of a king was much discommended and leasted at. And when these yong gentlemen came againe into England, they were all French, in eating, drinking, and apparell, yea, and in French vices and brags, so that all the estates of England were by them laughed at: the ladies and gentlewomen were dispraised, so that nothing by them was praised, but if it were after the French turne, which after turned them to displeasure, as you shall heare.

After the kings ambassadours were returned, and Tornaie deliuered to the Frenchmen upon the conditions aforesaid, the hostages that were here left for the payment of the great summes and performance of the conditions compiled in the league (of the which one was, that if the marriage took none effect, then the cite of Tornaie should be redeliuered upon repayment of the same summes) the said hostages knew not in what case they stood, but when they knew it, they were verie braue and resolute: howbeit, they dissembled the matter in the best wise they could. The king used familiarly these foure hostages, and on the seventh daie of Maie prepared a disguising, and caused his great chamber at Græntwich to be staged, and great lights to be set on pillores that were gilt, with basons gilt, and the rose was covered with blue satten set full of pusses of fine gold and flowers: and vnder was written lanimes, the meaning whereof was, that the flower of youth could not be oppressed.

Into this chamber came the king, and the quene, with the hostages, and there was a goodlie comedie of Plautus played; and that done, there entered into the chamber eight ladies in blacke veluet bordered about with gold, with hoeses from the waist downeward, and sleeves ruffed and plisted at the elbow, and plaine in the middle, full of cuts, plucked out at euerie cut with fine camerike, & tired like the Egyptians verie richlie. And when these ladies had passed about the place, in came eight noble personages in long gownes of taffata set with flowers of gold bullion, and vnder that apparell cotes of blacke veluet embroidered with gold all to cut, and plucked out with cuts of white sarcenet, and euerie man had buskins of blacke veluet full of aggets of gold.

When the eight men danced with the eight ladies all being visarded, and suddenlie the men cast off their large gownes, and then their vnder apparell was seene. And when all was done, euerie lord and ladie put off their visards, and then it was knowne that the king, the duke of Suffolke, and the French quene were there, which were present at the plaie time. On the eight daie of March was a solemn iustices, the king himselfe, and eight yong gentlemen bared and barbed in blacke veluet embroidered with gold; against the duke of Suffolke, and eight of his band, all in white satten with drops of gold. And that daie they all ran exceedingly well, which the strangers highlie commended.

About the end of March, the king sent for all the yeomen of the gard that were come from Tornaie, and after manie good words given to them, he granted to euerie of them foure pence the daie without attendance, except they were speciallie commanded. And here it seemeth requisite to adde the report of a foreine chronicler touching the league of amitie and conditions of the same, knit by in breuitie and godtearmes as followeth. Now (saith he) the differences betwene the French and English were also reconciled. And for the moze stabilitie of which agreement, it was confirmed with a contract of parentage and alliance, wherein the king of England promised to giue his onelie daughter, to whom heaving no sons, there was hope of the descending & succession of the kingdom to the Dolphin the eldest sonne of the croiaine of France, adding for a portion foure hundred thousand duckets. Both the one and the other boze yet so tender age, that infinit accidents might happen, before perfection of yeeres would make them able to establish matrimonie. There was made betwene them a league defensue, wherein were comprehended Cesar, and the king of Spaine, in case they would ratifie it in a certaine time.

The king of England bound himselfe to restore Tornaie, receiving presentlie for detraiments expended upon that towne, two hundred and threescore thousand duckets, and threescore hundred thousand to be defalked of the portion, and to paie threescore hundred thousand moze in the space of twelue yeares. The French king also was bound, that if the peace and the parentage followed not, to render by againe into the hands of the English, the towne of Tornaie. Manie ambassadours were sent from both the realmes to negotiate this league, and to receiue the ratifications and othes, by whom in the courts of both the kings the acts of the accord were dispatched with great solemnitie and ceremonie, with a resolution of an interuene of both the kings betwene Calis and Bullongne, immediatlie after the restitution of Tornaie.

About the same time, the daughter of the French king, appointed to be married to the king of Spaine, being dead, the former peace and capitulation was effrones reconfirmed betwene them, wherein was promised the marriage of the second daughter of France. Both the kings celebrated this coniunction with most great demonstrations of perfect amitie: for the king of Spaine, hauing paid in at Lyons an hundred thousand duckets, waie publiketle the order of saint Michaell upon the day of the celebration of the same, and in recompense of that honour: the French king, upon the daie dedicated to saint Andrew, was honorable attired in the robes and colour of the golden fleece.

About this time, John Ja. Trinnice, whose newther old age reduced almost to the last time, nor his vertue so oftentimes expressed in the service of the fruce of France could anie waie aid or comfort (being both ambitious and impatient, and therefore enuied) following the French court, fell sicke at Charters, where he gaue up to the king, his innocentie and complaints, and made to God the last reckoning of his aged daies. He was a man in the iudgement of manie, and confirmed by sundrie experiences, of singular valour in the discipline of warre, and ran a race alwaies opposed to the inconstancie of fortune, who (according to his mutabilitie) made him feele the operation of both his humors, sometimes reioicing in his fauour, and erst againe finding his sorrow and of a bitter task. By his commandement were written upon his tombe these words, not disagreeable to the variable condition and course of his natural life:

I find the rest within my graue,
Which in my life I could not haue.]

An. Reg. 11.

In this yeare the twelue of Februarie, died the emperor Aparrimilian, for whome the king caused a solemne obsequie to be kept in Doules church. He died at Luis, a towne vpon the marches of Austrich, where he remained for his delight and pleasure in hunting the wild boze, and other chases of the field. He liued alwaies vnder one condition of fortune, who manie times fauoured him, in offering him manie faire occasions, & as often wrought against him in not suffering him to take the fruit and effect of them. He was by nature inconstant and remouable, and had conceits and impressions verie ill disposed and different from the iudgement of other men, joined to an excessive prodigalitie and dissipation of monie.

Spatters which cut off from him the effects and successe of all occasions, being otherwise a prince most perfect and instructed in the ordering of warre, secret to laie and dispose a plot, diligent to follow it, of bodie able and suffering, of mind affable and easie, and replenished with manie other excellent gifts and ornaments. Vnto some of these properties, the good seruice which he did the king of England at Terwin giueth proofe, at what time both he and his people marched vnder the English ensigne, and receiued paie as stipendarie souldiours; whose wages the king had a care to paie, as maie appeare by his coining of siluer monie, whereof was scarcitie in his campe, in respect of gold, wherewith the souldiours were well stored, as one doth verie well make report, saieing:

Pro mercede nihil nisi fuluum soluitur aurum, Auri militibus radiantis copia toris Tanta fuit castris, ut rex eudisse coactus Nummum ex argento fuerit.

Altho as the emperor was dead, the French king and the king of Spaine began manifestlie to aspire to the empire, the purchase whereof albeit was a matter of right great importance, and no lesse the emulation running betwene two so mightie princes, yet they ordered their ambition with great modestie, neither vsing words of iniurie, nor threats of armes; but either one labouring by his authoritie, & by his meanes, to draw on his side the electors. The French king sundrie times reasoned touching the election with great comelinesse with the Spanish ambassadours, to whom he said it was a matter both agreeable and conuenient, that either of them seueralie should seeke by honest meanes to increase the honour of his house by so great a dignitie: which for that in times before had bene transferred into the families of their predecessours, there was now the lesse occasion to breed betwene them two matter of iniurie, nor diminution of their amitie and good will.

But rather he wished, that in the action of the empire, they might follow the example and order of two young louers, who albeit they follow the quest of one labie, and either one labourer by his industrie to carie his; yet they forbere to come to contention. The king of Spaine alluded with good right, that the empire appertained to him, as hauing continued by a long succession of time in the house of Austrich, and that it had not bene the custome of the electors to deplete the issue of the emperor, without manifest cause of their disability, neither was there anie in Germanie of that puissance and authoritie to make him equall to stand competitor with him in that election. And least of all did he hold it iust or like, that the electors would transport to a forreine or strange prince, so great a dignitie continued by so manie ages in the nation of Germanie.

And albeit some particular amongst them, either through the insinuation of monie, or other propertie of corruption, might be allured to another intention, yet he hoped to stop him with force prepared in time conuenient, not doubting also but the other electors also would oppose against him, and the princes and free townes of Germanie would not indure so vsuerfall an infamie, spectallie to suffer it to be laid vpon the person of the French king, which would be no other thing than to make great the puissance of a king enemie vnto their nation, and from whome there was no suertie that the imperiall dignitie would euer returne into Germanie; he thought it would be an action easie to obtaine and reduce to perfection, that which had bin solicited by his grandfather, who had already compounded for recompenses and donations, and other diuidents for euerie of the electors.

On the other side, the desire of the French king was as great, and no lesse were his hopes, which toke their principall foundation vpon an opinion he had to corrupt the voices of the electors with his huge summes of monie: especiallie for that there were amongst them both pensionaries to him, and otherwise assured by manie good offices, who encouraging him with the facilitie of the enterprise, pushed him on to embrace it. And for his part, as mostall men are apt to beleue the thing they desire, so he nourished that hope with reasons rather apparant than true: he knew that commonlie it was a matter grievous to the princes of Germanie to haue the emperors mightie; being gealous that in so great a puissance, they would not either in part or in all, quarrell the iurisdiction and authorities imperiall occupied by manie of them. In which reason he perswaded himselfe, that they would in no sort consent to the election of the Spaniard, & so of themselves to subiect themselves to an emperor more mightie than had bene since a long descent and race of emperors. A matter which in his person seemed to be qualified, for that hauing neither estates nor ancient alliances in Germanie, they had no occasion of suspicion of his greatness.

The same reason also made him beleue well of the conformitie of the free townes, in whome much lesse that the regard of the glorie of the nation would carie it from him, seeing it would helpe to petye the ballance on his side, for that with most men the motions of proper and private interest maie do more, than the respect of publike and generall profit. He knewe it was not a little grievous to manie noble houses of Germanie, pretending to be capable of such a dignitie, to see the empire continue so long time in one house; but much more did it discontent them to suffer that so great an estate, which of right ought sometimes to be giuen to one of them, and sometime to passe to another, should become a perpetuall descent and succession in one line: inso much as they might call inheritance and succession that election, which durst not leaue the line of the emperors. That in that sort the empire was translated from Albert de Austrich to Frederike his brother, and from Frederike to Aparrimilian his sonne; and now there was deuise to passe it from Aparrimilian to the person of Charles his grandchild.

By these humors and indignations of the princes of Germanie, he toke hope that the discords and gealousies among themselves might helpe on his cause, the rather for that it often happeneth in the contentions of men, that he that is excluded, or the partie to whome he fauoreth, runneth with a naturall rashnesse rather to call in, and to aduance a third, than to giue place to him that hath opposed against his intention. Moreover, the French king was not without his hopes in the fauour of the pope, both in regard of the amitie and alliance betwixt them; and also for that he was not ignorant how in conuenient it would be to the see apostolike to haue

The French king in hope to be emperor as well as the Spanish.

The French king builded his hope vpon the humors of the princes of Germanie.

In this yeare the twelue of Februarie, died the emperor Maximilian, for whom the king caused a solemn obsequie to be kept in Boules church. ¶ He died at 11. uiz, a towne upon the marches of Austria, where he remained for his delight and pleasure in hunting the wild boze, and other chases of the field.
He lived alwaies vnder one condition of fortune, who many times fauoured him, in offering him manie faire occasions, & as often wrought against him in not suffering him to take the fruit and effect of able, and had conceits and impressions verie ill disposed and different from the iudgement of other men, joined to an excessive prodigality and dissipation of monie.

¶ Matters which cut off from him the effects and successe of all occasions, being otherwise a prince most perfect and instructed in the ordering of warre, secret to laie and dispose a plot, diligent to follow it, of bodie able and suffering, of mind affable and easie, in respect of gold, wherewith the souldiours were well sized, as one doth verie well make report, saying:

Pro mercede nihil nisi fulsum soluitur aurum, Auri militibus radiantis copia totis Tanta fuit castris, ut rex cudi se coactus Nummum ex argento fuerit.

Altho as the emperor was dead, the French king and the king of Spaine began manifestlie to aspire to the empire, the purchase wherof albeit was a matter of right great importance, and no lesse the emulation running betwene two so mightie princes, yet they ordered their ambition with great mo-destie, neither vsing words of iniurie, nor threats of armes; but either one labouring by his authoritie, & by his meanes, to draw on his side the electors. The French king sundrie times reasoned touching the election with great comelinesse with the Spanish ambassadors, to whom he said it was a matter both agreeable and conuenient, that either of them seu-rally should seeke by honest meanes to increase the honour of his house by so great a dignitie: which for that in times befoze had bene transferred into the families of their predecessours, there was now the lesse occasion to breed betwene them two matter of iniu-rie, nor diminution of their amitie and good will.

But rather he tokted, that in the action of the empire, they might follow the example and order of two yong louers, who albeit they follow the quest of one labie, and either one labourer by his industrie to carie hir; yet they forbere to come to contention. The king of Spaine alluded with good right, that the empire appertained to him, as hauing continued by a long succession of time in the house of Austria, and that it had not bene the custome of the electors to deprive the issue of the emperor, without manifest cause of their disability, neither was there anie in Germanie of that puissance and authoritie to make him equall to stand competitor with him in that election. And least of all did he hold it iust or like-lie, that the electors would transport to a forreine or strange prince, so great a dignitie continued by so manie ages in the nation of Germanie.

And albeit some particular amongst them, either through the insinuation of monie, or other proprie of corruption, might be allured to another intention, yet he hoped to stop him with force prepared in time conuenient, not doubting also but the other electors also would opose against him, and the princes and free townes of Germanie would not in-dure so brisuer fall an infamie, speciallie to suffer it to be laid upon the person of the French king, which would be no other thing than to make great the puissance of a king entirie vnto their nation, and from whome there was no surtie that the imperiall dignitie would euer returne into Germanie: he thought it would be an action easie to obtaine and reduce to perfection, that which had bin solicited by his grandfather, who had already compounded for recompen-

On the other side, the desire of the French king their principall foundation vpon an opinion he had to corrupt the voices of the electors with his huge summes of monie: especiallie for that there were auing neither estates nor ancient alliances in Ger-manie, they had no occasion of suspicion of his great-nesse.

The same reason also made him beleue well of the conformitie of the free townes, in whome much lesse that the regard of the glorie of the nation would tions of proper and priuate interest maie do more, than the respect of publike and generall profit. He knewe it was not a little grieuous to manie noble houses of Germanie, pretending to be capable of such a dignitie, to see the empire continue so long time in one house; but much more did it discontent them to suffer that so great an estate, which of right ought sometimes to be giuen to one of them, and sometime to passe to another, should become a perpetuall descent and succession in one line: inasmuch as they might call inheritance and succession that election, which durst not leaue the line of the emperors. That in that sort the empire was translated from Albert de Austria to Frederike his brother, and from Frederike to Maximilian his sonne; and now there was deuile to passe it from Maximilian to the person of Charles his grandchild.

By these humors and indignations of the princes of Germanie, he toke hope that the discords and gealousies among themselves might helpe on his cause, the rather for that it often hapeneth in the contentions of men, that he that is excluded, or the par-tie whome he fauoureth, runneth with a naturall rathnesse rather to call in, and to aduance a third, than to giue place to him that hath opposed against his intention. Moreover, the French king was not without his hopes in the fauour of the pope, both in regard of the amitie and alliance betwixt them; and also for that he was not ignorant how in-conuenient it would be to the see apostolike to haue the imperiall crowne inuested in Charles, no; so much for his owne greatnesse, as for that by the opportunitie and neighbourhood of the realme of Naples to the estate of the church, and the adherencie of the barons of the Cebelins, he had a plaine and open passage to run vp to the gates of Rome.

But in that discourse he considered not that the same reason, which he iudged true against Charles, was also against himselfe: for that the empire being ioined to his person, he was no lesse to be feared of the pope & all others, than Charles. For that though the one of them possessed happilie more realmes and states; yet the other was not to be lesse esteemed, hauing his power not dispersed nor separate in manie places, but was prince of a realme entierlie assembled and vnitied, where the obedience and fidelitie of his subiects was no lesse wonderfull, than his treasure and riches infinite. Neuerthelesse, not knowing in himselfe that which he considered in another, he had recourse to the pope, and imploied his fauor vnder the offer and protestation of his person and kingdoms, with all other deuotions of a loving son. Notwithstanding all this, the French king was abused by his baine hope, which sed him with fantasies of the empire, whereto he was not allotted nor elected.

For on the twentieth eight of June was elected to be emperor Charles king of Castile, and nephew to the queene, by the whole assent of the electors of the empire: namely, the archbishop of Spaine, the archbishop of Cullen, the count Palatine, and the duke of Saron. Although the French king sent his great maister to cause him to be elected to the high maiestie of the empire; yet his ambassadoz and great maister of his household (called Confiere lord of Boffie, and brother to William Confiere lord Boncuet, admirall of France, which was ambassadoz in England the last yere, as you haue heard) did not so his message that it toke anie effect. The king which had sent doctor Pace his secretarie for the aduancement of his nephew the king of Castile, to the dignitie imperiall, because he had the duchie of Austria, and manie other seignories in Almaine, was verie iolous of this election, and caused a solemne masse to be sung at Paules the seuenth daie of Iulie: at which masse was present the cardinall Campeius, the cardinall of Poike, the duke of Buckingham, of Norfolk, Suffolke, with the ambassadoz of Spaine, France, Venice, and Scotland.

After masse was done, the quier sang Te Deum, and then all the lords departed to Wainards castell to dinner, and that night were solemne fires made thorough London, and great plentie of wine giuen by Italians, Dutchmen, and Spaniards for these newes. In this yere the king with all the knights of his order being in England, rode on double horses, with the gentlemen following the king from Colbroke to Windsoze in gorgeous apparell, and there he kept with great solemnitie the feast of saint George, and dined in the hall. The bishop of Winchester prelat of the order sat at the heards end alone. The king was solemnelie serued and the surnap cast like the feast of a coronation. All things were plentiful to strangers that resorted thither. At the masse of Requiem were offered the banner & other habillements of honour belonging to Maximilian the emperor late deceased.

After this feast ended, the king came to Richmond, and so to Grenewich, and there laie all Spaine. In which moneth the kings counsell secretlie communed together of the kings gentlenesse and liberallie to all persons: by the which they perceived that certeine yong men in his priue chamber, not regarding his estate or degree, were so familiar and homelie with him, that they forgot themselves, which things although the king of his gentle nature suffered, and not rebuked nor reprimanded it: yet the kings counsell thought it not meet to be suffered for the kings honour, and therefore they all together came to the king, beseeching him to haue moze regard to his realtie.

To whome the king answered, that he had chosen them of his counsell, both for the maintenance of his honour, and for the defense of all things that might blemish the same: wherefore if they saw anie about him misuse themselves, he committed it vnto their reformation. When the kings counsell caused the lord chamberleine to call before them diuerse of the priue chamber, which had bene in the French court, and banished them the court for diuerse considerations, laing nothing particularlie to their charges, & they that had offices were commanded to go to their offices. Which discharge out of court grew for the hearts of these yong men, which were called the kings minions. Then was there foure sad & ancient knights put into the priue chamber, whose names were; sir Richard Wilingfield, sir Richard Feringham, sir Richard Welfon, and sir William Kingston; and diuerse officers were changed.

In this summer the queene desired the king to bring to his manoz of Hauering in the Woburn in Essex the gentlemen of France being hostages, for whose welcomming she purueied all things in the most liberall manner: and especiallie she made to the king such a sumptuous banquet, that the king thanked hir hartlie, & the strangers gaue hir great praise. The king lieng there did shot, hunt, and run daile with the hostages to their great ioy. This yere in September the king late at his manoz of Newhall in Essex, otherwise called Beaulieu, where the king had newlie builded a coslie mansion, there to welcome the queene, the lords, and the French gentlemen, he made to them a sumptuous banquet, and all along the chamber sat a ladie & a lord, or a knight, which were plentifully serued.

After the banquet ended, with noise of minstrels entered into the chamber eight maskers with white beards, and long and large garments of blew sattin pained with spers, powdered with spangles of bullion gold, and they danced with ladies sadlie, and communed not with the ladies after the fashion of maskers, but behaued themselves grauelie. Wherefore the queene plucked off their visors, and then appeared the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Essex, the marquesse Dorset, the lord Aburgauennie, sir Richard Wilingfield, sir Robert Wilingfield, sir Richard Welfon, sir William Kingston: all these were somewhat aged, the yongest man was fiftie at the least. The ladies had good sport to see these ancient persons maskers.

When they departed, the king and the foure hostages of France, and the earle of Devonshire with sir other yong gentlemen entered the chamber, of the which sir were all in yellow sattin, hose, shoes, and caps, and sir other were in like maner in greene: the pelotio sattin was fretted with filuer of damaske, and so was the greene verie richlie to behold: then euerie masker toke a ladie and danced. When they had danced and communed a great while, their visors were taken off, and they knotwne, and the king gaue manie broches and proper gifts where he liked. In the moneth of Nouember the king came from Lambeth to Westminster hall, and so to the Star chamber, and there were brought before him the lord Ayle, the lord Holward, sir Gathew Browne, sir William Bulmer, and John Scot of Camerwell, for diuerse riots, misdemeanors, & offenses by them committed: but the king speciallie rebuked sir William Bulmer knight, because he being his seruant swozne, refused the kings seruice, and became seruant

want to the duke of Buckingham: yet at length by on his humble craving of mercie, still kneeling on his knees before his grace, the king pardoned him his offense: and likewise he pardoned the lord Howard, and sir Pat the w Browne, their offenses: but because the lord Egles matter concerned murder, he remitted him to the common law. And then he rose and went to his barge, and by the waie made James Parford mayor of the citie of London knight, and so returned to Lambeth.

The French king desirous to continue the friendship lately begun betwixt him and the king of England, made meanes unto the cardinall, that they might in some convenient place come to an interview together, that he might have further knowlege of king Henrie, and likewise king Henrie of him.
But the same went that the cardinall desired great-lie, of himselfe, that the two kings might meet, who mesuring by his will what was convenient, thought it should make much with his glorie, if in France also at some high assemblee of noble men, he should be scene in his baine pompe and shew of dignitie: he therefore breaketh with the king of that matter, declaring how honourable, necessarie, and convenient it should be for him to gratifie his friend therein, and thus with his persuasions the k. began to conceive an earnest desire to see the French king, and thereupon appointed to go ouer to Calis, and so in the marshes of Guisnes to meet with him.

Then were there sent unto Guisnes, under the rule of sir Edward Welknep three thousand artifi-cers, which builded out of the earth on the plaine before the castell of Guisnes, a most pleasant palace of timber, right curiouslie garnished without and within. Herewith were letters written to all such lords, ladies, gentlemen, and gentlewomen, which should give their attendance on the king and queene, which incontinentlie put themselves in a readinesse after the most sumptuous sort. Also it was appointed that the king of England, & the French king, in a campe betwixt Ard and Guisnes, with eightene aides, should in June next ensuing abide all commers being gentlemen, at the tilt, at tourneie, and at barr-ers, whereof proclamattion was made by Orleans king of armes of France here in the court of England, and by Clarenceur king of armes of England in the court of France, and in the court of Burgognie, and in diuerse other courts and places in Almanie and Italie.

During the time of these preparations, newes were brought to the king, that Charles his nephue elected emperor of Almanie, would shortly depart out of Spaine by sea, and come by England to go to Acon or Aip (a citie of fame and renowne in Ger-manie, for the ancient residence and sepulchre of Charlemaine) where he receiued the first crowne.
Wherefore the king hearing of this determination of the emperor, caused great provisions to be made at euerie haue, for the receiuing of his welbeloued nephue and friend: & daillie provisions were made on all sides for these noble meetings of so high princes: and especiallie the queene of England, and the ladie Dowager of France, made great cost on the apparell of their ladies and gentlewomen.

On the first daie of Februarie being Candle-masse euen, as the king and queene were come from euenlong at there manour of Greenwich, before the queenes chamber there blew a trumpet suddenlie, and then entered into the queens chamber foure gentlemen apparelled in long and large garments of blew damaske bordered with gold, and brought with them a tricke waggon, in the which sat a ladie rich-lie apparelled, with a canopie ouer hir head: and on the foure corners of the waggon were foure hedpieces called armites, euerie pece being of a sundrie deuise. The said ladie put by a bill to the king, the effect thereof was, that the foure gentlemen present would (for the loue of their ladies) answer all com-mers at the tilt at a daie by the king to be appointed: which daie was appointed at Shouetide next ensuing. At which daie the foresaid gentlemen ballantlie accomplished their enterprise, with great lauds of the king, the queene, and the ladies.

Whereouer, now that it was concluded, that the kings of England and France should meet (as yet haue heard) then both the kings committed the order and manner of these meetings, and how manie daies the same should continue, & what preheminence each should giue to other: unto the cardinall of Porke, which to set all things in a certentie, made an instrument, containing an order and direction concerning the premisses by him deuised and appointed.

The whole manner of the interview committed to the cardinall.

made by the cardinall.

Thomas archbishop of Porke and cardinall, &c. Atteit that by the treatie and meeting of the right high, and right puissant princes, Henrie by the grace of God, king of England, and of France, lord of Ireland, my so-grace, k. of France right chiltene, made and concluded at London the eight daie of October, the yere of our Lord one thousand five hundred and eightene, be among other things concluded and accorded, that the same meeting shall be in place indisferent, and not subiect to any of the said princes. Neuerthelesse we, considering the honour, profit, and utilitie, that shall rebound

Also considering that the said illustre king of England my soueraigne lord, in pas-great costs and expences, and dispose himselfe to great labors and dangers, leauing we haue thought & esteemed, that he should not be wholie satisfied to the honour and dignitie of the same, right illustre king of England my soueraigne lord, and should not haue in regard condigne of his labours and dangers, if the said interuiew or meeting after the first treatie shuld be in place indifferent. Wherefore it is that we desiring to weie equallie the honor and dignitie of the said two kings, by vertue and power of the commissions to vs giuen, of whom the tenours shall be hereafter declared: we haue made, declared, and orde-ned certeine articles accepted & approued by the same princes respectiuelie, which they will obserue, and by these presents we make, declare, and ordeine as followeth.

And first we declare and ordeine, that lemen, and household seruants, shall see and conuerse together familiarly, to the end that it maie ingender betwene them an amitie more firme and stable, for that cause, and that more suerlie and agreable they may be together, as well by day as by night without any danger or feare, which we desire to prouide: we declare and ordeine that two gentlemen, with sufficient companie of equall like number, be committed and deputed, respectiuelie by the said kings for the keeping and suertie of the waies and watches, that shall be made continuallie during the assemble of the said kings. The which gentlemen, with their companies, shall ordeine and depute explozatozs and spies in the ballies, forrests, woods, towngs, burrowes, villages, castels, passages, and waies, and other places dangerous and suspect: from time to time, and houre to houre, as well towards Flanders, as Picardie, Artois, & England, to exploit and watch there.

And if anie be found suspect, them to repulle and take awaie, to the end that not onelie the said princes, their gentlemen, and household seruants, maie suerlie and without feare visit the one the other, as said is: but also those that shall bring vitels necessarie to the said assemble, maie without danger, trouble, impechement, or noisance go and come: the which explozatozs shall be bounden euerie daie in the morning and euening, to make report to the said princes or to their said counsellors respectiuelie, of that which they found, and in what estate the waies be. We declare further and ordeine, that all men of armes and of warre, of the one and the other partie, shall not approch nearer than two iournies, to the place where the said interuiew shall be, except the retinue and men of war that be committed and deputed to keepe Bullongne and Calis: and that the same men of warre nor none other, during the assemble of the said princes, shall not presume to come nearer, vntil by the consent, accord, and licence of the said princes.

Item, we cardinall aboue said, by expresse authoritie and power to vs giuen, by these presents, bind the said princes to do, fulfill, and accomplish, all and euerie things aboue said herein contened. Finally, we declare and ordeine, that ech of the said kings on his partie, shall ratifie, confirme, and approue all and euerie the chapters and articles aboue said, by their letters pattents sealed with their hands. And by the same letters of ratification they shall be bounden, to accomplish with good faith and word of a king, all and euerie the things aboue said: the which letters made, subscribed, and sealed, as is said, they shall giue the one the other, and shall change in the cite of London, within one moneth next after the date of these presents. Made the twelue of March, the yeare of our Lord a thousand five hundred and nineteene.

The peres of the realme receiuing letters to prepare themselves to attend the king in this iournie, and no apparant necessarie cause expessed, why not therefore; seemed to grudge, that such a costlie iournie should be taken in hand to their importunate charges and expenses, without consent of the whole boord of the counsell. But namelie the duke of Buckingham, being a man of a lostie courage, but not most liberall, fore repined that he should be at so great charges for his furniture forth at this time, saing; that he knew not for what cause so much monie should be spent about the sight of a vaine talke to be had, and communication to be ministered of things of no importance. Wherefore he sticke not to saie, that it was an intolerable matter to beie such a vile and importunate person.

The duke indeed could not abide the cardinal, and speciallie he had of late conceiued an inward malice against him for sir William Bulmers cause, whose trouble was onelie procured by the cardinal; who first caused him to be cast in prison. How such greuous words as the duke thus uttered against him, came to the cardinals eare; whereupon he cast before hand all waies possible to haue him in a trip, that he might cause him to leape headlesse. But because he doubted his friends, kinsmen, and allies, and cheslie the earle of Surrie lord admerall, which had married the dukes daughter, he thought good first to send him some whither out of the waie, least he might cast a trumpe in his waie. There was great enmitie betwixt the cardinal and the earle, for that on a time, when the cardinal took upon him to cheeke the earle, he had like to haue thrust his dagger into the cardinal.

At length there was occasion offered him to compass his purpose, by occasion of the earle of Kildare his coming out of Ireland. For the cardinal knowing he was well prouided of monie, sought occasion to steere him of part thereof. The earle of Kildare being unmarried, was desirous to haue an English woman to wife; and for that he was a suter to a widow contrarie to the cardinals mind, he accused him to the king, of that he had not bozne himselfe by rightlie in his office in Ireland, where he was the kings lieutenant. Such accusations were framed against him when no bribes would come, that he was committed to prison, and then by the cardinals good preferment the earle of Surrie was sent into Ireland as the kings depute, in lieu of the said earle of Kildare, there to remaine rather as an erile, than as lieutenant to the king, even at the cardinals pleasure, as he himselfe well perceived.

In the beginning of Aprill, the said earle passed ouer into Ireland, and had with him diuerse gentlemen that had bene in the garrison of Cornate, and one hundred peomen of the kings gard, and others, to the number of a thousand men, where he by his manhood and policie brought the earle of Desmond and diuerse other rebels to good conformitie and order. He continued there two yeares, in which space he had manie bickerings and skintishes with the wild Irish. There rested yet the earle of Northumberland, whose the cardinal doubted also, least he might hinder his purpose, when he should go about to weake his malice against the duke of Buckingham: and therefore he picked a quarell to him, for that he had seized upon certeine wards which the cardinal said appertained of right to the king. And because the earle would not giue over his title, he was also committed to prison, & after toke it for a great benefit at the cardinals hands, that he might be deliuered out of his danger.

How in this meane while, the cardinal ceased not to bring the duke out of the kings fauour, by such such forged tales, and contrived surmises, as he da-lie put into the kings head: insomuch that (through the infelicitie of his fate) diuerse accidents fell out to the abuantage of the cardinall; which he not omitting, achieved the thing whereat he so studiouse (for the satisfiing of his cankered & malicious stomach) laid full aime. Now it chanced that the duke com-ming to London with his traine of men, to attend the king into France, went before into Kent unto a manor place which he had there. And whilest he staid in that countrie till the king set forward, greuous complaints were exhibited to him by his farmers and tenants against Charles Inceut his surerour, for such bising as he had vsed there amongst them.

Whereupon the duke toke such displeasure against him, that he depriued him of his office, not knowing how that in so doing he procured his owne destruction, as after appeared.

Anno Reg. 12.

The king set-terh forward towards France.

The kings maiestie perscuering in purpose to meet with Francis the French king, remoned with the quene, and all his court, the one & twentieth day of Maie being mondaie, from his manor of Greenwich towards the sea side: and so on the fridaie the siue and twentieth of Maie, he arriued at the citie of Canturburie, intending there to keepe his Whitsuntide. On the morrow after, the emperor being on the sea returning out of Spaine, arriued with all his nanie of ships roiall on the coast of Kent, direct to the port of Which the said daie by none, where hee was saluted by the viceadmerall of England, sir William Fitz William, with sir of the kings great ships well furnished, which laie for the safegard of passage betwixt Calis and Douer. Towards euening the emperor departed from his ships, and entered into his bote, and comming towards land, was met and receiued of the lord cardinall of Bozke with such reuerence as to so noble a prince appertained.

The emperor
Charles the sixt landeth in England.

The meeting of the emperor
and H. Henrie
at Douer castell.

The emperor
and H. Henrie
keepe Whitsuntide at Canturburie.

Thus landed the emperor Charles the sixt at Douer, vnder his cloth of estate of the blacke eagle, all spread on rich cloth of gold. He had with him manie noble men, and manie faire ladies of his bloud.
When he was come on land, the lord cardinall conducted him to the castell of Douer, which was prepared for him in most roiall manner. In the morning, the king rode with all hast to the castell of Douer to welcome the emperor, and entering into the castell, alighted. Of whose comming the emperor hauing knowledge, came out of his chamber, and met him on the staires, where either of them embraced other in most louing maner, and then the king brought the emperor to his chamber. On Whitsuntide earlie in the morning, they toke their horses, and rode to the citie of Canturburie, the more to keepe solemne the feast of Pentecost: but speciallie to see the quene of England his aunt was the emperor his intent, of whome ye may be sure he was most iollie recei-ued and welcomed.

Thus the emperor and his retinue, both of lords and ladies, kept their Whitsuntide with the king and quene of England, in the citie of Canturburie with all ioy and solace. The emperor yet him selfe seemed not so much to delight in pastime and pleasure, but that in respect of his youthfull yeares, there appeared in him a great shew of grauitie: for they could by no means bring him to dance amongst the res-due of the princes, but onelie was contented to be a looker on. Peraduenture the sight of the ladie Marie troubled him, whome he had sometime loued, and yet through fortunes euill hap might not haue hir to wife. The chiefe cause that moued the emperor to come thus on land at this time, was to perswade that by word of mouth, which he had before done most ear-nestlie by letters, which was, that the king should not meet with the French king at anie interuiew: for Polydor.

he doubted least if the king of England & the French king should grow into some great friendship and faithfull bond of amitie, it might turne him to displeasure.

But now that he perceined how the king was forward on his iourne, he did what he could to procure, that no trust should be committed to the faire words of the Frenchmen: and that if it were possible, the great friendship that was now in breeding betwixt the two kings, might be dissolued. And so somuch as he knew the lord cardinall to be loue with rewards, as a fish with a bait: he bestowed on him great gifts, and promised him much more, so that he would be his friend, and helpe to bring his purpose to passe. The cardinall not able to susteine the least assault by force of such rewards as he presentlie recei-ued, and of such large promises as on the emperours behalf were made to him, promised to the emperour, that he would so vse the matter, as his purpose should be sped: onelie he required him not to discalowe the kings intent for interuiew to be had, which he desired in anie wise to go forward, that he might shew his high magnificence in France, according to his first intention.

The emperor remained in Canturburie till the thursdaie, being the last of Maie, and then taking leauie of the king, and of his aunt the quene, depared to Sandwich, where he toke his ships and sailed into Flanders. The same daie, the king made saile from the port of Douer, and landed at Calis about eleuen of the clocke, and with him the quene and ladies, & manie nobles of the realme. His grace was receiued into the checker, and there rested. The fourth of June, the king and quene with all their traine remoued from Calis, to his princelie lodging netwile erected beside the towne of Guines, the most noble & roiall lodging that euer before was seen. For it was a palace, the which was quadrant, and euerie quadrant of the same palace was three hundred and twentie eight foot long of allise, which was in compasse thirtene hundred and twelue foot about. This palace was set on stages by great cunning & sumptuous worke.

At the entering into the palace before the gate, on the plaine greene, was builded a fountaine of im-bowed worke, gilt with fine gold, and bice, ingrailed with antike worke: the old god of wine called Bacchus burling the wine, which by the conduits in the earth ran to all people plentifullie with red, white, and claret wine, ouer whose head was written in letters of Romane in gold, Faicte bonne chere qui vouldra. On the other hand of side of the gate was set a pillar, which was of ancient Romane worke, bozne with foure lions of gold, the pillars topped in a wreath of gold curiously wrought and intrailed, and on the summit of the said pillar stood an image of the blind god Cupid, with his bow and arrowes of loue, readie by his seeming to strike the yong people to loue.

The foregate of the same palace of place with great and mightie masonrie by sight was arched, with a tower on euerie side of the same port, rered by great craft, and imbattelled was the gate and tower, and in the fenestres and windowes were images resembling men of warre, readie to cast great stones.
Also the same gate or tower was set with compa-sed images of ancient princes, as Hercules, Alexander, and other by intrailed worke, richlie limned with gold and albine colours: and well and warlike was made ouer the gate loupes, and inforced with bat-telments, and in the same gate a lodge for the porter, which there appeared, and other sumptuouslie appelled like unto kings officers. By the same gate all people passed into a large court faire and breu-tiful, utall, for in this court appeared much of the outward beautie of this place, for from the first water table, to the raising of reissin pices, were baie windowes, on euerie side mixed with cleare stozies curioudic glasse, the posts or moimels of euerie window was gilt.

Thus the outward part of the place lumed the eyes of the beholders, by real in of the sumptuous work. Also the tower of the gate (as seemed) was bulmed by great masonrie, and by great engine of mans wit, for the sundrie countenances of euerie image that there appeared, some shooting, some ca sting, some readie to strike, and firing of gunnes, which showed verie honozable. Also all the said qua drants, baies, and collicies, were roiallie intrailed, as faire as vnto the same court appertained. And direct against the gate was deuised a halpas, and at the entrie of the faire, were images of foze and terri ble countenances, all armed in curious worke of argentine. The baie of the same halpas pendant by craft of timber, & under it antike images of gold in armored with verdoz of olifs cast in compasse, moun ting their countenances toward the entring of the palace. The faire of the said halpas was cast of pas sage by the wents of hyode steps, so that from the first foot or towel step, anie person might without paine go vnto the highest place of the same halpas.

On euerie hand was their chamber dozes and enterings into the chambers of the same palace, which were long and large, and well proportioned, to receiue light and aire at pleasure: the roses of them from place to place, and chamber to chamber were sleed, and couered with cloth of silke, of the most faire and quicke inuention that before time was seene. For the ground was white ingrailed, embowed, and batoned with rich clothes of silkes, knit and fret with cuts and braids, and sundrie new castis, that the same clothes of silke shewed like bussions of fine burned gold: and the roses in losenges, that in the same roses were in kindlie course, furnished so to mans sight, that no living creature might but loy in the beholding thereof. For from the iaw pice of the said sleeling (which pice was gilt with fine gold) were workes in pane paled, all the walles to the crest in countering the cleare stozies, the same crest which was of large depintesse, the worke was antike knots with bosses cast and wrought with more cunning than I can write, all which workes and ouerages were gilt, and to set it the more to the glorie, the flour ishing wile was comparable to the rich amell.

Also at the foot of the same palace was another crest all of fine set gold, whereon hanged rich & maruelous clothes of arras wrought of gold and silke, compas sed of manie ancient stozies, with which clothes of ar ras euerie wall and chamber were hanged, & all the windowes so richlie couered, that it passed all other sights before seene. In euerie chamber and euerie place convenient were clothes of estate, great and large of cloth of gold, of tissue, and rich embroderie, with chaires couered with like cloth, with pommels of fine gold, and great cushions of rich worke of the Turkie making, nothing lacked of honoutable fur nishment. Also to the same palace was reared a chappell with two closetts, the quire of the said chap pell sleed with cloth of gold, and thereon fret ingra iled bent clothes of silke, all was then silke and gold.
The altars of this chappell were hanged with rich re vesture of cloth of gold and tissue, & embowdered with perles.ouer the hie altar was hanged a rich canopie of maruelous greatnesse, the altar was appareled with fine paire of candlesticks of gold, and on the al tar an halpas, and thereon stood a crucifix all of fine gold, and in the same halpas stood twelue images of the bignes of foure peares of age, all gold.

All the copes and vestments were so rich as might be prepared or bought in the cite of Florens, for they were all but of one pice, so woven for the purpose, cloth of tissue and powdered with red roses purpled with fine gold. The vestris set with pearles and pre cious stones. And all the walles and desces of this chappell were hanged with right cloth of gold, & three rich great crosses were there readie to be borne at festiual times, and basens and censers, gospellers, pares, crewets, holie water vessels, and other orna ments all of gold. Also in the first closet was a tra uerse for the kings person of cloth of gold, & in it his place & chaire, with cushions of cloth of gold: before the traverse was an altar of presence, which altar was adorned with cloth of broderie, and rich pearles and precious stones, set in goldsmiths worke of fine gold.
On the altar was a beske or halpas, whereon stood a patible of the crucifix of fine gold, with an image of the Trinitie, an image of the virgine Marie, and twelue other images, all fine gold & precious stones, two paire of candlesticks of fine gold, with the ba sens, crewets, pares, and other ornaments.

The said closet was hanged with tapets embro dered with rich worke fret with pearles and stones, the rose of the same closet was sleed with worke of inmoued, gilt with fine gold, and senoper, and bise.
The second closet was for the queens person, in which was a traverse of rich cloth of gold, the altar so richlie appareled, that there lacked neither pearles nor stones of riches. On the altar were twelue great images of gold, the closet hanged with cloth of gold, all other iewels mistall. I suppose neuer such like were seene, and the rose of the same closet was sleed with like worke that the kings closet was, as is be fore rehearsed. And from this palace or place into the mightie & strong fortresse & castell roiall of Gulesnes, was a gallerie for the secret passage of the kings person into a secret lodging within the same castell, the more for the king ease. Also to this palace was all houses of offices, that to such an honourable court should appertene, that is to wit, the lord chamberlein, lord steward, lord treasurer of the household, for the comptrolloz, the office of greene cloth, wardrobes, setwell house, and office of household seruice, as chibrie, pantrie, cellar, butterie, spicerie, pither house, larder and poultrie, and all other offices so large and faire, that the officers might & did maruell, as in the craft of viands, by ouens, harthes, veredoxes, chimnies, ranges, & such instruments as there were ordeined.

In this palace (as ye haue heard) was the kings grace lodged, and all the nobles after their degrees.
And for that the towne of Gulesnes was little, and that all the noble men might not there be lodged, they set up tents in the field, to the number of twen tie and eight hundred sundrie lodgings, which was a goodlie sight. Thus was the king in his palace to all at Gulesnes. Francis the French king was with all his nobles of the realme of France come to the towne of Ard, which was prepared for his coming, manie tents, halles, and paulions were set and pit ched in the field. On the French partie also there was at the same towne of Ard builded the French kings lodging full well, but not finished. Such was the prouision in Picardie on euerie part thorough all. The French king commanded his lodging to be made a little out of the towne of Ard, in the territo rie of an old castell, which by the warre of old time had bene beaten. On the same place was edified a house of solace and sport, of large and mightie com passe, which was chieflie susteined by a great mightie mast, whereby the great ropes and tackle streined, the same mast was staied. All the rose of the same house hving on the same mast, and with tackle was streined & borne by the supporters of the same mast oz tree, the colours of the same was all blew, set with wrought in maner like the skie or firmament, and a Ard, this cressant was covered with frets and knots made of iute bushes, and boy branches, and other things that longest would be grane for pleasure.

Now like as diuerse of the French nobilitie had visited the king of England whilest he late in Calis, so likewise the lord cardinall, as ambassadour to the king, rode with a noble repaire of lords, gentlemen, and prelates, to the towne of Ard, where he was of the French king highlie intertained, with great thanks, for that by his meanes hee had ioined in friendship with the king of England, to his high contentation and pleasure, as hauing obtained the thing which he had long desired. The noble port, sumptuous shew, and great traine of gentlemen, knights, lords, and number of seruants, in rich apparell & suites of li-ueries attendant on the cardinall, made the French men greatlie to wonder at his triumphant doings.

The king of England had giuen vnto the said cardinall full authoritie, power, and libertie, to assirme and confirme, bind and vnbind, whatsoever should be in question betwene him and the French king: and the like authoritie, power, and libertie, did the French king by his sufficient letters patents, grant to the same cardinall, which was accepted to be a signe of great loue, that he should commit to great a trust vnto the king of Englands subiect. The daie of the meeting was appointed to be on the thurs-daie the seauenth of June, vpon which daie the two kings met in the vale of Andren, accompanied with such a number of the nobilitie of both realmes, so richlie appointed in apparell, and costlie iewels, as chaines, collars of S.S., & other the like ornaments to set forth their degrees and estates, that a wonder it was to behold and view them in their order and romes, which euerie man kept according to his appointment.

The two kings meeting in the field, either saluted other in most louing wise, first on horsebacke, and after alighting on foot embraced with courteous words, to the great reioicing of the beholders: and after they had thus saluted ech other, they went both together into a rich tent of cloath of gold, there set vp for the purpose, in the which they passed the time in pleasant talke, banquetting, and louing deuises, till it grew toward the evening, and then departed for that night, the one to Guisnes, the other to Ard. At this meeting of the two kings in open sight, I then well perceived (saith Hall) the habillements of all of the French king. His garment was a chemise, of cloath of silver, culponed with cloath of gold, of da-maske, cantell wise, and garded on the borders with the Burgon bands.

ouer that he had a cloake of broched sattin, with gold of purple colour, wrapped about his bodie trauerse, beded from the shoulder to the waist, fastned in the loope of the first sould: this said cloake was richlie set with pearles and pretious stones. This French king had on his head a coiffe of damaske gold set with diamonds, and his courser that he rode on was co-uered with a trapper of tissue, bordered with deusse, cut in fashion mantell wise, the skirts were embowed and fret with frized woike, and knit with cor-belles & buttons tasseled of Turkie making, rainces and headstall answering of like woike: and verelie of his person the same Francis the French king, a goodlie pzince, statelie of countenance, merie of cheere, browne coloured, great eyes, high nose, big lipped, faire bearded, broad shoulders, small legges, & long feet.

On saturday the ninth of June, in a place within the English pale were set vp in a field called the Aubessine, that is to saie, the hawthorne in English, for Henrie: and the other the Framboiser, which in English signifieth the raspis berie, after the signification in French. These trees were curiously wrought, the leanes of grane damaske, the branches, boughs, and withered leanes of cloath of gold; and all the bodie and armes of the same cloath of gold laid on timber: they were in height from the foot to the top thirtie foure foot of assize, in compasse about an hundred twentie and nine foot, & from bough to bough fortie three foot: on these trees were flowers and fruits in kindlie wise, with silver and Venice gold: their beautie shewed farre.

On the same daie the two kings came to those trees of honour, noble accompanied, in such roll sozt as was requisite. The campe was in length nine hundred foot, and in bredth three hundred and twentie foot, ditched round about (sauiing at the entrees) with broad and deepe ditches. Diuerse scaffolds were reared about this campe for the ease of the nobles. On the right side of the field stood the queene of England, and the queene of France, with manie ladies. The campe was stronglie railed and barred on euerie end: in the entrie there were two lodgings prepared for the two kings, wherein they might arme themselues, and take their ease. Also in the same compasse there were two great cellars couched full of wine, which was liberallie bestowed on all men. The two kings, as brethren in armes, undertooke to deliuer all persons at iusts, tournie, and barriers.

With these two kings were associate by the order of armes, the duke of Glondine, the duke of Suffolke, the countie saint Paule, the marquise Dorset, monsieur de Roche, sir William Kingston, monsieur Brian, sir Richard Feringham, monsieur Ca-uaen, sir Giles Capell, monsieur Buccall, master Nicholas Carew, monsieur Pontafillion, and master Anthonye Kneuet. On mondaie the eleuenth of June, the two queenes of England and of France came to the campe, where either saluted other right honourable, and went into a stage for them prepared. At the houre assigned, the two kings armed at all paces mounted on horsebacke, and with their companies entered the field; the French king on a courser barbed, couered with purple sattin, broched with gold, & embroidered with corbins fethers round and buckled, the fether was blacke and hatched with gold: on his head piece he bare a plume. All the parteners of the French kings challenge were in like ap-parell, euerie thing correspondent in cloath of silke embroidered, on his person were attendant on horsebacke noble persons, and on foot foure persons all apparelled in purple sattin.

The king of England was vpon a fresh courser, the trappers of cloth of gold, of tissue, the arlon man-tell wise, and on the hount of the trapper bard fashion, cut in waues of water woike, and euerie waue raw wrought and frized with damaske gold: this woike was laid lose on russet veluet, and knit together with points of gold, which waues signified the lordship of the narrow seas. All the parteners of the kings challenge were in the same sute, their horses as well as their persons. Attendant on the king on horsebacke were sir Henrie Guilford master of the kings horse, sir John Dechie depute of Calis, sir Edward Guilford master of the kings armie, and monsieur Sporet of the French court. All these foure were appa-relled in the kings liuerie, which was white on the right side, and the left side gold and russet both hose and garment: on him were attendant on foot sir ho-the number of an hundred and twelue persons, of the which number all the knights and gentlemen had coats, the one halfe siluer, and the other cloath of gold and russet beluet, and the other officers coats were of right sattin of the same colour, and all their hosen were of the same sute verie costlie.

Thus with honour and noble courage these two noble kings with their companies entered into the field, and then presented vnto the quenes. After reuerence done, they rode round about the tilt, and so toke their places appointed, abiding the answers: which was for the first the duke of Alanfon and ten men of armes on his band, on coursers barbed, the barbs couered with white and blacke beluet, fastenep the one within the other, garded with Burgon bands of tinell sattin, as well their garments as their barbs. Then entered on coursers barbed twelue gentlemen of the band of the lord admerall of France, their garments and barbs were russet sattin, broched with gold and white and purple sattin, after the deuise of their pleasure with great plumes. When these bands were entred the field, they shewed themselves about the tilt, and did reuerence vnto the quenes. The band of the duke of Alanfon toke first place, they made them prest on both sides, the french king was the first that ran, he did valiantlie and bhaie speares mightlie.

Then ran the king of England to monsieur Cranbeulle with great vigor; so that the speares bhaie in the kings hand to the vantplate all to shivers. And at the second course he gaue the said monsieur Cranbeulle such a stroke, that the charnell of his headpiece, although the same was verie strong, was broken in such wise that he might run no more, wherby the king wanted thre courses. Then ran the duke de Gandosine, & met his counter part right noble, and bhaie speares right valiantlie. The noble duke of Suffolke charged his course, and met right valiantlie his counter part, and furnished the five courses right noble together like good men of armes. And when all parties of the challenge had right valiantlie furnished their courses, then ran againe the two noble kings, who did so valiantlie, that the beholders had great ioy, after which courses the heralds cried Desamee, and the trumpets sounded to lodging.

On tuedaie the twelue of June at houre conuenient the two quenes toke their stages, and the band of chalenge in the field prest to answer and deliuer all comers, to whome came ten gentlemen armed on barbed horsse of the band of monsieur de Salons, their barbs and apparell cloath of beluet full of friers knots siluer. After they had presented them vnto the quenes, then they toke the end of the tilt, and so course after course they ran to the chalengers right eagerlie, and the chalengers of the partie of the two kings deliuered to the end of their articles of iusts. Then entered eleuen men of armes of the band of monsieur de Tremoiell, on horsse barbed with yel low beluet, losenged with friers knots of blacke beluet: and after they had saluted the quenes, they likewise toke the end of the tilt, and course after course ran vntill they were deliuered of their chalenges of iusts. Valiantlie this daie was finished.

On wednesday the thirteenth of June, the two hardie kings armed at all peeces, entered into the field right noble apperelled. The french king and all his partners of chalenge were arrayed in purple sattin, broched with gold and purple beluet, embrodered with little rolles of white sattin, wherein was written, Quando: their barbs & garments were set full of the same, and the residue where was no rolles were powdered & set with the letter elle, as thus. L. which in french is she, which was interpreted to be, Quando elle, when she: and insuing the deuise of the first daie, it signifieth together, Hart fastened in paine endles, when she. The king of England with all the band of partners of his chalenge were likewise on horsse: backe, apperelled in trappers of losenges russet beluet and cloath of siluer of damaske, embrodered and set in euerie losenge a branch of eglantine of gold, the apparell of the persons were of the same correspondent to the trapper. This eglantine tre is sweet, pleasant and Greene, if it be kindlie and frendlie handled; but if it be rudelie dealt with, it will pricke and he that will pull vp the whole tre by the top, his hands will be hurt.

The two kings with their companies thus apperelled, presented themselves to the quenes, and so toke the end of the tilt. Then entered into the field monsieur Leskelw called lord Leskin, with him came eleuen men of armes, himsele the twelue on horsse barbed and richlie apperelled, and so rode about the tilt and saluted the quenes, and toke the end of the tilt. Monsieur de Leskelw and his eleuen companions had their bases and barbs all of blacke cloath of gold of damaske all cut on blacke sattin, their garments had mantell sleeves on the left arme, to the wast behind iust to the shoulder, which was prassed for the strangenelle. The french king ran to monsieur de Ambois, one of the band of monsieur Leskelw, and the king of England charged his course and ran to monsieur Leskelw, and so furnished their courses (as they saie) right noble and valiantlie in breaking speares that were strong. Thus course after course ech with other, his counter partie did right valiantlie: but the two kings surmounted all the rest in prouesse and valiantnesse.

This band thus furnished, entered the marquesse de Salons and his band, twelue persons all riding on coursers barbed and apperelled in white sattin and blacke, broched with gold and siluer, with cuts and culpins much after taluic and blacke sattin billots: & after reuerence done to the quenes, they toke the end of the tilt. To the marquesse de Salons ran the king of England, and the king of France to an other of the same band, still course after course ran all the noble men, till the marques de Salons and his band were deliuered, who bare them right valiantlie: then blew the trumpets the retreat, & the two kings them vnarmed and after departed, the french king vnto Ard, and the king of England to his castell of Gwisnes.

On thursdaie the thirteenth daie of June by the nonetide the two quenes met in the campe & toke their places, the people were come to behold the honour, and to see the two kings, who all readie armed entered the field, to receive and deliuer all men by answer of iusts. Then entered the earle of Denonshire, on his band the lord Pontacut, lord Herbert, lord Leonard Greie, maister Arthur Poole, maister Francis Brian, maister Henrie Jooris, and foure other all richlie apperelled, the one side blew beluet embrodered with a mans heart burning in a ladies hand holding a garden pot skilling with water on the heart: the other side was white sattin embrodered with letters of gold. This companie rode about the tilt, and did reuerence to the quenes, and so abode at the end of the same.

The earle of Denonshire charged his speare, and the french king likewise charged his course to meet the same earle, and ran so hard together, that both their speares bhaie, and so mainteined their courses noble. Then ran the king of England to monsieur Pemozancie, and him encountered, & both bare together and gaue great strokes; the kings most noble grace neuer disaiozed nor breathed vntill he ran the five courses & deliuered his counterpartie. marquesses, knights, esquires, and others ran as fast as euer they might, there was none that abode when the courtes came, untill the earle of Duonshire and his band were deliuered of demands. Then entered the lord Howard sonne to the duke of Suffolke and eleven companions apparelled and barded in crimsin sattin full of flames of gold, the borders ribbed with crimsin beluet, and with much hono<sup>r</sup> (after due reuerence done to the quenes) were brought with heralds of armes about the tilts; and so toke the place to them appointed: right rich was their apparell.

Then ran the French king and encountered the same lord Edmund, they brake both their staves vntill the course after course, the encounter ceased not till they had furnished their five courses; so was the lord Edmund deliuered by the French k. Then ran the king of England to a strong gentleman named Hafe Brooke and brake his speare, and ran course after course, untill he had finished his courses right noble and like a prince of most valiancie. The residue ceased not untill they had ech deliuered other of their challenge.

On fridaie the fifteenth daie of June the king of England mounted on a courser rosall, his person armed at all peeces, his apparell and trappers was the one side rich cloath of gold of tisse, the other side cloath of tisse of siluer, and cloath of gold of tisse entered round the one with the other.

The ound is a worke wauing vp & downe, and all the borders as well trappers as other was garded with letters of fine gold, and all the other side that was ound was set with signes called cifers of fine gold, the which were set with great and orientall pearles. The cifers signified letters knit together in a knot, which was to wit; God my friend, my realme and I maie. This was the deuise and reason thereof. All the kings band were apparelled in like apparell. The French k. likewise armed at all points mounted on a courser rosall, all his apparell as well bards as garments were purple beluet entered the one with the other, embroidered full of little booke of white sattin, & in the booke were written Ame. About the borders of the bards and the borders of the garments a chaine of blew like iron, resembling the chaine of a well of prison chaine, which was interpreted to be Liberty, a booke. Within this booke was written (as is said) Ame. But these two together and it maketh Liberty. The chaine betokeneth prison or bonds, and so maketh together in English, Deliver me of bonds. Then they toke the end of the tilt.

Readie was monsieur Florengis and with him twelue men of armes with courfers barded: the bards and apparell was crimsin beluet, & towne beluet, and plunket beluet embroidered bordertwise with shepheards hookes of cloath of siluer. When they with honour had passed about the tilt (due reuerence to the quenes and ladies done) the two kings had their speares readie, and then began the rushing of speares. The king of England this daie ran so freshly and so manie courses, that one of his best courfers was dead that night, this band was deliuered man after man of their pretense of iuffs. Then entered bands of monsieur de Hambeurs and monsieur de Puits, ech hauing eleven persons in number, the one band all white sattin embroidered with blacke, and the other all blacke dopped with siluer drops; who after reuerence done to the quenes, at the end of the tilt toke their places. Then began a new encounter hard and sore, manie of them bare great strokes of the kings, to their honour: and with such violence they ran, as they fet their hollies in a sweating heat, and themselves meeting with full force made the fragments or broken peeces of their staves mount aloft in the air like an arrow out of a bow; as the poet saith;

On saturdaye the seuenteenth daie of June, the French king with a small number came to the castle of Gules about the houre of eight in the morning. The king being in his priue chamber had therof knowledge, who with glad hart went to receiue the same French king, and him met and welcomed in friendly and honorable maner; and after communication betwene them had, the king of England departed, leauing the French king there in the sumptuous place before named. Then was buie the lord chamberleine, the lord steward, and all other officers, to make readie feast and cheare. It were too long to rehearse all, for such a feast and banquet was then made, that of long time before the like had not bene scene. The king of England thus departing, he toke his horse, and with a companie of noblemen rode to Ard, where the French quene and other noble men receiued him with much honour.

After which receiuing, he was by the said quene and lords brought into a chamber hanged with blew beluet embroidered with flowers belice of cloth of gold, wherein was a great bed of like worke, from whence he was conueied to another chamber, in the which was a kings state. This chamber was hanged and sieled with cloth of gold, embroidered with great cordels or friers knots of cloth of siluer. In the same chamber were two suppers, on either side one, furnished with great and goodlie plate gilt. Noble feasting and cheare was there made. After dinner the ladies dressed them to danse, and certeine yong honourable lords of England, apparelled after the manner of Russland or farre Castland, whose hosen were of rich gold sattin called aureat sattin, ouerrolled to the knee with scarlet, and on their fet shoes with little plikes of white nailes after the Castland guise, their dublets of rich crimsin beluet and cloth of gold, with wide sleeves lined with cloth of gold: ouer this they had cokes of crimsin beluet short, lined with cloth of gold, on euerie side of the cokes rings of siluer, with laces of Venice gold, and on their heads they had hats made in the towne of Danke, and purses of seales skinnies, and girdels of the same: all these yong lords had bisards on their faces, and their hats were barked with like hatbands full of damaske gold.

Other ten lords were apparelled in long golones of blew sattin of the ancient fashion, embroidered with reasons of gold that said Adieu jeunesse, fete well youth: they had tippets of blacke beluet, & hats hanging thereby, & on their heads he violet standing caps, and girdels of silke, and purses of cloth of gold after the ancient maner, with bisards on their faces of like anciencie. After all these triumphs and baueries, great store of spices, fruits, iellies, & banking viands were brought, which being done and ended, the king toke leaue of the French quene and ladies, to whome were brought thirtie horses trapped in damaske, white and yellow, and so passed he and his traine the towne of Ard into the field and campe. Right rosallie also was the French k. entertained, and all other after their degree and state. Now when all this solemnitie was ended, the French king toke leaue of the quene and ladies of the court. The lord cardinall in statelie attire, accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, and other great lords, conducted forward the French king, and in their way they encountered and met the king of England and his companie right in the ballie of Anderne, apparelled in their masking apparell, which gladded the French king. After reuerence done, the said two kings departed for that night, the English to Gules, and the French to Ard.

an hideous storme of wind and weather, that manie contempered it did prognosticate trouble and hatred hostile after to follow betwene princes. On tuesdaye the nineteenth of June, the two kings came to the campe againe armed at all peeces, and there abode them that would come, so that then began the iustes afresh. On wednesdaye the twentieth of June, the two kings began to hold tourneys with all the parteners of their challenge armed at all peeces. The quene of France and the quene of England were in the places for them prepared, and there was manie a goodlie battell performed: the kings doing as well as the best, so that the beholders spake of them honoz. On thursdaie the one and twentieth of June, the two kings likewise kept the tourneys, so that all those noble men that would proue their valiances, were deliuered according to the articles of the tourneys, which this daie toke end. On fridaie the 22 of June, the two kings with their retinue did battell on foot at the barriers, and there deliuered all such as put forth themselves to trie their forces. On saturdaye the thre and twentieth of June, the lord cardinal sang an high solemne masse by rote, aloft vpon a pompous stage before the two kings & quenes, the which being finished, indulgence was giuen to all the hearers. The two kings dined in one chamber that daie, and the two quenes in another. After dinner, the two kings with their band entered the field on foot before the barriers, & so began the fight, which continued battell after battell, till all the commers were answered. There were deliuered this day thus at the barriers by battell, an hundred and six persons: the two last battells did the kings trie. And so that Saturdaye the whole challenge was performed, and all men deliuered of the articles of iusts, tourneys, and battells on foot at the barriers, by the said two kings and their aids.

After this, there followed roiall maskes, and on the sundae the four and twentieth of June, the king of England with four companies, in euery companie ten, trimlie appointed in masking apparell, rode to Ard: and likewise the French king accompanied with eight and thirtie persons as maskers repaired to Guisnes. They met on the waie, & each companie passed by other without any countenance making or dissembling. They were honozable received, as well at the one place as the other. And when they had ended their pastime, banketting, and dances, they returned and met againe on the way homeward, and then putting off their visards, they louinglie embraced: and after amiable communication together, they toke leave each of other, & for a remembrance gaue gifts either to other verie rich and princelie.

During this triumph, much people of Flanders and west Flanders drew to Guisnes, to see the king of England & his honoz, to whom bittels of the court were giuen in plentie, the conduit of the gate did run wine alwaies. There were vagabonds, plowmen, labourers, and of the bragerie, wagoners and beggers, that for drunkennesse laie in routs and heapes. So great resort came thither, that knights and ladies, who were come to see the noblenesse, were faine to lie in haie and straw, and held them thereof highlie pleased. From the court of the emperor, noz of the ladie Margarets court, noz of Flanders,abant, noz Burgognie came neuer a person to answer to the challenge. By that it seemed that there was small loue betwene the emperor & the French king. Moreover, monsieur Fajot capteine of Bullogne with monsieur Chattelon, did their deuoir to haue taken the towne of saint Omer, of which doing was thought no goodnesse to the emperor.

On mondaie the five and twentieth of June, the king with the quene removed from Guisnes to Calis, where he remained till the tenth of Julie, on which daie he rode to Graueling, and was received on the waie by the emperor, and so by him conueied to Graueling, where not onlie the king, but also all his traine was cheered and scalded, with so louing manner, that the Englishmen highlie praised the emperours court. [When the French king and his lordes had knowledge of the meeting of the emperor and the king of England in the towne of Graueling, they were therewith greatlie grieved, as by manie things appeared. For as the Englishmen were in France disdained, and in their sutes there greatlie deferred, and had little right, and much lesse fauour: so from day to day still more and more began hartburning, and in conclusion open warre did arise betwene the two realmes.]

On Wednesdaye the eleventh of Julie, the emperor and his aunt the ladie Margaret duchesse of Sauoy came with the king of England to the towne of Calis, and there continued in great ioy and solace, with feasting, banketting, dancing and masking untill the fourteenth of Julie. For the intertaining of these estates (the English lords and gentlemen displaced of their lodgings to serue the other and their traine) there was builded a banketting house eight hundred fot compasse, like a theatre, after a goodlie deuise, builded in such maner as (I thinke) was neuer scene, with sixtene principals made of great masss, betwixt euery mass foure and twentie fot, and all the outsidcs closed with board and canuas.

Ouer it, and within round about by the sides, were made thre scaffolds or lofts one above another for men and women to stand vpon. And in the midst of the same banketting house, was set by a great pillar of timber made of eight great masss, bound together with iron bands, for to hold them together: for it was an hundred and foure and thirtie fot of length, and cost six pounds thirtene shillings and fourepence to set it vp right. The banketting house was couered ouer with canuas, fastened with ropes and iron as fast as might be deuised. And within the said house was painted the heauens, with starres, sunne, moone, and clouds, with diuerse other things made aboue ouer mens heads: and there were great images of wickers couered, and made like great men of diuerse strange nations: and diuerse reasons were written by them of the countries that they likened to be of, with the armes of those countries hanging by them.

Also there was made as it were manie ships border saile, and windmills going, and about the high pillar of timber that stood vp right in the midst, was made stages of timber for organs and other instruments to stand vpon, and men to plaie on them, & for other musicians & pageants to be plaied, when the king of England & the emperor should be at their banket. But in the morning of the same day, the wind began to rise, & at night blew off the canuas, and all the elements, with the starres, sunne, moone, and clouds, and the wind blew out aboue a thousand torches, and other lights of war, that were prepared to giue light to the banket, & all the kings seats that were made with great riches, besides all other things, were all dafed and lost.

The same daie at night that the states were intertained, the king and sixtene persons were appareled all in blacke velvet couered with cloth of gold, cut on the velvet, fastened with knots of gold, on the which knots hong spangles of gold like tufts, and bonnets of the same, & cloches of crimson sattin and cloth of gold wrapped trauerses, and their bullkins of the same cloth of gold. All these iustie maskers went to the emperours lodging, and were received, and in the chamber of presence danced and revelled, the which at the emperours request, the king and other disordered themselves, whereby the king was knit one: then the king took his leaue, and departed for that night. On tuesdaye the twelue of Julie, because the banquetting house could not be finished, the emperour and the ladie Margaret supped with the king & the queene at the checker, where the same night after supper revelled ninetie and six makers: after the reuels was a banquet, after which banquet the king brought the emperour and the ladie Margaret to the staple, and after withdrew him.

This night were eight companies of maskers, and in euery companie twelue persons all in gold, silver and velvet, richlie apparellled, but because the roome was small, the shew was the lesse. In these reuels were put in maskers apparell diuerse gentlemen of the French court vnknowing to the k. or anie other that bare rule. For diuerse yong gentlemen of the French court favored more the French partie, than the emperours partie; through which meanes they saw and much more heard than they should haue done. On fridaie the thirtieth date of Julie, the emperour did intend to haue departed from Calis, but the counsell was such that he departed not that night.

On saturdaye the fourteenth of Julie, the emperour took his leaue of the queene of England his aunt, and departed toward Grauling, being conducted on his waie by the king of England, to a village towards Flanders called Wlaell, and there they embraced and took their leaue either of other in most louing maner. They did not altogether spend the time thus while they were together, in vaine pleasures, and sporting reuels; for the charters before time concluded were read ouer, and all the articles of the league tripartite, agreed betwixt the emperour, the king of England, and the French king, were at full declared, to the which the French king had fullie consented. And for the more proofe thereof, and confirmation of the same, he sent monsieur de Roch with letters of credence to signifie to the emperour, that in the word of a prince he would obserue, fulfill, performe and keepe all the same articles, for him, his realme and subjects. Shortly after that the emperour and the king had taken leaue each of other, and were departed, the king shipped, and with the queene and all other the nobilitie returned safelie into England.

The king kept his Christmas at Greenwich this yeare, with much noblenesse and open court. And the tenth daie of Februarie, in his owne person, iusted with all commers. On Twelue daie his grace and the earle of Denonshire, with foure aids, answered at the touraine all commers, which were sixtene persons: noble and rich was their apparell, but in feats of armes the king excelled the rest. About this time the king hauing regard to the common welth of his realme, considered how for the space of fiftie yeares past and more, the nobles and gentlemen of England, being given to grasur of cattell, and keeping of sheepe, had inuented a meane how to increase their yearelie reuenues, to the great decaye and vndowing of husbandmen of the land. For the said nobles and gentlemen, after the maner of the Spaniards, more studying how to increase their pastures, than to maintaine tillage, began to decaye husband tacks & tenements, and to convert arable ground into pasture, furnishing the same with beastes and sheepe, and also dere, so inclosing the field with hedges, ditches, and pales, which they held in their owne hands, ingrossing woulles, and selling the same, and also sheepe and beastes at their owne prices, and as might stand most with their owne private commoditye.

Whereof a threefold euill chanced to the common wealth, as Polydor noteth. One, for that thereby the number of husbandmen was sore diminished, the which the prince vseth chiefly in his seruice for the warres: another, for that manie townes and villages were left desolate, and became ruinous: the third, for that both wool and cloth made thereof, and the flesh of all maner beastes used to be eaten, was sold at far higher prices than was accustomed. These enormities at the first beginning being not redressed, grew in short space to such force and vigour by euill custome, that afterwards they gathered to such an vnited force, that hardly they could be remedied. Such like a disease, which in the beginning with little paine to the patient, and lesse labour to the surgeon might be cured; whereas the same by delaye and negligence being suffered to putrifie, becommeth a desperate force, and then are medicines nothing available, and not to be applied, according to his opinion that said:

Pescantes videas: venienti occurrere morbo.*

The king therefore causing such good statutes as had bene deuised and established for reformation in this behalfe, to be reuiued and called vpon, took order by directing forth his commissions vnto the iustices of peace, and other such magistrats, that presentment should be had and made of all such inclosures, and decaye of husbandrie, as had chanced within the space of fiftie yeares before that present time. The iustices and other magistrats, according to their commission executed the same. And so commandement was giuen, that the decayed houses should be built up againe, that the husbandmen should be placed eilsons in the same, and that inclosed grounds should be laid open, and sore punishment appointed against them that disobeyed.

These so good and wholesome ordinances shortly after were defeated by meanes of bishoppes giuen vnto the cardinal: for when the nobles and gentlemen, which had for their pleasures imparied the common fields, were loth to haue the same againe disparted, they redeemed their vexation with good summes of monie; and so had licence to keepe their parks and grounds inclosed as before. Thus the great expectation which men had conceiued of a general redresse, proued void: but albeit, some profit the husbandmen in some parts of the realme got by the mowing of this matter, where inclosures were already laid open, yet mistresse monie could preuent them; and so they inioied their commons, which before had bene taken from them.

After that this matter for inclosures was thus dispatched, the cardinal boiling in hatred against the duke of Buckingham, & thirsting for his blood, deuised to make Charles Kneuet, that had bene the dukes surueior, and put from him (as ye haue heard) an instrument to bring the duke to destruction. This Kneuet being had in examination before the cardinal, disclosed all the dukes life. And first he offered, that the duke was accustomed by waie of talke, to saie, how he meant so to vse the matter, that he would attaine to the crowne, if king Henrie chanced to die without issue: & that he had talke and conference of that matter on a time with George Peuil, lord of Aburgauernie, vnto whom he had giuen his daughter in marriage; and also that he threatened to punish the cardinal for his manifold misdoings, being without cause his mortall enimie.

The cardinal hauing gotten that which he sought for, incouraged, comforted, and procured Kneuet, with manie comfortable words and great promises, that he should with a bold spirit and countenance obiect and laie these things to the dukes charge, with more if he knew it when time required. Then Kneuet partie prouoked with desire to be reuenged, and partly moued with hope of reward, openly confessed, that the duke had once fullie determined to deuise meanes how to make the king away, being brought into a full hope that he should be king, by a vaine prophesie which one Nicholas Hopkins, a monke of an house of the Chartreux order beside Wyke, called Henton, sometime his confessor, had opened vnto him.

The cardinall hauing thus taken the examinatioon of Lancaster, went vnto the king, and declared vnto him, that his person was in danger by such traitorous purpose, as the duke of Buckingham had conceived in his heart, and shewed how that now there is manifest tokens of his wicked pretense: wherefore, he exhorted the king to prouide for his owne suertie with speed. The king hearing the accusation, informed to the bittermost by the cardinall, made this answer; If the duke haue deserued to be punished, let him haue according to his deserts. The duke her-upon was sent for by to London, & at his coming thither, was straightwaies attached, and brought to the Tower by sir Henrie Sparneie, capteine of the gard, the sixteenth of Aprill. There was also attached the foresaid Chartreux monke, master John de la Car alias de la Court, the dukes confessor, and sir Gilbert Perke priest, the dukes chancellor.

After the apprehension of the duke, inquisitions were taken in diuerse shires of England of him; so that by the knights and gentlemen, he was indicted of high treason, for certeine words spoken (as before ye haue heard) by the same duke at Blechingleie, to the lord of Aburgauennie: and therewith was the same lord attached for concelement, and so likewise was the lord Montacute, and both led to the Tower. Sir Edward Penill, brother to the said lord of Aburgauennie, was forbidden the kings presence. Moreover, in the Guildhall, within the citie of London, before John Bugge knight, then lord maior of the same citie, by an inquest whereof one Miles Gerrard was foreman, the said duke was indicted of diuerse points of high treason, as by the same indictment it appeareth.

Item, that the said duke intending to eralt himselfe, and to surpe the crowne, the roial power, and dignitie of the realme of England, and to depriue the kings maiestie thereof, that he the said duke might take vpon him the same; against his allegiance, had the tenth daie of March, in the second yere of the kings maiesties reigne, and at diuerse other times before and after, imagined and compassed the kings death and destruction at London, & at Thorneburie, in the countie of Gloucester. And for the accomplishment of his wicked intent and purpose (as in the indictment is alledged) the twentieth and fourth daie of Aprill, in the fourth yere of the kings reigne he sent one of his chapleins called John de la Court, to the priorie of Henton in Summersetshire, which was an house of the Chartreux monks. The effect or substance of whose message was, to vnderstand of one Nicholas Hopkins, a monke of the same house (who was vaineie reputed by waie of reuelation to haue forknowledge of things to come) what should happen concerning the matters which he had imagined. Which monke, causing the said de la Court first to sweare vnto him, not to disclose his words to any maner of person, but onlie to the duke his master: therewith declared, that his master the said duke should haue all, willing him for the accomplishment of his purpose, to seeke to win the fauour of the people. De la Court came backe with this answer, and told it to the duke at Thorneburie the morrow after, being the twentieth fift of Aprill.

Also the two and twentieth of Iulie in the same fourth yere, the duke sent the same de la Court with letters vnto the said monke, to vnderstand of him further of such matters: and the monke told him againe for answer, that the duke should haue all. And being asked as well now, as before at the first time, how he knew this to be true: he said, By the grace of God. And with this answer de la Court now also returning, declared the same vnto the duke, the twentieth fourth of Iulie at Thorneburie aforesaid. Moreover, the said duke sent the same de la Court againe to the said monke with his letters, the first and twentieth of Aprill, in the fift yere of the kings reigne, when the king was to take his tourne into France; requiring to vnderstand what should become of these warres: and whether the Scottish king should in the kings absence invade the realme or not. The monke (among other things) for answer of these letters, sent the duke word, that the king should haue no issue male.

Again, the said duke the twentieth daie of February, in the first yere of the kings reigne, being at Thorneburie, spake these words vnto Kase earle of Westmerland; Well, there are two new dukes created here in England, but if ought but good come to the king, the duke of Buckingham should be next in blood to succed to the crowne. After this, the said duke on the sixteenth daie of Aprill, in the said first yere of the kings reigne, went in person vnto the priorie of Henton, and there had conference with the foresaid monke, Nicholas Hopkins, who told him, that he should be king. Wherevnto the duke said, that if it so chanced, he would shew himselfe a iust and a righteous prince. The monke also told the duke, that he knew this by reuelation, and willed him in any wise to procure the ioue of the commons, the better to attaine his purposed intention.

The duke at the same time gaue, and promised to giue yearelie vnto the said priorie, six pounds, therewith to buye a tun of wine. And further he promised to giue vnto the same priorie, in readie monie twentie pounds, whereof ten pounds he gaue in hand, towards the conueieng of water vnto the house by a conduit. And to the said monke Nicholas Hopkins he gaue at that present in reward thre pounds, and at another time fortie shillings, at another time a marke, and at another time six shillings eight pence. After this, the twentieth daie of March, in the tenth yere of the kings reigne, he came to the same priorie, & estones had conference with the said monke, to be more fullie informed by him in the matters aboue specified. At what time the monke also told him, that he should be king. The duke in talke told the monke, that he had done verie well, to bind his chapleine John de la Court, vnder the seale of confession, to keepe secret such matter: for if the king should come to the knowledge thereof, it would be his destruction.

Likewise, the twentieth daie of October, in the seventh yere of the kings reigne, and at diuerse other times, as well before as after, the said duke had sent his chancellor Robert Gilbert chapleine, vnto London, there to buye certeine clothes of gold, silver, and beuets; euerie time so much as amounted to the worth of thre hundred pounds; to the intent the said duke might bestow the same, as well vpon knights, esquires, gentlemen of the kings house, and residents of his gard, as vpon other the kings subiects, to win their fauours and friendships to assist him in his euill purpose. Which clothes the said Gilbert did buye, and brought the same vnto the said duke, who the twentieth daie of Ianuarie, in the said seventh yere, & diuerse other daies and yeres before and after, did distribute and giue the same vnto certeine of the kings subiects for the purpose aforesaid.

The monke reuelation was peremptorie to the duke.

That herein the monke lied.

recited, as by the indictment it was inferred.

Furthermore, the said duke, the tenth of Zulie, in the tenth yeare of the kings reigne, and diuerſe other daies and times, as well before as after, did conſtitute more ſeueral and particular officers in his caſtles, honours, lordſhips, and lands than he was accuſtomed to haue, to the end they might be aſſiſtant to him, vnder colour of ſuch offices, to bying his euill purpoſe to paſſe. Whereouer, the ſame duke ſent vnto the king the tenth of Maie, in the ninth yeare of his reigne, for licence to retaine aſide of the kings ſubjects, whom he ſhould pleaſe him, dwelling within the ſhires of Hereford, Glouceſter, and Summerſetſhire; and alſo, that he might at his pleaſure conuene diuerſe armours, and habilliments for warre into Wales, to the intent to uſe the ſame againſt the king as the indictment imported, for the accompliſhing of his naughty purpoſe, which was to deſtroie the king and to ſurper the roſall gouernement and power to himſelfe.

Which sute for licence to haue reteiners, and to conuie such armours and habillements of warre, the said Gilbert, the twentieth daie of Maie, in the said ninth yeare, and diuerse other daies befoze and after, at London, and east Greenwich did follow, labouring earnestlie, both to the king and counsell, for obtaining the same. On the twentieth daie of Iulie in the said ninth yeare, the said duke sent the said Gilbert vnto Henton aforesaid, to vnderstand of the said monke Nicholas Hopkins, what he heard of him: and the monke sent him word, that befoze Christmas next there should be a change, & that the duke should haue the rule and gouernement of all England. And mozeouer, the twentieth of Febzuarie, in the eleuenth yeare of the kings reigne, at Wledinglie in the countie of Surrie, the said duke said vnto the said Robert Gilbert his chancelor, that he did expect and tarte for a time moze conuenient to atchue his purpose, and that it might easlie be done, if the nobles of this realme would declare their minds together: but some of them mistrusted, and feared to shew their minds together: and that marred all.

He said further at the same time to the said Gilbert, that what so ever was done by the kings father, was done by wrong. And still he murmured against all that the king then presentlie reigning did. And further he said, that he knew himselfe to be so wicked a sinner, that he wanted Gods fauour: and therefore he knew, that what so ever he took in hand against the king had the worse successe. And furthermore, the said duke (to alienate the minds of the kings subiects from their dutifull obseissance towards the said king and his heires) on the twentieth date of September, in the first yeare of his reigne, being then at London, reported vnto the said Robert Gilbert, that he had a certeine writing sealed with the kings great seale, comprehending a certeine act of parlement, in the which it was enacted, that the duke of Summerset one of the kings progenitors was made legitimate: and further, that the said duke meant to haue deliuered the same writing vnto king Henrie the seventh, but (said he) I would not that I had so done for ten thousand pounds.

And furthermore, the same duke on the fourth of November, in the eleventh yere of the kings reigne, at east Greenwich in the countie of Kent, said unto one Charles Baneuet esquier, after that the king had reproued the duke for reiteining William Bulmer knight into his seruice, that if he had perceiued that he should haue bene committed to the Towre (as he doubted he should haue bene) he would haue so wrought, that the principall doers therein should not haue had cause of great reuising: for he would haue played the part which his father intended to haue put in pacifice againſt king Richard the third at Solihurie, who made earnest ſuite to haue come vnto the preſence of the ſame king Richard: which ſuite if he might haue obtained, he hauing a knife ſecretlie about him, would haue thruſt it into the bodie of king Richard, as he had made ſemblance to kneele downe before him. And in ſpeaking theſe wordes, he maliciouslie laid his hand vpon his dagger, and ſaid, that if he were ſo euill bleſed, he would doo his beſt to accompliſh his pretended purpoſe, ſweariug to confirme his word by the blood of our Lord.

Beside all this, the same duke the tenth of Maie, in the twelfth yere of the kings reigne, at London in a place called the Rose, within the parish of saint Laurence Poultneie in Cantolike street ward, demanded of the said Charles Kanevet eiquer, what was the talke amongst the Londoners concerning the kings iourneie beyond the seas? And the said Charles told him, that manie stood in doubt of that iourneie, least the Frenchmen meant some deceit towards the king. Whereto the duke answered, that it was to be feared, least it would come to passe, according to the words of a certaine holie monke. For there is (saith he) a Chartreux monke, that diuers times hath sent to me, willing me to send vnto him my chancelloz: and I did send vnto him John de la Court my chapleine, vnto whome he would not declare anie thing, till de la Court had sworn vnto him to keepe all things secret, and to tell no creature liuing what he should heare of him, except it were to me.

And then the said monke told be la Court, that neither the king nor his heires should prosper, and that I should inuenuer my selfe to purchase the good wils of the communaltie of England; for I the same duke and my bloud should prosper, and haue the rule of the realme of England. Then said Charles Kneuet; The monke maie be deceived though the diuels illusion; and that it was euill to meddle with such matters. Well (said the duke) it cannot hurt me, and so (saith the indiment) the duke seemed to reioice in the monks words. And further, at the same time, the duke told the said Charles, that if the king had miscaried now in his last sicknesse, he would haue chopped off the heads of the cardinall, of sir Thomas Louell knight, and of others; and also said, that he had rather die for it, than to be bled as he had bene.

Moreover, on the tenth daie of September, in the said eleuenth yere of this kings reigne, at Westmynster, in the countie of Surrie, walking in the gallerie there with George Penill knight, lord Aburgauiennie, the duke murmuring against the kings counsellors, and there gouernement, said vnto the said George; that if the king died, he would haue the rule of the realme in spite of who so euer said the contrarie; and withall said, that if the said lord Aburgauiennie would say, that the duke had spoken such words, he would fight with him, and lay his sword vpon his pate: & this he bound vpon with manie great othes. These were the speciall articles & points comprised in the indictment, and laide to his charge: but how trulie, or in what sort proued, I haue not further to say, either in accusing or excusing him, other than as I find in Hall and Polydor, whose words in effect, I haue thought to impart to the reader, and without anie parciall wexling of the same either to or fro.

Sauling that (I truſt) I made without offence ſaie, that (as the rumour then went) the cardinall had ſie procured the death of this noble man, no leſſe fauou other, that chiefele went about to crosse the cardinall in his looble demeanoꝝ, & headie proceedings. But to the purpose. Shortlye after that the duke had bene indicted (as befoze ye haue heard) he was arreigned in Westminster hall, befoze the duke of Norfolke, being made by the kings letters patents high steward of England, to accomplish the high cause of appeals of the pæres & pæres of the realme, and to discerne and iudge the cause of the pæres.

There were also appointed to sit as iudges and iudges vpon the said duke of Buckingham, the duke of Suffolke, the marquess Dorset, the earls of Worcester, Devonshire, Essex, Somersetshire, Kent, Devon and Derby, the lord of saint Johns, the lord de la Mare, the lord Fitzwarren, the lord Willoughbie, the lord Brooke, the lord Cobham, the lord Herbert, and the lord Spoytelle: Where was made within the hall at Westminster a scaffold for these lords, and a presence for a iudge, a scaffold and counterrailed about, and barred with begréés. When the lords had taken their place, the duke was brought to the barre, and vpon his arraignment pleaded not guiltie, and put himselfe vpon his piéres. Then was his indictment read, which the duke denied to be true, and (as he was an eloquent man) alledged reasons to falsifie the indictment; pleading the matter for his owne iustificacion verie pijsilie and earnestlie. The kings attourneie against the dukes reasons alledged the examinations, confessions, and profes of witnesses

The duke desired that the witnesses might be brought forth. And then came before him Charles Annet, Perke, de la Court, & Hopkins the monk of the priorie of the Charterhouse beside Bath, which like a false hypocrite had induced the duke to the treason with his false forged propheties. Diuerse presumptions and accusations were laid vnto him by Charles Annet, which he would faine haue couered. The depositions were read, & the deponents deliuered as prisoners to the officers of the Tower. Then spake the duke of Rosfolke, and said: My lord, the king our soveraigne lord hath commanded that you shall haue his lawes ministred with fauour and right to you. Therefore if you haue anie other thing to say for your selfe, you shall be heard. Then he was commanded to withdraue him, and so was led into Paradise, a house so named. The lords went to counsell a great while and after toke their places.

Then said the duke of Forssfolke to the duke of Suffolke; What say you of sir Edward duke of Buck- ingham touching the high treasons? The duke of Suffolke answered; He is giltyte: & so said the marques and all the other earls and lords. Thus was this prince duke of Buckingham found giltyte of high treason, by a duke, a marques, seven earls, & twelue barons. The duke was brought to the barre fore chafing, and sweet mariellouslie; & after he had made his reuerence, he paused a while. The duke of Forssfolke as iudge said; Sir Edward, you haue heard how you be indicted of high treason, you pleaded thereto not giltyte, putting your selfe to the pées of the realme. which haue found you giltyte. Then the duke of Forss- folke wept and said; You shall be led to the kings pilson, and there laid on a hardle, and so drayne to the place of execution, and there be hanged, cut downe aloue, your members cut off and cast into the fire. your bowels burnt before you, your head smitten off. and your bodie quartered and diuided at the kings will, and God haue mercie on your soule. Amen.

The duke of Buckingham said, My lord of Northfolke, you haue said as a traitor should be said vnto, but I was neuer anie: but my lords I nothing maligne for that you haue downe to me, but the eternall God forgive you my death, and I doe: I shall neuer be to the king for life, howbeit he is a gracious prince, and more grace may come from him than I desire. I desire you my lords and all my fellows to pray for me. Then was the edge of the axe turned towards him, and heled into a barge. Sir Thomas Howell desired him to sit on the cushions and carpet ordeined for him. He said nay; for when I went to Westminster I was duke of Buckingham, now I am but Edward Bohune the most cattife of the world. Thus they landed at the Temple, where received him Sir Nicholas Walsle & Sir William Sandes baronets, and led him through the citie, &c. as desired ever the people to pray for him, of whome some wept and lamented, and said: This is the end of euill life, God forgive him, he was a proud prince, it is pittie that he behaued him so against his king and liege lord, whome God preferue. Thus about foure of the clocke he was brought as a cast man to the Tower.

On fridaie the ſeuenteenth daie of Maie, about elesen of the clocke, this duke of Buckingham, earle of Hereford, Stafford, and Northampton, with a great power was deliuered to Iohn Beine a Iohn Skenington ſhirriffes, who led him to the ſcaffold or Tower hill, where he ſaid he had offended the kings grace through negligence and lacke of grace, and deſired all noble men to beare by him, and all men to pray for him, and that he truſted to die the kings true man. Thus makeſſe with an axe he toke his death.
Then the Anguſtine friers toke his bodie, and head, and buried them. Alas that ener the grace of truth was withdrayne from ſo noble a man, that he was not to his king in allegiance as he ought to haue bene! Such is the end of ambition, the end of falſe prophesies, the end of euill life, and euill counſell; but ſpeciallie the end of malice, which grew to ſo huge and monſtrous a fire in the bawtie hart of the proud cardinal, that nothing could allwaie it, but the blood of this noble duke, againſt whome he had procured this proceſſe in iudgement ended with the execution of death: the toquents whereof were (as it ſeemeth by the ſentence of the iudge) much diminished through the mercie of the king.

For though his offense was traitorous, and therefore deserved as law had provided, and the Iudge defined; yet in respect of the offenders person, the kings favour dispensed with the rigor of iudgement, so that he was beheaded onlie, and his bodie not dismembred. ¶ This duke had begun a great and sumptuous building at his manor of Thornburie, but left the same unfinished. He made a faire parke hard by the same building, for the which he took in much and fruitfull ground. Also another parke at Galfwood, one mile off, he enlarged at two times to the compasse of six miles, for the which deed, and such like, he had manie a curse of the poore tenants.] At the time of his death (no doubt) his conscience (giving in greater evidence than 10000 witnesses) told him whether he was iustlie condemned or no. for a mans dieng day is as a bill of information, putting him in mind of his life well or ill spent, as one saith:

*Pectora terribili cum mors ferit horrida telo,

as sometime was the chiefe place of a temporall subier in the reline the (high steward excepted) whose power did extend to restraine some actions of the kings. Wherefore being now no such office (for there was neuer anie advanced thereunto since the beheading of this duke) I thinke it not bnniet to make some memorie of those persons possessing to high a place, least both they and their office might hereafter grow in vtter obliuion: these therefore they were.

Alfgarus
Stallere.

Alfgarus Stallere, constable to Edward the Confessor, of whome thus writeth the histozie of Elie in the second booke written by Richard of Elie a monke of that house, in the time of Henrie the second, whose words although they be somewhat long, I shall not graue to set downe in this sort. De famosa villa Estre, alio nomine Plasie vocata, dicendum est quam misere ab Elie est destrata. Alfgarus quidem Stallere, quod Latine dux dicitur, eam inuasi, & vniuersa. Abbas vero Wulfscum & fratres, cum sedulo frustrarequirerent, Edwardum Confessorem adieunt, cui rex mandauit, ut restitueret: sed ille regis iussu nequaquam obtemperauit. Fratres autem, cum nec prece nec precio eius animum flectere potuissent, anathematizant eum, nec sententiam super eum vlla die pratermittunt.

Quod ille diutius paripendens, licet magnus & potens in regno esset (vix regis confabularum) ab ecclesia eliminatus, & fidelium consortio ad correptionem (vix iam cunctis detestabilis effectus) compulsum peruenire, tandem plurimum oburgatus & correptus a rege) reuersus est in se, & prece tandem nititur obtinere quod iniqua manu cunctatus non est. Illi vero hoc cognoscentes, illi annunt, demiserunt ei (quamuis ad suum incommodum) ita ut iureiurando postipsum vitam ab omni suorum inquietudine libera ad ecclesiam possessio rediret. Quod quidem factum est, & scripto Anglica sermone designatum. Testes rex Edwardus & regina, &c. Which man (after the death of king Edward the Confessor and Harold the usurper) was when the Normans entered England, as saith the said histozie In ergastulo plurimis alijs ferro astrictus usque ad mortem.

Gloucester.

Walter constable of England in the time of William the Conquerour, and of William Rufus succeeded Alfgarus. Here (before I saie anie more) I thinke it not amisse to set downe somewhat touching William Fitz Dierne, or Dbert earle of Hereford, whome manie will haue to be constable in the time of the Conquerour: which truelie I can not as yet be led to beleue. For although that this William was the onelie man, who both persuaded, incouraged, and procured aid of others to assist William Conquerour for the obtaining of England; and that this man was (as we commonlie saie) the onelie right hand, cheefe compeller, and disposer of the kingdome, after that William the Conquerour had obtained the same, being also Tribunus militum of all the armie that William Conquerour led into England, and the man that persuaded the bishop of Sambozow to compound for the title of the king of Denmarke made vnto England: yet I suppose him not to be constable, but onelie marshall of England; or at the least if he were, it could not be verie long. For that this earle was extreme old, departed the realme, and disposed all the affaires of the Norman bastard beyond the seas, and died about the yeare of our redemption 1072, being about the eight yeare of the reigne of William Conquerour.

Spilo of Hereford.

Spilo the sonne of the said Walter, an enimic to king Stephan (who yet confirmed him in his fathers inheritance) was advanced first to great honors by Henrie the first: who meeting Spawd the emperesse at Bisslow, and taking hir for lawfull queene, did continually follow hir faction: for which the, in the first yeare of king Stephan, to honour him for his good seruice (as appeareth by the charter thereof) gaue him the earldome of Hereford, constableship of England, the castell of Wironell, & the forest of Deane. He was lord also of Bechehenocke. He translated the chanons of the monastirie of Saint Iohnis of Lanthonie, in the yeare of our redemption 1103, being the fourth yeare of king Henrie the first, to a place nere Gloucester, then called Hyde, and since Lanthonie; as Iohn Stow hath well noted out of other authors.

10 He married Sibilla the daughter of Bernard de Wymarch, a nobleman of Normandie, who obtained by conquest the lordship of Bechehenocke: by whome he had issue five sonnes and three daughters. The sonnes were Roger; Walter, Henrie, William and Spahell. His three daughters were, Margaret, married to Humfrey Bohune; Bertha the second was married to Philip Buse, created by king Stephan lord of Buse; Colver, Bauld, & Wyntble, and in his wiues right lord of Bechehenocke; Lucia married to Herebert the sonne of Herebert, base sonne to Henrie the first, who was (in his right) lord of the forest of Deane: he died in the eight or (as others haue) the ninth yeare of king Stephan, being the yeare of our redemption 1143.

William (the sonne of Walter Beauchampe) thirthe of Worcester, was made high constable of England by king Stephan, in the first yeare of his reigne, being in the yeare of our redemption 1139, when the king was at Worcester: which honour he toke from Spiles of Gloucester; as saith that painefull antiquarie Iohn Stow in his chronicle printed in the yeare of our Lord 1580, fol. 197.

Roger the sonne of Spilo succeeded his father in all his inheritance, as well of the earldome, as otherwise: whereby he was in time following also constable of England, and (as it is most probable) restored to that office by Henrie the second; for that he was a great enimic to king Stephan. He went amongest others with Henrie Fitz Empressse to Dauid king of Scots, who knighted the said Henrie in the fourteenth yeare of king Stephan: he married Cicilie the daughter of Iohn Fitz Paine, and died without issue.

Walter second sonne to Spilo, after the death of his brother Roger was earle of Hereford, constable of England, and lord ouer Swenthie or Wenthe: he builded in the time of Henrie the first the castles of Gloucester, Bisslow, and Rochester, with the Tower of London: he held the land of Wenthe by long time, who hauing no heire of his bodie gaue the same land to Henrie of Hereford, and for taking the world toke monasticall habit on him at Lanthonie, where he was buried, dieng without issue.

Henrie of Hereford the sonne of Spilo, after the enterance of Walter his brother into religion, was earle of Hereford, constable of England, and lord of Bechehenocke and Deane, who was in Wenthe at a conflict slaine by his owne men, and buried at Lanthonie with Walter the constable: after whose death 60 Henrie the second deputed Iago ap Seisell to the custody of the land of Wenthe.

William the sonne of Spilo, and brother to Henrie of Hereford, was constable of England, after the death of his brother, and died without issue.

Spahell the youngest sonne of Spilo, after the death of William, was constable of England, who died without issue: whome I feare not to place as constable, since all histozies agree that all the sons of Spilo did successiuelie intoe that office, after whome the inheritance comming to their sister, whereof the eldest called Margaret (or Margerie) was married to Humfrey Bohune, which line of the Bohunes became afterwards constables of England by inheritance.

1521

Humfrie de Bohune, steward to Henrie the first, (the sonne of Humfrie de Bohune, steward in houle to William Rufus, sonne to Humfrie de Bohune that came in with the Conquerour) was (in the right of his wife Margerie one of the daughters and heire of the foresaid spile) constable of England; he had issue Humfrie de Bohune.

Humfrie de Bohune, constable of England, married Margaret sister to William king of Scots and daughter to the earle of Huntingdon, mother to Canon earle of Britaine: he had issue Henrie. This Margaret died the third of king John, being the yeare of Christ 1201. And this Humfrie also died in the time of king John, as some haue: or rather (as others haue) in the time of king Richard the first.

Henrie de Bohune, the sonne of the said Humfrie and Margaret, was the first earle of Hereford of that name of the Bohunes, contrarie to that received error, which hitherto hath made the other Bohunes earle of Hereford: and contrarie to the printed pedigree of the deceased father of the earle of Essex now living. For this man, being the first erle of the Bohunes, was made earle of Hereford in the first yeare of king John, as the charter doth witness. He was also constable of England, and married spawd, the daughter and heire of Cessie lord Ludgar (all sometime earle of Essex, in whose right his husband was intituled to that honoz of the earldome of Essex, by whome he had issue Humfrie his heire. He died about the fourth yeare of Henrie the third, being the yeare of our redemption 1220, in his iourne as he went to Jerusalem with other noble men.

Humfrie de Bohune sonne of Henrie, being the second of that name that was erle of Hereford, was also earle of Essex and constable of England, being by all men termed La bone counte de Hereford. He married spawd the daughter of the earle of Erie in Normandie, he had issue Humfrie de Bohune that was taken in the yeare of Christ 1265, being the fourth of king Henrie the third at the battell of Cuesham, and died in the life of his father, leaving behind him a sonne called Humfrie, heire to him and to his father, which Humfrie the father died in the yeare of our redemption 1275, being the third yeare of king Edward the first.

Humfrie de Bohune the third earle of Hereford of that name, the sonne of Humfrie Bohune slaine at the battell of Cuesham, was after the death of his grandfather erle of Hereford and Essex, and constable of England, he married spawd de Ferens, or Frenis, and had issue Humfrie, this earle died in the yeare of our redemption 1298, being the twentieth first of Edward the first, & was buried at Malden with his wife spawd.

Humfrie de Bohune the fourth erle of Hereford of that name, was earle of Hereford, Essex, and constable of England, he married Elizabeth the daughter to king Edward the first, and widow to John earle of Holland, he had issue John erle of Hereford, Humfrie earle of Hereford, and William earle of Northampton. This Humfrie taking part with Thomas earle of Lancaster was slaine at Worwilde by a Welshman standing under a bidge that thrust him thorough with a speare, in the fourteenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1321.

John de Bohune the eldest sonne of this Humfrie, being the first earle of Hereford, was after the death of his father earle of Hereford, Essex, and constable of England, he married the daughter of Edmund Fitz Alen earle of Arundell, and died without issue in the yeare of Christ 1335, being the ninth yeare of king Edward the third. He was buried in the abbeie of Stratford besides London.

Humfrie de Bohune first earle of Hereford, being brother to John de Bohune, whome he succeeded, was after the death of his brother earle of Hereford and Essex, and constable of England, he died without issue in the yeare of our Lord 1361, being the thirtieth first of king Edward the third, and was buried at the Augustine friers in London.

William de Bohune seventh erle of Hereford of that surname, being the sonne of the other Humfrie and brother to the last Humfrie, was at a parlement holden in the tenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, being in the yeare of our Lord 1336, created earle of Northampton, and after the death of his brother Humfrie, he was earle of Hereford and Essex, and constable of England. He was in the eighteenth yeare of Edward the third, being the pere of Christ 1344, sent into Britaine as generall ouer the English armie, to restore John de Montford to the dukedome of Britaine: which he did, putting Charles de Blois to flight. He married Elizabeth some saie Cleane, one of the daughters and heires of Bartholomew Bladenere baron of Bedes in Kent, by whome he had issue Humfrie.

Humfrie de Bohune, the eighth & last erle of Hereford of that surname of Bohune, was after the death of William his father earle of Hereford, Essex and Northampton, and constable of England. He augmented the castell of Brecknocke, first built by Bernard Preymarch. He in the eight and twentieth pere of Edward the third (as John Stow noteth) being the yeare of Christ 1354, reedified the frier Augustines church in London, in which he was buried. He married Ione the daughter of Richard Fitz Alen erle of Arundell, by whome he had issue two daughters and heires, Cleane, the eldest, married to Thomas of Woodstocke: and Marie the second, married to Henrie of Bolingbroke, after king of England, by the name of king Henrie the fourth.

Thomas of Woodstocke the first sonne to king Edward the third, was created earle of Buckingham, in the first yeare of Richard the second at his coronation, being the yeare of our Lord 1377, and after duke of Gloucester, in the eight yeare of Richard the second 1385. He married Cleane, eldest daughter of Humfrie Bohune (as before) in whose right he was earle of Essex, Northampton, and constable of England, besides which he was also lord of Brecknocke. He had issue one son & foure daughters: his sonne was Humfrie erle of Buckingham, whom R. Richard (after the murdering of his father at Calis) sent into Ireland, where he remained as prisoner untill the time of king Henrie the fourth; which called him home: who returning into England, died of the plague without issue at Chester: after whome his mother lived not long. Of whose death thus writeth that worthy poet Sir John Gower knight, living at that time, in his booke of the historie of Richard the second, and Henrie the fourth, commonlie taken as part of his worke intituled & named, For clamantibus.

Interea transit moriens nec in orbe remansit, Humfredus dictus reddit illo Deo benedictum, Defuncto nato cito post de sine beato, Mater transiit dum nati funera sumpsit, Primo decessit Cignus, dolor videri prepsit Matrem cum pullo sibi mors nec parire in vello.

The foure daughters, heires to Thomas of Woodstocke & their brother Humfrie, were Anne the eldest, married to Edmund Stafford erle Stafford, who had issue Humfrie erle of Stafford, Hereford, & Northampton, lord of Brecknocke, &c: which Anne after the death of erle Stafford, and the second time maried William viscount Southhampton created erle of Gloucester in France: the second daughter was Philip, lip, which died without issue: the third Zou, was married to Gilbert lord Talbot: the fourth Zabel, was a religious person at the Monies in London. The duke of Gloucester was murdered at Calis about the yeare of Christ 1398, being the 22 yeare of Richard the second, touching whose life and death, with the manner thereof, thus writeth the said sir John Gower, in the same booke intituled Vox clamantis:

O quam fortuna stabili non permanet una, Exemplum cuius fiat in ordine carminis huius, Rex agit, & Cygnus patitur de corde benignus, Ille prostratus non est de rege leuatus, Ad plebsse captus tunc est velut hostia raptus, Rex iubet arma geri, nec eo voluit misereri, Cum sponsa nati lugent quasi morte grauati, Pluribus huius rex dummodo semina fleuit, Nil peras munit quem tunc manus inuida punit, Rex sterit obliquus nec erat tunc vnus amicus, O regale genus, princeps quasi pauper egenus, Turpiter attractus iacet & sine iure subactus, Sunt ibi fautores regis de sorte priores, Qui Cygnum pendunt, ubi captum ducere tendunt, Sic ducendo ducem, perdit sine lumine lucem, Anglia quae tota tenebrefcit luce remota, Trans mare natauit, regnum qui semper amauit, Fleunt centum mille, quia Cygnus praeterit ille, Calisq; portus petit unde dolus later ortus, Error quem regis genuit putredine legis, Carcere conclusus subit fuit ille reclusus, Nescit quo sine sit vita sine ruina, Tunc rex elatum sumpsit quasi fulco volatum, Vnde suas gentes perdit custode carentes.

A little after which followeth these verses, touching the deniall of buriall to be granted vnto him among the rest of his honourable and roiall ancessors:

Sic nece deuictum, sic corpus ab hoste relictum, Clam de conlatu, susceperat Anglia nauis, Per mare regreditur, corpus nec adhuc sepelitur, Namq; sepulturam, defendit rex sibi puram, Desuper a latere, patris loca iusta revere, Dummodo quiescit, vix bassa sepulchra subiuit.

Of the manner also of whose death the said sir John Gower hath set downe these three following verses:

Huius quam rectorum quidam de sorte malorum, Sic duci electi plumarum pondere lecti, Corpus quassatum ingulantiq; necans ingulatum.

His wife Elenor died the third of October, in the yeare of our redemption 1399, being the first yeare of king Henrie the fourth, and was buried at Westminster on the south side of king Edward the third with this epitaph:

Icy gift Elenor de Bohune aysne fille & vn des heyres a honorable seigneur monseigneur Humphrey de Bohune, countie de Hereford, & de Essex, & de Northampton, & constable d'Anglitterre, fem-cester, que motust tierce iours de October lan du grace 1399, de que alme Dieux fait mercy.

Edward
Plantagenet.

Edward Plantagenet sonne to Edmund of Langley, was by Richard the second created earle of Arundell, and duke of Albemarle, who being constable of England arrived in the three and twentieth yeare of Richard the second, and in the yeare of our Lord 1399 in Ireland, to bring aid to the king being there in warre. Of this man is moze liberall discourse in my following treatise of the dukes of England.

Henrie Persie

Henrie Persie lord Persie, the first lord, and the first earle of Northumberland of that name, was advanced to that honourable title of earle at the coronation of king Richard the second, in the yeare of our redemption 1377. He was made high constable of England by Henrie the fourth, then elected but not crowned king of England, because the said earle did giue that ring to the king whereby he was wedded to the kingdome of England, to whom also the king gaue the Ile of man to beare the sword with which he entered the realme. He in the fourth yeare of king Henrie the fourth, being the yeare of Christ 1403, rebelled against the king: but after coming to the king vpon sending for, he was pardoned his life, but committed to safe custodie. After which, in the first yeare of that king, he was at a parlement holden at London restored to his estate and dignitie, who the yeare following, being the first of Henrie the fourth, and the yeare of Christ 1405, againe rebelled, and after fled into Scotland, to Dauid lord Fleming who receiued him, and in the seventh yeare of Henrie the fourth, being the yeare of our redemption 1506, as saith John Stow.

This Dauid persuaded the erle to flee into Wales, for which cause the Scots slue the said Dauid. After this, in the ninth yeare of Henrie the fourth, he came into England, raised the people, and was slaine at Bowneham nere to Haselewood, in a conflict had with him by Thomas Kockleie shiriffe of Northshire. He married two wiues, the first was Margaret daughter to Hase lord Penill, by whom he had issue Henrie Persie, surnamed Hotspurre (slaine at the battell of Shrewesburie in the fourth yeare of Henrie the fourth in his fathers life) Thomas and Hase. His second wife was Mauid, daughter to Thomas lord Lucie, and sister and heire to Anthoine lord Lucie baron of Cockermonth, being before the widow of Gilbert Humfreuill called the earle of Angus. His ladie Mauid gaue to hir husband the lordship and castell of Cockermonth, whereby the earles of Northumberland are bound still to beare the armes of Lucie.

John duke of Bedford the sonne and brother of kings (so) he calleth himselfe in the precept to summon Reginald lord Greie, & sir Edward Hastings knight, to determine the controuersie for bearing of the armes of Hastings earle of Denbroke in the marshalls court) was earle of Richmond and Bedford, and constable of England, being advanced to that office about the eight yeare of Henrie the fourth his father, being the yeare of our redemption 1406, of whom there is moze mention in the following discourse of the protectors of England.

Humfrie earle of Stafford, Hereford, and Northampton, lord of Breconke, Holdernes, and of Cambridge, and constable of England, and of Dover castell, in the eight yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of Christ 1430, went into France with Henrie the first to attend his coronation at Paris. He was created duke of Buckingham in the two and twentieth yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of Christ 1444. He was slaine at the battell of Northampton in the eight and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of our Lord 1460. He married Anne daughter to Hase Peul erle of Westmerland: he had amongst manie other of his children Humfrie his eldest sonne earle of Stafford, but (as hath John Stow) with an arrow in the right hand at the battell of saint Albons in the three and thirtieth yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of our Lord 1455, of which battell of saint Albons thus writeth John Whethamsted a learned abbat of that house:

Dum Maximus madidus flos saepuit inbriliq; arboris in collibus & Zephyrus resouerat flatus arboris Flora velut regnans herba ditauerat hortus Post glacies inopes herba fecerat & locupletat Et in peditis stillon praedonibus vndiq; regnum Repleuerat nimis, sic lateq; effuderat ossa Vnde villam tandem sapientis peruenit istam

John Tiptoth or Tiptost knight, the son of John lord Tiptost, and of Joice his wife, second daughter to Edmund Charlston lord Powes, was treasuroz of the realme in Michellmasse tearme in the tenth yere of Henrie the fourth, after which he was againe admitted to that office in the one and thirtieth and two and thirtieth yere of Henrie the first, from which place being once more remitted, he was the third time aduanced to the honoz of lord treasuroz of England in the second of Edward the fourth, and continued the same in the third of the said king. He was created earle of Worcester in the time of king Henrie the first. This man in the yere 1470, being the tenth of king Edward the fourth, took his part against the duke of Clarence, and Richard Penill earle of Marwike, at what time the said duke and earle being discomfited, fled to the sea side, and thence sailed to Southhampton, where they thought to haue had the Trinity a great ship of the earle of Marwikes; but the lord Seales the quenes brother fought with them, and inforced them to stie into France.

Whereupon king Edward the fourth came to Southhampton and caused Tiptost earle of Worcester to sit in iudgement vpon certeine gentlemen, as Clapham and others, taken at the same skirmish of Southhampton, where the earle caused the bodie of certeine condemned men, after that they were hanged to be thrust thorough the fundament by to the head with stakes, for the which crueltie he and others fell into indignation of the common people. Before which in the eight yere of king Edward, he was with John Dobleie made constable of the Tower, during their liues, and the longer liue of them two.

After this in the said yere 1470, being the tenth of Edward the fourth, in which Henrie the first readepted the crowne of England, which yere of Henrie the first is called in the law booke, the fourtie ninth yere of the reigne of R. Henrie the first. This earle of Worcester was taken in the top of an high tre in the forest of Weibridge in Huntingdonshire, brought to London, and at a parlement arrested and condemned to death, by sir John Here earle of Dorset. Whereupon he was beheaded at Tower hill, and buried in the blacke friers of London. He had thre wiues, whereof the first was called Cicilie the daughter of Richard earle of Salisburie: the second Elizabeth the daughter of Robert Greindoure: the third was Elizabeth, after married to sir William Stanleiz, which John had by his third wife Edward lord Tiptost who died without issue, so the inheritance went to the sisters of the said earle John Tiptost.

Lord Beaumont.

And here I thinke it not amisse to say somewhat of the lord Beaumont, who bring in our chronicles named constable of England (as may appeare in the five and twentieth yere of Henrie the first, in which yere he arrested Humfrie duke of Gloucester) that for any thing that I can yet see or learne, this Beaumont was not constable by patent during his life, but for the present time to execute the princes pleasure, and therefore not meet in this discourse to haue anie speciall place amongst such as were constables of England, either by descent or patent.

Sir Richard Woodville knight, earle Rivers, was Richard high constable of England in the fourth yere of king Edward the fourth, of whom is more large mention in the following discourse of the treasuroz of England in the historie of the reigne of quene Elizabeth.

George Plantagenet.

George Plantagenet, second sonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was created amongst other estates duke of Clarence, in the yere of our redemption 1461, being the first yere of king Edward the fourth immediately vpon his coronation, and was made constable of England in the time of Edward the fourth. He in the eight of Edward the fourth, about the yere of Christ 1468, married Isabell the eldest daughter of Richard Penill earle of Marwike and Salisburie, by whom he had issue Edward earle of Marwike and Salisburie, borne vpon the sea in the haven of Calis, who was in the time of Richard the third a continuall prisoner, and so having bene a prisoner, and thereto borne by a certeine satall destiny, was in the yere of our redemption 1485, being the first of king Henrie the seventh committed to custodie in the Tower, where he continued all the rest of his life, and was beheaded at Tower hill in the fiftenth yere of king Henrie the seventh, being the yere of Christ 1499, and was buried at Wilsam nere to his ancestors. Besides this Edward, this George duke of Clarence had issue a daughter called Margaret, created by king Henrie the eighth countesse of Salisburie, who married sir Richard Pole knight of the garter, descended of the ancient familie of the Poles in Wales.

Richard Plantagenet, the third sonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was aduanced to the title and honoz of the dukedome of Gloucester, in the yere of our redemption 1461, being the first yere of king Edward the fourth, some after his coronation. He was high constable of England: he married Anne second daughter to Richard Penill earle of Marwike and Salisburie. Which Richard after the death of his brother king Edward the fourth, did by the murder of his nephues ascend to the highest gouernement of England, and was crowned king by the name of Richard the third.

Richard Plantagenet.

Henrie Stafford, whome our chronicles doe in manie places corruptlie terme Edward, was sonne to Humfrie earle Stafford, and was high constable of England, and duke of Buckingham. This man raising warre against Richard the third usurping the crowne, was in the first yere of the reigne of the said Richard, being the yere of Christ 1483, betrayed by his man Humfrie Banasser (to whome being in distresse he fled for succour) and brought to Richard the third then lieng at Salisburie, where the safo duke confessing all the conspiracie, was behaded without arremnement or iudgement, vpon the second of Nouember, in the said yere of our redemption 1483, he married Katharine the daughter of Richard Moulle, sister to quene Elizabeth wife to Edward the fourth; & had issue, Edward duke of Buckingham, and Henrie earle of Wilshire, with two daughters, which were, Anne married to George lord Hastings of whom is descended the erle of Huntington now liuing, and Elizabeth married to Richard Katliffe lord Fitz Waters, of whome is issued sir Henrie Katcliffe knight, now earle of Souther.

Edward
Stafford.

Edward Stafford sonne to Henrie duke of Buckingham, being also duke of Buckingham after the death of his father was constable of England, earle of Hereford, Stafford, and Northampton, being in the first yere of Henrie the seventh, in the yere of our redemption 1485, restored to his fathers digni-ties and possessions. He is teamed in the booke of the law in the said thirteenth yere of Henrie the eight (where his arremnement is liberallie set downe) to be the soueraine & mirror of all courtelie. This man (as before is toucht) was by Henrie the seventh restored to his fathers inheritance, in recompense of the losse of his fathers life, taken awaie (as before is said) by the vsurping king Richard the third. He married Elianor the daughter of Henrie earle of Northumberland, and had issue Henrie lord Stafford (father to Henrie lord Stafford now liuing) and three daughters, Elizabeth married to Thomas Howard earle of Surrie, Katharine married to Rafe Penuill earle of Westmerland, and Marie married to George Penuill lord of Aburgauennie. And thus much by Francis Thim touching the succession of the constables of England.]

In this meane while, were the emperor and the French king fallen at variance, so that the warre was renewed betwixt them; for the pacifying wherof; the cardinall of Poike was sent ouer to Calis, where the ambassadours of both those princes were appointed to come to him. He arrived there the second of August. There went ouer with him the erle of Gloucestre, then lord chamberleine, the lord of St. Johns, the lord Ferrers, the lord Herbert, the bishop of Du-resine, the bishop of Elie, the pimat of Armacane, sir Thomas Bullen, sir John Beddie, sir John Wul-fie, sir Richard Wingfield, sir Henrie Gullford, and manie other knights, esquiers, gentlemen, doctors; and learned men. Thus honourable accompanied he rode thorough London the twentieth date of Julie, and at Thomas Becketts house the maior and aldermen toke leaue of him, praiering God to send him good speed. Thus passed he to Canturburie, where the archbishop of Canturburie and others receiued him in his stateliness, and brought him vnto his lodging vnder a canopie to the bishops palace. On the eighth date of Julie he came to Douer. On the twentieth he & the other lords with their retinues toke passage, and arrived at Calis in safetie, where the lord deputie and the counsell receiued them with much honour and lodged the cardinall in the Staple hall.

Cardinall
Woolle sent ouer to Calis.

Edw. Hall in
H. 8. fol. lxxxvj.

The emperor
& the French
king thrambassadours met at Calis, to treat of a peace.

Shortlie after his arriuall at Calis, thither came the chancelor of France, and the countie de Palice, with foure hundred horses, as ambassadours from the French king; and likewise from the emperor came great ambassadours, either partie being furnished with sufficient commissions to treat and conclude of peace as should appeare. But yet when it came to the point, as the one partie seemed conforinable to reasonable offers, so the other would not incline that waie; insomuch that they were neuer at one time agreable to anie indifferent motion that could be made. There were also the popes ambassadours, wherupon the cardinall would haue set the red a league betwixt the emperor, the king of England, the king of France, and the pope: but the popes ambassadours wanted commission thereto, and therefore were letters sent to Rome in all hast, and the Frenchmen taried still in Calis, till answer came from thence.

The cardinall rode into Flanders to speake with the emperor, which as then laie in Bruges. A mile without Bruges the emperor receiued him, and did to him as much honour as could be deuised. The chere was great which was made to the Englishmen, and of euerie thing there was such plentie, that there was no want of things necessarie, in somuch that of the fare, both for plentifulnesse, delicatnesse, and stateliness of seruice, a man might haue said:

De quocumque magnorum dixisset esse deorum.

The cardinall after he had taried in Bruges the space of thirtene daies, and concluded diuerse matters with the emperor, and accomplished his commission, he toke leaue of his maiestie, and by conuenient tomes returned to Calis, where the ambassadors of France taried his coming; and immediatlie after his returne to Calis, he treated with them of peace, but not so earnestlie as he did before. In fine, nothing was concluded, but onclie that sister-men of both the princes might stidie fith on the seas without disturbance, till the second of Februarie next. When no conclusion of agreement could be accorded, the cardinall sent to the emperor the lord of St. Johns, and sir Thomas Bullen knight, to aduer-tise his maiestie what had bene done, and likewise to the French king, as then lieng in campe with a mightie armie in the marches about Cambrie. The earle of Westmerland and the bishop of Elie were sent to informe him of all things that had bene motioned, exhorting him to incline to peace, but he gaue little care thereto: and then after they had bene a ninetene or twentie daies in his host they returned.
During the continuance of the cardinall in Calis, all writs and patents were there by him sealed, and no shiriffes chosen for lacke of his presence, hauing there with him the great seale, & full power in things, as if the king had bene there in person. Ambassa-dours coming from the king of Hungarie towards the king of England, were receiued honourable of the Cardinall during his abode in Calis.

After the returne of the English ambassadours, which the cardinall had sent to the emperor, and to the French king, he returned into England, hauing (as before is said) concluded a new league with the emperor, and signified by waie of intendment to the French king in the treatie with his ambassadours, that the king of England meant him not so much friendship as of late he had done, for diuerse causes.
But specialie this was bittered, that where it was concluded that the king of Scots should be included within the league (as before yee haue heard) contra-rie to that agreement, the said king refused to enter as a confederate into the same league: and this no doubt proceeded through counsell of the French king, by whom he was whole guided. This quarrell was laide as an occasion, whie to moue the king of England (perceiuing himselfe to be dissembled with) to withdraw his good will from the French king.

Who when he vnderstood the drifts of the cardinall, and conclusion of the new league confirmed betwixt the king of England and the emperor, he condemned the cardinall of vntruth, accused him of dissimulation, abhorred his practices, as by the which he lost the fruition of the king of England his friendship, and might no longer inioy it. And herewith he determined with himselfe neuer to put confidence in anie Englishman after, nor to bestow anie gifts or pensions vpon them. For he bled parrilie to send to divers of the kings counsell after the maner of his predecessors sundrie gifts and summes of monie; because he had imployed more on the cardinall than on the residue, he was the more offended toward him as the head of all this invidious doing. Yet he found not himselfe so much grieved, as to bitter anie bitter words towards the king: but contrarie with in a while after, directed his letters unto him, signifieng that he meant to continue the league as his friend: but it maie be he did this after a dissembling sort, because he would not be at warres with two so mightie princes at one time.

In this meane while, the warre was pursued between the emperor & the French king, as well on the confines towards Flanders, as beyond the mountains in the parties of Lombardie. Lornate was besieged by the lord Hugh de Boncada, a Spaniard, the which coming upon the sudden, took the manie abroad in the fields, yet they knew of his approach, and after this, coming before the citie, he intrenched it with a hedge, to keepe the citizens from stirring forth, and sent part of his armie with the light horsemen to for-lace the fracts and passages, that no succour should come to them within. The French king assembled an armie, in hope to aid them of Lornate with men, invittles, and vittels, the which armie assailed twice or thrice with all endevor, to have approached the citie: but in vaine, for with no small losse the French were repelled by the imperials, which nevertheless felt their part of slaughter, losing sundrie of their capitaines, as bassard Cuertre, and the capitaine of Sant. Finalle, the French armie brake up, & was dispersed into fortresses. Whereupon they of Lornate perceiving the succours which they hoped for, to faile them thus at need, rendered the citie to the emperor the last of Jan-nember, in this 13 yeare of king Henries reigne.

Pope Leo died this yeare suddenly, on the first of December, as he late at the village of Agalliana whither he went oftentimes for his recreation. He had heard the first reayport of the taking of Agillan, which stirred in him such an extream passion of joy, that the same night he entered into a small feaver: and for his better remedie he caused himselfe the next day to be remoured to Rome: where he died within a verie few daies after, notwithstanding the physicians in the beginning made no great reckoning of his disease. There was great suspicion that he was poisoned by Barnabie Palestina his chamberleine, whose office was alwaies to give him drinke. And yet though he was made prisoner through the suspicion of the fact & the vehement reasons of the same; yet the matter was dashed and the examination thereof: for that the cardinall de Medici as soon as he came to Rome, set him at libertie, fearing to fall further in disgrace of the French king, by whose practise it was supposed that Barnabie gave him the fatal drinke.
This was but whispered secretly, the author being no less doubtfull than the conjectures uncerteine.

He died (if we consider the common opinion: of men) in verie great glozie and felicitie, not so much for that by the surprisling of Agillan he saw himselfe delivered of dangers & expences intollerable, which having drained him of all store of monie and treasure, he was constrained to advance all meanes and maners for his supplie and relieving: but also that a verie few daies afore his death he received advertisement of the taking of Plaisance, and the verie day he died, newes came to him of the winning of Parma: a matter so greafully desired by him, that at such time as he debated to move warre against the Frenchmen, it is verie well remembred that he said unto the cardinall de Medici labouring to dissuade him, that as he was in nothing more caried to the desire of that warre, than to recover to the church those two cities; so when so ever God should blesse him with the effect of that desire, it would not grieve him to die. He was a prince in whom were manie things worthy to be commended & blamed, and in the estate & discourse of his life he deceived greatlie the expectation that was had of him, when he was created pope, for that in his government was great discretion, but farre lesse bountie than was looked for.]

After the death of the pope, doctor Richard Pace was sent to Rome, to make friends in the behalfe of the cardinall of Porke, who was brought into a baine hope thorough the kings favour and furtherance, to be elected pope. But Adrian the first of that name was chosen before doctor Pace could come to Rome; and so that lute was dashed. This Adrian bishop of Derghusa (after great contention in the college of cardinals touching the election of a new pope) was preferred to the custome of lotting of voices in the conclauie, without anie affection or parcialitie of voice: he was of nation a Fleming, & in his youth having bene scholemaster to Cesar, and by his meane made cardinall under pope Leo, did at that time gouverne Spaine in the absence of Cesar. And as there began some voices to publish for him, so cardinall Visto one of that election, began under an ozation speciall, to recount and amplifie his vertues and knowledge, by whose example certeine other carbinals yielded, and the residue from hand to hand followed, though more by constraint than counsell.

Thus was he chosen with the voices of all the cardinals, and had his creation perfected the same moning. Wherein this was to be wondered at, that euen those that had elected him could give no reason, why amid so manie troubles & dangers in the estate ecclesiastike, they had raised to the soueraigne see a stranger, a forrener, and of long absence out of the countrie, & wherein were helping no respects of fauor, no consideration of former merits, nor anie conuersation had with anie of the other cardinals: yet they scarcelie knew his name, he had neuer bene in Ita-lie, and had no hope nor cogitation to see it: of which strauagant maner of dealing, being not able to excuse themselves, they attributed all to the working of the Holie-ghost, who is wont (for so they alleged) to inspire the hearts of the cardinals in the electing of popes: he received newes of his election in the towne of Vitoria in Biskaye, and would not haue imposed upon him anie other name than his etone, which he caused to be published under Adrian the first.

Now he made his entrie into Rome the nine and twentieth of August, with a great concourse of the commons and the whole court: of whome albeit his coming was desired with an vniuersall gladnesse (for that without the presence forsooth of the popes, Rome beareth more a resemblance of a saunge de-fact than of a citie) yet that spectacle wrought sundrie impressions and diuersities of thoughts in the minds of all men, when they considered that they had a pope for nation and language a stranger, and for the affaires of Italie and the court altogether unexperienced: and also for that he was not of those regions and countries, who by long conuersation were alreadie made familiar with the customes of Italie.
The enuie that stirred by in men this consideration was redoubled by the accident of the plague, which beginning in Rome at his arrivall, afflicted the citie during the whole season of Autumne, to the great calamitie and losse of the people: a matter which in the fantasies of men was construed to an enill progno-stication of his pontificacie.]

Notwithstanding this election of Adrian (as you heare) accomplished; yet doctor Pace kept his tour-nie according to his commission. This Pace was a right worthy man, and one that gaue in counsell faithfull aduise. He learned he was also, and indued with many excellent good gifts of nature, courteous, pleasant, and delighting in musike, highlie in the kings fauour, and well heard in matters of weight. But the more the prince fauoured him, the more was he mistlike of the cardinall, who sought onelie to breake all the rule himselfe, and to haue no partener; so that he procured that this doctor Place vnder coloz of ambassage, should be sent forth of the realme, that his presence about the king should not win him too much authoritie and fauour at the kings hands.

Edw. Hall.
Doctor Tunstall made bishop of London.

1523

This yeare was a great death in London and other places of the realme. Many men of honour and great worship died, and amongst other, the bishop of London, doctor Fitz James, in whose place doctor Tunstall elected. The earle of Surrie returned out of Ireland, and came to the court the five and twentieth of Januarie. Many complaints were made by the merchants to the king and his counsell of the Frenchmen, which spoiled them by sea of their goods. For by reason that the wars were open betwixt the emperour, and the French king, many ships of warre were abroad on both parts, and now and then the Englishmen fell into their hands, and were used as enemies; namely by the Frenchmen, which naturally hated the Englishmen. The French kings ambassadours promised restitution of euery thing, but little was restored. In this month of Januarie therefore, the king commanded all his ships to be rigged, and made readie, which was done with all diligence.

Christopher Columbus.

On the second daie of Februarie, the king as then being at Greenwich, received a bull from the pope, whereby he was declared Defender of the Christian faith, & likewise his successors for ever. The cardinall of Poike sang the high masse that daie with all the pompous solemnitie that might be, and gaue cleane remission of sinnes to all that heard it. This title was ascribed vnto the king, because he had written a booke against Luther in Germanie; wherevnto the said Luther answered verie sharpelie, nothing sparing his authoritie nor maiestie. Of which booke published by the king, I will not (for reuerence of his raiallie) though I durst, report what I haue read: because we are to iudge honourable of our rulers, and to speake nothing but good of the princes of the people. Onelie this breife clause or fragment I will adde (least I might seeme to tell a tale of the man in the mone) that king Henrie in his said booke is reported to rage against the diuell and antichrist, to cast out his name against Luther, to rase out the name of the pope, and yet to allow his law, &c. I suppress the rest for shame, and returne to our historie.]

In this meane time, grudges and displeasures still grew and increased betwixt the king of England and the French king, so that their graces rankled daile more and more, till at length the duke of Albanie returned into Scotland, contrarie to that which was covenanted by the league. The French king in deed alleaged, that he was not primum to his going thither; and wrote to the king, that the said duke was entered Scotland without his assent: but it was otherwise iudged & knowne, that he had commission of the French king to go thither. Whereupon, the king was sore offended, and prepared for wars. Buffers were made of able men, and a note taken of what substance men were. The king also sent his ships to the sea, well trimmed, manned, and vittelled. The admerall was one Christopher Columbus, a perfect sea man. His commission was, to take garde the merchants, and other the kings subjects, that were greivously spoiled and robbed on the sea, by Frenchmen, Scots, and other rousers.

The eight of Februarie, the lord Dacres, warden of the marches foreaneinst Scotland, entered into Scotland with five hundred men, by the kings commandement, & there proclaimed, that the Scots should come in to the kings peace, by the first of March following, or else to stand at their perils; the duke of Albanie being then within five miles with a mightie power of Scots. The eleuenth of Februarie, the lord of Aburgauennie was brought from the Tower to Westminster, and there in the kings bench confessed his indictment of mispistion. The lord Pontefract was about the same time restored vnto the kings fauour. On the second of March, certaine noble men of the empire, arrived in England, to passe into Spaine, who were honourable received; and in honour of them, great iusts and triumphs were made, which being finished and done, they took their leave and departed on their iourne.

Duncan Campbell, a Scottish rouser, after long fight, was taken on the sea by John Arundell an equier of Cornewall, who presented him to the king. He was committed to the Tower, & there remained prisoner a long season. All the kings ships were put in a readinesse, so that by the beginning of April, they were rigged and trimmed readie to make saile. This yeare died the lord Brooke, sir Edward Poynings, knight of the garter, sir John Peche, and sir Edward Belknap, valiant captains, which were suspected to be poisoned at a banquet made at Ard, when the two kings met last. Wheat was sold this yeare in the citie of London, for twentie shillings a quarter, & in other places for twentie six shillings eight pence.

In this yeare Caluan Dowglas, bishop of Dunkell fled out of Scotland into England, because the duke of Albanie being come thither, had taken vpon him the whole gouernement of the king and realme there, the sequel of whose doings the bishop sore mistrusted. The king assigned vnto this bishop an honest pension to liue on. And shortly after, was Clarenceur the herald sent into Scotland, vnto the duke of Albanie, to command him to avoid that realme for diuerse considerations; & if he would not, then to desie him, with contrarie to the articles of the league concluded betwixt France & England, he was entered Scotland without his licence. The duke refused to accomplish the kings commandement, and was therefore desied by the said Clarenceur. The first of March, the French king commanded all English mens goods being in Burdeaur, to be attached, and put vnder arrest, and retained not onelie the monie due to be paid for the restitution of Coenaie, but also withheld the French quenes dowry.

The cardinall vnderstanding that he was enuill spoken of, for doing his power legantine to such advantage as he did, in selling graces & dispensations, he thought to bestow some part thereof amongst the people freelie, without taking any thing for the same. Whereupon, when Lent drew nere, he appointed the preachers at Pauls croffe, to declare, that it should be lawfull to all persons for that Lent, to eat milke, butter, cheese, & eggs. And to the end that none should haue any scrupulousness of conscience in so doing, he by his authoritie granted remission of sins to all those that did eat white meats: knowing as it were afore hand, that the people giuen to the obseruance of their religious fast, would not easilie be brought to breake the same, contrarie to the ancient custome used in their countrie. Neither was he deceived therein, for so farre were the people from receiuing or accounting this as a benefite, that they took it rather for a wicked & cursed deed in those that received it, & few or almost none could be indued to breake their old order and scrupulous trade in that behalf.

Perewith also, all the Frenchmen in London were arrested, committed to prison, and put to their fines: but they were more courteously used than the Englishmen were in France. For after they had bene in durance ten daies, they were set at libertie, upon finding suerties to appeare before the maior, or else before the councell at a certaine daie, and to paie the fine upon them assessed, which fine the king pardoned to diuerse of the poorest sort. But in comparison of the Scottish nation, you would haue said, the Frenchmen were in small displeasure: for not onely those that were bozne in Scotland, but also diuers northermen bozne, wthyn English ground, for enmious spite called Scots, were apprehended, imprisoned, and grieuouſly fined, although some of them by streit inquirie tried to be Englishmen, escaped without paying the fine.

The cardinall taking his tournie forward on the twentieth of Maie, rode through London, accompanied with two carles, six and thirtie knights, and an hundred gentlemen, eight bishops, ten abbats, thirtie chapleins, all in velvet and sattin, and peomen seven hundred. The marquesse Dorset was gone ouer before into Calis: and the five and twentieth of Maie being Sunday, the said marquesse, with the bishop of Chichester, the lord de la Mare, and diuerse other at the water of Graueling, receiued the emperour in the name of the king of England, and with all honour brought him to Calis, where he was receiued with procession, by the lord Bernes lieutenant of the towne, with the maior and merchants of the Staple, in the best manner that might be deuised.

On the mondaie he toke ship at Calis, and landed at Dover, where the cardinall with thre hundred lords, knights, and gentlemen of England was ready to receiue him, and with all honour that might be, brought him to the castell, where he was lodged. On wednesdaie, being the Ascension euen, the king

On friday being the first of June, the king and the emperor with all their companies, marched toward London, where the citie was prepared for their entrie, after the manner as is used at a coronation, so that nothing was forgotten that might set forth the citie. For the rich citizens well apparellled stood within railles set on the left side of the streets, and the cleargie on the right side in rich copes, which censured the princes as they passed, and all the streets were richlie hanged with clothes of gold, silver, velvet, and arras, and in euery house almost minstrelle; and in euery street were the se two verses written in letters of gold, both Latine and English:

Sundrie pageants were deuised, and stages verie faire and excellent to behold, with such melodie of instruments, and other tokens of ioy and gladnesse, that wouder it was to consider the manner thereof. The emperor was lodged at the Blache fries, and all his nobles in the new palace of Westwell. On Whitsundaie being the eight of June, the emperor and the king rode to the cathedrall church of saint Paule, and there heard masse, which was long by the cardinall that had his trauerse, and cupbord. Before masse, two barons gaue him water, and after the gospell two carles; and at the last lauatorie, two dukes: which pziue the Spaniards soze disdained. The emperor thus remained with the king certene daies and rode to diuerse places with him, being still feasted & banquetted, and had all the pleasure shewed to him that might be imagined. At Winclosz they taried a whole weeke and moze, where on Corpus Christi daie, the emperor wore his mantell of the garter, and sate in his owne hall. On the same daie both the princes receiued the sacrament, and after that scruiue was ended, they toke their corporall othes to keepe and obserue the league, which was concluded betwixt them. On the morow after, they departed from Winclosz, and by soft and easie iournies they came to Winchester, on the two & twentieth of June.

Polydor.

On the first of Iulie, the emperours nauie came before Hampton, containing an hundred and foure score goodlie ships. Then the emperor took leaue of the king, of whome he had manie great gifts, and notable summes of monie by waie of lone; & so the first of Iulie he took his ship, and made saile to Spaine, where he arrived in safetie the tenth daie after. The king bestowed of the citie of London twentie thousand pounds, and deliuered priuite seales for warrant of the repayment. None were charged but men of good wealth. The like lone was practised through all the realme, not without grudge of manie persons that were called vpon for the same. The earle of Surrie hauing waisted the emperor ouer to the coast of Biscaye, vpon his returne finding the wind fauourable, according to his instructions, made to the coast of Britaine, and landing with his people in number seven thousand, about fise miles from Hozleis, marched thither, and assaulting the towne, wan it.

For the maister gunner Christopher Pozreis hauing there certeine falcons, with the shot of one of them, stroke the Locke of the wicket in the gate, so that it flew open: and then the same Christopher and other gentlemen, with their souldiers, in the smoke of the gunnes pressed to the gates, and finding the wicket open, entered, and so finally was the towne of Hozleis wone, and put to sacke. The souldiers gained much by the pillage, for the towne was exceeding rich, and speciallie of linnen cloth. When they had rifled the towne thoroughlie, and taken their pleasure of all things therein, the earle caused them by sound of trumpet to resort to their standards, and after they had set fire in the towne, and burned a great part thereof, the earle retreated with his armie towards his ships, burning the villages by the waie, and all that night lay on land. On the morrow after they took their ships, and when they were bestowed on board, the earle commanded sixtene or seuentene ships small and great, lieng there in the hauen, to be burnt.

When the lord admerall had thus wone the towne of Hozleis, he called to him certeine esquires, and made them knights, as sir Francis Brian, sir Anthoine Botwone, sir Richard Cornwell, sir Thomas Dore, sir Giles Huseie, sir John Russell, sir John Keinsford, sir George Cobham, sir John Cornwallis, sir Edward Kigleie, and diuerse other. After this they continued a while on the coast of Britaine, and disquieted the Britains by entering their haucens, and sometimes landing and doing diuerse displeasures to the inhabitants about the coast. After that the earle had lien a while thus on the coast of Britaine, he was countermanded by the kings letters, who thereupon brought backe his whole fleet vnto a place called the Colw, vnder the Ile of Wight, and then went on land himselfe, discharging the more part of his people, and leauing the residue with certeine ships vnder the gouernance of the viceadmerall sir William Fitz Williams, to keepe the seas against the French.

In this meane while, diuerse exploits were achieved betwixt them of the garrisons in the marches of Calis, & the Frenchmen of Bullongne and Bullongnois: but still the losse ran for the most part on the French side. For the English frontiers were well and stronglie furnished with good numbers of men of warre, and gouerned by right sage and valiant capitaines, which dailie made inuasions vpon the French confines, and namelie sir William Sandes treasurer of the towne of Calis, and sir Edward Gilsford marshall, were two that did the Frenchmen most displeasure. On the third of Iulie, three hundred French horsemen comming nere to the castle of Gulsnes, kept themselves in covert, appointing eight or ten of their companie to shew themselves in sight to the Englishmen within. Whereupon there went forth eight archers, and fell in skirmish with those horsemen, till there came three other to the rescue of the Frenchmen, and skirmished with the archers on foot.

Herewith issued out of Gulsnes twelue demulances all Welshmen, in rescue of the footmen, and then all the troope of the French horsemen brake forth and set on the Welshmen. The footmen, so long as they had anie arrowes to bestow, shot lustilie, and in the end were obliged to defend themselves with their swords. The Welshmen keeping together, entered into the band of the Frenchmen, brake their speares, and after fought and laid about them with their swords, so that they made a waie, and escaped from those three hundred French horsemen. Of the French side were slaine three men and fise horses, the English archers on foot selling their liues dearlie, were all slaine, for the Frenchmen would not take anie of their prisoners, they were so angrie for losse of their fellows.

On the fise and twentieth of Iulie, the treasurer and marshall of Calis, with fourtene hundred footmen, entered the French pale: and finding not monsieur de Fioat for whome they sought, they went to Whitland baie, set the towne on fire, and assaulting the church, into which the people were withdrawne, wan it, and afterwards set fire on the steeple, because that diuerse, hauing shut vp themselves therein, through counsell of a priest that was with them, refused to yield, till the fire caused them to leape downe and so manie of them perished, and the rest were taken prisoners, and led to Calis. About two daies before this, to wit, the three and twentieth daie of Iulie, one Thwaites a capteine of an English ship, with sir scoze men, archers and others, took land beside Bullongne, and passing vp into the countrie three miles to a towne called Newcastell, forraied all the parts as he went, and in his returne set fire on that towne, and burnt a great part thereof, and came againe to his ship in safetie, notwithstanding fourscore bagbutters, and three hundred other men of warre of the countrie came forth, and pursued the Englishmen verie fiercelie: but the Englishmen putting them backe, got to their ship, and lost not a man.

Whereouer, whilst the warres were thus followed in France, the lord Rosse, and the lord Wacres of the north, which were appointed to keepe the borders against Scotland, burnt the towne of Kelsie, and fourscore villages, & ouerthrew eightene towers of stone, with all their barnekines. Also the king appointed the earle of Shrewesburie to be his lieutenant generall of the north parts, against the inuasion which was intended by the duke of Albanie, which earle directed his letters to all the shires lieng from Trent northward, that all men should be in a readinesse. Order was taken by the cardinall, that the true value of all mens substance might be knowen, and he would haue had euerie man sworne to haue uttered the true valuation of that they were worth, and required a tenth part thereof to be granted towards the kings charges now in his warres, in like case as the spiritualtie had granted a fourth part, and were content to liue on the other three parts.

The earle of Shrewesburie being belied by the Englishmen.

The lord Rosse and the lord Wacres of the north were appointed to keepe the borders against Scotland.

The earle of Shrewesburie returned with his armie to Calis.

The king granted a tenth part of the true valuation of the substance of all his subjects towards his warres.

This demand was thought gréuous to them of the citie of London, where the cardinall first moued it; so that manie reasons were alleaged by them why they indged themselves sore dealt with. In the end they brought in their billes, which were receiued vpon their honesties. The king in this meane time, being now entered into wars with France, thought not to suffer his enimies to rest in quiet: and therefore leauied an armie which he sent ouer to Calis, appointing the earle of Surrie to be generall of the same. When the earle was come to Calis, and had taken order in his businesse for that tourne, he set forward with his armie, being diuided into three battels or wards, of the which, the first was led by sir Robert Kataliffe, lord Fitz Water, the middle ward by battell the earle himselfe guided, and with him his brother the lord Edmund Howard. The reerward was gouerned by sir William Sands, and sir Richard Wingfield, both being knights of the garter. Capteine of the horsemen was sir Edward Gullford.

They entered into the French ground the second of September, being tuesdaie, and toke their iourne toward Hedding. By the way there came to them a great powder of Burgognians from the ladie Margaret, as then regent of Flanders, according to the articles of the league. All the townes, villages, and castels in the countrie thorough the which they marched, were burned, wasted, and destroyed on euerie side of their waie: as the towne and castell of Selhois, the townes of Wume bidge, Senekerke, Bostingham, & Panstier, the towne and castell of Perbins, the towne of Dauerne, the castels of Columberge, and Kew, the towne and church fortified of Boards, saint Marie de Bois, the towne of Maus, the towne and castell of Fringes. On the sixteenth daie of September, the earle of Surrie with his armie of Englishmen and Burgognians, came before the castell of Hedding, and planted his siege before it. The towne was entered, and part thereof burned by the Burgognians.

Within the castell was capteine monsieur de Biez, hauing provided for defense of the place all things necessarie; so that the earle of Surrie, and other capteins of the host, perceiving they could not within anie short time win it, after they had bin before it eleuen daies, they raised their siege, because they had no great battering peeces to ouerthrow the walles. For the weather was such, and the waies wored so deepe towards the latter end of that summer, that they could not conueie with them anie great ordnance. From Hedding they passed forward, and coming to Doelens, burned the towne, and raised the castell. From thence they came vnto the towne of Darrier, which they burnt also and spoiled. Thus they burned and spoiled all the waie as they passed. But the weather still wored worse and worse, so that manie fell sicke through intemperance thereof, and the Burgognians and Spaniards which were in the armie returned into Flanders.

Then the earle of Surrie, perceiving that he could no longer keepe the field in that season of the yeare, turned backe towards Calis in good order of battell, and came thither the sixteenth of October. He would gladlie in deed (before the departure of the Burgognians and Spaniards) haue passed the water of Somme: but other capteins considering the time of the yeare to be past, and that the whole armie contained not aboue eightene thousand men, iudged it more wisdome to returne, and so in the end their opinions were followed. After that the English armie was returned to Calis, the earle of Surrie sent forth sir William Sands, sir Maurice Berkeleye, sir William Fitz Williams, and with them three thousand men, which burned Margulson, the towne of saint Jehans robe, and also Temple towne, with manie villages.

They also brought a marvellous great bottle of gods out of the countrie, which they got at this rode, as fouretene thousand sheepe, a thousand four hundred open and kine, and other great cattell, a thousand three hundred hogs, and eight hundred mares and horses, besides prisoners. When the earle of Surrie had set things in order, and appointed forth such as he would haue remaine in the garrisons, on that side the sea; he returned, and all the residue of the armie (sauing those that were commanded to tarie) came ouer also with the nauie, and arrived in the Thames; and so euerie man into his countrie at his pleasure. There remained also behind a companie of men of warre called aduenturers, which serued without wages, liuing onelie on that which they could catch & win of the enimies. There were foure hundred of them that went with the armie now this last time into France, and did much hurt vnto the Frenchmen: for they were by practise become expert and skillfull in the points of warre, and daile exploited one enterprise or other, to their owne aduantage, and hinderance of the enimie.

The duke of Albanie being in this meane while established gouernour of Scotland, raised an armie of fourescore thousand men and aboue, with the which he approached to the English borders: but made no inuasion. The mistrust that he had in the Scots caused him to staie, and therefore he sent to the French king for six thousand Almans, the which he daile looking for (as that in vaine) broue off time till the end of summer was now at hand, and then requiring a truce for certeine moneths, obtained it at the kings hand. The earle of Shrewesburie had in a readinesse eight and twentie thousand men to haue resisted him, if he had entered vpon the English confines. After that an abstinence of warre was taken betwixt England and Scotland, then in October following there came into England three personages of small behauiour (as it seemed) ambassadoers out of Scotland: they were smallie regarded, and shortly departed.

Their commission was onelie to vnderstand, whether the king had assented to the truce or not. Where vpon it was thought that they were sent rather for a countenance onelie of fulfilling the promise made by the duke of Albanie at that present, when the truce was granted, than for anie true meaning to accomplish that which was promised; that is to saie, to agree vnto some vnfeined and perfect conclusion of peace. The king here vpon doubting their old pranks, ordeined the earle of Northumberland and Henrie Persie the first of that name, wardens of the whole marches, who thankefullie receiued the honoz thereof, and so he departed. But whatsoeuer matter it was that moued him, shortly after he began to make sute to the king, and ceased not, till he was of that office discharged: and then the earle of Surrie lord admirall of England was made generall warden, and the lord Marqueste Dorset was made warden of the east and middle marches, and the lord Dacres of the west marches.

The earle of Northumberland was for this refusall of exercising the office of lord warden, greatlie blamed of his owne tenants, and accounted of all men to be bold of the loue and desire that noblemen ought to haue to honoz and chualrie. The lord Marqueste Dorset accompanied with sir William Bulmer, and sir Arthur Darcie, with manie other of the nobilitie, the second of Aprill then being thursdaie before Easter, entered into Cumbdale, and so passing forward ten miles into Gallowaie, burnt on euerie side the townes and villages. A parlement holden at the Blackefriers in London. Edw. Hall. in H. 8. fol. Cvj.

On the fifteenth daie of Aprill began the parlement, which was holden as then at the Blackefriers, and that daie the masse of the Holie-ghost was song, all the lords being present in their parlement robes. ¶ Now when masse was finished, the k. came to the parlement chamber, and there sat downe in the seat roiall of thron, and at his feet on the right side sat the cardinall of Yorke and the archbishop of Canturburie, and at the raile behind stood doctor Tunstall bishop of London, which made to the whole parlement an eloquent oration, declaring to the people the office of a king. First he must be a man of iudgement, according to the saying of the prophet Dauid, Domus iudicium tuum regi da, &c. Also he must be a man of great learning, according to the saying of the prophet, Erudimini qui indicatis terram. According to which sayings he said, that God had sent vs a prince of great iudgement, of great learning, and great experience: which according to his princelie dutie, forgot not to studie to set forward all things which might be profitable to his people and realme, least might be laid to his charge the saying of Seneca; Es rex & non habes tempus esse rex? Art thou a king and hast no time to be a king? Which is as much to saie, as; Art thou a king, and doest nothing profitable to thy people? Art thou a king, and seest the people haue an insufficient law? Art thou a king, and wilt not provide remedie for the mischance of thy people?

The oration of doctor Tunstall bishop of London.

These things haue moued the kings most excellent maiestie to call this his high court of parlement, both for the remedie of mischances which be in the common law, as recoueries, foren vouchers & corrupt trials, and for making and ordering of new statutes, which mite be to the high advancement of the common-wealth. Wherefore he willeth his commons to repaire to the common house, and there to elect them a speaker, or their common mouth, and to certifie the lord chancelor of the same, who should thereof make report to the kings most noble grace, and should declare his pleasure when he would haue him presented to his person. This was the cause of the parlement, as he said. But suerlie of these things no word was spoken in the whole parlement, and in effect no good at made, except the grant of a great subsidie were one. But according to this instruction the commons departed to the common house, & chose for their speaker sir Thomas More knight, & presented him on the saturday after in the parlement chamber, where he (according to the old vsage) disabled himselfe both in wit, learning, & discretion, to speake before the king, and brought in for his purpose how one Rhomio desired Haniball to come to his reading, which thereto assented, and when Haniball was come he began to read De remilitari, that is, of cheualrie. When Haniball perceived him, he called him arrogant sole: because he would presume to teach him which was maister of cheualrie, in the seats of warre. So the speaker said, if he should speake before the king, of learning and ordering of a common-wealth and such other like, the king so well learned and of such prudence and experience might saie to him as Haniball said to Rhomio. Wherefore he desired his grace that the commons might chose an other speaker.

The oration of sir Thomas More speaker for commons.

The cardinall answered, that the king knew his wit, learning, and discretion by long experience in his seruice: wherefore he thought that the commons had chosen him as the most meetest of all; and so he did admit him. Then sir Thomas More gaue to the king his most humble thanks, and desired of him two petitions: the one, if he should be sent from the commons to the king on message and mislike their intent, that he might with the kings pleasure resort againe vnto the commons for the knowledge of their true meaning. The other was, if in communication and reasoning, any man in the common house should speake more largelie than of dutie he ought to doe, that all such offenses should be pardoned, and that to be entered of record. Which two petitions were granted; and so thus began the parlement and continued as you shall heare.]

This yere was the citie and the whole Ile of the Rhodes conquered by the Turke, and all the christians displaced: whereof Guicciardin hath discoursed as followeth. ¶ The end of this yere (saith he) was made no lesse wretched and unhappie, than dangerous to all christian princes for the losse of the Ile of Rhodes: which Soliman Ottoman toke by violence, notwithstanding it was defended by the knights of Rhodes, called in other times more ancient the knights of saint John of Jerusalem. And abiding in that place since they were chased out of Jerusalem, notwithstanding they late betwixen two so mightie princes as the Turke & the Soldan; yet their valour had preserved it of long time, and to the right worthie glorie of their order, they had remained as an assured rampie christian religion in those seas: & yet they were not without their impatations & notes of infamie, for that hauing a continuall custome for the better defending of those shores, to spoile the vessels of the infidels, they were thought sometimes to make pillage of christian ships.

The Turke sent into the Island a wonderfull great armie, which remaining there manie moneths with no lesse horrour to good men for their cruelties, than terror to all men for their huge numbers, at last he came thither in person. And desiring to his desire of conquest and glorie, the respect of profit and riches which the victorie would yeld, he lost not one minute of time to ber them. Wherein his industrie was nothing inferior to his valour, for sometimes he cast monstrous mines and trenches, sometimes he raised platformes of earth and wood, whose height overtopped the wals of the towne, and sometimes he afflicted them with most furious and bloudie assaults: inso much that as these works and engines were not performed without a wonderfull butcherie & slaughter of his souldiours; so also the defense of them was so dangerous to the liues of them within, that manie numbers were diminished, manie bodies maimed and made vneruicible, & the residue soze terrified by the calamitie of their companions and friends, to whom they could giue no other propertie of compassion, than to mourne with them in their common miserie.

Their aduersitie was so much the more intolerable, by how much their travels were without fruit, their words without comfort, and their valour disfauoured of fortune, & lastlie their store of gunpowder was consumed, which is not the least necessitie for the defense of a place. They saw before their eyes huge breaches made into their walles with the artilleries of their enemies, they discerned severall mines wrought into manie parts of the towne, and they found by lamentable experience, that the lesse god they did, the more painfullie they laboured, for that their fortune had reduced them to these termes of extremitie, that in abandoning one place to relieue another, they put both in danger, not hauing numbers sufficient to furnish the seruice, and lesse expectation expectation of rescue amid perils so raging and desperate: so that, what for that their necessities were greater than their hopes, & their sense lesse able by the continuall diminution of their numbers, & lastly holding it no breach of honour to preserve by wisdom and composition, that they could no longer defend by their valour and prowes, they gave place to their destinie, and capitulated with the Turke as followeth. That the great maister of their order should leave the towne to him: that as well he as all his knights should depart in safetie, with libertie to carie with them as much of their goods as they could. And for assurance of this capitulation, the Turke should withdraw out of those seas, his fleet or naute, and retire his armie by land five miles from Rhodes. By vertue of which capitulation Rhodes remained to the Turkes, and the christians passed into Sicilie, and so into Italie, keeping their faith and profession unviolated. They found in Sicilie an armie by sea compounded of a certeine number of vessels, with great relace of vittells and munitions, and readie to hoise saile at the next wind to revivitt Rhodes. The shewment of this rescue was laid to the popes fault.

After they were departed, Soliman for a more contempt of christian religion, made his entrie into the citie upon the daie of the birth of the sonne of God: which daie being celebrated in the churches of christians with noise of musike & holie innocations, he converted all the churches of Rhodes dedicated to the service of Iesus Christ, into Mosques (so they call their temples) which after all the christian rites and ceremonies were abolished, they made dedicatorie to Mahomet. God cause had the christians hereupon with heavie hearts to make their complaint to God by the president of the psalmist, lamenting the libertie of the enemies exercising the vehemencie of his rage against Gods people: & full well with swolne ries testifying the sorrow of their soules might (saying he sounding the dumps of their threnomina) saie:

perde funditus Hosles proternos, qui tuum sacrum Mantusanda polluant, Clangunt sonora buccina, non que tuas Laudes canat, ludibrio sed fusa acerbo qua profanet: in tuis Pecillis figunt turribus, &c.

To understand more of this historie touching the taking of Rhodes, what moved the Turke to couet the same, his letter comminatorie to Philip de Villiers who took part against him, with other accidents and circumstances belonging to this martiall action; read the report of Edward Hall, which is verie copious and plentifull in this behalfe. And now will we returne to our owne affaires here in England. About this time the bishop of Durham departed this life, & the king gave that bishopricke to the cardinall, who resigned the bishopricke of Bath to doctor John Clerke maister of the rolles, and sir Henrie Parre that was vicechamberleine, was made lord privie seale, and shortly after was created lord Parre. In the end of this yeare, doctor Blith bishop of Chester was attached for treason, but he acquitted himselfe. About this time the cardinall exercised his authoritie (which he pretended by his power legatine) verie largelie, not onelie in prouing of testaments in his court, calling the executors and administrators before him, of what diocesse soever they were, but also by prouisions he gave all benefices belonging to spirituall persons, and ran thereby with in danger of the pzeunice, as after ward was laid to his charge.

But after that he perceived his owne follie and rash doing herein, contrarie to the lawes, which would not permit that anie such things as were moued within the prouince of Canturburie, might be concluded without the authoritie of the archbishop, he sent them againe to Boules, and saie himselfe at Westminster with his cleargie of the prouince of Yorke. And euen as there was much adw amongst them of the common house about their agreement to the subsidie, so was there as hard hold for a while amongst them of the clergie in the conuocation house. Paule Richard bishop of Winchester, & John bishop of Rochester held soze against it, but most of all sir Roland Philips vicar of Croidon, and one of the canons of Boules, being reputed a notable preacher in those daies, spake most against that payment.

But the cardinall taking him aside, so handled the matter with him, that he came no more into the house, willinglie absenting himselfe to his great infamie, and losse of that estimation which men had of his innocencie. Thus the belwedder giuing ouer his hold, the other yielded, and so was granted the halfe of all their spirituall revenues for one yeare, to be paid in five yerres following, that the burthen might the more easilie be borne. The parlement being begun (as ye have heard) the cardinall on the nine and twentieth day of Aprill came into the common house, and there shewing the great charges that the king necessarilie was at, and daile must be at in maintenance of his warres against the frenche and Scots, demanded the summes of eight hundred thousand pounds to bee raised of the first part of euerie mans goods and lands, that is to wit, foure shillings of euerie pound.

This demand was enforced on the morrow after, by sir Thomas More then speaker of the parlement: but he spake not so much in perswading the house to grant it, but other spake as earnestlie against it, so that the matter was argued to and fro, and handled to the bittermost. There were that proued how it was not possible to haue it leuied in morie, for men of lands and great substance had not the first part of the same in coine. And sith the king by the loanes had received two shillings of the pound, which by this rate amounted to 400000 pounds: and now to haue foure shillings of the pound, it would amount in the whole unto twelue hundred thousand pounds, which is first and last six shillings of the pound, being almost a third part of euerie mans goods, which in coine might not be had within this realme.

For the profe thereof was alleged, that if there were in England but twentie thousand parishes, and euerie parish should giue an hundred markes, that were but fiftene hundred thousand markes, which is but an hundred thousand pounds; and there be not verie manie parishes in England one with another, able to spare an hundred markes, out of cities and townes. And where it is written, that in England there be fortie thousand parish churches, it was proued that there were not thirtene thousand at this daie. Hard hold there was about this demand, and certeine wise and discret persons were sent to the cardinall, to moue him to be a meane to the king, that a lesse summe might be accepted: but he answered that he would rather haue his tong plucked out of his head with a paire of pinners, than to moue the king to take anie lesse summe: and so with that answer they departed, reporting to the house the cardinals words. Then euerie daie was reasoning, but nothing concluded.

Whereupon the cardinall came againe into the lower house, and desired that he might reason with them that were against the demand: but he was answered that the order of that house was to heare, and not to reason, except amongst themselves. Where he began to shew arguments of the great wealth of the realme, so that it might be thought, that he repined and disdaind that anie man should be wealthie but himselfe. After he was gone, the commons debated the matter according to their former maner, and so in the end concluded of two shillings in the pound, from twentie pounds upward, and from forty shillings to twentie pounds, of euerie twentie shillings twelue pence, and vnder forty shillings of euerie head of sixtene peeres and vnder four pence to be paid in two yeares. When this was notified to the cardinall, he was much therewith offended, so that to please him, at length, the gentlemen of fiftie pounds land and vnder, by the liberrall motion of sir John Huseie, a knight of Lincolnshire, were burdened with twelue pence more of the pound of the same lands, to be paid in three yeares.

Sir John Huseie.

The cardinall to moue them thereto, bare them in hand that the lords had agreed to foure shillings of the pound, which was untrue: for they had granted nothing, but staid till they might vnderstand what the commons would do. The king therefore hauing knowledge of this, and such other notable lies uttered by the cardinall, repproved him therefore verie sharpelie, and said that yer it were long he would looke to things himselfe without anie substitute. A marvellous matter to consider how much the cardinall was coled herewith, and how lowlie for a while he bare himselfe, so that thereby it well appeared how the maiestie sharpenesse now and then, doth much to restrain the euill nature of the seruant. But the cardinall within a few daies after, pacifying the kings displeasure toward him, became nothing the better.

Cardinall Wolsey repproved by the king.

After that the foresaid grant was passed and accorded, the parlement was prorogued till the tenth of June. During which prorogation, the common people said to the burgeses; Sirs, we heare say you will grant foure shillings of the pound, we aduise you to do so that you may go home: with manie euill words and threatenings. In this season the cardinall by his potuer legantine dissolued the cōsecration at Pouls called by the archbishop of Cantuarburie, calling him and all the cleergie to his conuocation at Westmister, which was neuer sene before in England (saith Hall) whereof maister Skelton a merrie poet wrote:

Edw. Hall in H. 8. fol. Cx.

The cardinall dissolued the archbishop of Cantuarburie's consecration.

Gentle Paule lay downe thy sword,

For Peter of Westminster hath shauen thy beard.

When the parlement was begun againe, the gentlemen that saw themselves charged with twelue pence more of the pound for their lands, did so much, that it was granted, that men of fiftie pounds and vnder in goods, should also pay twelue pence of euerie pound in the fourth yeare: which could not be brought about but with great adu, and much grudging of the burgeses and commons. The one and thirtieth of Iulie, the parlement was adourned: Westmister, & there continuing till the thirteenth of August, was that day at nine of the clock at night dissolued. During the time of this parlement, the seven and twentieth of Appill, was sir Arthur Plagenet, bassard sonne to king Edward the fourth, at Wyndesore created vicount Lisle, in right of his wife, which was wife to Edmund Dupleie beheaded.

Arthur Plagenet created vicount Lisle.

In this yeare the fiftieth of June, Christerne king of Denmarke, with his wife, and a small traine with them, landed at Douer, where he was noblely receiued by the earle of Devonshire, the bishops of Exeter and Rochester, and diuerse knights and esquieres which brought them to Crēnwich, where the king and queene receiued them with all honor. Now after he had remained at the court certeine daies, he was brought to London, & lodged at Bath place.

Essex, and Kent, and diuerse other lords and ladies. The citie made to him and to his wife a coslie banquet that night, and after he had passed the time a while in London, he resorted againe to the king, and had of him great gifts, and so likewise had his wife of the queene hir aunt, & then taking their leave they departed, and were conueied to Douer. And thus after this king had bene in England two and twentie daies, he tooke shipping, and sailed againe into Flanders, where he remained as a banished man out of his owne countrie.

About the same time, the earle of Gloucere being restored to the cardinals fauour, and taking to wife the ladie Elizabeth Graie, was sent ouer againe into Ireland to occupie his former office, where by the assistance of his faithfull friend Hugh Hynde archbishop of Dublin, and chancellour of that land, he brought the countrie into reasonable good order, so far as the rebellious doings of the wild Irish would permit. In this meane while, the warre was earnestly pursued betwene England & France, & England and Scotland, insomuch that each part did what in them lay to hurt other. On the borders toward Scotland lay the earle of Surrie high admerall of England, and the marques Dorset, with his brethren, sir William Compton, & sir William Kingston, with diuerse other knights and esquieres sent to them by the king, which dailely invaded the realme of Scotland, and threw downe the castell of Wetherbone, the castell of West Melgate, the castell of Blackater, the tower of Spackwallles, the tower of east Melgate, & manie other, and burnt to the number of thirtie and seven villages, and haried the countrie from the east marches to the west, and neuer had skirmish.

For the Scots, albeit they shewed themselves in plumps, waiting some aduantage, they durst not yet approach to the maine battell of the Englishmen, so that in all this iournie there were but few Englishmen lost. When the lords perceiued that the Scots ment not to make anie inuasion into England this yeare, they tooke order for the fortifying of the frontiers, & so returned. It was thought that the cardinall perceiuing in what fauour sir William Compton was with the king, and doubting lest the same might diminish his authoritie, desired to send him thus into the warres against the Scots. For the said sir William could not well brooke the cardinals presumption, in taking vpon him so highlie, to the derogation of the kings supreme gouernement, and therefore the cardinall in his absence thought to worke him out of fauour: but it would not be. For shortly after was sir William Compton called home to the court againe.

The Frenchmen burned a ship fraught with stone in the haven of Calis, vpon hope to haue destroyed the haven; but they missed the chanell in bringing in the ship, and so after that the ship was consumed with fire, the stones were recovered out of the water, and brought into Calis, which serued the Englishmen to good vse. Diuerse enterprises were atchieued betwixt them of the garrisons French and English in those marches. In Iulie the lord Sands treasuroer of Calis, with other capteins & souldiours, to the number of twelue hundred, entered into the confines of their enemies, and came before Bulongne, where they had a great skirmish, & put their enemies to the waxe: and after marching into the countrie, tooke diuerse churches and other places which the Frenchmen had fortified, as the church of Wderfall, the steeple of Wdingham, and the castell of Hardingham, and so after they had bene within the enemies countrie almost two nights and two daies, they came backe to Calis, hauing not lost past a dozen of their men.

The whole armie (as appeared by the musters taken thereof) consisted in six hundred demilances, two hundred archers on horsebacke, three thousand archers on foot, and five thousand bill men. To these also were adioined senentene hundred, which were taken out of the gentlemen and crewes of Hammes, Guines, & Calis, so that in all they were ten thousand and five hundred, well armed and appointed for the warre. Beside them, there were also two thousand six hundred labourers and pioneers. When this armie was come over to Calis, and all things readie for the iournie, they issued out of Calis

which had as good will to be still as broad, as the Welshmen had desire to returne home. For these Brekers by spoiling of townes, taking of prisoners, & other such practises of warlike exploits, made their haunts, and dailie brought to the campe, horses, mares, bittels, cloth, come, and other necessaries, which might not have bene missed.

After great raines and winds which had chanced in that season, there followed a sore frost, which was so extreme, that manie died for cold, and some lost fingers, some lost toes, and manie lost nailes between their fingers, so extreme was the rigour of that frost. The thirteenth daie of November the duke removed to a place within two miles of Bogan castle, and still it froze. The Welshmen in the morning set out a shout, and cried; Home, home. The Brekers hearing that, cried; Hang, hang. Whereof businesse was like to have ensued, but by policie it was ceased. Sir Edward Guilford capitaine of the horsemen viewing the castell of Bogan, perceived that the marshes (wherewith it was inclosed) were so hard frozen, that great ordinance might passe over the same. Which he signified to the duke, & therewith the duke was contented that he should trie what successe would come of giving the attempt to win it. So was the ordinance brought over the marshy ground, whereof they within being advertised, immediatlie after three shots of canon discharged against them, they yielded the castell, and all the artillerie within it, of the which there was good store, as three score & thirtie peeces great and small. The keeping of this castell was delivered to the seneſcall of Henegob.

In this meane while the lord Sands was come to the court, and informed the king of the state of the armie. The king had before his coming heard that his people in the said armie were in great miserie, both by reason of the intemperat weather, & unseasonable time of the yeare, the lacke of bittels, & such other discommodities: wherefore he caused a new power of six thousand men to be prepared and sent unto the duke of Suffolke for a reliefe, under the leading of the lord Pontiole. But per this power could be put in order to passe the sea, and before the duke could have knowledge againe from the king of his further pleasure, he was constrained to breake up his armie, and returned by Valencennes, and so through flanders unto Calis. He left at Valencennes all the great artillerie. The king was somewhat displeased with the breaking up of the armie thus contrarie to his mind, but hearing the reasonable excuses which the duke & the captains had to alleage, he was shortly after pacified. And so after they had remained in Calis a certeine time, untill their friends had asswaged the kings displeasure, they returned, and all things were well taken, and they received into as much favour as before.

But now to returne to the doings in other parts, as betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, which chanced in this meane while that the duke of Suffolke was thus in France. We shall understand, that the Scots hearing that the warre was thus turned into France, thought that nothing should be attempted against them, and therefore waxed more bold, and began to rob and spoile on the marches of England. Wherefore the king sent againe thither the earle of Surrie treasurer, and high admerall of England, the which with all speed comming to the west borders, sent for an armie of six thousand men, with the which entering Scotland by the drie marshes, he overthrew certeine castles, piles, and small holds, till he came through the dales to Jedworth, wherein laie a great garrison of Scots, which skirmished with the Englishmen in right charpelle at their first comming, but yet at length the towne, abbeie, and castell were wone, spoiled, and burned.

After this the earle incamped within the Scottish ground from the two and twentieth of September till the five and twentieth of the same moneth, & then returned backe againe into England. During which time the lord Dacres won the castell of Fernibers. The French king perceiving that the Scots did not worke anie notable trouble to the Englishmen to keepe them from the invading of France (the cause was (as he took it) for that they lacked the duke of Albanie, whome they named their gouvernour) he therefore provided a naue of ships to have transported him over into Scotland; so that all things were redie for his iournie. But the Englishmen were redie on the sea under the conduct of sir William Fitz Williams to stop his passage if he had let forward; wherefore he caused his ships to be brought into West haven, and byted it abroad, that he would not go into Scotland that yeare.

The king of England being certified that the duke meant not to depart out of France of all that yeare, about the middes of September, commanded that his ships should be laid up in hauens till the next spring. The duke of Albanie being thereof advertised, boldie then took his ships, and sailed into Scotland with all convenient speed, as in the Scottish historie ye maie read more at large. Shortly after his arrivall there, he wrought so with the Scots, that an armie was leaved, with the which he approached to the borders of England, & lodged at Calwedstreame, readie to enter into England. The king of England having advertisement given to him from time to time of the proceedings of his aduerſaries, with all diligence caused to be assembled the people of the north parts beyond Trent, in such numbers that there were three thousand gentlemen bearing coats of armes with their powers and strength, which were all commanded to repaire to the erle of Surrie with speed. The noble marquesse Dorset was appointed with six thousand men to keepe Berwik, least the Scots should laie siege thereto.

The duke of Albanie hearing of the preparation which the earle of Surrie made against him, sent to him an herald, promising him of his honour to give him battell; and if he took him prisoner, he would put him to courteous ransom, & his bodie to be safe. To whome the earle answered, that much he thanked the duke of his offer, promising him to abide battell if he durst give it; & that if the said duke chanced to be taken by him or his, he would strike off his head, and send it for a present to his maister the king of England, and bade him that he should trust to none other. At this answer the duke and the Scots took great despite. The earle of Surrie being at Alnewicke, there came to him the earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, the lords Clifford, Dacres, Lumleie, Dgle, & Darcie, with manie knights, esquires, gentlemen, and other souldiers and men of warre, to the number of fortie thousand: And from the court there came the maister of the horse, sir Nicholas Carew, sir Francis Brian, sir Edward Bainton, and others.

The last of October being saturday, in the night before the same daie, the duke of Albanie sent two or three thousand men over the water to besiege the castell of Marke, which comming thither with their great ordinance, beat the castell verie sore, and won the uttermost ward called the Barnekins. On sundae and mondae being the first and second of November, they continued their batterie, and then thinking that the place was assaultable, courageously set on the castell, and by strength entered the second ward. Sir William Lisle that was capitaine of this castell, perceiving the enimies to have wone the false bazies, and that nothing remained but onlie the inner ward or dungeon, incouraged his men to the best of his power, with words of great comfort and manhood, and therewith issued forth with those few that he had left about him (for he had lost manie at other assaults) and what with courageous shewing, and manfull fighting, the enemies were driven out of the place, and of them were slaine, and named lie of those Frenchmen which the duke had brought forth of France, to the number of three hundred, which laie there dead in fight when the earle of Surrie came thither, besides such as died of wounds, and were drowned.

When the Scots and Frenchmen removed their ordinance over the water in all hast, and by that time that they were got over, the earle of Surrie was come with five thousand horsemen, and all his great armie followed. He was sozie that his enemies were gone, and much praised sir William Lisle for his valiancie. The earle would gladlie have followed his enemies into their owne borders, but his commission was onlie to defend the realme, and not to invade Scotland; and therefore he said, not onlie unto the great displeasure of himselfe, but also of manie a lustie gentleman, that would gladlie have seen further proofe of the Scottish mens manhood. Shortly after, the quene of Scots, mother to the king, sent to hir brother the king of England, for an abstinence of warre, untill further communication might be had about the conclusion of some good agreement betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, which request to hir was granted; and so the English armie brake up, and the earle of Surrie returned to the court.

Edw. Hall in H. 8. fol. Cxvj. A present sent by the emperor to the king.

In this season the emperor Charles sent to the king of England two mules trapped in crimson velvet curiouslie embroidered, all the buckles, stirrups and all such other garnishings were silver and gilt of marvellous cunning worke. He sent also eleven girdles full goodlie to behold trapped with rusted velvet richlie wrought, and foure speares, and two iavelins of strange timber & worke richlie garnished, and five brace of greihounds: and to the quene he sent two mules with rich trappers, and high chaires after the Spanish fashion. All these presents were thankfullie received both of the king and quene.]

An anticipation.

Whilest the earle of Surrie was in the marches of Scotland, and the duke of Suffolke in France (as before ye have heard) the cardinal sent out commissions in the moneth of October, that everie man being worth fortie pounds, should paie the whole subsidie before granted, out of hand, not tarrieng till the daies of payment limited. This was called an anticipation, that is to meane, a thing taken before the time appointed, and was a new terme not knowne before those daies: but they paid sweetlie for their learning. In December were taken certeine traitors in Couentrie, one called Francis Philip, scholemaster to the kings henchmen, and one Christopher Pickering cleerke of the larder, and one Anthonie Painville gentleman, which by the perswasion of the said Francis Philip, intended to have taken the kings treasure of his subsidie, as the collectors of the same came towards London, and then to have raised men and taken the castell of Killingworth, and to have arreared warre against the king. The said Francis, Christopher, and Anthonie, were hanged, drawne, and quartered at Tborne the eleuenth of Februarie, and the other were sent to Couentrie, and there executed.

The archduke of Austria made knight of the garter.

In this peare the king sent the lord Doroie, sir William Huseie knight, & doctor Lee his almoner to don Ferdinando the archduke of Austria, with the order of the garter, which in the token of Ju-remberge received the same, where all the princes of Germanie were then assembled at a diet or council. In this meane while, diuerse enterprises and feats of warre were practised and atchieved by them of the garrisons in the marches of Calis, and the Frenchmen of Bullogne, and the borders thereabouts: but the Frenchmen commonlie were put to the worse. Amongest other exploits, it chanced that one Brexton a gentleman, and capteine of a number of the aduenturers, as he went about to spoile the towne of Wall, was taken by the French horsemen, and sold unto the peasants of the countrie, the which unmercifullie slue him and fiftene more that were taken with him; after that the men of warre had deliuered them, and were departed. But this murder was reuenged shortly by other of the aduenturers, which comming vnto the same towne of Wall, took thirtie eight prisoners of the inhabitants, & slue of them thirtie & six, & burned the towne.

In this peare thorough books of cphemerides, and prognostications, foreshewing much hurt to come by waters & floods, many persons bittelled themselves, and went to high grounds for feare of drowning. Speciallie one Bolton prior of saint Bartholomewes in Smithfield, builded him an house upon Harow on the hill, onlie for feare of this flood, and thither he went and made prouision of all things necessarie for the space of two moneths. This great raine and waters should haue fallen in Februarie, but no such thing happened, whereby the follie of men was shewed. The astronomers for their excuse did saie, that in their computation they had miscounted in their number an hundred yeares. A legat was sent from the pope to the king to moue him to peace: but the king declared to him the whole circumstance of his title, for the which he made wars against the Frenchmen, and thereof deliuered notes to the said legat, the which departed with the same backe to Rome in post. He had bene first with the French king, and with the emperor, but could not bring them to any god consocietie, as his desire was to haue done; so that his trauell was without frute in manner, as it appeared.

Manie enterprises, skirmishes, foires, and other feats of warre were attempted and put in vze betwixt the Englishmen of Calis, Guisnes, and other fortresses there in those marches, and the Frenchmen of Bullogne, and other of the garrisons in the frontiers of Picardie, and still sir William Fitz Williams as then capteine of Guisnes, sir Robert Jerningham capteine of Helwam bridge, sir John Mallop, and sir John Cage were those that did to the Frenchmen most damage. Also monsieur de Bees being capteine of Bullogne, did for his part what he could to defend the frontiers there, and to annoy his enemies. Yet one daie in Maie, sir William Fitz Williams, and sir Robert Jerningham, with seven hundred men (accounting in that number the Breckers) went to Bullogne, and there skirmished with the Frenchmen, whilest Christopher Co a capteine of foure English ships took land, and fought with them of base Bullogne on the one side, as the Breckers assailed them on an other.

There was a sharpe bickering, and in the end the Frenchmen were driven backe, and diuerse of them slaine & taken, speciallie by the Breckers, that were the barriers of them, & so when the tide was turned, Christopher Co with his men withdrew to his ships, the Breckers returned to sir William Fitz Williams, who staid for them, and then gathering his men together by sound of a trumpet, sent forth such as might fetch the dists of beafts and cattell in the countrie neere adjoining, & with the same returned backe in safetie. On the eight of August monsieur de Bees accompanied accompanied with diuerse French lordes and men of war, to the number of eight hundred footmen, and as manie horsemen, came verie earlie in a morning to a village called Bonnings, within the English pale, and leauing there three hundred horsemen in ambush, road to Balkerwell, and there appointed to tarrie with other three hundred men, and the residue of the horsemen and footmen with banner displayed went forth and forraied all the countrie.

Sir Robert Herningham also with foure score horsemen issued forth of Calis, to vnderstand the demeanour of the Frenchmen: but being not able to resist the great number of the Frenchmen, he was chased, and saued himselfe by flight. But this displeasure was shortly after reuenged by the said Robert, the which comming to Marguison the twelfe of August with three hundred footmen, and three score horsemen, he skirmished with the Frenchmen that stood at defense, chased them into the church, and fired them out of the same, so that the Frenchmen leapt out of the church to their destruction, for of three hundred there were saued but three score alive. On the one and twentieth of Maie being Trinitie sundaie, five hundred Scotchmen in the morning verie carlie, entred by severall wayes into England, and laie covertlie by the high wales, in purpose to haue surprised such market men as came to the faire that day kept at Wretwike. They toke diuerse, but finally being espied, the alarme rose, and they were fought with right sharplie, who defended themselves with such manhood in bawling backe to their advantage, that if the young lord of Fulberie had not come to the succours of the Englishmen, the Scots had gone a waile with their bottie. Notwithstanding in the end they were glad to seeke refuge by flight, losing 200 of their number, which were taken in the chase.

On the fift of Iulie next ensuing, sir John a Fentwike, Leonard Pulgrau, and bassard Heron, with diuerse other English captains, hauing with them nine hundred men of war, entred the Pers, minding to fetch out of the same some bottie, and encountering with the Scots being in number two thousand, after soe and long fight, caused them to leaue their ground and to flie, so that in the chase were taken two hundred Scots, and manie slaine, & amongst them were diuerse gentlemen. But sir Rafe a Fentwike, Leonard Pulgrau, and the bassard Heron, with thirtie other Englishmen well horsed, followed so farre in the chase, that they were past rescues of their companie, whereof the Scots being aduised, suddenly returned, and set on the Englishmen, which oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, were some overcome, and there was taken sir Rafe a Fentwike, Leonard Pulgrau, and sir other: and bassard Heron, with seauen other were slaine. The residue by chance escaped. The other Englishmen with their 200 prisoners returned safelie into England.

On the seuenth of Iulie, the Englishmen fought with like fortune against the Scots that were entered England at the west marches. For in the beginning they put the Scots to the worke, and toke three hundred of them prisoners: but afterwards, because the Englishmen that had taken those prisoners, withdrew out of the field with the same prisoners, the Scots perceiuing the number of the Englishmen to be diminished, gaue a new onset on the Englishmen, and them distressed. After this, the Scots sued for a truce, and had it granted to indure till the feast of saint Andrew. This yeare the first of September was doctor Thomas Haniball maister of the rolles receiued into London with earles, and bishops, and diuerse other nobles and gentlemen, as ambassadors from pope Clement, which brought with him a rose of gold for a token to the king. And on the daie of the natiuitie of our ladie, after a solemne masse song by the cardinal of Boke, the said present was deliuered to the king: which was a tree forged of fine gold, & wrought with branches, leaues, and floures resembling roses. This tree was set in a pot of gold which had three feet of antique fashion. The pot was of measure halfe a pint, in the vpper most rose was a faire sapphire loupe peried, the bignesse of an acorne, the tree was of heighth halfe an English yard, and a foot in breadth.

This yeare in Iulie the lord Archembald Douglas earle of Angus, which had married the queene of Scots sister to the king of England, escaped out of France (where he had remained for a season, in manner as a banished man) and came into England to the king, as then being at Grenewich, and was of him courteously receiued. Sir Anthonie Fitz Herbert one of the Iustices of the common ples, sir Rafe Egerton knight, and doctor Denton deane of Lichfield, being sent in the beginning of this yeare into Ireland as commissioners, behaued themselves so sagelie, that they reformed diuers wrongs, brought sundrie of the wild Irish by faire means vnto obedience, and made (by the kings authoritie) the earle of Kildare deputie of the land; before whome the great Owele bare the sword. And the lord Piers Butler earle of Ormond, which before was deputie, was now made high treasurer of Ireland. In September the said commissioners returned.

During all this season, there were daile attempts made and practised by the Englishmen in the lowe countries, namelie the English horsemen; & the aduenturers rested not, but daile made inuasions vpon the French confines. But the aduenturers about the beginning of winter made an enterpryse to fetch some bottie from a village lieng towards Spurrell. They were not fullie two hundred men, and of those there were five and twentie horsemen. The Frenchmen by chance the same time were abroad vnder the conduct of the earle of Dammartine, which was going to St. Omers with fiftene hundred horsemen, and eight hundred footmen, and perceiuing where the aduenturers were comming, made towards them, and after long & cruell fight overcame them, and slue most part of them, for that in defending themselves most stoutlie, they had slaine and wounded a great number of the Frenchmen, per they could be overcome, keeping themselves close together, and might not be broken so long as they had any arrowes to shot. This was the end of the aduenturers otherwise called Irakers, being as hardie men as euer serued prince.

In December there came to London diuerse ambassadoes out of Scotland, about a peace to be had, and a marriage concluded betwene the king of Scots, and the ladie Marie daughter to the king of England, as in the Scottish historie yett shall find moze at large expressed. Before the feast of Christ masse, the lord Leonard Craie, and the lord John Craie, brethren to the marquesse Dorset, sir George Cobham, sonne to the lord Cobham, William Carie, sir John Dobleie, Thomas Wiat, Francis Pointz, Francis Sidneie, sir Anthonie Woune, sir Edward Seimoz, Oliuer Spanners, Perciuall Hart, Sebastian Pudigate, and Thomas Calen, esquires of the kings household, enterprised a challenge of feats of armes against the feast of Christmas, which was proclaimed by Winsore the herald, and performed at the time appointed after the best maner, both at tilt, tourneie, barriers, and assault of a cassell erected for that purpose in the tiltyard at Grenewich, where the king held a rofall Christmas that yeare, with great mirth and princelie pastime.

power Legantine, would haue visited the friers ob-seruants, but they in no wise would thereto condes-cend, wherefore nineteene of the same religion were accursed at Pauls crosse, by one of their owne religion, called frer Fozrest. John Fokin Steward of household to the French kings mother, this yere whilest the French king was in Italie, came into England, & was receiued in secret maner into the house of one doctor Larke, a prebendarie of S. Stephens, and oftentimes talked with the cardinal about the affaires betwixt the kings of England and France, motioning waies for a peace to be concluded. When this was knowne abroad, as at the length it was, monseigneur de Bzate the emperours ambassadoz mis-liked such covert doings, and soe gradged thereat.
The foure and twentieth of Ianuarie, the president of Rome called monsieur Bzinion, came to London as ambassadoz from the French king, and was lodged with the said John Fokin.

Ambassadors from the em-perour and their requestes.

On sundaie the fift of March were receiued in to London monsieur de Beuer lord of Campher, ad-mirall of Flanders, and maister John de la Cose, president of Valins, & maister John de la Cose, as ambassadors from the ladie Margaret in the name of the emperour. These ambassadors required three things in their suit. First they demanded the ladie Marie the kings onelie daughter to be deliuered out of hand, and she to be named emperesse, and to take possession of all the lowe countries, and to be gouer-nour of the same. Also that all such sums of monie as the king should giue with hir in mariage for a dower to be made to hir, should be paid instantlie.
Thirde, that the king of England himselfe should passe the sea, and make warre in France the next summer. The two first demands were not agreed to for certene causes, and as to this last, the king said he would take aduilement.

Newses of the siege of Pauls & the taking of the French
king prisoner.

On thursdaie the ninth of March, at seauen of the clocke in the morning, there came a gentleman in poist from the ladie Margaret gouernesse of Flanders, which brought letters containing how that the seure and twentieth of februarye, the siege of Pauls (where the French king had lien long) was raised by force of battell, and the French king himselfe taken prisoner. The same day the president of Rome, & John Fokin were going to the court (for they had not yet spoken with the king) and in Wolborne in their waie heard these things, whereupon they returned to their lodging right sorrowfull, and within short space after returned to the regent of France. It was thought the king would haue agreed with the French king, if his chance had not hapned, for all the people of England grudged against Flanders, for the euill demean-our of the Flemings in time of the warre. Also the king was displeased with them for inhancing his coine there, which caused much monie to be conueied out of this realme baile ouer into that countrie.
Bountifull and great triumph was made in London for the taking of the French king, on saturdaye the eleuenth of March; and on the morow after being sundaie the twelfth of March, the king came to Pauls, and there heard a solemne masse, and after the same was ended, the quere sang Te Deum, and the minstrels plaid on euerie side.

The battell of Pauls, wherein the French king is taken prisoner.

Here it is conuenient to adde the battell of Paula, wherein the French king was taken prisoner, most notable discouered by Guicciardine, in the fifteenth booke of his historie: the principall matter whereof, to make the report of Pauls and the French king more perspicuous, it were good to inferre. On the night (saith mine author) before the five and twentith of februarye, a daie dedicated by the christians to the apostle saint Marthe, and also the daie of the battaille of the emperour, the imperiales determined to march to Spirabell, where late incamped cer-teine companies of hollemen and footmen. In this march they stood vpon this intention, that if the French men moued, then they had set at libertie the siege of Pauls: and if they moued not, then to aduenture the fortune of the battell. Therefore the better to aduance this determination, all the beginning of the night they gaue manie alarmes, the more to keepe trauelled and wearie the French men, making semblance as though they would charge them on that side towards Pauls, Belin, and saint Lazarus.

About midnight enerie souldior, by the commandement of the capteins, put on a white cassakin ouer his armor, to be knowne from the Frenchmen. They were cast into two squadrons of hollemen, a foure of footmen. In the first were six thousand footmen equallie compounded of lanceknights, Spaniards, and Italians: this squadron was led by the mar-quesse of Guast: the second stood onelie vpon cer-teine bands of Spanish footmen under the charge of the marquesse of Biskwaite: the third and fourth squadron were of lanceknights, commanded by the viceroy and the duke of Bourbon. They arrived at the parkes walles certene houres before daie, and by the working of their masons, and readie willes of their souldiers, they cast downe to the earth three score fadome of wall: by which breach, being entred within the parkes, the first squadron drew towards Spirabell, and the residue of the armie toke the waie to the campe.

As soone as the king vnderstood that they were entred into the parkes, thinking they would draw to Spirabell, he issued out of his lodging to fight in plaine and open field, desiring to draw the battell rather to that place than to any other, for the aduantages which it gaue to the hollemen: he commanded to turne the artilleries toward the enemies, which beating them in flanke, brought great damage to the reregard. But in the meane while, the battell of the imperiales gaue a furious charge vpon the kings squadron, which ordinarilie was the battell: but as the Spaniards went, it was the reregard. The king fought valiantlie, & abode with great courage the violence of his enemies, who with the furie of their harquebuziers forced his men to giue ground, till the rescue of the Switzers came, when the Spaniards were repelled, as well by them as by the hollemen that charged them in flanke.
But the viceroy being called in by the marquesse of Biskwaite, who brought to the fight his lanceknights, they were easilie broken, not without great slaughter of the Switzers, who that daie did nothing answer the opinion of valor which aforesometimes they had waied to honorablie to expresse in battelles.

The king kept alwaies the middle of the battell, being insurrounded with a great gard of men at armes.
And albeit he did what he could to containe and con-firme his people: yet after he had fought long with his owne hands, his horse being slaine vnder him, him selfe lightlie hurt in the face and in the hand, he was stricken downe to the earth, and taken prisoner by five souldiers that knew not what he was. In which misfortune the viceroy pressing into the throng his maiestie disclosed him selfe to him, who with great reuerence kissed his hand, and receiued him prisoner in the emperours name. At the same time the marquesse of Guast with the first squadron had defeated the hollemen that were at Spirabell.
And Anthoine de Leua, who (as was said) had to that end cast downe to the earth so great a quantitie and space of wall, as an hundred and fiftie hollemen might fallie forth in front, issued out of Pauls, & charged the French behind, that he put them whole to flight. And in that feare they were almost all stripped.

ped and trusted, except the reregard of the hostle-men, which being led by monsieur de Alanfon from the beginning of the battell, retired almost whole.

It is holden for certeine, that in this battell were slaine more than eight thousand men of the French campe, part by sword, and part of bodies drowned in the river of Theffin, seeking their safetie by swimming. Of this generall number were about twen-tie of the most noble and apparant lords of France, as the admerall, the lord James Chebanes, the lord Palissa, and Trimonville, the master of the hostle, monsieur de Aubignie, monsieur de Boisse, and monsieur de la Escud, who being taken graueilie wounded by his enemies, gaue to them his life in stead of a ranfome. The prisoners that were taken were the king of Nauarre, the bastard of Sauoie, the lord Pontinterancie, Saint Paule, Biron, Anall, monsieur de Chandon, monsieur de Amber-court, Galeas Visconte, Frederike Boscolo, Barnabie Visconte, Cuidanes, with manie gentlemen, and almost all the capteins that escaped the slaughter of the sword. There was also taken prisoner Jerome Landro bishop of Brundisio the popes nun-tio, but by commandement of the viceroy, he was easily set at libertie: as also monsieur Saint Paule and Frederike Boscolo committed to the castell of Pavia, brake prison a little after, by the corruption of the Spaniards that had them in charge.
Of the imperialles side the vniuersall slaughter exceeded not seauen hundred bodies; and not one captaine of name except Ferrand Castriot mar-quesse of Angco, the marquesse of Disquairo was wounded in two places, & Anthonie de Arua light-lie hurt in the leg. The preie and spoile of this battell was so great, as there had not bene scene in Italie more rich fouldoies.

Of so great an armie there was preserved but the reregard of foure hundred lances, commanded by monsieur de Alanfon, they neuer came to the fight, neuer suffered charge, nor neuer were followed, but leaving behind them their baggage, they retired whole to Piemont, their feare making them more hastie to flie, than carefull of their honor. And as one calamitie followeth another, so the losse of the battell was no sower reappoynted at Millaine, than Theodor Trunlce, who laie there in garrison with foure hundred lances, departed and toke his waie to Spusocquo, all the fouldoies following him by troops: insomuch as the same daie that the king lost the battell, all the dutchie of Millaine was made free from the iurisdiction of the French. The daie after the victorie, the king was led prisoner to the rocke of Milqueton, for that the duke of Millaine, in regard of his proper suretie, consented hardlie that the person of the king should be kept within the castell of Millaine: he was garded with great gelousie and watch; but in all other things (except his libertie) he was used and honored as appertained to the state and maiestie of a king.

Now (saith mine author, speaking to the readers of his historie) you haue scene set downe the ouer-throw of the French armie in the battell of Pavia: a wretched successe, where was so great expectation of victorie. You haue scene a mightie king deliue-red by prisoner into the hands of him, with whom he contended for glorie and emperie: a spectacle most tragical amongst all the calamities that fortune bringeth vpon mans mortalitie. You haue scene the most part of the nobilitie, and honozable capteins of France, slaine in the sernice and presence of their king: a matter that made more lamentable his owne condition and aduersitie. You haue scene the residue of that armie, so vniuersallie perplexed with feare and confusion, that the same thing that should haue retained them in so great affliction, made them the lesse assured, and further off from confidence.

When word came to the emperour of all the former accidents, the eies of euerie man were set to behold with what propriete of affection he would receiue his gladfome newes, and to what ends his thoughts were disposed: who so farre as exterior demonstrations made shew, expressed great tokens of a mind much moderated, and verie apt to resist easilie the prosperitie of fortune: yea the signes and inclinations appering so much the more incredible, by how much he was a prince mightie & yong, and as yet had neuer tasted but of felicitie. For after he was informed truelie of so great a victorie, whereof he had the reappoynt the tenth of March, together with letters of the French kings owne hand, written rather in the spirit and condition of a prisoner, than with the courage of a king, he went forthwith to the church to make his holie oblations to God with manie solemnities. And the morning folowing he recei-ued with signes of right great deuotion the sacrament of the eucharist, and so went in procession to our ladies church out of Paduill, where was his court at that time.

His temperance and moderation was aboute the expectation of his estate, and farre contrarie to the course of the time in matters of that nature: for he would not suffer anie bels to be rung, nor bounfaires to be made, nor anie other manner of publike demonstrations, such as are used for glorie or glad-nesse, alledging with a mind more vertuous than insolent, that such propriete of fasting and reioicing was due to victories obtained against infidels, but ought to haue no shew where one christian ouercame another. Neither were the actions and gestures of his person and speeches differing from so great a temperance and continencie of mind, which he well expessed in the answers he made to the congratulations of the ambassadours and great men that were about him: to whome he said he was not glad of the accident according to the gloriois operation of flesh and blood, but his reioicing was in that God had so manifestlie aided him: which he interpreted to be an assured signe that he stood in his grace and fauour, though not through his owne merit, yet by his celestial election. The French king being in the custodie of the viceroy of Naples (who much comforted him, and praised his valiantnesse, and praised him to be content, for he should haue a gentle end) desired to write to his mother, which was to him granted. His verie words were these.

The manifold passions of perplexities of the people in generall.

In this estate of aduersitie the people set before their eyes all that feare and despaire could imagine: they doubted least so great a calamitie were not the beginning of a further ruine & subuersion: they saw their king prisoner, and with him either taken or slaine in the battell the chieftains of the kingdome, which in the imagination of their sorowes they held a losse irreparable: they beheld their captiues discomfited, and their souldiers discouraged: a calamitie which stopped in them all hope to be readressed or reassured: they saw the realme made naked of mo-nie and treasure, and inuironed with most mightie enimies: an affliction which most of all caried their thoughts into the last cogitation of desperat ruine: for the king of England, notwithstanding that he had holden manie parles and treaties, and shewed in manie things a variation of mind, yet not manie daies before the battell, he had cut off all the negociations which he had interteined with the king, and had published that he would descend into France, if the things of Italie took anie good successe.

So that the Frenchmen feared least in so great an oportunitie, the emperor and he would not leaue warre against France, either for that there was no other head or gouernour than a woman, and the little children of the king, of whom the eldest had not yet run eight yeares accomplished: or else because the enimies had with them the duke of Burbon, for his owne particular a puissant prince, and for his authoritie in the realme of France verie popular and strong in opinion, a mightie instrument to stirre vp most dangerous emotions. Besides, the ladie regent, as well for the loue she bare to the king, as for the dangers of the realme was not without hir passions both proper and particular: for being full of ambition, and most greedie of the gouernment, she feared that if the kings deliuerie drew any long tract of time, or if anie new difficultie hapned in France, she should be constrained to yield by the administration of the crowne to such as should be delegate and assigned by the voices of the kingdome. Neuerthelesse and so manie astonishments and confusions, she drew hir spirits to hir, and by hir example were recomfited the nobles that were of counsell with hir, who took speedie order to man the frontiers of the realme, and with diligence to leaue a good provision of monie.

The ladie regent, in whose name all expeditions and dispatches went out, wrote to the emperor letters full of humilitie and compassion, wherein she for-gat not by degrees vehement and inducing to solicit a negotiation of accord: by vertue whereof, hauing a little after deliuered don Hugo de Boncado, she sent him to the emperor, to offer him that hir sonne should renounce and disclaime from all rights of the kingdome of Naples, and the estate of Apellan, with contentment to refer to the censure and arbitration of the law, the titles and rights of Burgundie, which if it appertained to the emperor, he should acknowledge it for the dowrie of his sister: that he should render to monsieur Burbon his estate together with his mouables which were of great valour, and also the reits and revenues which had bene le-nued by the commissioners sent out of the regall chamber: that he should giue to him his sister in ma-riage, and deliuer vp to him Provence, if iudgement of the interest and right were made of his side.

And for the more facilitie and speedie passage of this negotiation, rather than for anie desire he had to nourish hir inclination to the warre, she dispatched immediatlie ambassadours into Italie, to recommend to the pope and the Venetians the safetie of hir sonne: To whom she offered, that if for their proper securitie, they would contract with hir, and raise armes against the emperor, she would for the particular aduance five hundred lances, together with a great contribution of monie. But amid these travels and astonishments, the principall desire as well of hir, as of the whole realme of France, was, to appease and assure the mind of the king of England, iudging trulie that if they could reduce him to amitie and reconcilement, the crowne of France should re-maine without quarrell or molestation. Where, if he on the one side, and the emperor on the other, should rise in one saint face, hauing concurrent with them the person of the duke of Burbon, and manie other oportunities and occasions, it could not be but all things would be full of difficulties and dangers.

At this the ladie regent began to discern manie tokens and apparances of god hope: for notwithstanding the king of England immediatlie after the first reappoirts of the victorie, had not onelie expressed great tokens of gladnesse and reioysing, but also published that he would in person passe into France: and withall had sent ambassadours to the emperor to solicit and treat of the moving of warre iointlie together: yet proceeding in deed with more mildnesse than was expected of so furious thewes and tokens, he dispatched a messenger to the ladie regent, to send to him an expresse ambassadour: which accordingly was accomplished, and that with fulnesse of authori-tie and commission, such as brought with it also all sorts of submitions & implozations which she thought apt to reduce to appeasement the mind of that king so highlie displeased. He reposed himselfe altogether upon the will and counsell of the cardinal of Borke, who seemed to restraine the king and his thoughts to this principall end, that bearing such a hand upon the controuersies and quarrels that ran betwene other princes, all the world might acknowledge to depend upon him and his authoritie the resolution and expectation of all affaires.

And for this cause he offered to the emperor at the same time to descend into France with a puissant armie, both to giue perfection vnto the alliance concluded betwene them before; and also to remove all scruple and gelousie, he offered presentlie to consigne vnto him his daughter, who was not as yet in an age and disposition able for marriage. But in these matters were very great difficulties, partlie depending upon himselfe, and partlie deriuing from the emperor, who now shewed nothing of that readi-nesse to contract with him which he had used before: for the king of England demanded almost all the rewards of the victorie, as Normandie, Guien, and Gascoigne, with the title of king of France. And that the emperor, notwithstanding the inequality of the conditions should passe likewise into France, and communicate equalitie in the expences and dangers. The inequality of these demands troubled not a little the emperor, to whom they were by so much the more grievous, by how much he remembered that in the yeares next before, he had alwaies deferred to make warre euen in the greatest dangers of the French king. So that he perswaded himselfe that he should not be able to make anie foundation upon that confederation.

And standing in a state no lesse impouerished for monie and treasure, than made wearie with labours and perils, he hoped to draw more commodities from the French king by the means of peace, than by the violence of armes and warres, speciallie tolding with the king of England. Besides, he made not that accompt which he was wont to doe of the marriage of his daughter, both for hir minoritie in age,

age, and also for the dowrie for the which he should stand accountable for: so much as the emperor had received by waite of loane of the king of England: he seemed by manie tokens in nature to nourish a wonderfull desire to haue children, and by the necessity of his condition he was caried with great contentment of monie: upon which two reasons he took a great desire to marie the sister of the house of Portugal, which was both in an age able for marriage, and with whom he hoped to receiue a plentiful portion in gold and treasure, besides the liberalities of his owne people offered by waite of beneuolence in case the marriage went forward: such was their desire to haue a queene of the same nation and language, and of hope to procreate children.

For these causes the negociation became euerie daie more hard and desperat betwene both those princes, wherein was also concurrent the ordinarie inclination of the cardinall of Portie towards the French king, together with the open complaints he made of the emperor, as well for the interests and respects of his king, as for the small reputation the emperor began to hold of him. He considered that afoze the battell of Pavia, the emperor neuer sent letters unto him which were not written with his owne hand, and subscribed, your sonne and cosine Charles: but after the battell, he used the seruice of secretaries in all the letters he wrote to him, insiring nothing of his owne hand but the subscription, not with titles of so great reuerence and submission, but onelie with this bare word Charles. In this alteration of affection in the emperor, the king of England took occasion to receiue with gracious words and demonstrations, the ambassadour sent by the ladie regent, to whom he gaue comfort to hope well in things to come. And a little afterward, estranging his mind wholie from the affaires which were in negociation betwene him and the emperor, he made a confederation with the ladie regent, contracting in the name of hir sonne, wherein he would haue inserted this expresse condition, that for the kings ransom and deliuerie, should not be deliuered to the emperor anie thing that at that time should be vnder the power or possession of the crowne of France.

Shortlie after, the viceroy & the other capitans imperiall were induced upon vrgent reasons to transport the person of the French king into a surer hold, than where presentlie he was kept, iudging that for the ill disposition of others, they could not without perill kepe him garded in the duchie of Milan: in which feare ioined to their continuall desire so to doe, they resolved to conueie him to Genes, and from thence by sea to Naples, where his lodging was prepared within the new castell. This determination brought no little græfe to the king, who from the beginning of his captinitie, had vehementlie desired to be carried into Spaine: perhaps he had opinion (measuring happilie an other man by his owne nature, or else running with the common error of mortall men being easilie beguiled in things they desire) that if once he were brought to the presence of the emperor, he doubted not of some easie passage for his libertie, either through the emperours benignitie, or by the conditions he meant to offer. The viceroy was of the same desire for the augmentation of his owne glorie.

But being retained for feare of the French armie by sea, they dispatched by common consent monsieur Pontmerancie to the ladie regent: who granted to him six light gallies of those that late in the port of Barcelles upon promise to haue them restored as soon as the king was arrived in Spaine. With these gallies, he returned to Portofino, where the kings person was alreadie arrived, and joining them to six tene gallies of the emperor, which was the nauie appointed at first to conduct him to Naples, he reduced them all into one fleet, and armed them all with solmen of the Spanish. The capturing imperials and the duke of Bourbon were persuaded, that the kings person should be led to Naples: but of the contrarie, setting by sail the seuenth of June, they took such course, that the eight daie they arrived with a happie voyage at Rosas a haven of Catalogna: there coming brought no small joy to the emperor, who till that daie had understood nothing at all of that resolution.

As soon as he was made assured of the kings being there, he dispatched commandments unto all places where he should passe, to receiue him with great honours: onelie till it should be otherwise determined, he gave order to kepe him in the castell of Sociatua nere to Valence, a castell ancientlie used by the kings of Aragon for the garding of great personages, and wherein had bene kept prisoner for manie yeares the duke of Calabria. But the deliberation to kepe him in that place, seeming farre too rigorous to the viceroy, and nothing agreeable to the promises he had made to the king in Italie, he wone so much of the emperor, that till he had taken an other counsell, the kings person might remaine nere Valence in a place apt for hunting and other delights of the field. Where he left him lodged with sufficient gard, vnder the charge of capitaine Alarcon, in whose custodie he had alwaies remained since his vnfortunate daie.

From thence the viceroy, together with Pontmerancie, went to the emperor to make reappoynt of the state of Italie, and the discourse of things which till that daie had bene debated with the king, with whom he persuaded the emperor with manie reasons to draw to accord, for that he could not haue a faithfull amitie and coniunction with the Italians. The emperor after he had heard the viceroy and Pontmerancie, determined to conueie the king into Castillo to the castell of Paduill, a place farre removed from the sea and the confines of France, where being honored with ceremonies & reuerences agreeable to so great a prince, he should neuertheless be kept vnder carefull and strait gard, with libertie to take the aire abroad certeine times of the daie, mounted onelie upon a mule. The emperor could neuer be brought to admit the king to his presence, if first the accord were not either established, or at least in an assured hope of resolution.

And to the end there might be interposed in the negociation a personage honorable, & almost equall with the king, Pontmerancie was sent in great diligence into France, to bring the duchesse of Milan the kings sister and a widow, with fullnesse of authority to debate and contract. And to the end this negociation of accord were not hindered by new difficulties, there was made a little afterwards a truce untill the end of December, betwene the emperor and such as administrated the gouernment of France. Whereouer the emperor gaue order that one part of those gallies which were come with the viceroy, should returne into Italie to bring the duke of Bourbon into Spaine, without whose presence and priuatie he gaue out that he would make no conuention: and yet the gallies that for want of monie, and other impediments, were prepared but with slow diligence.

Whiles the case of the French king was in demand, but not yet determined, by means of sundrie ouerthwarts that ouerthrew the foundation of euerie purpose tending to his deliuerance: it fortuned that the French king falling sicke in the castell of Paduill, and hauing in vaine desired the presence of the emperor, was caried by his discontentment and melancholie into such extremitie and danger of his life, that the physicians appointed for his cure, told the emperor that they stood desperat of his recovery, if himselfe in person came not to comfort him with some hope of his deliuerie. The emperor obteyning more compassion than the reason of things, was not curious to condescend to perforce so good an office, and as he prepared to visit him accordingly, his high chancellor seeking to turne him from the soene, told him with manie strong reasons, that he could not go to him in honour, but with intention to deliuer him presentlie and without anie covenant: otherwise as it would be a humanitie not roiall but mercenarie, so it would disclose a desire to recouer him, not moued of charitie, but pushed on by his proper interest, as not to lose by his death the occasion of the profit hoped for by the victorie.

The emperor
visits the
in durance.

This counsell assuredlie was graue and honourable touching the man that gaue it, and no lesse worthy to be followed by so great a prince as the emperor: and yet being more caried by the reasons of others, he took post to go to him. But for the danger of the king being almost at the extremitie, the visitation was short, and yet for the time accompanied with gracious words full of hope that he would deliuer him immediatlie vpon his returning to health: in so much that whether it was by the comfort that he breathed into him (in the sicknesse of captiuitie the promise of libertie credeeth all medicines) or by the benefit of his youth, which with the fauour of nature was stronger than the maladie, he began after this visitation to resume so good disposition, that within few daies he was out of danger, notwithstanding he could not recouer his former health but with verie slowe time.

And now neither the difficulties that were shewed on the emperours side, nor the hopes which were giuen by the Italians, nor anie other nature of impediments whatsoever, could staie the volage of the ladie Alanson into Spaine. For that as nothing was more hard or heauie to the Frenchmen than to leaue off the practises and negotiations of accord begun with those that had power to restore their king: so nothing was more easie to the emperor, than feeding the French with hopes, to draw their minds from taking armes; and by that meane so to keepe the Italians in suspence, as not to dare to enter into new deliberations. And in that cunning maner, sometimes using delaies, and sometimes pressing forward the affaires, he thought to keepe the minds of all men confused and intangled. The ladie Alanson was receiued by the emperor with verie gracious demonstrations and hopes: but the effects fell out both hard and heauie. For when she ministered speech to him for the marriage of his sister the widowe with the king: he made answer; that it was a matter which could not be done without the consent of the duke of Bourbon.

The ladie Alanson treateth with the emperor for the kings deliuerie.

The other particularities were debated by deputies of both parts, wherein, as the emperor insisted obstinatlie to haue the dutchie of Burgognie restored as appertaining to him: so the French refused to consent, unless he would accept it for dowrie; or else to referre it to the sentence of the law and iustice to decide the true title. And albeit they could easilie haue condescended to the residue, yet for that they were so farre off for the demand of Burgognie, the ladie Alanson returned at last into France, without winning anie other grace, than a fauour to see the king his brother; who growing more and more into distrust of his deliuerie, desired him at his departing to admonish his mother, and all the counsell from him, to looke carefulie to the profit of the crowne of

The French king is careful of the France, without having anie consideration of him, as if he liued not. But notwithstanding the departure of the ladie Alanson, the solicitations for the kings deliuerie did not cease, for that there remained behinde the president of Paris, and the bishops of Ambrun and Carbe, who had till then followed the negotiation but with verie little hope, with the emperor would not harken to anie condition, if first Burgognie were not restored, which the king would not be brought to restore; but in a last necessitie.

After this unfortunate accident of the French king ensued manie troublesome and intricate matters, among which the case of the French king was descanted vpon, and a solicitation of peace resolved, which contained these covenants following. That betwene the emperor and the French king should be a peace perpetuall, in which should be comprehended all such as should be named by their common consent. That the French king by the first daie of the next moneth of March, should be set at libertie vpon the marches in the coast of Fontarabie. That within six weeks after he should consigne to the emperor the dutchie of Burgognie, the countie of Charolois, the iurisdiction of Flanders, the castell Chainro, dependancies of the said dutchie, the countie of Fflandona, the reloyt of St. Laurence de la Roche, a dependant of French countie, together with all the appurtenances as well of the said dutchie as vicountie, all which for hereafter should be separate and exempted from the souereigntie of the realme of France. That at the same and verie instant that the king should be deliuered, there should be put into the emperours hands the Dolphin of France, and with him either the duke of Orleans the kings second sonne, or else twelue principall lords of France, whom the emperor did name.

It was left to the election of the ladie regent, either to deliuer the kings second sonne, or the twelue barons, and they to remaine as hostages untill restitution were made of the lands and places aforesaid, and the peace swoyne and ratified, together with all the articles by the estates generall of France, and inregistered in all the courts of parlement of the kingdome with forme and solemnities necessarie. For the accomplishing wherof, there was set downe a terme of foure moneths: at which time returning the hostages, there should be put into the emperours hands the duke de Angouleme the kings third son, to the end to traine him vp with the emperor, the better to intertaine and assure the peace. That the French king should renounce and giue vp to the emperor all his rights to the realme of Naples, together with all such titles and preeminences as were to come to him by the inuestiture of the church. That he should doe the like touching his interest in the state of Millaine, of Venes, of Ast, and likewise of Arras, Tourneie, of the Isle, and of Motuete. That he should render vp the towne and castell of Hedin as a member of the countie of Artois, with all the munitions, artilleries, and moueables that were in it when it was last taken. That he should disclaime and yeld vp all souereigntie in Flanders and Artois, and all other places or peeces which the emperor possessed.

That on the other side, the emperor should resigne and giue vp to him all the right, title, and quarter which he pretended to anie place possessed by the Frenchmen, and especiallie the townes and castles of Perone, Montdidier, Roie, the counties of Bullongne, Guines, & Donchieto, with other townes standing vpon the one and other shore of the river of Some. That there should be betwene them a league and confederation perpetuall for the defense of their estates, with obligation to aid one another when when need required, with 500 men at armes, and ten thousand footmen: that the emperor should promise to giue in marriage to the king the ladie Eliano; his sister, whom, as soon as the dispensation should be obtained from the pope, he should contract or handfast with words obligatorie for the present, and afterwards she should be led into France, to consummate the marriage at the same time that according to the capitulations the hostages were to be deliuered: that she should haue for her portion two hundred thousand crownes, with iewels according to her estate, the one moiety of the monie to be paid within sixteene moneths, and the other halfe in one yeare after.

Furthermore, that a marriage should be betwene the Dolphin & the daughter of the Is. of Portugal, daughter to the ladie Eliano, at such time as their age will suffer: that the French king should do all that he could to induce the ancient Is. of Auarre to giue up to the emperor the rights of that kingdom, which in case he would not performe, then the king not to aid him with any succours. That the duke of Guelders, and the countie of Zutphen, and the principall townes of those estates, should promise with sufficient securitie, to giue themselves to the emperor, after his death, that the king should giue no succour to the duke of Wittenberge, nor likewise to Robert de la Sparch. That he should furnish and rigge for the emperor, both when he should passe into Italie, and two moneths after being so required, twelve gallies, foure ships, & foure gallions, all well munitioned and appointed, except men of war, & the said vessels to be rendred three moneths after accompting from the date of his imbarcking: that in place of the armie by land which the king offered for Italie, he should paie him two hundred thousand crownes in monie, the one halfe within sixteene moneths, and the other halfe within a yeare after.

Again, that at the time when the hostages should be deliuered, he should be bound to giue bills of exchange for the paie of six thousand footmen for six moneths immediatly after the emperours arrivall in Italie: that he should also furnish for his service five hundred lances paid, with a band of artillerie. That he should saue harmlesse the emperor of his promise made to the king of England by pensions, which the French king should paie him, the arerages whereof amounted to five hundred thousand crownes, or else to deliuer so much in readie monie to the emperor. That they should both ioine to beseech the pope to call a generall councell with all speed, to the end to consult vpon an vniuersall peace amongst christians, to aduance an enterprise against the infidels and heretikes, and to grant to all the crowne for three yeares. That within six weeks the king should restore the duke of Bourbon in most ample forme, into all his estates, goods mouable and immouable, and fruits and reuenues received: nor to molest him for any thing past, nor constrain him to dwell or go to the realme of France, that it should be lawfull to the said duke of Bourbon, to demand by the waie of law and iustice, the earldome of Provence. That in like sort all those that had followed him, should reenter in safetie into their goods and states, and namely the bishop of Autun, and monsieur de saint Valler.

Moreover, that the prisoners taken in the towres should be deliuered on both parts within sixteene moneths. That there should be restitution made to the ladie Margaret of Austria of all that she possessed afore the warre. That the prince of Orange should be set at libertie with restitution to the principalltie of Orange, and all that he possessed by the death of his father, which had bene taken from him for lowing the faction of the emperor. That the like should be done to other barons. That there should be made restitution to the marquesse of Salusse of his estate. That the king as soon as he arrived in the first towne of his realme, should ratifie this capitulation, and be bound to procure the Dolphin to ratifie it when he should come to the age of foureteene yeares. And were named by common consent, and cheslie the Switzers. Whelie there was not one of the potentates of Italie, except the pope, whom they named as conseruator of the accord, and that more for maner sake and ceremony, than in effect and true meaning. Lastlie, it was expressed in the said capitulation, that in case the king for any occasion, would not accomplish these matters promised; he should returne true prisoner.

This accord for the parts it contained, brought no small astonishment to all Christendome. For when it was understood, that the first execution thereof consisted in the deliuerie of the king, all mens opinions were, that being in his libertie, he would not deliuer by Burgongnie, as being a member of too great importance for the realme of France. And except a few, who had counselled the emperor to it, all his court had the same iudgement, and namely the Chancellor, who reprehended and detested the matter with so great vehemencie, that notwithstanding he was commanded to signe the capitulation (according to the office of chiefe chancellors) yet he refused to do it, alledging; that in such matters, dangerous and hurtfull as that was, he ought not to vse the authoritie that was giuen him: neither could he be altered from this opinion, notwithstanding the emperor was angrie with him: who seeing him so resolute in his opinion, signed it himselfe, and within few daies after went to Madrid, to confirme the alliance, and make a foundation of amitie and good will with the king, whom he interteined in familiar and priuat sort.

Great were the ceremonies and demonstrations of amitie betwene them: oftentimes they shewed themselves together in places publike: and as often did they passe in secret familiar discourses. They went together in one coach vnto a castell not halfe a daies iourne from thence, where was quene Cleano, whom the king married. And yet in all these great signes of peace and amitie, he was observed with as carefull and strict gard as before, without any aduantage of libertie. So that he was embraced as a brother, and garded as a prisoner. A matter which made manifest to the world, that it was an accord full of discord, an alliance without amitie, and that vpon euery occasion their ancient gelousies and passions would be stronger in them, than the regard of that alliance, made more by force than frendship. And daies were spent in these offices and ceremonies of amitie, when was brought from the ladie regent the ratification, together with the declaration, that with the Dolphin of France they would rather giue in hostage the kings second son, than the twelve barons.

When the king departed from Madrid, taking his waie to the frontier of his realme, there was to be exchanged his person for his sonnes, who had bene small age. There was sent to accompanie him the viceroie the worker and author of his deliuerie, to whom the emperor had given the citie of Arras, with other estates in Flanders and in the Kingdome of Frawles. The king of England hearing that the French king should now be deliuered, sent to him a knight of his chamber, called sir Thomas Chente, to signifie to him the great joy and gladnesse, which he conceived for his restitution to libertie, and the conclusion of the generall peace. For which kindnesse & courtesie

the deliuerie
king.

After much a do and manie remonings, the French king was come on the confines of Fontarabie, a towne appertaining to the emperor, standing upon the Ocean sea, and is a frontier betwene Biskaye and the duchie of Guisen. And on the other side, the ladie regent was arrived with the children of France, at Baion, not manie leagues from Fontarabie. The torments of the golfe took hit by the waie, which was the cause that he had linged some time longer than the date appointed of permutation. But at last, the eighteenth daie of March, the French king accompanied with the bicerope and capteine Alarcon with fiftie horse, was presented upon the shore of the riuer that diuideth the realme of France from the kingdome of Spaine. And on the other side, upon the shore opposite appeared monsieur Lawtrech with the kings children and like number of horse. There was in the middell of the riuer a great barke made fast with anchors, in which was no person. The king was rowed nere to this barke in a little boat, wherein he was accompanied with the bicerope, capteine Alarcon, and eight others, all armed with short weapons: and on the other side of the barke were likewise brought in a little boat, monsieur Lawtrech with the hostages & eight others, weaponed according to the others.

The French
king with the bicerope are unbarkeed.

After this the bicerope went into the barke with the king, and all his companie: and also monsieur Lawtrech with his eight that accompanied him, so that they were within the barke a like number of both parts, Alarcon and his eight being with the bicerope, and Lawtrech and the others with the person of the king. And when they were all thus within the barke, the Dolphin, who being giuen to the bicerope and by him committed to capteine Alarcon, was forthwith bestowed in their boate, and after him followed the little duke of Mleance, who was no sooner entred the barke, than the French king leaped out of the barke into his boate, which he did with such quicknesse and celeritie, that the exchange or permutation was thought to be done at one selfe instant; so welcome to him was libertie, without the which nothing is sweet, nothing is comfortable, as the poet saith:

Libertas per dulce bonum, bona cetera reddit.

The French
king is not a little glad of his libertie.

Asone as the king was on the other side of the shore, his new libertie making him fearefull of ambush, he mounted upon a Turkish horse of a wonderfull swiftnesse, which was prepared for the purpose: and running betwene feare and gladnesse by on the spur, he neuer staid till he came to St. John de Lus, a towne of his obedience, foure leagues from the place. And being there readilie relieved with a fresh horse, he ran with the same swiftnesse to Baion, where, after he had passed ouer the offices of court done to him by his people, he dispatched with great diligence a gentleman to the king of England, to whom he wrote with his owne hand letters of his deliuerie, charging the messenger under verie lying commission, to tell the king of England, that as he acknowledged the effect of his libertie to be wrought whole by him and his operations, so in recompense, he offered to remaine to him a perpetuall and assured friend, and to be guided in all his affaires by his counsell. And afterwards he sent an other solemne ambassage into England, to ratifie the peace which his mother had made with him, as one that reaped a verie great foundation in the amitie of that king.

Quic. pag. 968.

When the French king was gotten into Baion, being required by a gentleman of the bicerope, to ratifie the accord according to the obligation of his word, being come into a place free and assured, he deferred it from one daie to another, interposing reasons and excuses general: wherein, to the end to hold still the emperor in hope, he sent to aduertise him by a man especiall, that he forbore for the present to accomplish the ratification, not by omission or wilful negligence, but upon this necessitie, that before he proceeded realtie to such an act, he was to labour to reapease and reduce the minds of his subjects contented with the obligations he had made, tending to the diminution of the crowne of France. Nevertheless, he would in his time resolve all difficulties, and obserue with fidelitie all that he had promised to him, both in substance and circumstance. By this dealing, no lesse doubtfull for the manner, than dangerous in meaning, might easilie be comprehended what were his intentions, the same being more manifestlie detected at the arrivall of the messengers sent to him not manie daies after, by the pope and Venetians, in whom was no great need of industrie or labour, to sound out the plaine course of his inclination.

For, after he had received them with manie demonstrations and offices of court, he intertained them severallie and apart with sundrie speeches of compassion, such as tended to manifest complaints against the inhumanitie of the emperor: who he said did neuer administer to him during his captivitie, anie one office appertaining to the ranks of a prince, nor at anie time shewed himselfe touched with that affection and commiseration which one prince ought to expresse in the calamities of another; and much lesse would use anie course of common comfort, either to relieue the heavinesse of his condition with anie propertie of apt consolation, or once to enter into consideration, that the same accident that had fallen upon him, might also be as heavilie heaped upon his owne head. In this complaint, he alleged the example of Edward king of England called of some Edward Long-Shankes. To whom when was presented as prisoner John king of the Frenchmen, taken by the prince of Wales his son in the battell of Poitiers, he did not onelie receive him with great comfort and compassion of his afflicted case, but also, all the tyme of his imprisonment within the realme of England, he let him go at libertie under a free gard.

Furthermore he had daily familiar conversation with him, he would oftentimes haue him to accompany him on hunting, to communicate in the open aire and solace of the field, and was not curious to call him to eat with him at his table. And by these humanities much lesse that he lost his prisoner, or ranged him to an accord lesse favourable; but of the contrarie, by the operation of those graces and good offices, there grew betwene them such a familiaritie and confidence, that the French king, after he had continued manie yeares in France, made a voluntarie voiage into England, to honour and gratifie under that propertie of office, the liberalitie and frankenesse of the king. He alleged that as there was onelie remembrance of two kings of France that had bene taken prisoners in battell, king John and himselfe, so the diuersitie of the examples was also worthie of singular memorie, seeing upon the one was expressed all facilitie and mildnesse of the victor, and to the other were ministred all those rigours and severities, which tyrants in the height and pride of their fortune are wont to use. Whereby to he added manie circumstances discovering the discontentment of his mind, whereupon ensued practices wherewith the emperor was not well pleased.

Death of the king of France.
An. Reg. 17.

Dom. 1525.

The French king is not verie halie to rathe the accord.

The French king complaith neth upon the emperor to the messengers sent from the pope and the elections.

The king of England alledged by the French king as a president of humilitie in the case of a captive king.

Some thow after that this peace was accorded, and the French king delivered, the emperor married the lady Isabel daughter to Emanuel king of Portugal, and had with him eleven hundred thousand marks. Thus were the French affaires intermixed with our owne, and verie needfull to us, and wher here we will end, and returne to Emanuel.

Cardinal Wolsey being still most highlie in the emperours favour, obtained licence to erect a college at Oxford, and another at Ipswich, the towne where he was borne, the which foundations he began rather of a vaine desire of glorie and worldlie praise, than of the institution of true religion and advancement of doctrine, and therefore sith he was not moved thereto by respect of true godlinesse and bountifull liberalitie, he went about to clothe Peter and Paul: for the which godliness of the king to suppress certeine small monasteries, and after got a confirmation of the pope that he might implew the goods, lands, and revenues belonging to those houses, to the maintenance of most of his two colleges, wherby not onelie he, but also the pope were evil spoken of through the whole realme. In March the king sent Cuthbert, Lenthall bishop of London, and Sir Richard Whittington chamberlaine of the duchie of Lancaster, a knight of the order, into Spain, to confer with the emperor touching causes, concerning the raising of the French king, and so, warres to be made into France on euerie side.

The same being determined thus to make warre in France, he tooke the sea himselfe in person, his council considered that a great all things great treasure and victuals of monie must needs be provided. Whereupon the cardinal there was deuised strange commissions, and sent in the end of March into euerie shire, and commissioners appointed, and priuie instructions sent to them how they should proceed in their writings, and order the people to bring them to their percole: which was, that the first part of euerie mans substance should be paid in monie or plate to the king without delay, for the furniture of his warre, he thereto tolde them cursing, weeping, and exclaiming against our king & cardinal, that pite it was to hear. And so he wrote, notwithstanding all that could be said or done, for as he occupied by the commissioners to persuade the people to this contribution, the same would not be granted. And in excuse of this he said it was alledged, that wrong was offered, and the ancient customs & lawes of the realme broken, which would not any man to be charged with long payment, except it were granted by the estates of the realme in parlement assembled. The like answer was made by them of the spiritualitie, & whom was demanded the fourth part of their goods.

Wherupon the emperor sent his ambassadoe, hincup offered for admitting of John Bokun into the realme as before ye haue heard, for some other cause. The ninth of April departed out of England, not taking leave of the king, nor of the cardinal, and so much did he take condole, that he passed through France in post, and came to the emperor before the ambassadoes of England came thither. And together with his report, or otherwise, the accustomed fashion that the emperor showed to the Englishmen, began again to occur, as was well perceived, what the matter was. This yeare at Westminster died Thomas, duke of Suffolke, and was honourable buried at Epsom. The cardinal travelled earthenly with the monks and abbotmen of London, about the same monie to be granted, and likewise the commissioners appointed in the shires of the realme, set upon the same: but the burthen was so greuous, that it was generallie venet, and the common in euerie place so moued, that it was like to grow to rebellion.

In After the people would not assemble before the commissioners in no houses, but in open places, and in Huntingdonshire diuerse resisted the commissioners, and would not suffer them to sit, which were apprehended and sent to the Fleet. The duke of Suffolke sitting in commission about this subside in Suffolke, perswaded by courteous meanes the rich clothiers to assent thereto: but when they came home, and went about to discharge and put from them their spinners, carbers, fullers, weavers, and other artificers, which they kept in worke afore time, the people began to assemble in companies. Wherof when the duke was aduertised, he commanded the constables that euerie mans hartes should be taken from him. But when that was knowne, then the rage of the people increased, raising openie on the duke, and Sir Robert Druce, and threatened them with death, and the cardinal also. And herewith there assembled together after the manner of rebels four thousand men of Lanark, Sudburie, Wyndesore, and other towne thersabouts, which put themselves in hartesse, and raised the beis alarme, and began still to assemble in great number.

The duke of Suffolke perceiuing this, began to gather such power as he could, but that was verie slender, for the gentlemen that were with the duke, but so much that all the bridges were broken, so that the assemble of those rebels was somewhat letted. The duke of Suffolke being therof aduertised, gathered a great power in Suffolke, and came towards the commons, sending to them to know their intent, received answer, that they would live and die in the kings causes, and be to him obedient. Therupon he came himselfe to talke with them, and willing to know who was their capitaine, that he might answer for them all: it was told him by one John Greene a man of fiftie yeares of age, that Howertie was their capitaine, the which with his cousin Jocerelle, had brought them to that doing. For whereas they and a great number of other in that countrie, had not not upon themselves, but upon the substantiall occupiers, now that they through such payments as were demanded of them, were not able to maintain them in worke, they must of necessity perishe, want of sustentance.

The duke hearing this matter, was sore for their case, and promised them, that if they would depart home to their dwellings, he would be a meane for their pardon to the king. Whereupon they were contented to depart. After this, the duke of Suffolke, and the duke of Suffolke came to Burie, and thither released much people of the countrie in their shires with halters about their neckes, meekely desiring pardon for their offences. The dukes in which demeaned themselves, that the commons were appeased, and the demand of monie ceased in all the realme, for well it was perceived that the commons would pay none. Then went the two dukes to London, and brought with them the chiefe captains of the rebellion, which were put in the Fleet. The king then came to Westminster to the cardinals palace, and assembled there a great councill, in the which he openly protested, that his mind was neuer to aske any thing of his commons which might sound to the breach of his lawes, wherefore he willed to know by whose meanes the commissions were so frentie gotten forth, to demand the first part of euerie mans goods.

The cardinal excused himselfe, and said, that when it was moued in councill how to raise monie to the kings use, the kings councill, and name the commons, for the king ges, said, that he might lawfullie demand anie summe by commission, and that by the consent of the whole counsell it was done, and toke God to witnes that he neuer desired the hinderance of the commons, but like a true counsellor deuised how to enrich the king. The king indeed was much offended that his commons was thus intreated, & thought it touched his honoz, that his counsell should attempt such a doubtfull matter in his name, and to be denied both of the spirituality and temporality. Therefore he would no more of that trouble, but caused letters to be sent into all shires, that the matter should no further be talked of: & he pardoned all them that had denied the demand openlie or secretlie. The cardinal, to deliuer himselfe of the euill will of the commons, purchased by procuring & aduancing of this demand, affirmed, and caused it to be bzuted abroad, that though his intercession the king had pardoned and released all things.

The rebels pardoned after their appearance in the Star chamber.

Those that were in the Towler and Fleet for the rebellion in Suffolke, and resisting the commissioners aswell there as in Huntingdon shire and Kent, were brought before the lords in the Star chamber, and there had their offenses opened and shewed to them: and finally the kings pardon declared, and thereon they were deliuered. In this season a great number of men of warre laie at Bullongne, and in other places thereabout, which diuerse times attempted to indamage the Englishmen, and to spoile the English pale: but they could neuer spoile the marches where the greatest part of the cattell belonging to the inhabitants was kept. Tindale men with aid of the Scots, did much hurt in England by robberies, which they exercised: and therefore were sent thither, sir Richard Bulmore, and sir Christopher Dacres, to redreine their doings. Diuerse came to them, and submitted themselves: but the greatest theues kept them in the mounteins of Cheuiot, and did much hurt, yet at length they seuered, and many of them were taken.

Tindale men great robbers

The cardinal by his power legantine sent one of his chaplains called doctor John Allen, to visit the religious houses of this realme about this season, which doctor pzactised amongst them greatlie to his profit, but more to the slander both of himselfe and of his maister. On the eighteenth daie of June, at the manor place of Wyndesore, the kings sonne (which he had begot of Elizabeth Blunt, daughter to sir John Blunt knight) called Henrie Fitzroie, was created first earle of Huntingham, and after on the selfe same daie he was created duke of Richmond and Somerset. Also the same daie the lord Henrie Courtenie earle of Denonshire, and cosine germane to the king, was created marquisse of Excester: and the lord Henrie Brandon sonne to the duke of Suffolke and the French quene, a child of two yeares old, was created earle of Lincoln: and sir Thomas Hanners lord Ross was created earle of Rutland, and sir Henrie Clifford earle of Cumberland, and the lord Fitzwater sir Robert Katcliffe was created vicount Fitzwater, and sir Thomas Bullen treasurer of the kings household was created vicount Rochefort.

Henries baie sonne created earle and duke in one daie.

The French kings mother as then regent of France, procured a safe conduct for an ambassadoz to be sent into England to treat of peace, and there, with sent John Jokin called monsieur de Claur, which (as we haue heard) in the last yeare was kept secret in maister Larks house. By his procurement a truce was granted to indure from the thirtieth of Iulie for forty daies betwene England and France both by sea and land. In the later end of Iulie came into England the cheefe president of Rome with sufficient authoritie to conclude anie agreement that should be granted. At his suite the king was contented that a truce should be taken, to endure from the fourteenth of August, till the first of December. This yeare the king sent doctor Henrie Standish bishop of saint Asse, and sir John Baker knight into Denmarke, to intreat with the nobles of that countrie for the reduction of their king Christierne to his realme and former dignitie: but the Danes hated him so much for his crueltie, that they could not abide to heare of anie such matter, and so these ambassadoz returned without speeding of their purpose for the which they were sent.

But the French ambassadoz did so much both by offers and intreaties, that the king condescended to a peace, which being concluded, was proclaimed in London with a trumpet the eight of September. By the covenants of this peace the king of England should receiue at certeine daies twentie hundred thousand crownes, which then amounted in sterling monie to the summe of foure hundred thousand pounds sterling, of which one payment of fiftie thousand pounds was paid in hand. In October were sent into France, sir William Fitzwilliam treasurer of the kings house, and doctor Tailor, as ambassadoz from the king of England to the labie regent, whome they found at the citie of Lion, where, of hir they were honozable receiued: and in their presence the said labie regent toke a corporall oth in solemne wise, and according to the custome in such cases used, to performe all the articles and covenants passed and concluded in the league and treatie of peace by his commissioners.

The emperour was nothing pleased, in that the king of England had thus concluded peace with the Frenchmen, and therefore the English merchants were not so courtouslie dealt with, as they had bene afore time. In this winter was great death in London, so that the terme was adourned: and the king kept his Christmasse at Eltham, with a small number, and therefore it was called the still Christmasse. In Januarie was a peace concluded betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland for three yeares and six moneths. The cardinal about this time comming to the court, which then laie (as before we haue heard) at Eltham, toke order for altering the state of the kings house. Spanie officers and other seruants were discharged, and put to their pensions and annuities. In which number were fourtescore and foure yeomen of the gard, which before hauing twelue pence the daie with checke, were now allowed five pence the daie without checke, and commanded to go home into their countries. Diuers ordinances were made at that season by the cardinal, touching the gouernance of the kings house, more profitable than honozable, as some said, and were called long after, The statutes of Eltham.

On Shrouetuesdaie there was a solemne iusts held at the manor of Grenewich, the king & eleuen other on the one part, and the marquisse of Excester with eleuen other on the contrarie part. At those iusts by chance of shiuring of a speare sir Francis Brian lost one of his eyes. The eleuenth of February being fundaie, the cardinal with great pompe came to the cathedrall church of Bawles, where he sat in pontificalibus under his cloth of estate of rich cloth of gold, and there doctor Barnes an Augustine frier bare a fagot for certeine points of heresie alleged against him; and two merchants of the Shilleard bare fagots for eating of flesh on a fridaie: and there the bishop of Rochester doctor Fisher made a sermon against apartine Luther, which certeine yeares before, that is to wit, about the yeare a thousand five hundred and eightene, had begun to preach and write against the authoritie of the pope.

A band article was made be-the eight and his brother the king of France.

We must here note, that the emperor being at Windsor in the fourteenth yere of the kings reigne covenanted, amongst other things, to take to wife the ladie Marie daughter to the king of England: but now upon considerations his mind changed, for the which the Englishmen sore murmured against him. On the nine and twentieth of Aprill being sundaye, the cardinall sang a solemne masse in the kings chappell at Greenwich, and after the same was ended, the king swore in presence of the ambassadoys of France, and of the ambassadoys of Rome, of the emperor of Venice, and of Florence, to observe and keepe the peace and league concluded betwixt him and his loving brother, and perpetuall alie the French king, during his life and one yere after.

In this meane while, there was a secret league concluded betwixt the pope, the Venetians, the Florentines, and Francis Sforza duke of Milan: into the which league the French king also entered, after he was returned into France. There was also place left to the king of England to enter into the same league, and likewise to all other kings and princes: and if the king of England would, he should be admitted as protector of the same. But the emperor might not be admitted, till he had delivered the French kings children (having a reasonable summe of monie for the same) and had restored the duke of Milan to his whole duchie. It was thought indeed, that the emperor being wrongfullie informed against this duke, rather through envie of some of the emperours captains, than for any cause ministered by the duke, dealt verie treightlie with him, and meant to defeat him of his duchie. For redresse therof, and also to provide that the emperor should not grow too strong in Italie to the danger of other estates, this league was devised: by force whereof he might be brought to reason, if he would refuse convenient offers and indifferent waies of agreement.

This league was concluded the two and twentieth of Maie in this yere. What followed thereof, ye may read more at large in the histories of Italie and France, where the warres are more at large touched, which chanced in that season betwixt the emperor, and the confederats, and how the imperiall armie toke the citie of Rome, and besieging the pope in cassell saint Angelo, constrained him to yield, and agree to certaine propositions put unto him. ¶ Who being by his aduersitie made naked of all helpe present, and lesse expectation to be rescued there was so great want of valour and order, was driven to turn the race of his fortune, compounding the first daie of June with the imperials almost under the same conditions with the which he might have accorded before. That the pope should paie to the armie four hundred thousand duckets in this order: one hundred thousand presentlie to be defraied of the gold, monie, and treasure reserved in the cassell: fiftie thousand within twentie daies, and two hundred and fiftie thousand within two moneths: assigning to him for these defraiments, an impost of monie to be charged upon the whole church state. That he should deliver into the power of the emperor, to retaine them so long as he thought good, the cassell saint Angelo, the rocks of Ostia, of Civita Vecchia, of Civita Castellana, together with the cities of Parma, Plasencia, and Modena.

Furthermore, that the pope together with all those cardinals that were with him, which were thirtene in number, should remaine prisoners within the cassell, untill the first payment of an hundred and fiftie thousand duckets were satisfied. That afterwards they should go to Naples or to Caietta, to expect what the emperor would determine of them. That for assurance of the payments, wherof he third part apportioned to the Spaniards, he should deliver in for hostages, the archbishops of Siponto and Bisca, the bishops of Bistola & Verona, together with James Salviatio, Simon de Ricapola, and Laurence brother to cardinall Rodolfo. That Hans de Cero, Albert Pio, Dattio Baillon, the knight Casalo, the ambassadour of England, with all others that were saved within the cassell, except the pope and the cardinals, should depart in suertie. That the pope should give absolution to the Colonnois of the censures they had incurred. And that when he should be led out of Rome, a legat should remaine there for him with authoritie to dispose and administer iustice.

During the popes captivitie, Rome was sore afflicted with the plague, in somuch that the rage thereof so greatlie increased, that the cassell of saint Angelo was visited, to the great danger of the life of the pope; about whome died certene spectall men that did service to his person: who amid so manie afflictions and aduersities, and no other hope remaining to him than in the clemencie of the emperor, appointed for legat with the consent of the captains, cardinall Alexander of Farnese, who notwithstanding being issued out of the cassell, and Rome, refused under that occasion to go in the said legation. The captains desired to carie the person of the pope with the thirtene cardinals that were with him, to Caietta: but he laboured against that resolution with great diligence, petitions, and art.]

This yere in the citie of London a great grudge was conceived against merchants strangers, for that they by vertue of licences, which they had purchased to bring woad into the realme, contrarie to a statute thereof provided, brought over such plentie thereof, and uttered it aswell in the citie, as abroad in the countrie, so franklie, that Englishmens woad laie unbought. At length the maior called a common council in the month of August, and there were manie billes laied against the strangers, and at last it was enacted, that no citizen nor freman should buy nor sell in no place, nor exchange nor meddle with certene strangers, called Anthonie Bonuice, Laurence Bonuice, Anthonie Ciuale, Anthonie Caueler, Francis de Ward, Thomas Calneant, and a great sort more, whose names I let passe. And if any person did meddle or occupie with them contrarie to this act, he should lose his freedom and liberty in the citie of London. By which act the strangers were so bideled, that they came to a reasonable point and conclusion.

In this season the angell noble was tuff the first part of an ounce Troie, so that six angells were tuff an ounce, which was fourtie shillings sterling; & the angell was worth two ounces of siluer: so that six angells were worth twelue ounces, which was but fourtie shillings in siluer. By reason of the good weight and low valuation of the English coine, merchants daily carried ouer great store, because the same was much inhauced there. So that, to meet with this inconuenience, in September proclamation was made through all England, that the angell should

The king kept a solemne Christmasse at Greene, with with reuerles, masks, disguisings, & bankets: and the thirtieth daie of December, was an enterpryse of iusts made at the tilt by six gentlemen, against all comers, which balliantlie furnished the same, both with speare and sword: and like iusts were kept the third daie of Januarie, where were three hundred speares broken. That same night, the king and manie yong gentlemen with him, came to Bidewell, and there put him and sixtene other, all in masking apparell, and then toke his barge, and rowed to the cardinals place, where were at supper a great companie of lordes and ladies, and then the maskers danced, and made goodlie pastime: and when they had well danced, the ladies plucked awaie their visors, and so they were all knownen, and to the king was made a great banquet.

On the fourteenth of Januarie came to the court don Hugo de Mendoza, a man of a noble familie in Spaine: he came as ambassadour from the emperour to the king, with large commission, for the emperour put it to the kings determination, whether his demands which he required of the French king were reasonable or not. This noble man carried here two yeres. This Christmasse was a goodlie disguising plaied at Grates In, which was compiled for the most part by maister John Ro, sergeant at the law manie yeres past, and long before the cardinall had any authoritie. The effect of the play was, that lord gouernance was ruled by dissipation and negligence, by whose misgouernance and euill order ladies publike weale was put from gouernance: which caused rumor, popul, inward grudge and disdain of wanton souereignetie, to rise with a great multitude, to expell negligence and dissipation, and to restore publike welth againe to his estate, which was so done.

ment of the plaie

This plaie was so set forth with rich and costlie apparell, with strange deuises of masks & morisshes, that it was highlie praised of all men, sauing of the cardinall, which imagined that the play had bene deuised of him, and in a great furie sent for the said maister Ro, and toke from him his cosse, and sent him to the Fleet; and after he sent for the yong gentlemen, that plaied in the plaie, and them highlie rebuked and threatened, and sent one of them called Thomas Poile of Kent to the Fleet, but by means of friends maister Ro and he were deliuered at last. This plaie so displeased the cardinall, and yet it was neuer meant to him, as you haue heard. Wherefore manie wisemen grudged to see him take it so hartlie, and euer the cardinall said that the king was highlie displeased with it, and spake nothing of himselfe. But what will you haue of a guiltie conscience but to suspect all things to be said of him (as if all the world knew his wickednesse) according to the old verse:

Confitemi ipse sibi de se putat omnia dici.

The second of March were receiued into London the bishop of Tarbe, Francis bicount of Thurane, and maister Anthonie Welsie second president of Paris, as ambassadours from the French king. They were lodged in Tailors hall. On Shrouetuesdaie the king himselfe in a new harnesse all gilt, of a strange fashion that had not bene seene, and with him eight gentlemen all in cloth of gold of one sute, embroidered with knots of silver, and the marques of Cresser, and eight with him in blew velvet and white sattin, like the waues of the sea, these men of armes came to the tilt, and there ran manie fresh courses, till two hundred fourscore and six speares were broken, and then they disarmed and went to the quenes chamber, where for them was provided a costlie banquet.

The French ambassadours sued (as was said) to haue the ladie Marie daughter to the K. of England, giuen in mariage to the duke of Orleans, second sonne to the French king: but that matter was put in suspense for diuerse considerations. And one was, for that the president of Paris doubted whether the mariage betwene the king and his mother (he being his brother's wife) was lawfull or not. While the French ambassadours laie thus in London, it happened one euening as they were coming from the Blacke friers, from supper to the Tailors hall, two boies were in a gutter casting downe rubbish, which the raine had driuen there, and vntwares hit a lackie belonging to the bicount of Thurane, and hurt him nothing, for scantlie touched it his cote. But the French lords toke the matter highlie, as a thing done in despite, & sent word to the cardinall. Who being too hasty of credence, sent for sir Thomas Seimor knight, lord maior of the citie, and in all hast commanded him upon his allegiance, to take the husband, wife, children, and seruants of the house, and them to imprison, till he knew further of the kings pleasure, and that the two boies apprentices should be sent to the Tower: which commandement was accomplished without anie fauor. For the man, and his wife, and seruants, were kept in the counter till the first daie of Maie, which was six weekes full, and their neighbours of gentleness kept their house in the meane time, and one of the apprentices died in the Tower, and the other was almost lame. Of the crueltie of the cardinall, and of the pride of the Frenchmen, much people spake, & would haue bene reuenged on the Frenchmen, if wise men in the citie had not appeased it with faire words.

On the fourteenth daie of March were conueied from London to Greenwich by the earle of Rutland and others, the lord Gabriel de Salamanca earle of Otonburgh, John Burgrau of Silberberge, and John Faber a famous cleerke, after bishop of Lien, as ambassadours from don Ferdinand, brother to the emperour, newlie elect king of Hungarie and Beaine, after the death of his brother in law king Lewis, which was slaine by the Turke the last summer, as you haue heard before. This companie was welcomed of the high officers, and after brought in to the kings presence, all the nobilitie being present, and there after great reuerence made, maister Faber made a notable oration, taking his ground of the gospel, Exijt seminator seminare semen suum, and of that he declared how Christ and his disciples went forth to sow, and how their seed was good that fell in to the good ground, and brought forth good fruit, which was the christian faith: and then he declared how contrarie to that sowing, Mahomet had sowne seed, which brought forth euill fruit. He also shewed from the beginning, how the Turkes haue increased in power, what realmes they had conquered, what people they had subdued euen to that daie.

He declared further what acts the great Turke then liuing had done, and in especial he noted the getting of Belgrad, and of the Rhodes, and the slaying of the king of Hungarie, to the great rebuke (as he said) of all the kings christened. He set forth also what power the Turke had, what diuersities of companies, what armor, what captains he had, so that he thought, that without a maruellous great number of people he could not be overthowne. Wherefore he most humbly besought the king, as S. Georges knight, knight, and defender of the faith, to assist the king his master in that godlie warre and vertuous purpose. To this oration the is. by the mouth of sir Thomas Pope answered, that much he lamented the losse that happened in Hungarie, and if it were not for the wars which were betwene the two great princes, he thought that the Turke would not haue enterprised that act. Wherefore he with all his studie would take paine, first, to set an vnitie and peace throughout all christendome; and after that, both with monie and men, he wold be redie to helpe toward that glorious warre, as much as any other prince in christendome. After this done, the ambassadours were well thereto, and diuerse times resorted to the court, and had great cheare and good rewards, and so the third daie of Maie next ensuing, they toke their leaue and departed homeward.

In the winter season of this yeare fell great abundance of raine, and namelie in September, November, and December. And on the firstenth of January it rained so abundantly, that great floods thereby ensuing, destroyed corne fields, pastures, and drowned manie sheepe and beasts. When was it dyie till the twelue of Appill, and from thence it rained euerie day or night till the third of June, & in Maie it rained thirtie hours continuallie without ceasing, which caused great floods, & did much harme, namelie in corne, so that the next yeare it failed within this realme, and great dearth ensued.

This time a bill was set vp in London, much contrary to the honour of the cardinall, in the which the cardinall was warned that he should not counsell the king to marrie his daughter into France: for if he did, he should shew himselfe enimie to the king and the realme, with manie threatening words. This bill was deliuered to the cardinall by sir Thomas Seymour, maior of the citie, which thanked him for the same, & made much search for the author of that bill, but he could not be found, which sore displeased the cardinall. And upon this occasion the last daie of Appill at night he caused a great watch to be kept at Westminster, and had there cart guns readie charged, & caused diuerse watches to be kept about London, in Pewington, St. Johns Street, Westminster, saint Giles, Kingston, and other places nere London: which watches were kept by gentlemen & their seruants, with householders, and all for feare of the Londoners because of this bill. When the citizens knew of this, they said that they marvelled why the cardinall hated them so, for they said that if he mistrusted them, he loued them not: and where loue is not, there is hatred: and they affirmed that they neuer intendede any harme toward him, and mused of this chance. For if five or six persons had made alarm in the citie, then had entred all these watchmen with their traine, which might haue spoiled the citie without cause. Wherefore they much murmured against the cardinall and his indiscreet doings.

The French ambassadours at Greenwich on Sunday the first of Maie, swore in the name of their master the French king to obserue the peace and league concluded betwene them, for tearme of two princes lines. These ambassadours had great cheare, and lufkes were enterprised for the honour and pleasure of them at the kings commandement by sir Nicholas Carew, sir Robert Jerningham, sir Anthonie Browne, and Nicholas Haruie squier challengers. Against whome ran the marques of Excester, and thirteen with him as defendants. When these ambassadours should returne, they had great rewards giuen them of the king, and so toke their leaue and departed. Shortly after the king sent sir Thomas Bullen vicount Rochford, and sir Anthonie Browne knight, as ambassadours from him into France, which came to Paris to the bishop of Bath that late there for the king as legier.

Then these three went to the court, and saw the French king in person sweare to keepe the league & amitie concluded betwene him & the king of England. Also the king sent sir Francis Poins knight ambassadour from him to Charles the emperor, and with him went Clarenceur king of armes, to demand the one halfe of the treasure and ordinance which was taken at Paula, for so much as that warre was made as well at the kings charge as at the emperours. Also they were commanded to demand one of the French kings sonnes, which lay in hostage with the emperour, that is to wit, the duke of Anjou, to be deliuered to the king of England; and further that he should call backe his armie out of Italie. And if it were so that he refused these reasonable requests, then should they in the kings name denounce open warre against him. The English merchants liked the matter nothing at all, that there should be any warres betwixt the emperor and the king of England. And where they were desired by the cardinall to keepe their marts at Calis, they would not assent thereto.

In this meane time great warres were managed betwene the pope and other princes, amongst whom the duke of Burbon (of whom you haue heard often mention before in sundrie actions) lenieng a great power, led the same towards Rome, and incamped within the medow nere to the citie, from whence with the insolencie of a souldier he sent a trumpet to demand passage of the pope through the citie of Rome, to go with his armie to the realme of Naples. The morning following vpon the point of the daie, by the consideration of his case and the aduersities thereof, he found there remained no other hope for his affaires, than to be resolute to releue the afflictions of his armie, and according to the opportunitie that was offered by the citie of Rome, either to die or to vanquish. In which resolution pushed on more and more by the murmurs and exclamations of his souldiers, in whom he could not discern which was greater, either their insolencies or their necessities, he drew nere the suburbs by the waie of the mounteine and Santo Spirito, where he began to giue a furious assault. Wherein he seemed to haue the fauour of fortune, who made him present his armie in more fueritie by the benefit of a thicke mist, which being risen before daie, and increased with degrees of fog and thicknesse, became such a couer to his whole campe, that his souldiers were not discerned till they were nere the place where they began to giue the assault.

The duke of Burbon through a last despaire of his estate advanced before all his companies, either for that he had no other expectation of refuge, in case he returned not victorious, or else by his owne example he thought to call on with a greater courage the lanceknights, who it seemed went not resolute to the seruice. But such was his destinie to determine his life & his glorie together, or rather such the reward of his wilfull forwardnes, which for the most part breapeth wretched effects vpon such as seeke not to accompany their valour with counsell and discretion. In the beginning of the assault he was stricken with a bullet of an harquebuz, of which wound he fell downe dead to the earth, receiuing instant death. His bodie and life the price of the action, which contrarie to all iustice and pietie he went about to execute. But much lesse that his death did abate or diminish, seeing it did inflame and redouble the courage of his souldiers, who fighting with a wonderfull constancie the space of two houres, made waie at last by their hands and weapons to enter the suburbs, where they were were not onelie holpen by the weaknesse of the rampires which were great and generall, but also they found helpe in the slender resistance which the defendants made.

The morall of the foze laid action worth the noting.

An experience of right good doctrine, to such as haue not as yet gotten by the benefit of examples past, the knowledge of things present, who in that action maie discern what propertie of difference is betwene the vertue of souldiours exercised and trained in war, and armes newlis and hapillie leuied, and compounded of the multitude of a people more wilfull than skilfull; and by so much lesse apt to be drawn vnder discipline, by how much more by their nature and custome they are seldome conformable to anie good order. For there was at the defense of the suburbs one part of the youth of Rome, vnder the ensignes of the people; notwithstanding that manie of the Cebelins & faction of Colonna desired, or at least did not feare the victorie of the imperials. They hoped in regard of their faction, to receiue no harme or offense by the victors: the same being the cause whie they proceeded so coldlie in the defense. Neuer thelesse, for that according to the rules of warre, it is a hard matter to take towines without artilleries, there died of the assailants, partlie by that want, and partlie through their wilfull forwardnesse, about a thousand footmen; who hauing once by their valor made the waie open to enter in, all the defendants fled before them as men whose feare was far aboue anie other sense or passion in them.

Rome taken and sacked.

In which disorder, some took the waie which his fortune and not his wit laid out for him: some in the astonishment seeking to fle, who durst no more fight, were slaine by the enimic afore he could resolve vpon the waie of his safetie; some either better prepared, or more hapillie preferred, found that safetie in running away, which they could not but doubt if they had longer endured the fight: and some with that resolution which their present calamitie would suffer, ran by heapes towards the castell, where in place of rescue they found a feare conformable to their owne: in so much as all things being reduced to confusion and manifest flight, the suburbs were entierlie abandoned & left a preie to the victors. And the person of the pope, who expected with great deuotion in the palace of Clatican what would be the issue of the assault, hearing that the enimies were entered, had also (with the others) his passions of feare & frailtie, and in that timorous contemplation of his owne perill, he fled with certaine cardinales to the castell.

The pope with certaine cardinales fle to the castell of saint Angelo.

This feare kept him from being resolute in a perill that was so desperate, neither did he thinke, that with the presence and maiestie of his person, though it was couered with the haile of the highest dignitie on earth, he was able to put by the danger, which the valor and fidelitie of his souldiers could not defend with their weapons. Where he consulted with the cardinales, whether it were more for his safetie to remaine there, or during the furie of the astonishment, to retire with the light horsemen of his gard into some place of more suertie by the waie of Rome. But he, who was appointed by destinie, to be an example of the calamities that maie thunder vpon popes, and how fraile is the authoritie and maiestie of that see, being certified by the relation of Berard de Padoa, who was fled from the armie imperiall, that the duke of Burboin was dead, and that the whole armie standing abated in courage for the death of their capteine, desired to come to accord with him. In which matter they sent out men to parlie with the principallies there, he wretchedlie left there all his counsellies to go awaie, both he and his capteins remaining no lesse irresolute in the prouisions for defense, than they had bene slow in the expeditions.

So that the daie following, the Spaniards neither taking order nor counsell, to defend the quarter beyond Liber, entered the place without anie resistance. And from thence, not finding anie impediments to stop their victorie, the same euening they entered the citie of Rome by the bridge Nillo, where except such as reposed in the confidence of their faction, and certaine cardinales, who for that they bare a name to embrace the emperours quarrell, beleeued to find more suertie than the others, all the residue of the court and citie (as happeneth in accidents so furious) was conuerted into fleeing and confusion. But the souldiours being within the citie, which they knew wanted nothing to make them right glorious, and well satisfied of all things appertaining to their desires, they began to omit no time to execute the thing they had so deartlie bought. Cuprie one ran to pillage with the same vnbidded libertie, which in such cases maketh souldiours both insolent and impious.

There was small care or regard borne either to the name of friends, factions, or fauourers; and much lesse was respected the authoritie of cardinales and prelats, or dignitie of temples and monasteries; and lastlie, not reserved from violation, the holie relikes brought thither from all parts of the world; yea euen things sacred, and speciallie dedicated, were profaned from their shrines and holie places, and made subiect to the furious wills and discretion of the souldiours. It is not onelie impossible to reaccount, but also to imagine the calamities of that citie raised to a wonderfull greatnesse, and appointed by Gods ordinance to suffer manie fortunes and directions, hauing bene sacked by the Goths within ix. C. and lxxx. yeares. It is hard to particulate the greatnesse of the preie, both for the generall wealth and riches which the greedy hands of the souldiours had made vp in heaps, and for other things more rare and pretious drawne out of the store-houses of merchants and courtiers. But the matter which made the spoile infinit in value, was the qualitie and great number of prisoners redeemed with most rich and huge ransomes.

And to make by a full tragedie of miserie and infamie, the lanceknights being so much the more insolent and cruell, by how much they bare hatred to the name of the church of Rome, took prisoners certaine prelats, whom with great contempt and indignitie they set vpon asses and leane mules, and with their faces reuered to the crowne of the beasts, they led them thorough the citie of Rome, apparelled with the habits and markes of their dignitie: yea they passed manie of them to cruell toiments, who either died in the furie of the action, or at least with the painefulnesse thereof they liued not long after, first yielding a rancome, and afterwards rendering their liues. The generall slaughter as well at the assault as in the rage of sacking, was about foure thousand bodies. All the palaces of the cardinales were sacked, except some particulars, who to saue the merchants that were retired thither with their goods, together with the persons and goods of manie others reserved of the generall calamitie, made promise of great summes of monie. To whom notwithstanding was vsed this iniquitie, that some of them that had compounded with the Spaniards, were afterwards sacked by the lanceknights, or at least constrained to a second rancome.

The ladie marquesse of Mantua compounded for hir palace for the summe of fiftie thousand ducats, which were paid by the merchants and others retired thither: of which summe the rumour ran, that Ferrand hir sonne had ten thousand for his share.

The Spaniards entered into Rome by the bridge Nillo.

Compounding with the lanceknights to save certain persons and goods.

The cardinall of Slenita dedicated in a perpetuall deuotion to the name of the emperoz, after he had agreed with the Spaniards, as well for him selfe as for his palace, was afterwards made prisoner by the lanceknights, who made botie and prcie of his palace; and afterwards leading him all naked with buffets and bastanadoes into the bozough, he was driuen to redeme his life out of their hands, with a promise of five thousand duckats. The cardinales Spinera and Bonsero passed vnder almost the like calamitie, who being prisoners to the lanceknights, were rated at a ranome which they paid, after they had bene in a vile spectacle caried in procession thorough the towne of Rome.

This furie of souldiours executed in a place of so great riches and profit, could endure no dispensation of anie sort or qualitie of men, seeing the prelates and cardinales, Spanissh and Germans, who made themselves assured that the souldiours of their nation would spare them from oppression and taration, were taken and passed by the same measure of miserie and calamitie as others did. Right pittifull were the criengs and lamentations of the women of Rome: and no lesse worthie of compassion, the calamitie of nunnies and virgins professed, whom the souldiours rauished by tropes out of their houses to satiffie their lust, no age, no sex, no dignitie or calling was free from the violation of souldiours, in whom it was doubtfull whether bare more rule, the humoz of crueltie to kill, or the appetite of lust to deshouse, or lastlie, the rage of couetousnesse to rob and spoile: yea in the violation of these women might be discerned a confirmation of the iudgements of God hid den from mortall men, for that he suffered to be deli uered by to the violence of men, barbarous and bloody, the renowned chastitie of women professed and virgins.

To this compassion was ioined the infinite clamors of men forced against all law of humanitie, partie to wrest from them vtreasonable ransomes, and partie to disclose their goods which they had hid den from the ruine of the souldiours. All these things, sacraments and relikes of saints, whereof the churches were full, being despoiled of their ornaments, were pulled downe, and laid vpon the earth, suffering no small propfanations, by the vile hands of the lanceknights. And whatsoever remained vpon the preies and spoillings of the imperiales, which were things but base and vile, were raked and caried away by the pezants and tenants of the lands of the Colonnois, whose insolencie caried them into Rome during the generall furie. Whelie the cardinall of Colonno arriuing the daie after, preferred in his compassion the honoz of manie women that hapilie were fled for rescue into his house. The rumoz went that the valuation and prcie of this sacke in gold, silver, and iewels, amounted to more than a millian of duckats, but the matter of ransomes contained a greater quantitie.]

When Rome was thus taken by the imperiales, and the pope brought into captiuitie, therewith the king was so incensed against the emperour by the instigation of the cardinall, that he had determined not to spare anie treasure for the popes deliuerance. There rose a secret bruite in London that the kings confessor doctor Longland, and diuerse other great clerks had told the king that the marriage betwene him and the ladie Katharine, late wife to his brother prince Arthur was not lawfull: whereupon the king should sue a diuorse, and marrie the duchesse of Alans for sister to the French king at the towne of Calis this summer: and that the vicount Rochford had brought with him the picture of the said ladie. The king was offended with those tales, and sent for sir

Thomas Setmore mazo of the citie of London, secretly charging him to see that the people ceased from such talke.

But what so euer the commons talked, it was determined that the cardinall should go ouer into France as high ambassadour for the king, and to take with him twelue score thousand pounds, to be employed on the warres to be made by the confederats against the emperour, if he would not condescend to such demands as the English ambassadours on the kings behalfe should exhibit vnto him. The third of Iulie this triumphant cardinall passed thorough London with twelue hundred horse towards the sea side, and comming vnto Canturburie rested there, and there declared to the people what had chanced vnto the pope, and caused the monks of Chyffes church to sing their Letanie after this maner: Sancta Maria ora pro Clemente papa, &c. Then he exhorted the people to fast and prae for the popes deliuerance, accordinglie as he had alreadie sent commissions vnto all the bishops within the realme to follow that order, which was to fast three daies in the weeke, and to be in euerie parish solemne processions. The eleuenth of Iulie the cardinall toke shipping at Dover, and landed the same daie at Calis, from whence he departed the two and twentieth of Iulie, and with him was the bishop of London Cuthbert Tunstall, the lord Sands chamberleine to the king, the earle of Derby, sir Henrie Guilford, sir Thomas Pope, with manie other knights and esquires, in all to the number of twelue hundred horse, and of carriages there were foure score wagons, and three score mules and sumpter horses.

He that is desirous to vnderstand with what honour this triumphant cardinall was receiued in all places as he passed thorough Picardie by order giuen by the French king, maie read thereof at large in the chronicles of maister Edward Hall. At Amiens he was receiued by the French king himselfe, and by his mother with all other chiefe peres of France. There was nothing forgot that might do him honour or pleasure. But to the effect of his businesse. After he had shewed his commission, they fell in counsell, and in the end grew to a full conclusion of a league to be accorded and established betwixt the kings of England and France: the couenants and articles whereof were drawne and written vp in a faire charter, which was sealed in solemne wise, and deliuered vnto the cardinals by the kings owne hand.

After this, it was agreed, that Duot de Foies, commonlie called monsieur de Lawtrech, should go into Italie with a puissant armie to procure the popes deliuerance, & repell the emperours poluer out of all the partie of Italie, if he refused such reasonable offers & articles of agreement as were drawen, & should be exhibited to him. In this armie went sir Robert Feringham, John Carew of Hakam, & 80 other English gentlemen, which were sent by the cardinall from Amiens. When the armie was assembled, the cardinall deliuered the monie which he had brought out of England with him in barrels, with the which the armie was paid two moneths before hand, & the surplisage was deliuered to sir Robert Feringham, which was called treasure of the wars. This armie was called in Latine, Exercitus Angliae & Gallorum regum pro pontifice Romano liberando congregatus, that is to saie, The armie of the kings of England and France, gathered for the deliuerance of the bishop of Rome: and so was it reputed.

In this meane time the English ambassadozs, sir Francis Pouns and Clarenceaux the herald, were come into Spaine, and there to the emperour in the towne of Ale Dolliffe the first of Iulie deliuered the kings letters, and further declared their messages as they had in commandement. The emperor made to them a courteous answer for that time, and said he would take counsell in the matter, and then should they receiue further answer, and in the meane time they might repose them. Within a date or two after he called to him doctor Le that was the kings ambassador legier there with him, & the said sir Francis Poins, and said to them; My lordes we haue perceiued the king your maisters demands, which are weightie and of great importance. Wherefore we intend with all speed to write to the king our uncle, and when we haue receiued answer from him, we shall deliuer you of such things as you require, praieng you in the meane time to take patience.

The emperor protracted time of purpose, because he was loth to answer directlie to such greivous and most irkesome complaints, because he gessed by the course of things that the French king would shortly be constrained to agree to those conditions of peace, which he at the first had offered. But the French king & the cardinall being together at Amiens, amongst other things determined there betwixt them in counsell, deuised further what articles of offer should be sent to the emperor, which if he refused, then open defiance to be made vnto him in name of both the kings. The articles were these in effect.

Articles proposed to the emperor being in number sixtene.

1 First that the French king should paie for his rancome 25000 crownes: one wixter calleth it two millions. 2 Also that he should release all the pension that he had in Naples, with all the right of the same. 3 Also that he should neuer claime title to the dutchie of Millane. 4 Also he should release the superiortie of Flanders for ever, and the right which he had to the citie of Torone. 5 Also he should release all the homages of all persons within those countries. 6 Also to withdraue his armie out of Italie. 7 Also to forsake the aid of the Switzers against the emperor. 8 Also to take no moze part with Robert de la Marck against the emperor. 9 Also neuer to aid the king of Nauarre against him, although he had married the kings sister. 10 Also neuer to aid the duke of Gelderland, nor to challenge the same dutchie. 11 Also to aid the emperor with ships and men to his coronation. 12 Also to marie the ladie Celenor quene of Portugall sister to the emperor. 13 Also that the Dolphine should marie the said quenes daughter. 14 Also that if the French king had anie childe male by the said quene, then the dutchie of Burgognie to remaine to the said childe being male. 15 Also that the French king should be friend to the emperor & his friends; and enemie to his enemies.

These with manie other articles, which were not openlie knowne, were sent to the bishop of Tarbe, and to the vicount of Thuraine ambassadors with the emperor from the French king. Other articles were also sent to the English ambassadors being in Spaine, as to moue the emperor to some reasonable end with the French king: and that the king of England would release vnto him all the summes of monie due to him, as well by the emperor Maximilian his grandfather as himselfe, and take the French king as debto: for the same. If he would not agree to these offers, then was it accorded, that the French king should marrie the ladie Marie daughter to the king of England, and they both to be enemies to the emperor. When all these things were concluded, the cardinall took his leaue of the French king & his mother, and with great rewards returned, comming to Richmond, where the king then laie, the last of September.

Ambassadors from the French king.

In October, there came ambassadors from the French king into England, the lord Annas de Mont-merancie, great maister of the said French kings house, the bishop of Baion chiefe president of Rone, and monsieur de Humiers accompanied with sicke gentlemen well appointed. These ambassadors were receiued with all honour that might be deuised. On Alhalloves daie the king comming to the cathedrall church of saint Paule, where the cardinall sang masse, swore befoze the high altar in the presence of the French ambassadors to keepe and performe the league. On sundaie the tenth of Nouember, the king being elected knight of the order of St. Michael, receiued at Grænelwich the said order by the hands of the great maister of France, and monsieur Humiers that were companions of the same order: in like case as the French king the same daie at Paris receiued the order of the garter by the hands of the lord Aile, doctor Tailor, maister of the rolles, sir Nicholas Carew knight maister of the kings horses, sir Anthonie Botone knight, and sir Thomas Wriothesleie knight, otherwise called Cartier king of armes, the which were sent thither with the whole habit, collar, and other habillements of the order as apperteined.

After that the French ambassadors had bene highlie feasted, banketed, and interteined, with all hono: and pastime conuenient, the great maister and all his companie toke leaue of the king, and with great rewards returned into France, leaving the bishop of Baion behind them, who abode ambassador legier in England. In this moneth of Nouember, Arthur Wilshe, Gesteire Rone, and one Goret that spake against the popes authoritie, were abtured by the cardinall. By reason of the great wet that fell in the sowing time of the cozne, and in the beginning of the last yeare, now in the beginning of this cozne so failed, that in the citie of London for a while bread was scant, by reason that commissioners appointed to see order taken in shires about, ordeined that none should be conueied out of one shire into another.

Which order had like to haue bred disorder, for that euerie countrie and place was not prouided alike, and namelie London, that maketh his prouision out of other places, felt great inconuenience hereby, till the merchants of the Stiliard, and others out of the Dutch countries, brought such plentie, that it was better cheape in London than in anie other part of England, for the king also releued the citizens in time of their need with a thousand quarters by waie of lone of his owne prouision. The scarcitie at the first was moze than the dearth. For in the beginning of their want, wheat was onelie at sixtene shillings a quarter, & from thence it rose to twentie shillings, and after to sir and twentie shillings eight pence the quarter, till remedie by outward prouision was procured and had. In this meane while the lord Lautrech with his armie was entred into Italie, where how he sped, and what came of that expedition, we shall find in the histories of France and Italie, and therefore in this place I passe it over. Sir Francis Poins knight, in the end of December, returned out of Spaine into England, leaving Clarceur behind him to bring further answer.

The emperor at the request of this sir Francis Poins, who made the same in name of his maister the king of England, was contented to release twelue articles, which were reputed most preiudiciall to the French king, onelie to gratifie the king of England: but the cardinall kept the king still in displeasure toward the emperor, for the fauour which he bare to the French king, whose onelie purposes he sought to aduance. The articles which were drauene at Amiens when the cardinall was there, were exhibited to the emperor by the French ambassadors, and because he refused the same, word was sent to Clarenceur king of armes, to make defiance to the emperor. Whereupon on the Wednesday the two and twentieth of Januarie, Guien king of armes to the French king, and Clarenceur king of armes to the king of England, being in the cite of Burges in Spaine, came to the court of Charles the elect emperor, about nine of the clocke in the morning, and there did request of his maiestie, that it would please him to appoint them an houre of audience.

The lord de Chaour by ordinance from his maiestie gaue them answer, that it should be about ten of the clocke before none the same daie. And at the same houre his maiestie came into the great hall of his court accompanied with diuerse pzelats, dukes, marquesses, earles, barons, and other great lords and good personages, of diuerse nations of his kingdom and seignories in great number. The emperor sitting in a chaire prepared according to his dignitie, the two kings of armes of France & England being in the nether end of the hall, holding upon their left arms each one his coat of armes, did make three solenne reuerences accustomed, with knee to the ground. And when they were at the lowest staire before his imperiall maiestie, Clarenceur king of armes of England, hauing the words in both their names, spake as followeth.

Sir, following the three edicts inuolablie kept and obserued by your predecessours emperours of Rome, kings, princes, and capitains, Guien king of armes of the most christianised king; and also Clarenceur king of armes to the king of England our soueraigne & naturall lords: we presenting our selues before your sacred maiestie, for to declare certaine things from the said kings our maisters: beseech your maiestie, that hauing regard to the said labours according to your benignitie and mercie, that it would please you to giue vs sure access and good intreating in your countries, lands, and seignories, attending your answer, with sure conduct to returne vnto the countries, lands, and seignories of our said soueraigne lords. The emperor then bad them saie on what foucer the kings your maisters haue giuen you in charge: your priuileges shall be kept, none shall do you any displeasure within my kingdomes or territories. After this, Guien read a writing signed with the hand of the said Guien king of armes.

A copie of the said writing read as followeth.

Sir, the most christianised king my soueraigne and naturall lord hath commanded me to saie to you, that he hath conceived a maruelous greife and displeasure of that, that in place of amitie, which he so much desired to haue with you, the former enmitie in full force still remaineth. By the which he seeth and perceiueth, that the evils and inconueniences long since begun, shall continue and augment, not onelie vnto you, and vnto him, with your vassals and subiects, but also vnto all christendome: and that the forces and youths which the one and the other ought to employ against the enemies of the faith, shall be spent to the effusion of christian blood, and in offense vnto God: and that you and he endowd with so manie gracious gifts, shall not inioy the benefits, which it pleased the son of God to leane to vs, by his testament, which is peace, wherof all goodnesse proceedeth: and in place of the same shall haue war, wherof followeth all calamities, dangers, inconueniences, pouerties, and miseries. Wherevnto you shall submit your selfe vnto them whome ye may command, and shall hazard the blood and substance of your subiects in the pursues of strangers. Euerie one as for himselfe ought to haue regard thereto, and for the short time that we haue here to liue, not to go about to depriue himselfe of that tranquillitie, ioy, god regard and pastime, that the princes may haue by peace: and by following the warre, to be in pouertie, heauinesse, and hazard of losse of goods, honours, and liues: and that worst is, after they haue had euill daies in this world, to be in danger of eternall paine in the world to come, thorough them that haue bene the cause thereof, and that would not yeld vnto reason.

The king my soueraigne lord is ready to put himselfe for his part in all deuoir, and more than so, to haue peace and amitie with you: and by this means peace shall be procured throughout all christendome, whereby men might do God good seruice, in making warre on the Infidels, which will be so thankfull to him, that it will put off the punishment of faultes, which haue bene committed heretofore by reason of the warres, which haue too long indured betwixne you two, and not yet like to cease, considering the termes which you hold and seeke to mainteine, sith on the one part, certeine aduocating themselves on you, haue assailed and taken by force the cite of Rome, which is the place of the holie and apostolike see, where they haue committed and done all the mischefe that might be deuised.

The churches and reliques were profaned, the pope holding saint Peters seat, as vicar of God on earth, taken and put out of his libertie. By means whereof, they that haue committed and executed the said execrable deeds and wickednesse, with their authors and fautors, be fallen and run in paines of right; and they that hold them captiues, beare themselves on you; and he that doth keepe them, hath bene and is of the principall capitains, of whome you haue bene serued in your warres in Italie and other parts. And on the other side, the difference which at this time resteth betwixne you and the king my soueraigne and naturall lord, is principallie vpon the ranfome and recouerie of the princes his sonnes, which you hold for hostages of the same. He hath oftentimes offered, and yet doth offer to paie to you, and giue to you, not onelie that which may be said to be reasonable, and in such cases accustomed, but also more largelie.

You ought not to stand vpon things which by force and constraint he hath promised, the which iustlie and honestlie he maie not performe nor accomplish: you had a great deale more gained, to haue taken the said ranfome which was offered vnto you, than to continue the warre, and to giue occasion of all the evils and inconueniences that daily happen thereby thorough christendome. You see the king of England, with whome he hath brotherlie amitie for euer, and also the Venetians, Florentines, and duke of War, and other princes and potentats, following and holding the partie of the said christian king, for that they see he yeldeth to reason, and by reason you will not thereto incline, the vniuersall peace can not be concluded in christendome. The enemies of the faith gaine countries: all Italie is in armes, blood and rapine, and the apostolike see in trouble: so that if on your part you seeke not reindie, and that things do thus continue as they haue begun, it is to be feared that God will be angrie.

And for as much (sir) as to the declarations which the aboue said princes haue offered vnto you, and the presentations which the said christian king hath made vnto you, you haue refused to giue eare, thereby to come to some accord with him, and to content your selfe with a ranfome more than reasonable: also for that that you will not render unto his god brother, perpetuall alie and confederat, the king of England, that which is his, let the pope at libertie, and leaue I talie in peace and tranquillitie, he hath commanded me to declare, signifie, and notifie unto you, his great græfe and displeasure, with his said god brother the king of England, that they will hold and take you for their enimie, declaring all maner of treaties and couenants heretofore passed betwene them and you, in all that concerneth your profit & utilitie to be nothing, and that for his part he will not obserue nor keepe the same.

What the king of England desireth of the emperor in the French kings behalfe.

Maie he hath resolved by all meanes that he may imagine with his god frends, alies, & confederats, & with all his forces to indamage you, your countries, lands, and bassals by warre, or otherwise, in such sort as he maie deuise, untill the time that you haue restored unto him his children, with honest meanes and couenants touching his ransome, delivered the pope, rendered unto the king of England that you hold of him, and acquitted the summe which you owe him, and suffer his alies and confederats to liue in peace, rest, and tranquillitie, and protesteth before God and all the world, that he doth not wish nor desire the warre, but that it wholie displeaseth him, and is not therefore the cause of the euill that is or maie come thereof, considering that he hath put, and will put himselfe vnto all reason, as he hath offered and signified unto you and to all other christian princes, and yet doth.

The king of England meaning and the French kings for the returne of the emperours subjects out of their countries, and contrariwise.

And of all this he calleth God (who knoweth all things) to witnesse. And for that vnder colour of the publication of the pretended trette of Madrid made, he being yet prisoner in Spaine, diuerse of your subjects, and of them of the king of England, and of his haue carried their merchandises and other goods into the kingdomes, streits, and seignories the one of the other, whereby maie insue great damages, if of them no mention should be made in this present declaration and signification: my soueraine lord and the said king of England be contented that libertie be giuen vnto all subjects being in the said kingdomes, countries, streits, and seignories, to retire and depart from thence with all their goods and merchandises within fortie daies after this intimation made. Prouided that you shall do the like vnto their subjects in all & euerie their merchandises. Given the eleuenth daie of Nouember 1527, & signed Cuien king of armes.

The emperours words to Cuien the French kings herald.

The emperor after the defiance giuen by Cuien, spake in this sort: I do vnderstand that which you haue read from the king your maister, & I do much maruell why he doth desire me, for he being my prisoner by right warre, and I hauing his faith by reason he can not do it. It is vnto me a noueltie to be defied of him, seeing it is six or seuen yeares that he hath warred against me, and yet giuen me no defiance. And sith that by the grace of God I haue defended my selfe from him (as he hath scene, and euerie one else) without that he hath giuen me any warning, or considering the reason and iustification whereon I do rest my selfe, for the which I thinke I haue not otherwise deserved towards God: I hope that at this time now you aduertise me of it, being aduertised I shall defend my selfe the better, in such sort that the king your maister shall do me no hurt: for sith he doth desire me, I am halfe assured.

How the emperor was affectioned for the pope in his captiuitie.

And touching that which you spake of the pope, none hath bene more sorrowfull than I of that which was done, and it was without my knowledge or commandement: and that which hath bene done, was done by vnicelle people, without obedience to any of my captains. And yet I aduertise you, that the pope long since is set at libertie, and yesterday I had certeine newes of it. And touching the sonnes of your maister, he knoweth that I haue them for pledges; and also my lords his ambassadors know well, that the fault hath not lien in me that they haue not bene delivered. And as for that of the king of England my god brother and vnckle, I beleue if it be so as you do say, that he is not well informed of things passed: and if he were, yet could I not saie as your writing containeth, I desire to send him my reasons for to aduertise him of all the truth. And I beleue when he shall know it, that he will be vnto me as he hath bene.

The emperor somewhat to incurre the displeasure of England.

The heralds message to the emperor.

I neuer denied the monie which I borrowed of him, and I am ready to paie it as by reason & right I am bound: and thanked be God I haue enough to do it. Nevertheless, if he will make warre against me, it will be to my great displeasure, & I cannot but defend my selfe. I praye to God that he giue me no more occasion than I thinke I haue giuen vnto him. And to the rest, for that your writing is great, and the paper sheweth it selfe to be gentle, seeing that they haue written what they would, you shall giue me the writing, whereby more particularlie I maie answer in another paper, wherein shall be nothing but truth. This answer being made by his maiestie with his owne mouth vnto Cuien king of armes, the said Cuien took his cote of armes that he had on his left arme (as before is said) and put it on, and then Clarenceur king of armes of England said vnto his maiestie, not by writing, but by mouth, as followeth.

The English heralds message delivered by word of mouth.

Sir, the king my soueraine lord hath commanded me to say vnto you, that seeing the necessitie of peace in the christian religion, as well by reason of the inforcements manie yeeres past, begun by the great Turke enimie vnto our faith, which by force of armes hath taken awaie from the christians the citie and Ile of Rhodes, one of the principall bulwarks of christendome, and in Hungarie the fortress of Belgrad, and part of the countrie there, as also by heresies and new sects, of late risen in diuerse places of christendome; and likewise knowing the great warres being kindled in all parts, by meanes of which all christendome is in trouble, confusion, and marvellous division, and not long since by your people and ministers and souldiers in your armie, and vnder your captains the holie citie of Rome hath bene sacked and robbed, the person of our holie father the pope taken prisoner, and kept by your people, the cardinals likewise taken and put to ransome, the churches robbed, bishops, priests, and people of religion put to the sword, and so manie other euils, cruelties, and inhumane facts committed by your people, that the aire and the land are infected therewith.

The report of the heralds falleth out to be verifiable by Guiccardines discourse, lib. 18.

And it is verie like, that God is verie greatly stirred and prouoked vnto ire. And to speake after the maner of men, if by amendment it be not pacified, innumerable euils and inconueniences shall happen vnto all christendome. And for that the rest and increasement of the said warre, proceedeth of the contentions and debates betwene you, and the most christened king his god brother, and perpetuall alie: to make an end of which debates, the king my soueraine lord hath sent his ambassadors and others, vnto the most christened king his god brother, with whom he hath done so much, that for the loue that he hath borne him, he hath made vnto you so great offers, and so reasonable, that you cannot, nor ought

The emperor
sawmeth loth to incur the of Englands displeasure.

The herald
blat an argument spawne from benefites received to moue the emperor.

The herald of England
hereth the emperour what is the king of Eng= lands pient determination if he offers be refused.

The report of the herald
falleth out in-justifiable by Guicciardines discourse,
lib. 18.

The disposition of the king of England to the pope and the French king.

The king of England favoured the

Of which offers and conditions he hath likewise advertised you by his ambassadours, praised and besought you for the honour of God, and the wealth of all christendome, for the benefits and pleasures that he hath done vnto you diuerse waies; and that in time of your great need, that it would please you to accept the said offers; and make an end of the said warres, that haue so long endured. Likewise as a churched prince bound by the protection of his pope, and his apostolike, and consequentlie to the deliuerance of his兵innesse (whom you cannot, nor ought to, haue prisoner without great offense) that you would restore his兵innesse vnto a full and entier libertie. Also he hath oftentimes shewed by diuerse obligations, and other meanes, how you are indebted vnto him in diuerse great summes of monie, that he hath giuen and lent you in your necessitie, requiring you to make payment.

Which offers, and the augmenting of the same, haue bene made and made againe, with all demonstrations and honest reasons that haue bene possible, And in the end there hath bene made vnto you instance for the deliuerie of our holie father, whom you haue restrained or caused to be restrained in place of deliuerie, which is very strange, & against the true estate & dutie of a christian prince. So that the king my soueraigne, & the most christian king his brother, and perpetuall alie, can no longer induce it with their honours and dutie towards God and the church. And seeing you will not condescend to reason, nor accept the said offers being moze than reasonable, nor satisfie the king my said soueraigne of the debts by you due, as you are bound, he hath concluded to deliuer the said most christianised king his good brother & perpetuall alie, & other of his confederats, to doe his endeavour to constrain you by force & might of armes to deliuer our holie father, & likewise the chylizen of France, whom you hold, in pateng you a reasonable ranfome, and to satisfie him of that you owe him.

Therefore the king my soueraigne lord, as a true and constant prince, willing to keepe inuiolable his faith, which he hath promised vnto the said chryistian prince, and other his allies, and not willing to leaue the person of our said holie father the pope in captiuitie, as also will not the said chryistian king: they two doe summon you at this time for all, to accept these last offers, for the deliuerance of the said children of France, and for the wealth of an vniuersall peace, and to deliuer the person of our said holie father, and also to paie spediely and without anie more delay, the debts by you due vnto the king my soueraigne.

And if you refuse these finall offers, and also to deliver the person of our said holie father, and paie the said debtes, as a godd christian prince; and louer of peace is bound to doe; the king my soueraigne, and the said christian king his godd brother, not without great sorrow and displeasure, doe declare to be your enemies, and so hereafter doe hold and repute you for such one, denouncing vnto you waere by sea and land, and desiring you with all their forces,

The defiance intimated to
the emperor
by the herald
of England.

10 Herewithelsse, considering that there be diuerse of your subiects, and great quantitie of their goods in the realmes of England and France, and other lands & lordships of the said pincines: likewise there be diuerse of the subiects of the kings of England and France; and of their goods in your kingdomes, countries, lands, and lordships, the which may receiue aswell of the one part as of the other, great and unrecoverable hurts and damages, if without advertisements and monition they should be taken 20 and detained: the kings maiestie my soueraigne, and the most christian king of France his good brother be willing that libertie be giuen vnto your subiects being in their kingdomes, countries, and lordships, for to retire and depart with all their goods and merchandise, within fourtie daies after this intimation, so that the like libertie and permission be in like sort granted to their subiects. ¶ To this defiance of the king at armes of England the emperours maiestie did answer in these words.

Libertie granted to the emperors subjects in England and France to return to their owne countries, and the like demanded on the contrary part.

The emperours answer to the English heralds oration.

Now vnderstand that which you haue declared, and I cannot thinke that if the king of England were thoughtlie aduertised of things as they haue passed, and of the reason to which I haue yielded, he would not saie that which you haue said, and therefore mine intention is to aduertise him. As to that which you spake of the pope, I was neuer consenting to his detractiō, which was neuer done by my commandement : & I giue you to vnderstand, that he is deli-uered, and I am sorie for the harmes that were done at the time when he was taken, of the which I take my selfe not to be in fault, as I haue told the king at armes of France, And as to the deliuerance of the French kings sons, where means haue bene made for their deliuerance, I haue bene readie to giue eare thereto, and the fault resteth not in me, so: that the peace hath not bene concluded.

But now that you tell me that the king your master will force me to deliuer them, I will answer thereto in other sort than hitherto I haue done, and I trust to keepe them in such wise, that by force I shall not need to deliuer them: for I am not accustomed to be forced in things which I do. As to the debt which the king of England hath lent me, I haue neuer denied it, neither do I denie it, but am ready to 60 paye it as right requireth, as I haue caused it to be declared vnto him, and I my selfe haue shewed no lesse to his ambassadors, and deliuered my saien by writing, and I cannot beloeue, that for such things (which I refuse not to accomplish) he will make war against me, and if he will so doe it will grieue me, but yet I must defend my selfe: and I praise God that the king your master giue me not greater occasion to make him war, than I haue giuen him. You shall deliuer me in writing, that which you haue said, to the which I will answer by writing particularlie.

The emperor's modesty in this point is notable.

This answer made by the emperor to the king of armes Clarenceur, the said Clarenceur took his coat of armes, which he had lieng on his left armie arme (as before is said) and put it upon him. The emperor here with commanded him to deliuer by writing into the hands of the lord of Buclans all that he had uttered by word of mouth, as is above expressed. Which Clarenceaur promised to do, so he did afterwards, signed with his owne hand, word for word. Clarenceaur hauing thus done his dutie, incontinentlie withdrew: but before his departure, the lord of Buclans said to him, and also to Cuten, these words ensuing. Behold here this writing in my hand, containing the articles of the composition betwene the emperor and the pope.

¶ That the pope should be no partie against the emperor, neither in the affaires of Millaine, nor in the kingdom of Naples. That he should accorde unto the emperor the crossade in Spaine, and a tenth of the reuenues ecclesiastike through all his dominions. That to assure the obseruation of these things, Citta should remaine in the hands of the emperor, and Citta Clerchia which Andrea Dore had left to him before. That he should assigne ouer to him Citta Castellana, a towne which had refused to receiue the imperials, Pario Perusquo procaro of the like being entred within the rocke by secret commission from the pope, notwithstanding he made semblance of the contrarie. That he should also deliuer ouer to him the rocke of Furlie, and to put into his hands for hostages Hippolito and Alexander his nephues, and till they were come from Parma the emperor to be possessed of the cardinals Pisani, Triulco, and Caddi, whome they led to the reahme of Naples.

Furthermore, that he should make present payment to the lanceknights of three score thousand ducates, and to the Spaniards thirtie & five thousand. That in so doing they should let him come out at libertie with all the cardinals, and they to go out of Rome and out of the castell, alwaies interpreting to libertie when soeuer they should be conueied in safetie to Vmbetto, Spoleto, or Perousa. That within fiftene daies after his going out of Rome he should paie the like quantitie of monie to the lanceknights, and afterwards the residue within three moneths to the Spaniards & lanceknights souldie, according to their shares and portions. Which residue together with the summes paid, amounted to more than three hundred and fiftie thousand ducats.

This is the true copie (said the lord of Buclans) of the capitulation, made touching the deliuerance of the pope, and how he is deliuered, and departed from castell saint Angelo, the tenth of December last past: put it in your relation. The said king of armes answered; We will so do: and so for that time they parted. ¶ Here, because mention is made of the popes deliuerance out of prison, it shall not be amisse to set downe the manner thereof as it is reported by Guicciardine. All things hauing their orderlie expedition, & the resolution set downe, that the tenth of December the Spaniards should accompanie him into a place of surtie, he fearing some variation either for the ill mind which he knew don Hugo bare to him, or for anie other accident that might happen, the night before he stole secretlie out of the castell in the closing of the euening, disguised in the attire of a merchant. Lewis de Consaguo who was in the paie of the emperor, taried for him in the medowes with a strong companie of harquebuziers, and with that gard did accompanie him to Vmbetto, where dismissing almost all his bands of footmen, he was led by the same Lewis euen to Vmbetto, into which citie he entred by night without the companie of anie one cardinall. An example worthy of consideration, and perhaps neuer happened since the church was great: that a pope should in that sort fall from so great a puissance and reuerence, his eyes to behold the losse and sacke of Rome, his person to be turned ouer into captiuitie, and his whole estate reduced to the disposing of an other, and within few months after, to be restored & established in his former greatnesse. So great towards princes Christian is the authoritie of the pope, and the respect which mortall men doe beare to him.

At the same instant that the heralds were at the emperours court, the emperor called before him the said Cuten king of armes of France, and said to him as followeth. It is reason that you enjoy your priuileges, you ought also to do your dutie; and therefore I praye you deliuer to your master, present to his owne person the which I shall tell you, which is this: that since the libertie of Vmbetto, contrarie to the same dutie of his subjects haue bene taken going about the citie of Vmbetto, and other also going to serue me in Italie, which haue bene detained prisoners, with intreaties, and by force thrust into the galleies; and besides I praye of his subjects the which I might likewise take, you shall aduertise him, that if he deliuer me some mine, I will deliuer his; if not, as he shall intreat mine, I will intreat his; and that he send me answer hereof within fortie daies: if not, I will take the refusal for an answer.

The king of armes Cuten asked if his maiestie ment this touching the merchants. Whereunto the emperor answered: This is beside that which is contained in your writing, touching the merchants, to which point (said he) I will answer by writing. And herewith Cuten making three obeisances, said; Sir I will glasse do it. Then said the emperor, Tell the king your master further; that I beleue that he hath not bene aduertised of that which I told to his ambassadors in Granada, which toucheth him nere. For I told him in such a case so noble a prince, that if he had understood the matter, he would haue made me an answer. We shall do well to know it of his ambassadors. For by that he shall understand, that I haue kept better faith to him in that I haue promised at Madrid than he to me, and I praye you to tell him, and saile not before. Cuten answered, Without doubt sir I will do so: and so making his obeisance he departed.

The emperor appointed John le Alemand the baron of Buclans to see that no displeasure nor evil speech were vsed to the said kings of armes; but that they should be well vsed: which was done to their good contentation. After this, the seauen and twentieth of Januarie, the said kings of armes came to the said lord of Buclans, who by the emperours appointment deliuered an answer unto either of them in writing, accordinglie as the emperor had promised; the copies thereof are set forth at large in the annales of Aquitaine, and so briefenesse here omitted. To conclude, the French king toke such displeasure with the emperours answers made unto his king of armes Cuten, whereby he was charged to do otherwise than by his faith giuen he ought to haue done, that the eight and twentieth daie of March being in the citie of Paris, accompanied with a great number of the princes of his blood, cardinals and other prelates and nobles of his realme, and also the ambassadors of diuerse princes and potentates, he called before him Nicholas Verenot lord of Granuelle, unto whom he said in effect as followeth.

honourable behauiour, which you haue shewed in doing your dutie being here with me, you haue deserued at my hands, with I must needs saie, ye haue acquit your selfe in euerie behalfe, as well to the honoz of your master, as god contentation of each man else, so that I am assured the fault resteth not in you, whie things haue not come to better end and purpose than they haue done, for the god zeale and affection, which I haue euer proued in you to the advancement of peace and quieting of things, wherein I doubt not but you haue done your due to the full.

But being informed that your master the elect emperour, against all right and law, as well diuine as humane, had commanded to be done vnto my ambassadors, and likewise to the other of the league remaining with him, for the furtherance of things toward a peace, and contrarie to all god customs, which hitherto haue bene obserued betwixt princes, not onelie christians, but also infidels, me thought I could not otherwise do, for the behoufe of mine owne ambassadors, arrested and against reason kept in ward, but to do the same to you, although I had no mind to vse you euill, for the reasons aboue said, for the which, and for the dutie you haue shewed in doing that appertained, I assure you my lord ambassador, that beside that I doubt not but your master will recompense you for the same, ye may be assured that where particularlie in anie thing I may pleasure you, I will do it with as good a will as you can require me.

And to make answer to that which your master by word of mouth hath said vnto Guien and Clarenceaux kings of armes of the king my god brother and perpetuall and best alie, and of me vpon the intimation of the warre which hath bene made by vs, consisting in eight points, I will that each one vnderstand it. First, as to the which he saith he marvelleth that he hauing me a prisoner by iust warre, and hauing also my faith, I should desse him, and that in reason I neither may nor ought to do it; I answer thereto, that if I were his prisoner here, and that he had my faith, he had spoken true: but I know not that the emperour hath euer at anie time had my faith, that may in anie wise auaille him. For first in that warre so euer I haue bene, I know not that I haue either seene him or encountered with him.

When I was prisoner, garded with foure or fift hundred harquebuzers, sick in my bed, and in danger of death, it was an easie matter to constrain me, but not verie honorable to him that should do it: and after that I returned into France, I know not anie that hath had power to compell me to it: and to do it willingly without constraint, it is a thing which I waie moze, than so lightlie to bind my selfe thereto. And because I will not that my honoz come in disputation, although I know well that euerie man of warre knoweth sufficientlie, that a prisoner garded is not bound to anie faith, nor can bind himselfe thereto in anie thing: I do neuertheless send to your master this writing signed with mine owne hand, the which my lord ambassador I priaie you read, and afterwards promise me to deliuer it vnto your master, and not to anie other. And herewith the king caused it to be deliuered to the said ambassador by master John Robertet, one of the secretaries of the estate, and of his chamber.

The ambassador toke the writing in his hand, and after excused himselfe to the king, saing: That as to him, by the letter which his master & soveraigne lord had written vnto him now lastlie, his commission was already expired, and that he had no farther commandement nor instructions from his maiestie, but to take leaue of the king with as much speed as he might, and to returne home. Which he most humblie besought him to permit him to do, without further charge or commission, although he knew that he was at his commandement, and that he might at his pleasure constrain him, as seemed to him god. Wherevnto the king answered; My lord ambassador, with you will not take vpon you to read this writing, I will cause it to be read in this companie, to the end that euerie one may vnderstand and know that I am cleared in that, whereof against truchy he goeth about to accuse me.

Beside that, if you afterwards will not beare it, & deliuer it to him, I will send one of my heralds here present to go in companie with you: for whom you shall procure a good & available safe conduct, that he may passe vnto your master, protesting & demanding, that an act maie be registred before this companie, that if he will not it should come to his knowledge, that I am discharged, in that I do my best to cause him to vnderstand it accordingly as I ought to do, and in such sort as he can not pretend cause of ignorance. After the king had ended these words, he called to him the said Robertet, and commanded him to reade the said writing with a loud voice, which was done word for word.

The copie of the said writing directed to the emperour.

F Francis, by the grace of God, king of France, lord of Genes, &c. To you Charles, by the same grace, chosen emperour of Rome, and king of Spaine. We do you to wit, that being aduertised, that in all the answers that you haue made to our ambassadors and heralds, sent to you for the establishing of peace, in excusing your selfe, without all reason you haue accused vs, saing, that we haue plight you our faith, and that thereupon (besides our promise) we departed out of your hands and power. In defense of our honour, which hereby might be burthened too much against all truth, we thought good to send you this writing; by which we giue you to vnderstand, that notwithstanding that no man being in ward is bound to keepe faith, and that the same might be a sufficient excuse for vs: yet for the satisfieng of all men, and our said honoz (which we mind to keepe, and will keepe, if it please God, vnto the death) that if ye haue charged, or will charge vs, not onelie with our said faith, and deliuerance, but that euer we did anie thing that became not a gentleman that had respect to his honoz; that ye lie fallie in your throat: and as oft as ye saie it, ye lie: and we determine to defend our honoz to the uttermost drop of our blood. Wherefore, seeing ye haue charged vs against all truth, write no moze to vs hereafter: but appoint vs the field, and we will bring you the weapons. Protesting, that if after this declaration ye write into anie place, or vse anie words against our honoz, that the shame of the delaie of the combat shall light on you, seeing that the offering of combat is the end of all writing. Made at our god towne and citie of Paris, the eight and twentieth date of March.

March. In the pere of our Lord, one thousand five hundred twentie and eight, before Easter. Thus signed. Francis.

This Robertet was one of the secretaries to the estate.

After that Robertet had read this writing there in presence of the emperours ambassadors, the king made further replie unto the points contained in the emperours answers to the defiance: and withall to conclude, told the said ambassadoz, that his master the emperour had constrained him by such mes- sage as he had sent to him, to make the answer in truth, which he had made: and further willed him to deliver unto the emperour the writing which he had signed with his hand, and to saie to him, that he took him for so honorable a prince, that considering the matter wherewith he charged him, and the answer that he made, he would not faile but to answer him like a gentleman, and not by writing like an advocate. For if he otherwise do (saie the king) I will answer his chancelloz by an advocate, and a man of his estate, and a more honest man than he.

The emperour answered the French kings letters.

Shortly after, the emperours ambassadors returned home into Spaine in safetie, and well intreated. And upo their returne, the ambassadors of France were set at libertie, and delivered beyond Frontierabie, & so came safelie home into France. Then a French herald, appointed to accompanie the ambassadour Grandeuill, brought the writing of the combat unto the emperour, because Grandeuill refused to medle with it. To the which the emperour five months after, or thereabouts, sent an answer by one of his heralds; who being arrived at Paris, meant upon the sudden to present his letters unto the French king. But the king getting intelligence thereof, the tenth of September, sitting within his great hall of his palace at Paris aforesaid, before the table of marble in a roial seat, addressed and set up for him firtene steps in height, appointed to give audience to the said herald.

What states both native and foreign were present in the French kings hall.

On his right hand sate in chaires the king of Navarre, the duke of Alanson and Berrie, the earle of Foix and Arminache. And on the same side sate also upon a bench, the duke of Vendosme a pere of France, lieutenant generall, and gouernoz of Picardie, don Hercules de Est, eldest sonne to the duke of Ferrar, duke of Chartres and Montargers, who latelie before had married the ladie Kener, a daughter of France, the duke of Albanie regent and gouernoz of Scotland, the duke of Longueuille, great chamberleine of France. And nere to them upon another bench sate the presidents and counsellors of the court of parlement; and behind them manie gentlemen, doctors, and learned men. On the left hand were set in chaires prepared for them, the cardinall Saluarie the popes legat, the cardinall of Bourbon, and duke of Laon, a pere of France, the cardinall of Sens chancelloz of France, the cardinall of Lorain, the archbishop of Harbon, the ambassadoz of the kings of England and Scotland, of the segniorie of Venice, of Millan, of the Cantons, of the Swisses, and of Florence.

who stood on either side of the French kings seate

On an other bench sate the bishop of Transilvania, ambassadoz for the king of Hungarie, the bishop and duke of Angres, one of the peeres of France, the bishop & earle of Poion, an other of the peeres of France, the archbishop of Lion, primate of all France, the archbishop of Burges primate of Aquitaine, the archbishops of Aux and Rouen, the bishops of Paris, Meur, Aizeur, Pascon, Limoges, Abazes, Conserans and Terbe. And behind them sate the masters of the requests, and the counsellors of the great councill. On either side the kings seate stood the earle of Beaumont great master and marshall of France, the lord de Wison admerall of Frances lieutenant generall, and gouernoz of Burgonie. And behind the same seat were manie knights of the order, that is to wit, the earle of Laual, lieutenant generall and gouernoz of Britaine, the lord of Pontmerancie, the lord Daubignie capitaine of an hundred lances, and of the Scottish gard, the earle of Biennne, Lignite, and Rouille, the lord of Fleurang, marshal of France, the lord of Ruffore, the lord of Cenoilliac great esquier and master of the artillerie of France, Loie monsieur de Clenes, the lord of Hunters, and the earle of Carpte.

Behind them was the earle of Estamps prionoff of Paris, and with him manie gentlemen of the kings chamber: among the which was the earle of Lancarull, the lord of Guien, the son of the earle of Rouille, the son of the lord of Fleurang, the lord de la Rochpot, the lord Donartie great master of the waters and forests, the lord of Lude, the lord of Janlis, the lord de Cillebon, bailie of Rouen, the baron of Chateau Pozant, the lord de la Loue, the count de la Potheaugroing, and the lord of Mertes. And besides these, the masters and officers of the household & gentlemen waiters, with the more part of the two hundred gentlemen or pensioners, as we terme them. At the entrie into the said thronoz tribunall seat, were the capteins of the garbs, and the prionoff of the household. And before the king knelted the others of the chamber upon the one kne: and at the foot of the step that went up to the kings seate were the prionoffs of the merchants and chesiers of the towne of Paris. Beneath in the hall (the gates whereof were still open) there was an infinite number of people of all nations: and in presence of them all, the king made this declaration.

The cause wherefore I haue made this assemblee, is, for that the emperour elect hath sent to me an herald of armes, who (as I coniecture, and as the same herald hath said, and as his safe conduct importeth) hath brought me letters, patents and autentike, concerning the suertie of the field for the combat that should be betwixt the said elected emperour and me. And forasmuch as the said herald, under colour to bring the suertie of the field, may vse certeine flations, dissimulations, or hyppocrisies, to shift off the matter, whereas I desire expedition, and to haue it dispatched out of hand; so that by the same an end of the warres, which haue so long continued, may be had, to the ease and comfort of all chrisendome, to auoid the effusion of blood, and other mischances which come thereof: I haue wished it knowne to all chrisendome, to the end that euerie one may vnderstand the truth, from whence procedeth the mischance and the long continuance thereof.

I haue also caused this assemblee to be made, to shew that I haue not without great cause enterprised such an act; for the right is on my side: and if I should otherwise haue done, mine honoz had bene greatlie blemished. A thing which my lords that are of my blood, and other my subiects would haue taken in euill part. And knowing the cause of the combat, and my right, they will beare with it, as god and lofall subiects ought to do, trusting by Gods helpe to proceed in such sort therein, that it shall plainelie appere if the right be on my side or not: and how, against truth, I haue bene accused for a breaker of my faith, which I would be loth to do, no: at anie time haue meant so to do. The kings my predecessors and ancessors, whose pictures are ingrauen and set here in order within this hall, which in their daies haue successiuelie atchued glorious acts, and greatlie augmented the realme of France, would thinke me unworthie, and not capable to be their successor, if against mine honoz I should suffer my selfe to be charged with such a note, noire by the emperor, and should not defend my person and honoꝝ in the manner and forme accustomed.

And herewith he declared the whole case as it stood. First, how being taken at Pavia by fortune of war, he neuer gaue his faith to anie of his enemies, & consenting to be led into Spaine, caused his owne gallies to be made ready to conueie him thither, where at his arrivall, he was committed to ward within the castell of Spadill, garded with a great number of barquebuziers & others. Which unconteous dealing found in the emperor, so much grieved him, that he fell sicke, and late in danger of death: Whereupon the emperor comming to visit him after his recovery of health, an accord was made betwixt the deputies of the emperor and the ambassadours of the ladie his mother then regent of France: which accord was so unreasonable, that no pince being in libertie would haue consented thereto, nor for his deliverance haue promised so great a ranfome. Which trette yet they constrained him (as he said) to sweare to performe, being prisoner, against the protestation which he diuerse times had made, yea as yet being sicke, and in danger of reciduation; and so contentlie of death.

After this, he was conueied forth on his iourne homewards, still garded & not set at libertie. And it was told him, that after he came into France, it was conuenient that he should giue his faith; for that it was knowne well enough, that what he did or promised in Spaine, it nothing anulled. And further he remembered not that the emperor had told him at anie time, that if he performed not the contents of the treatie, he would hold him for a breaker of his faith, & though he had, he was not in his libertie to make anie answer. Two things therefore said he, in this case are to be considered. One, that the trette was violently wrong out from them that could not bind his person, and the which (as to the residue) had bene accomplished by his mother, deliuering his sonnes in hollage. The other thing was his pretended faith, on which they can make a ground, sith he was not set at libertie. And herewith he shewed manie reasons, to proue that his enemies could not pretend in right that they had his faith.

Further he said, that in matter of combat there was the assailant, which ought to giue suertie of the field, and the defendant the weapons. Herewith also he caused a letter to be read, which the emperor had writtten to maister John de Calumont president of Bourdeaux, the said kings ambassadour in the court of the said emperor: the tenor of which letter imported, that the emperor put the said ambassadour in remembrance of speech which he had uttered to the said ambassadour in Granada, repeating the same in substance as followeth. That the king his maister had done naughtilie in not keeping his faith which he had of him, according to the treatie of Spadill: and if the king would saie the contrarie, I will (said the emperor) mainteine the quarrell with my bodie against his. And these be the same words that I spake to the king your maister in Spadill, that I would hold him for a lewd and haughtie man, if he brake the faith which I had of him, &c.

When after the said letter had bene read, he caused also his answer made by way of a cartell to be read, the tenor whereof ye haue heard before. That done, he continued his tale, in declaring what order he had obserued to procure the emperor to the combat, without all shifting delaties: so as if the herald now come from the emperor would vse anie talke, other than to deliuer him an authentike writing of suertie of the field, and not obserue the contents of his saie conduct, he meant not to giue him audience. And herewithon was the herald called to come in, and declare his message. Who apparelled in his cote of armes, made his apperance before the king there sitting, accompanied (as ye haue heard) into whose presence the king said.

Herald, dost thou bring the suertie of the field, such one as thy maister, being the assailant, ought to deliuer vnto the defendant, being such a personage as I am? The herald herewith said: Sir, make it please you to giue me licence to doe mine office: Then said the king: Giue me the pattent of the field, and saie what thou wilt. The herald beginning his tale, The sacred. Tith (said the king) shew me the pattent of the field, for I hold thy maister for so noble a pince, that he hath not sent thee without the suertie of the field, sith I haue demanded it; and thou knowest that thy saie conduct, conteineth no lesse but that thou shouldst bring it. The herald answered, that he trusted he had brought that which might content his maiestie.

The king replied & said: Herald, giue me the pattent of the field, giue it me: and if it be sufficient, I will receiue it, and after saie what thou wilt. The herald said he had in commandement not to deliuer it, except he might declare that which he had first to saie. The king said: Thy maister can not giue lawes to vs in France. To conclude he told the herald, that he peraduenture might speake things that his maister would not anouch, and that he had not to deale with him, but with his maister. The herald then required that he might haue licence to depart: which the king granted. And withall the king commanded that it might be registred what had passed in this behalfe, for a testimonie that the fault rested not in him in that he receiued not the pattent. The herald likewise for his discharge, required a copie in writing of that which had passed, and the same was granted.

Thus far haue I ouerpasse the common bounds of my purpose, in speaking so largelie of this matter of combat, because of the rarenes thereof, changing betwixt two so mightie princes, although it came not to the effect of triall. And now to returne to that which folloved further upon the defiance, denounced to the emperor by the two kings of armes, Gutes and Clarenceur. Ye shall vnderstand, that the lords and nobilitie, to the number of seuen hundred in whose presence it was giuen, toke it so officiously, that drawing forth their swords, they swore that the same should be reuenged: for other wise they protested, that the infamie would rebound to them and their heires for ever. Herewith the warre was proclaimed through all Spaine with banners displayed, in which were painted a red sword, with a burning cresset against the French king and his partakers, but not mentioning the king of England by expresse name. But it was recited in the proclamation, that the king of England had menaced and defied the emperor in the French kings quarrell.

Then were the English merchants in Spaine attached, and their goods put in safetie, till it might be knowne how the emperours subiects were ordered in England. Then likewise were all the ships of the emperours subiects here arrested: and in semblable manner all the Englishmen and their goods and ships were arrested by the ladie regent in the low countries. The common people in England much lamented, that warre should arise betwixt the emperor and the king of England, speciallie because the emperours dominions had holpen and releued them with graine in time of their necessitie & want. But chesellie this matter touched merchants which haunted the emperours dominions. Yet at length were those of the low countries set at libertie, and their goods to them deliuered, in fauour of intercoure of merchandize. But forsomuch as the Spaniards were still deteined, the ladie regent also deteined the ships and goods of the English merchants though she set their persons at libertie.

The incmoditie rising of lacke of interest course for transche.

By this meanes the trade of merchandize was in manner fore-let here in England, and namelie the clothes laie on their hands, whereby the common-wealth suffered great decaie, and great numbers of spinners, carders, tuckers, and such other that lived by clothworking, remained idle, to their great impoverishment. And as this warre was displeasing to the Englishmen, so was it as much or more displeasing to the townes and people of the low countries, & in especiall to the townes of Antuerpe & Barrois, where the marts are kept. So that at length there came ambassadours from the ladie regent, the which associating themselves with don Hugo de Spendoza ambassadour for the emperour, came to the king at Richmond the twentieth and ninth of March, and there moved their sute so effectually, that an abstinence of warre was granted, till time that a further communication might be had: and upon this point letters were sent into Spaine, France, and Flanders, and so this matter continued untill answers were brought from thence againe.

An abstinence of war granted upon sute made to the king of England.

The emperours ambassadours intreated not so earnestly to moue the king to haue peace with their master, but the French ambassadours solicited the king as earnestly to enter into the warre against him, and suerly they had the cardinall on their side. But yet the king wisely considering with other of his counsell, what damage should insue thereby unto his subjects, and specially to the merchants and clothiers, would not consent so easilie to the purpose of the Frenchmen, though he had twentieth thousand pounds sterling out of France, of yearelie pension, to continue friend & alie to the French king. But he protested euer that he would see the reime of France defended to his power, and studie no lesse to haue a peace concluded, which might be as honourable to the French king as to himselfe, and beneficiall unto their people, of whom by warres, might be made both slaughter and bloudshed, which are companions inseparable of battell; as the poet well saith:

Hinc breuiter diua moris aperta via est.

On the two and twentieth of Februarie the king created at Windso: sir Piers Butler of Ireland, erle of Osserie, & also a Dutch craite of Arnew chaled a French craite by the Thames from Margate to the Tower wharfe, and there as they fought sir Edmund Wallingham lieutenant of the Tower perceluting them, called his men together, and entering the ships took both the captains. The kings counsell took by the matter betwixt them, for the Fleming chalenged the Frenchman as a lawfull prize. An abstinence of the warre was taken in the beginning of this yeare betwixt Flanders, and the countries of Picardie on this side the river of Some to begin the first of Maie & indure till the last of Februarie. By means of this truce all the Englishmen might lawfullie passe into the low countries, but not into Spaine: which sore grieved the merchants that haunted those parties. It was further agreed, that if no generall peace could be had, during the time of this truce: then all the merchants should haue respite two moneths after to passe into their owne countries with their wares and merchandizes in safetie.

A truce and the benefits insuing from the same.

The sweating sicknesse, whereof died both courtiers and others.

In the end of Maie began in the cite of London the disease called the sweating sicknesse, which afterwards infected all places of the realme, and slew manie within five or six houres after they sickened. This sicknesse, for the manner of the taking of the patients, was an occasion of remembryng that great sweat which raged in the reigne of this kings grandfather; and hapilie men caused the same remedie then used to be reuiued. By reason of this sicknesse, the tearme was adiourned, and the circuit of the assises also. There died diuerse in the court of this sicknesse, as sir Francis Poins, which had bene ambassadour in Spaine, and diuerse others. The king for a space remoued almost euerie date till he came to Tintinhargar, a place of the abbay of saint Albons, and there he with the queene, and a small compaignie about them, remained till the sicknesse was past. In this great mortalitie died sir William Compton knight, and William Carew esquier, which were of the kings private chamber.

A prisoner brake from the sessions hall at Newgate when the sessions was done, which prisoner was brought doونه out of Newgate in a basket, he seemed so weake: but now in the end of the sessions he brake thorough the people unto the Greie friers church, and there was kept sir or seauen daies per the thiriffes could speake with him, and then because he would not abjure and aske a crowner, with violence they took him thence, and cast him againe in prison, but the law serued not to hang him.

We heare heard how the people talked a little before the cardinals going ouer into France the last yeare, that the king was told by doctor Longland bishop of Lincoln and others, that his marriage with queene Katharine could not be good nor lawfull. The truth is, that whether this doubt was first moued by the cardinall, or by the said Longland, being the kings confessor, the king was not onelie brought in doubt, whether it was a lawfull marriage or no; but also determined to haue the case examined, cleared, and adiudged by learning, law, and sufficient authority. The cardinall verelie was put in most blame for this scruple now cast into the kings conscience, for the hate he bare to the emperour, because he would not grant to him the archbishopricke of Toledo, for the which he was a suer. And therefore he did not onlie procure the king of England to ioin in friendship with the French king, but also sought a diuorse betwixt the king and the queene, that the king might haue had in marriage the duchesse of Alanson, sister unto the French king; and (as some haue thought) he travelled in that matter with the French king at Amiens, but the duchesse would not giue eare thereunto.

But howsoeuer it came about, that the king was thus troubled in conscience concerning his marriage, this followed, that like a wise & sage prince, to haue the doubt cleared, he called together the best learned of the realme, which were of seuerall opinions. Wherefore he thought to know the truth by indifferent iudges, least peraduenture the Spaniards, and other also in fauour of the queene would saie, that his owne subjects were not indifferent iudges in this behalfe. And therefore he wrote his cause to Rome, and also sent to all the vniuersities in Italie and France, and to the great clearkes of all christendome, to know their opinions, and desired the court of Rome to send into his realme a legat, which should be indifferent, and of a great and profound iudgement, to heare the cause debated. At whose request the whole consistorie of the college of Rome sent thither Laurence Campeius, a preest cardinall, a man of great wit and experience, which was sent hither before in the tenth yeare of this king, as we haue heard, and with him was ioined in commission the cardinall of Poixke and legat of England.

This cardinall came to London in October, and did intimate both to the king & queene the cause of his coming: which being knowne, great talke was had thereof. The archbishop of Cantuarburie sent for the famous doctors of both the vniuersities to Lambeth, both, and there were euerie daie disputations and communings of this matter. And because the king meant nothing but vprightlie therein, and knew well that the quene was somewhat wedded to hir owne opinion, and wished that she should do nothing without counsell, he had hir chose the best clearks of his realme to be of hir counsell, and licenced them to do the best on hir part that they could, according to the truth. When the elected William Warham archbishop of Canturburie, and Nicholas Westbischop of Ely, doctors of the lawes; and John Fisher bishop of Rochester, and Henrie Standish bishop of Saint Asaph, doctors of diuinitie, and manie other doctors and well learned men, which for suertie like men of great learning defended hir cause, as farre as learning might mainteine and hold it vp.

This yere was sir James Spenser maio: of London, in whose time the watch in London on whidsummer night was laid downe. About this time the king receiued into fauour doctor Stephan Cardiner, whose seruice he vsed in matters of great secrecie and weight, admitting him in the roome of doctor Pace, the which being continuallie abroad in ambassages, and the same oftentimes not much necessarie, by the cardinals appointment, at length he took such greife there with, that he fell out of his right wits. The place where the cardinals should sit to heare the cause of matrimonie betwixt the king and the quene, was ordeined to be at the Blacke friers in London, where in the great hall was preparation made of seats, tables, and other furniture, according to such a solemne session and roiall apparance. The court was platted in tables and benches in manner of a confessorie, one seat raised higher for the iudges to sit in. When as it were in the midst of the said iudges aloft above them thre degrees high, was a cloth of estate hanged, with a chaire roiall vnder the same, wherein sat the king; and besides him, some distance from him sat the quene, and vnder the iudges sat the scribes and other officers: the chiefe scribe was doctor Stewens, and the caller of the court was one Cooke of Winchester.

Then before the king and the iudges within the court sat the archbishop of Canturburie Warham, and all the other bishops. Then stood at both ends within the counsellors learned in the spirituall lawes, as well the kings as the quenes. The doctors of law for the king (whose names yee haue heard before) had their conuenient roimes. Thus was the court furnished. The iudges commanded silence whilst their commission was read, both to the court and to the people assembled. That done the scribes commanded the crier to call the king by the name of king Henrie of England, come into the court, &c. With that the king answered and said, Here. Then called he the quene by the name of Katharine quene of England come into the court, &c. Who made no answer, but rose out of hir chaire.

And because she could not come to the king directly, for the distance seuered betwene them, she went about by the court, and came to the king, kneeling downe at his feet, to whom she said in effect as followeth: Sir (quoth she) I desire you to doe me iustice and right, and take some pittie vpon me, for I am a poore woman, and a stranger, borne out of your dominion, hauing here no indifferent counsell, & lesse assurance of friendship. Alas sir, what haue I offended you, or what occasion of displeasure haue I met with you, intending thus to put me from you after this sort: I take God to my iudge, I haue bene to you a true & humble wife, euer conformable to your will and pleasure, that neuer contraried or gaine said any thing thereof, and being alwaies contented with all things wherein you had any delight, whether little or much, without grudge or displeasure, I loued for your sake all them whom you loued, whether they were my friends or enemies.

I haue bene your wife these twentie yeres and moze, & you haue had by me diuerse children. If there be anie iust cause that you can alleage against me, either of dishonour, or matter lawfull to put me from you; I am content to depart to my shame and rebuke; and if there be none, then I praye you to let me haue iustice at your hand. The king your father was in his time of excellent wit, and the king of Spaine my father Ferdinando was reckoned one of the wisest princes that reigned in Spaine manie yeres before. It is not to be doubted, but that they had gathered as wise counsellors vnto them of euerie realme, as to their wisdoms they thought meet, who deemed the marriage betwene you and me good and lawfull, &c. Therefore, I humbly desire you to spare me, until I may know what counsell my friends in Spaine will aduertise me to take, and if you will not, then your pleasure be fulfilled. With that she arose vp, making a lowe curtelle to the king, and departed from thence.

The king being aduertised that she was ready to go out of the house, commanded the crier to call her againe, who called her by these wordes: Katharine quene of England, come into the court. With that (quoth maister Griffith) Madame, you be called againe. On (quoth she) it maketh no matter, I will not tarrie, go on your waies. And thus she departed, without anie further answer at that time, or anie other, and neuer would appeare after in anie court. The king perceiuing she was departed, said these wordes in effect: For as much (quoth he) as the quene is gone, I will in hir absence declare to you all, that she hath bene to me as true, as obedient, and as conformable a wife, as I would wish or desire. She hath all the vertuous qualities that ought to be in a woman of hir dignitie, or in anie other of a baser estate, she is also surelie a noble woman borne, hir conditions will well declare the same.

With that quoth Wolsey the cardinall: Sir, I most humbly require your highnesse, to declare before all this audience, whether I haue bene the chiefe and first mouer of this matter vnto your maiestie or no, for I am greatly suspected herein. My lord cardinall (quoth the king) I can well excuse you in this matter, marrie (quoth he) you haue bene rather against me in the tempting hereof, than a letter forward or mouer of the same. The speciall cause that moued me vnto this matter, was a certaine scrupulositie that picked my conscience, vpon certeine wordes spoken at a time when it was, by the bishop of Baion the French ambassado: who had bene hither sent, vpon the debating of a marriage to be concluded betwene our daughter the ladie Marie, and the duke of Orleans, second son to the king of France.

Vpon the resolution and determination whereof, he desired respite to aduertise the king his maister thereof, whether our daughter Marie should be legitimate in respect of this my marriage with this woman, being sometimes my brothers wife. Which wordes once conceiued within the secret bottom of my conscience, ingendered such a scrupulous doubt, that my conscience was incontinentlie accombed, vexed, and disquieted; whereby I thought my selfe to be greatlie in danger of Gods indignation. Which appeared to be (as me seemed) the rather, for that he sent vs no issue male: and all such issues male as my said wife had by me, died incontinent after they came into the world, so that I doubted the great displeasure of God in that behalfe.

Thus my conscience being tossed in the waues of a scrupulous mind, and partlie in despaire to haue anie other issue than I had alreddie by this ladie now my wife, it behoued me further to consider the state of this realme, and the danger it stood in for lacke of a prince to succede me, I thought it good in releafe of the weightie burthen of my weake conscience, & also the quiet estate of this worlthe relme, to attempt the law therin, whether I may lawfullie take another wife more lawfullie, by whome God may send me more issue, in case this my first copulation was not good, without anie carnall concupiscence, and not for anie displeasure or mistaking of the queenes person and age, with whome I would be as well contented to continue, if our marriage may stand with the lawes of God, as with anie woman aliuie.

In this point consisteth all this doubt that we go about now to trie, by the learning, wisdome, and iudgement of you our prelates and pastors of all this our realme and dominions now here assembled for that purpose; to whose conscience, & learning I haue committed the charge and iudgement: according to the which I will (God willing) be right well content to submit my selfe, and for my part obeie the same. Wherein, after that I perceived my conscience to doubtfull, I moued it in confession to you my lord of Lincolne then ghostlie father. And for so much as then you your selfe were in some doubt, you moued me to aske the counsell of all these my lords: whereupon I moued you my lord of Canturburie, first to haue your licence, in as much as you were metropolitane, to put this matter in question, and so I did of all you my lords: to which you granted vnder your seales, here to be shewed. That is truth, quoth the archbishop of Canturburie. After that the king rose vp, and the court was adioyned vntill another daie.

Here is to be noted, that the queene in presence of the whole court most graueouslie accused the cardinal of vntruth, deceit, wickednesse, & malice, which had some dissention betwixt hir and the king his husband; and therefore openlie protested, that she did bitterlie abhorre, refuse, and forsake such a iudge, as was not onelie a most malicious enemie to hir, but also a manifest aduersarie to all right and iustice, and therewith did she appeale vnto the pope, committing hir whole cause to be iudged of him. But notwithstanding this appaile, the legats sat weekelie, and euerie daie were arguments brought in on both parts, and praieses alleaged for the vnderstanding of the case, and still they assaied if they could by anie means procure the queene to call backe hir appeale, which she bitterlie refused to do. The king would gladdie haue had an end in the matter, but when the legats draue time, and determined vpon no certeine point, he conceiued a suspition, that this was done of purpose, that their doings might draw to none effect or conclusion.

The next court daie, the cardinals sat againe, at which time the counsell on both sides were there ready to answer. The kings counsell alleaged the matrimonie not to be lawfull at the beginning, because of the carnall copulation had betwene prince Arthur and the queene. This matter was verie beementlie touched on that side, and to proue it, they alleaged manie reasons and similitudes of truth: and being answered negatiuelie againe on the other side, it seemed that all their former allegations were doubtfull to be tried, and that no man knew the truth. And thus this court passed from sessions to sessions, and daie to daie, till at certeine of their sessions the king sent the two cardinals to the queene (who was then in Wyndesore) to perswade with hir by their wisdoms, and to aduise hir to surrender the whole matter into the kings hands by hir owne content & will, which should be much better to hir honour, than to stand to the triall of law, and thereby to be condemned, which should seme much to hir dishonour.

The cardinals being in the queenes chamber of presence, the gentleman usher aduertised the queene that the cardinals were come to speake with hir. With that the rose vp, & with a sheine of white thred about hir necke, came into hir chamber of presence, where the cardinals were attending. At whose coming, quoth she, What is your pleasure with me? It please your grace, quoth cardinal Wolfe, to go in to your priuie chamber, we will shew you the cause of our coming. My lord, quoth she, if yee haue anie thing to saie, speake it openlie before all these folke, for I feare nothing that yee can saie against me, but that I would all the worlde should heare and see it, and therefore speake your mind. Then began the cardinal to speake to hir in Latine. Saie god my lord (quoth she) speake to me in English.

Forsooth, quoth the cardinal, god madame, if it please you, we come both to know your mind how you are disposed to do in this matter betwene the king and you, and also to declare secretlie our opinions and counsell vnto you: which we do onelie for verie zeale and obedience we beare vnto your grace. My lord, quoth she, I thanke you for your good will, but to make you answer in your request I cannot so suddenlie, for I was set among my maids at worke, thinking full little of anie such matter, wherein there needeth a longer deliberation, and a better head than mine to make answer: for I need counsell in this case which toucheth me so nere, & for anie counsell or frendship that I can find in England, they are not for my profit. What thinke you my lords, will anie Englishman counsell me, or be frend to me against the kings pleasure that is his subiect? Saie forsooth. And as for my counsell in whom I will put my trust, they be not here, they be in Spaine in my owne countrie.

And my lords, I am a poore woman, lacking wit, to answer to anie such noble persons of wisdome as you be, in so weightie a matter, therefore I praie you be good to me poore woman, destitute of frends here in a forren region, and your counsell also I will be glad to heare. And therewith she toke the cardinal by the hand, and led him into hir priuie chamber with the other cardinal, where they tarried a season talking with the queene. Which communication ended, they departed to the king, making to him relation of hir talke. Thus this case went forward from court to court, till it came to iudgement, so that euerie man expected that iudgement would be giuen the next day. At which daie the king came thither, and set him downe in a chaire within a doore, in the end of the gallerie (which opened directlie against the iudgement seat) to heare the iudgement giuen, at which time all their proceedings were red in Latine.

That done, the kings counsell at the barre called for iudgement. With that (quoth cardinal Campeius) I will not giue iudgement till I haue made relation to the pope of all our proceedings, whose counsell and commandement in this case I will obserue: the case is verie doubtfull, and also the partie defendant will make no answer here, but doth rather appeale from vs, supposing that we be not indifferent. Therefore I will adiourne this court for this time, according to the order of the court of Rome. And with that the court was dissolved, and no more done. This protrading of the conclusion of the matter, king Henrie toke verie displeasantie. Then cardinal Campeius toke his leaue of the king and nobilitie, and returned towards Rome.

Whilste these things were thus in hand, the cardinal of Forke was aduised that the king had set his affection vpon a young gentlewoman named Anne, the daughter of sir Thomas Wolle, vicount Rochford, which did wait vpon the queene. This was a great great griefe vnto the cardinall, as he that perceiued aforehand, that the king would marie the said gentlewoman, if the diuorſe toke place. Therefore he began with all diligence to diſappoint that match, which by reason of the miſliking that he had to the woman, he iudged ought to be auoided more than preſent death. While the matter ſtood in this ſtate, and that the cauſe of the queene was to be heard and iudged at Rome, by reason of the appeale which by hir was put in: the cardinall requirde the pope by letters and ſecret meſſengers, that in anie wiſe he ſhould defer the iudgement of the diuorſe, till he might frame the kings mind to his purpoſe.

Howbeit he went about nothing ſo ſecretlie, but that the ſame came to the kings knowledge, who toke ſo high diſpleaſure with ſuch his cloaked diſſimulation, that he determined to abaſe his degre, ſith as an vnthankfull perſon he forgot himſelfe and his dutie towards him that had ſo highlie aduanced him to all honoz and dignitie. When the nobles of the realme perceiued the cardinall to be in diſpleaſure, they began to accuſe him of ſuch offences as they knew might be proued againſt him, and thereof they made a booke containing certeine articles, to which diuerſe of the kings counsell ſet their hands. The king vnderſtanding moze plainlie by thoſe articles, the great pride, preſumption, and couctouſneſſe of the cardinall, was ſoze moued againſt him; but yet kept his purpoſe ſecret for a while. Shortlie after, a parlement was called to begin at Weſtmiſter the third of Nouember next ſiſſuing.

In the meane time the king, being informed that all thoſe things that the cardinall had done by his power legantine within this realme, were in the caſe of the premonition and prouiſion, cauſed his attorneie Chriſtopher Hales to ſue out a writ of premonition againſt him, in the which he licenced him to make his attorneie. And further, the ſeuententh of Nouember the king ſent the two dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke to the cardinals place at Weſtmiſter, who (went as they were commanded) and finding the cardinall there, they declared that the kings pleaſure was that he ſhould ſurrender by the great ſeale into their hands, and to depart ſimplie vnto Ather, which was an houſe ſituated nigh vnto Hampton court, belonging to the biſhoprike of Wincheſter. The cardinall demanded of them their commiſſion that gaue them ſuch authoritie, who answered againe, that they were ſufficient commiſſioners, and had authoritie to doe no leſſe by the kings mouth. Notwithſtanding, he would in no wiſe agree in that behalfe, without further knowledge of their authoritie, ſaieng; that the great ſeale was deliuered him by the kings perſon, to introy the miniſtration thereof, with the ſeale of the chancelor for the terme of his life. Whereof for his ſuertie he had the kings letters patents.

This matter was greatlie debated betwene them with manie great words, in ſo much that the dukes were ſaine to depart againe without their purpoſe, and rode to Windſore to the king, and made report accordingly; but the next daie they returned againe, bringing with them the kings letters. When the cardinall deliuered vnto them the great ſeale, and was content to depart ſimplie, taking with him nothing but onlie certeine prouiſion for his houſe: and after long talke betwene him and the dukes, they departed with the great ſeale of England, and brought the ſame to the king. When the cardinall called all his officers before him, and toke account of them for all ſuch ſtuffe, whereof they had charge. And in his gallerie were ſet diuerſe tables, whereupon laie a great number of goodlie rich ſtuffe, as whole peces of ſilke of all colours, velvet, ſattin, damaske, taſſata, gro-graine, and other things. Alſo, there laie a thouſand peces of fine Holland cloth.

There was laid on euerie table, bookes reporting the contents of the ſame, and ſo was there inuentories of all things in order againſt the kings coming. He cauſed to be hanged the walles of the gallerie on the one ſide with cloth of gold, cloth of tiſſue, cloth of ſiluer, and rich cloth of booken of diuerſe colours. On the other ſide were hanged the richeſt ſute of coapes of his owne prouiſion made for his colleges of Oxford and Ipſwich, that euer were ſcene in England. Then had he two chambers adjoining to the gallerie, the one moſt commonlie called the gilt chamber, and the other the counsell chamber, where in were ſet by two broad and long tables vpon treſſes, whereupon was ſet ſuch a number of plate of all ſorts, as was almoſt incredible.

In the gilt chamber were ſet out vpon the table nothing but gilt plate, and vpon a cupbord and in a window was ſet no plate but gold, verie rich: and in the counsell chamber was all white and parcell gilt plate, and vnder the table in baſkets was all old broken ſiluer plate, and bookes ſet by them purpoſing euerie kind of plate, and euerie parcell, with the contents of the ounces thereof. Thus were all things prepared, giuing charge of all the ſaid ſtuffe, with all other remaining in euerie office, to be deliuered to the king, to make answer to their charge: for the order was ſuch, that euerie officer was charged with the receipt of the ſtuffe belonging to his office by indenture. To ſir William Calcoigne, being his treaſurer, he gaue the charge of the deliuerie of the ſaid goods, and therewithall, with his traine of gentlemen and peomen, he toke his barge at the priue ſtaires, and ſo went by water vnto Putnicie, where when he was arriued, he toke his mule, and euerie man toke their horſes, and rode ſtreight to Ather, where he and his familie continued the ſpace of three or foure weekes, without either beds, ſheets, table cloths, or diſhes to eat their meat in, or where with to buie any: the cardinall was forced to horow of the biſhop of Carleill, plate and diſhes, &c.]

After this, in the kings bench his matter for the premonition, being called vpon, two attorneis, which he had authoriſed by his warrant ſigned with his owne hand, confeſſed the action, and ſo had iudgement to forfeit all his lands, tenements, goods, and cattels, and to be out of the kings proteccion: but the king of his clemencie ſent to him a ſufficient proteccion, and left to him the biſhoprikes of Poike and Wincheſter, with plate and ſtuffe conuenient for his degre. The biſhoprike of Dureſme was giuen to doctor Tunſtall biſhop of London, and the abbacie of ſaint Albons to the prior of Poike. Alſo the biſhoprike of London being now void, was beſtowed on doctor Stokeſlie, then ambadaſſour to the vniuerſities beyond the ſea for the kings marriage.

The ladie Margaret duches of Saroy aunt to the emperour, and the ladie Lois dutcheſſe of Angoleſme mother to the French king, met at Cambreie in the beginning of the moneth of June, to treat of a peace, where were preſent doctor Tunſtall biſhop of London, and ſir Thomas More then chancelor of the duchie of Lancaſter, commiſſioners for the king of England. At length through diligence of the ſaid ladies a peace was concluded betwixt the emperour, the pope, and the kings of England and France. All theſe met there in the beginning of Iulie, accompanied with diuerſe great princes and counceilers, on euerie part. And after long debating on both ſides, there was a good concluſion taken the ſift daie of Auguſt. In the which was concluded, that the treatie of Madrid ſhould ſtand in his full ſtrength and vertue, ſauing the third and fourth, and the eleuenth and four-

In the emperours countries, when all things were writen, sealed, and finished, there was a solemne masse song in the cathedrall church of Cambzeie, the two ladies ambassadors of the king of England, sitting in great estate: and after masse the peace was proclaimed betwene the three princes, and Te Deum song, and monie cast to the people, and great fires made through the citie. The same night the French king came into Cambzeie, well and noble accompanied, and saluted the ladies, and to them made diuerse bankets: and then all persons departed into their countie, glad of this concord. This peace was called the womens peace, for because that notwithstanding this conclusion, yet neither the emperor trusted the French king, nor he neither trusted nor loued him, and their subjects were in the same case. This proclamation was proclaimed solemnelie by heralds with trumpets in the citie of London, which proclamation much reioiced the English merchants, repairing into Flanders, Brabant, Zealand, and other the emperours dominions. For during the wars, merchants were euill handled on both parties, which caused them to be desirous of peace. On the foure & twentieth of Nouember, was sir Thomas More made lord chancelor, & the next day led to the Chancery by the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and there swoorne.

At the daie appointed the parlement began, on which daie the king came by water to his place of Whitehall, and there he and his nobles put on their robes of parlement, and so came to the Blache friers church, where a masse of the Holie-ghost was solemnelie song by the kings chappell: and after the masse, the king with all the lords of parlement and commons, which were summoned to appeare at that daie, came into the parlement chamber, where the king sate in his throne or se at roiall: and sir Thomas More his chancelor, standing on the right hand of the king behind the barre, made an eloquent oration.

In this oration he declared, that like as a good shepheard, which not alonelic keepeth and attendeth well his shepe, but also foreseeeth and prouideth for all things which either may be hurtfull or noisome to his flocke, or maie preserue and defend the same against all perils that may chance to come: so the king which was the shepheard, ruler and gouernour of his realme, bigilantlie foreseeing things to come, considered how diuers labors before this time were made, not by long continuance of time and mutation of things, verie insufficient and vnperfect: and also by the fraile condition of man, diuerse new enenities were sprung amongst the people, for the which no law was yet made to reforme the same. Which was the verie cause whie at that time the king had summoned his high court of parlement. And he resembled the king to a shepheard or hearde man for this cause: for if a prince be compared to his riches, he is but a rich man; if a prince be compared to his honour, he is but an honourable man: but compare him to the multitude of his people, and the number of his flocke, then he is a ruler, a gouernour of might & puissance, so that his people maketh him a prince, as of the multitude of shepe cometh the name of a shepheard. And as you see that amongst a great sort of shepe some be rotten & faultie, which the good shepheard sendeth from the good shepe: so the great wonder which is of late fallen (as you all know) so craftie, so scabbedlie, yea and so vnrulie iugled with the king, that all men must needes ghesse and thinke, that he thought in himselfe that he had no wit to perceiue his craftie doing; or else that he presumed that the king would not see nor know his fraudulent iugling and attempts. But he was deceived: for his graces sight was so quicke and penetrable, that he saw him, yea and saw through him, both within and without, so that all things to him was open, and according to his desert he hath had a gentle correction.

Which small punishment the king will not to be an example to other offenders, but clearelie declareth, that whoeuer hereafter shall make like attempt, or commit like offense, shall not escape with like punishment. And because you of the common house be a grosse multitude, and can not speake all at one time: therefore the kings pleasure is, that you shall resort to the nether house, & there amongst your selues, according to the old and ancient custome, to chouse an able person to be your common mouth and speaker: and after your election so made, to aduertise his grace thereof, which will declare to you his pleasure, what day he will haue him present in this place. After this done, the commons resorted to the nether house.

house, and they chose for their speaker Thomas Audleie chiquier, and attourneie of the duchie of Lancaster: and the same daie was the parlement adioyned to Westminster.

On the first daie of the same moneth, the king came to the parlement chamber, and all the lords in their robes. And there the commons of the nether house presented their speaker, which there made an eloquent oration, which consisted in two points. The first point was, that he much praised the king for his equitie and iustice, mixed with mercie and pitie, so that none offense was forgotten and left unpunished, nor in the punishment the extremitie: no; the rigor of the law cruellie extended: which should be a cause to bide all men from doing like offenses, & also a comfort to offenders to confesse their crime and offense, and an occasion of amendment and reconciliation. The second point was, that he disabled himselfe both for lacke of wit, learning, and discretion to so high an office, beseeching the king to cause his commands to resort eiesones to their common house, and there to chose an other speaker for that parlement.

To this the king by the mouth of the lord chancellor answered; that where he disabled himselfe in wit and learning, his owne orate oration there made testified the contrarie. And as touching his discretion and other qualities, the king himselfe had well knowen him and his doings since he was in his service, to be both wise and discret: and so for an able man he accepted him, and for the speaker he him admitted. When the commons were assembled in the nether house, they began to commune of their griefes, wherewith the spirituality had before time grievously oppressed them, both contrarie to the law of the realme, and contrarie to all right: and in speciallie they were foremoued with six great causes.

The first for the excessive fines, which the ordinaries took for probats of testaments, in somuch that sir Henrie Guilford knight of the garter, and controller of the kings house, declared in the open parlement on his fidelitie, that he and others being executors to sir William Compton knight, paid for the probat of his will to the cardinall and the archbishop of Canturburie a thousand markes sterling. After this declaration were shewed to manie extortions done by ordinaries for probats of willes, that it were too much to rehearse.

The second was the great polling and extortionation, which the spirituall men used in taking of corps, presents, or mortuaries. For the children of the defunct should all die for hunger, and go a begging, rather than they would of charitie giue to them the sallowe cow which the dead man owght, if he had but one lie one; such was the charitie then.

The third cause was, that priests being suruisors, stewards and officers to bishops, abbats, and other spirituall heads, had and occupied farmes, granges, and grasing in euerie countrie, so that the poore husbandmen could haue nothing but of them; and yet for that they should paie deerie.

The fourth cause was, that abbats, priors, and spirituall men kept tan-houses, and bought and sold wool, cloth, and all maner of merchandise, as other temporall merchants did.

The fifth cause was, because that spirituall persons promoted to great benefices, and hauing their livings of their flocke, were lieng in the court in lords houses, and took all of the parishioners, and nothing spent on them at all: so that for lacke of residence both the poore of the parish lacked refreshing, and vniuersallie all the parishioners lacked preaching and true instruction of Gods word, to the great perill of their soules.

The first cause was, to see one priest little learned, to haue ten or twelue benefices, & to be resident upon none; and to know manie well learned scholars in the brinnerities, which were able to preach & teach, to haue neither benefice nor exhibition.

These things before this time might in no wise be touched, nor yet talked of by anie man, except he would be made an heretike, or lese all that he had. For the bishops were chancellors, and had all the rule about the king, so that no man durst once presume to attempt anie thing contrarie to their profit or commoditie. But now, when God had illuminated the eyes of the king, and that their subtle doings were once elpied; then men began charitably to desire a reformation: and so at this parlement men began to shew their grudges. Whereupon the burgeses of the parlement appointed such as were learned in the law, being of the common house, to draw one bill of the probats of testaments, another for mortuaries, and the third for non residence, pluralities, and taking of farmes by spirituall men. The learned men took much paines, and first set forth the bill of mortuaries; which passed the common house, and was sent up to the lords. To this bill the spirituall lords made a faire face, saying; that suerlie priests and curats took more than they should, and therefore it were well done to take some reasonable order: thus they spake, because it touched them little.

But within two daies after was sent up the bill concerning probats of testaments; at the which the archbishop of Canturburie in especiall, and all other bishops in generall both frowned and grunted, for that touched their profit. In somuch as doctor John Asther bishop of Rochester said openly in the parlement chamber these words: My lords, you see daily what billes come hither from the common house, and all is to the destruction of the church. For Gods sake see what a realme the kingdome of Boheme was; and when the church went downe, then fell the glorie of the kingdome: now with the commons is nothing but downe with the church; and all this me seemeth is for lacke of faith onlie. When these words were reported to the commons of the nether house, that the bishop should saie, that all their doings were for lacke of faith, they took the matter grievously, for they imagined that the bishop esteemed them as heretikes, and so by his slanderous words would haue perswaded the temporall lords, to haue restrained their consent from the said two billes, which they before had passed, as you haue heard before.

Wherefore the commons, after long debate, determined to send the speaker of the parlement to the kings highnesse, with a grievous complaint against the bishop of Rochester. And so on a daie, when the king was at leasure, Thomas Audleie speaker for the commons, and thirtie of the chiefe of the common house, came to the kings presence in his palace at Westminster, which before was called Porke place; and there verie eloquentlie declared what a dishonour to the king and the realme it was, to saie, that they which were elected for the wisest men of all the shires, cities, and boroughs, within the realme of England, should be declared, in so noble and open presence, to lacke faith: which was equivalent to saie, that they were infidels, and no christians, as ill as Turkes, or Saracens, so that what paine or studie neuer they took for the common wealth, or what acts or lawes fouer they made or stablished, should be taken as lawes made by Painims and heathen people, and not worthy to be kept by christian men. Wherefore he most humbly besought the kings highnesse to call the said bishop before him, and to cause him to speake more discretlie of such a number as was in the common house.

anno reg. 15.

The matter of testaments and mortuaries mooved
by the king.

The king was not well contented with the saying of the bishop, yet he gentlie answered the speaker, that he would send for the bishop, and send them word what answer he made, and so they departed againe. After this the king sent for the archbishop of Canturburie and six other bishops, and for the bishop of Rochester also, and there declared to him the grudge of the commons; to the which the bishop answered, that he meant the doings of the Bohemians was for lacke of faith, and not the doings of them that were in the common house. Which saying was confirmed by the bishops being present, who had him in great reputation: and so by that onelie saying the king accepted his excuse, and thereof sent word to the commons by sir William Fitz Williams knight, treasurer of his household; which blind excuse pleased the commons nothing at all. After diuerse assemblies were kept betwene certaine of the lords, and certaine of the commons, for the billes of probats of testaments, and the mortuaries; the temporallie laid to the spiritualtie their owne lawes and constitutions; and the spiritualtie soze defended them by prescription & vsage, to whom this answer was made by a gentleman of Grete inne: The v-sage hath euer bene of theues to rob on Shroters bill, ergo is it lawfull?

With this answer the spiritual men were soze offended, because their doings were called robberies.
But the temporall men stood still by their sayings, inso much that the said gentleman said to the archbishop of Canturburie, that both the exaction of pro-bats of testaments, and the taking of mortuaries, as they were vsed, were open robberie and theft. After long disputation, the temporall lords began to leane to the commons: but for all that the billes remained vnconcluded for a while. In the meane season, there was a bill assented to by the lords, and sent downe to the commons: the effect whereof was, that the whole realme by the said act did release to the king, all such summes of monie as he had borrowed of them at the loane, in the fiftenth yeare of his reigne (as you haue heard before.) This bill was soze argued in the common house, but the most part of the commons were the kings seruants, and the other were so laboured to by other, that the bill was assented vnto.

When this release of the loane was knowen to the commons of the realme, Lord so they grudged & spake ill of the whole parlement. For almost euerie man counted it his debt, and reckoned suerlie of the paiment of the same. And therefore some made their willes of the same, and some other did set it ouer to other for debt, and so manie men had losse by it, which caused them soze to murmur, but there was no reme-die. The king like a good and discret prince, seeing that his commons in the parlement house had released the loane, intending somewhat to requite the same, granted to them a generall pardon of all offences; certaine great offenses and debts onelie excepted: also he aided them for the redresse of their griefes against the spiritualtie, and caused two new billes to be made indifferentlie, both for the probats of testaments and mortuaries; which billes were so reasonable, that the spiritual lords assented to them all, though they were soze against there mindes, & in speciall the probats of testaments soze displeased the bishops, and the mortuaries soze displeased the pa-sons and vicars.

After these acts thus agreed, the commons made another act for pluralities of benefices, non residence, being selling and taking of farmes by spirituall persons. Which act so displeased the spiritualtie, that the priests raised on the commons of the common house, and called them heretikes and schisma-tikes, for the which diuerse priests were punished.

This act was soze debated aboue in the parlement chamber, and the lords spiritual would in no wise consent. Wherefore the king perceiuing the grudge of his commons, caused eight lords and eight of his commons to meet in the Star chamber at an after none, and there was soze debating of the cause, in so much that the temporall lords of the upper house, which were there, took part with the commons, against the spiritual lords; and by force of reason caused them to assent to the bill with a little qualificeng.
Which bill the next daie was wholie agreed to in the lords house, to the great reioicing of the laie people, and to the great displeasure of the spiritual persons.
During this parlement was brought downe to the commons the booke of articles, which the lords had put to the king against the cardinal, the chiefe wher-of were these.

1 First, that he without the kings assent had procured to be a legat, by reason whereof he took awaie the right of all bishops and spiritual persons.

2 Item, in all writings which he wrote to Rome, or anie other foreyn prince, he wrote Ego rex meus, I and my king: as who would saie, that the king were his seruant.

3 Item, that he hath slandered the church of England in the court of Rome. For his suggestion to be legat was to reforme the church of England, which (as he wrote) was Facta in reprobam sensum.

4 Item, he without the kings assent carried the kings great seale with him into flanders, when he was sent ambassado; to the emperour.

5 Item, he without the kings assent, sent a commission to sir Gregorie de Cassado, knight, to conclude a league betwene the king & the duke of Fer-rar, without the kings knowledge.

6 Item, that he hauing the French pokes presented to come and breath on the king.

7 Item, that he caused the cardinals hat to be put on the kings coine.

8 Item, that he would not suffer the kings clerke of the market to sit at saint Albons.

9 Item, that he had sent innumerable substance to Rome, for the obtaining of his dignities, to the great impoverishment of the realme.

These articles, with manie more, read in the common house, and signed with the cardinals hand, was confessed by him. And also there was shewed a writ-ting sealed with his seale, by the which he gaue to the king all his moueables and vnmoueables. On the date of the Conception of our ladie, the king at Pozke place at Westminster, in the parlement time, created the vicount Rochford erle of Wilshire, and the vicount Fitz Water was created erle of Suffer, and the lord Hastings was created erle of Huntington. When, all things were concluded in the parlement house, the king came to the parlement chamber the 17 daie of December, and there put his rosall assent to all things done by the lords and commons, and so proroged his court of parlement till the next yeare. After the parlement was thus ended, the king removed to Greenewich, and there kept his Christmasse with the queene in great triumph: with great plentie of viands, and diuerse disguisings and enterludes, to the great reioicing of his people.]

The king, which all this while, since the doubt was moued touching his marriage, abstained from the queenes bed, was now aduertised by his ambassadors, whom he had sent to diuerse vniuersities for the aboluing of his doubt, that the said vniuersities were agreed, and clereslie concluded, that the one brother might not by Gods law marrie the other bro-in any wise dispense with the same. For ye must understand, that amongst other things alleged for dispense of the marriage to be lawfull, evidence was given of certaine words, which prince Arthur spake the morrow after he was first married to the queene, whereby it was gathered, that he knew his carnallie the night then passed. The words were these, as we find them in the chronicle of master Edward Hall.

In the morning after he was risen from the bed, in which he had layne with hir all night, he called for drinke, which he before time was not accustomed to do. At which thing, one of his chamberleines marvellling, requiered the cause of his drougt. To whom he answered merittie, sateng; I haue this night bene in the middest of Spaine, which is a hot region, and that iournee maketh me so drie: and if thou haddest bene vnder that hot climat, thou wouldest haue bene drier than I. Againe, it was alleged, that after the death of prince Arthur, the king was deferred from the title and creation of prince of Wales almost halfe a yeare, which thing could not haue bene doubted, if he had not bene carnallie known. Also the king caused a bull to be purchased, in the which were these words relaxo an cogniam, that is, and peradventure carnallie known: which words were not in the first bull granted by pope Iulie at his second marriage to the king, which second bull with that clause was onelic purchased to dispense with the second matrimonie, although there were carnall copulation before, which bull needed not to haue bene purchased, if there had bene no carnall copulation, for then the first bull had bene sufficient. To conclude, when these & other matters were laid forth to proue that which she denied, the carnall copulation betwixt hir and prince Arthur, his counsellors left that matter, and fell to persuasions of naturall reason. And lastlie, when nothing else would serue, they stood stiffe in the appeale to the pope, and in the dispensation purchased from the court of Rome, so that the matter was thus shifted off, and no end likelie to be had therein.

The king therefore understanding now that the emperor and the pope were appointed to meet at the citie of Bononie alias Bologna, where the emperor should be crowned, sent thither in ambassage from him the earle of Wiltshire, doctor Stokesleie, elected bishop of London, and his almoner doctor Edward Lee, to declare both unto the pope and emperor, the law of God, the determinations of vniuersities in the case of his marriage, and to require the pope to do iustice according to truth, and also to shew to the emperor, that the king did moue this matter onelic for discharge of his conscience, and not for any other respect of pleasure or displeasure earthlie. These ambassadours comming to Bononie were honorablie receiued, and first doing their message to the pope, had answer of him, that he would heare the matter disputed when he came to Rome, and according to right he would do iustice.

The emperor answered, that he in no wise would be against the lawes of God, & if the court of Rome would iudge that the matrimonie was not good, he could be content: but he solicited both the pope and cardinals, to stand by the dispensation, which he thought to be of force enough to proue the marriage lawfull. With these answers the ambassadours departed and returned homeward, till they came on this side the mountaine, and then receiued letters from the king, which appointed the earle of Wiltshire to go in ambassage to the French king which then lay at Bourdeaux, making gift for monie for redeming of his children: and the bishop of London, was appointed to go to Padua, and other vniuersities in Italie, to know their full resolutions and determinate opinions in the kings case of matrimonie: and the kings almoner was commanded to returne home into England, and so he did.

¶ You haue heard before how the cardinal was attainted in the premunire, and how he was put out of the office of the chancelor, & laie at Ather. In this Lent season the king by the aduise of his counsell licensed him to go into his diocesse of Yorke, & gaue him commandement to keepe him in his diocesse, and not to returne southward without the kings speciall licence in writting. So he made great provision to go northward, and a parcelled his seruants newlie, and bought manie costlie things for his household: and so he might well enough, for he had of the kings gentleness the bishopricks of Yorke and Winchester, which were no small things. But at this time diuerse of his seruants departed from him to the kings seruice, and in especiall Thomas Crumwell one of his chiefe counsell, and chiefe doer for him in the suppression of abbeies. After that all things necessarie for his iournee were prepared, he toke his waie northward till he came to Southwell, which is in his diocesse, and there he continued this yeare, euer grudging at his fall, as you shall heare hereafter. But the lands which he had giuen to his colleges in Oxford and Ipswich, were now come to the kings hands, by his atteindor in the premunire: and yet the king of his gentleness and for fauour that he bare to good learning, erected againe the college in Oxford, and where it was named the cardinals college, he called it the kings college, & indouled it with faire possessions, and put in new statutes and ordinances. And for because the college of Ipswich was thought to be nothing profitable, therefore he left that dissolved.

In this yeare the emperor gaue to the lord master of saint Iohnes of Ierusalem, and his brethren the Island of Malta lieng betwene Sicill and Barbarie, there to imploye themselves vpon Chyfts enemies, which lord master had no place sure to inhabit there, since he was put fro the Rhodes by the Turke that besieged Vienna, but missed of his expectation. For the chyftians defended the same so valiantlie against the said Turke and his power, that he lost manie of his men by slaughter; manie also miscarried by sicknesse and cold: so that they perished in all to the number of fourescore thousand men, as one of his bassats did afterwarde confesse, which was to him a great displeasure; and in especiallie because he neuer besieged citie before, but either it was yielded or taken. In the time of this siege a metrician did make these two verses in memorie of the same:

Cesar in Italiam quo venit Carolus anno, Cincha est ripheis nostra Vienna Getis.

In the beginning of this yeare was the hanting and reading of the new testament in English translated by Tindall, Joye, and others, forbidden by the king with the aduise of his counsell, and namelie the bishops, which affirmed that the same was not trulie translated; and that therein were prologs and prefaces sounding to heresie, with vncharitable railing against bishops and the cleargie. The king therefore commanded the bishops, that they calling to them the best learned men of the vniuersities, should cause a new translation to be made, that the people without danger might read the same for their better instruction in the lawes of God, and his holie word. Diuerse persons that were detected to vse reading of the new testament, and other booke in English set forth by Tindall, and such other as were fled the realme, were punished by order taken against them by sir Thomas More then lord chancelor, who held greatlie against such booke, but still the number daily increased.

caused all his new testaments which he had bought with manie other bookes, to be brought into Pauls churchyard in London, and there were openlie burned. In the end of this yeare, the wild Irishmen, knowing the earle of Kildare to be in England, entered his land, and spoiled and burnt his countrie, with diuerse other countries. And the eric of Osserie being the kings deputie made little resistance, for lacke of power. Therefore the king sent the earle of Kildare into Ireland, & with him sir William Skevington knight, master of the kings ordinance, and diuerse gunners with him, which so politikelie ordered themselves, that their enemies were glad to offer amends, and to treat for truce: & so sir William Skevington the next yeare returned into England, leauing there the earle of Kildare for the kings deputie.

Now I will returne to the execution of the treatie of Cambridge, in the which it was agreed, that the ladie Cleane, and the French kings children should be deliuered when the ransom appointed was paid as you haue heard in the last yeare. Therefore the French king gathered monie of his subiects with all speed, and when the monie was readie, he sent the great master of France called Annas de Permonancie and diuerse other nobles to Balon with the monie, and to receive the ladie and the children. And thither came to them the great constable of Castile and monsieur Prat for the emperor, & there the crowns were weighed and touched: and that fault sooner the Spaniards found in them they would not receiue a great number of them, and so they carried the children backe from Fontarbie into Spaine. Thus the great master of France and his companie late still at Balon, without hauing his purpose performed, from March till the end of June, and longer had lien if the king of England had not sent sir Francis Bryan to Balon to warrant the paiement: wherevpon the daie of deliuerance was appointed to be on saint Peters daie in June.

At which daie the great master, with one and thirtie mulets laden with the crownes came to the one side of the riuer of Audate, which riuer departeth Spaine and France, and there taried till the first daie of Iulie: on which daie the ladie Cleane, and the children were put in two great boates, hauing onelie twelue gentlemen of Spaine with them: and in like manner the great master with two great boats, in the which the monie was, and twelue gentlemen with him. All these boats met at a bridge made in the middell of the riuer. The constable of Spaine and his twelue gentlemen met with the great master of France and his twelue gentlemen on the bridge: and after a little salutation, the Frenchmen entered into the two boats where the ladie and the two children were; and the Spaniards into the two boats where the monie was, and then ech part hasted to land. Thus were the French kings wife and children deliuered into his hands, for which deliuerance was great ioy and triumph made in France: and also in Iulie were fiers made in London and diuerse other places for the same consideration and cause.]

Now will we leaue France, and returne to England, renewing the remembrance of cardinall Wolfe, who after great lute made to the king, was licenced to remoue from Ather to Richmond, which place he had a little before repaired with great costs, for the king made an exchange thereof with him for Hampton court. The cardinall hauing licence of the king to repaire to Richmond, made hast thither, and lodged there in the lodge of the great parke, which was a verie prettie house, there he laie untill the beginning of Lent. Then he remoued into the charterhouse of Richmond, where he laie in a lodging which doctor Collet made for himselfe, untill he remoued northward, which was in the passion weeke after, and euerie daie he resorted to the charterhouse there, and would sit with one of the most ancient fathers, who perswaded him to despise the vaine glorie of the world.

Then prepared the cardinall for his iournie into the north, and sent to London for liuerie clothes for his seruants, and so rode from Richmond to Huntingdon, from thence to a place called the Kie, the next daie to Kalfone, where he lodged in the priorie; the next daie to Huntingdon, and there lodged in the abbey; the next daie to Peterborough, and there lodged in the abbey, where he abode all the next weeke, & there he kept his Easter, his traine was in number an hundred and threescore persons. Upon Maundie thursdaie he made his maundie, there hauing nine and fiftie poore men, whose feet he washed, and gaue euerie one twelue pence in monie, thre els of good canuas, a paire of shoes, a cast of red herrings, and thre white herrings, and one of them had two shillings.

On thursdaie next after Easter, he remoued to master Fitz Williams, sometime a merchant-tailor of London, and then of the kings counsell; the next weeke he remoued to Stamford, the next daie to Grantham, the next daie to Peterburke, and lodged in the castell that night and the next daie also: from thence he rode to Southwell, where he continued most part of all that summer, untill the latter end of graue time, and then he rode to Scrobie, where he continued untill Michaelmasse, and then to Calowd castell within seven miles of Poole, wherof we will speake moze hereafter. On the firste of Maie, a man was hanged in chaires in Finsburie field, for murdering doctor Miles vicar of saint Edmes. The fourth and fift of Nouember was a great wind, & great that blew downe manie houses and trees, after which wind followed so high a tide, that it drowned the marshes on Ester side and Kent, with the Ile of Thanet, and other places, destroying much cattell. The nineteenth of September, in the cite of London, a proclamation was made for the restraining of the popes authoritie in England, as followeth.

A proclamation published in England in the behalfe of the kings prerogatiue roiall against the pope.

The kings highnes streitlie chargeth and commandeth, that no maner of person, of what estate, degree, or condition soeuer he or they be of, doe purchase or attempt to purchase from the court of Rome or elsewhere, nor vse & put in execution, diuulge, or publish any thing hertofore within this yeare passed purchased, or to be purchased hereafter, contemning mater preiudiciall to the high authoritie, iurisdiction, and prerogatiue roiall of this his said realme, or to the let, hinderance, or impeachment of his graces noble & vertuous intended purposes in the premises, vpon paine of incurring his highnesse indignation, and imprisonment, and further punishment of their bodies for their so doing at his graces pleasure, to the dreadfull example of all other.

Some iudged, that this proclamation was made, because the queene (as was said) had purchased a new bull for ratification of hir marriage. Others thought that it was made, because the cardinall had purchased was said to him, that for the cardinals sake the king should haue the twofold speed in the sute of his mari-monie.

Ab. Fl. ex
12 pag. 770.
The cardinall
at this maner of Caluod togeth a countess house.

Cardinall Wolseie lieng at Caluod, held there an honourable and plentiful house for all comers, and also built & repaired the castell, which was great-lie in decay, hauing artificers and labourers aboue thye hundred persons baillie in wages. At length being thereunto perswaded by the doctors of the church of Pozeke, he determined to be installed there at Pozeke minster, the next monday after Alhallowes daie, against which time due preparation was made for the same, but not in such sumptuous wise, as his predecessors before him had used. For whereas the cardinall was not abashed to send to the king, requiring him to lend him the mitre and pall which he was wont to weare when he sang masse in ante solemne assemble: the king vpon sight of his letters, could not but maruell at the proud presumptuousnes of the man, saying: What a thing is this, that pride shuld thus reigne in a person that is quite vnder foot.

The cardinall knoweth not that he was arrested at Caluod.

The daie being once knowne vnto the worship-full gentlemen of the countrie, and other, as abbatts, and priors, and notice of his installation, they sent in such prouision of vittells, that it is almost incredible, all which was vnknewne to the cardinall, for as much as he was presented and disappointed of his purpose, by the reason that he was arrested of high treason, as ye shall hereafter heare. So that most part of this former prouision that I speake of, was sent vnto Pozeke the same daie of his arrest, and the next daie following: for his arrest was kept as close as could be. The order of his arrest was thus. It was appointed by the king & counsell, that sir Walter Walsh knight, one of the kings priue chamber, shoulde be sent downe with a commission into the north vnto the earle of Northumberland (who was sometime brought vp in house with the cardinall) and they twaine being iointlie in commission to arrest the cardinall of high treason, maister Walsh toke his horse at the court gate, about none, vpon Alhallowes daie, toward the earle of Northumberland.

I great
doubt,

Signifi-
cations of the cardinals tumourell,

And now haue I occasion to declare what happened about the same time, which peradventure signified the troubles following to the cardinall. The cardinall sitting at dinner vpon Alhalowes daie, hauing at his bozds end diuerse chapleins sitting at dinner, ye shall vnderstand that the cardinals great crosse stood in a corner at the tables end, leaning against the hanging, and when the bozds end was taken vp, and a conuentent time for the chapleins to arise, one doctor Augustine a Venecian, and physician to the cardinall, rising from the table with the other, hauing vpon him a great golowne of boisterous veluet, ouerthrew the crosse, which trailing downe along the tappet, with the point of one of the crosses, broke doctor Bonars head that the blood ran downe, the companie there standing greatlie astonied with the chance.

Doctor Bo-nars head broke.

The cardinall perceiuing the same, demanded what the matter meant of their sudden amaze: And they shewed him of the fall of his crosse vpon doctor Bonars head. Whay it (quoth he) dratone anie blood?
Pea forsooth my lord (quoth they.) With that he cast his eyes aside, & shaking his head, said Deus mihi opem, & that was the cause of his perill.

therewith saying grace, rose from the table, & went to his chamber. Now marke the signification how the cardinall expounded this matter at Domsret after his fall. First, ye shall vnderstand, that the crosse which he bare as archbishop of Pozeke, signified himselfe; and Augustine the physician who ouerthrew the crosse, was onelie he that accused the cardinall, whereby his enemies caught an occasion to ouer-throw him: it fell vpon doctor Bonars head, who was maister of the cardinals faculties and spirituall iurisdictions, and was then dammed by the ouerthrow of the crosse: yea, and more ouer, drawing blood of him, betokened death, which shortly after did insue.

How the cardinall expounded the fall of his crosse.

About the time of this mischance, the same verie daie and season, maister Walsh toke his horse at the court as nigh as could be iudged. Now the appointed time drew nere of his installation, and sitting at dinner vpon the fridaye next before the monday on the which daie he intended to be installed at Pozeke, the earle of Northumberland and maister Walsh, with a great companie of gentlemen of the earles house, & of the countrie, whome he had gathered together in the kings name, came to the hall at Caluod, the officers being at dinner, and the cardinall not fullie dined, being then in his fruits. The first thing that the earle did after he had set order in the hall, he commanded the porter at the gates to deliuer him the keyes thereof. Who would in no wise obeye his commandement, though he were roughlie threatened, and shrewdly commanded in the kings name to make deliuerie of them to one of the earles ser-uants.

The earle of Northumberland arresteth
the cardinall.

Sir (quoth he) seeing that ye do but intend to set one of your seruants in my place to keepe the gates, I know no seruant that ye haue but I am as able as he to do it, and keepe the gates to your purpose (whatsoener it be) also the keyes were deliuered me by my lord and maister, wherefore I praye you to pardon me, for whatsoeuer ye shall command me to do in the ministracion of mine office, I shall do it with a good will. With that (quoth the earle) hold him a booke (& commanding him to laie his hand thereon:) Thou shalt sweare (quoth he) that thou shalt well and trulie keepe the gates to the kings vse, and to do all such things as we shall command: and that ye shall let passe neither in nor out at these gates, but such as ye be commanded by vs. And with this oth he recei-ued the keyes at the earles hands.

The porter deliuereth the keyes to the earle.

Of all these doings knew the cardinall nothing, for they stopped the staires, so that none went vp to the cardinals chamber, and they that came downe could no more go vp againe. At the last one escaped, who shewed the cardinall that the earle was in the hall.
Whereat the cardinall maruelled, and would not beleue him, but commanded a gentleman to bring him the truth, who going downe the staires, saw the earle of Northumberland, and returned, and said it was verie he. Then (quoth the cardinall) I am forie that we haue dined, for I feare our officers be not prouided of anie store of god fish, to make him some honorable chere, let the table stand (quoth he.) With that he rose vp, and going downe the staires, he encountered the earle coming vp with all his suite.
And as soone as the cardinall espied the earle, he put off his cap, and said, My lord ye be most hartlie welcome, and so embraced each other.

The cardinall
maruelleth at the earles sur-den coming.

Then the cardinall toke the earle by the hand, and had him vp into the chamber, whome followed all the number of the earles seruants. From thence he led him into his bed-chamber, and they being there all alone, the earle said vnto the cardinall with a soft voice, laing his hand vpon his arme: My lord I arrest you of high treason. With which words the cardinall being maruellouslie astonied, standing both still

The action of arrest which
the cardinall
takeh in ill part.

Will a good space. At last (quoth the cardinal) What authoritie haue you to arrest me? Forsooth my lord (quoth the erle) I haue a commission so to do. Where is your commission (quoth he) that I may see it? Praise sir that you may not (said the erle.) Well then (quoth the cardinal) I will not obeye your rest. But as they were debating this matter betwene them in the chamber, as busie was maister Walsh in arresting doctor Augustine at the doore of the palace, saieing vnto him, Go in traitor or I shall make thee.

The cardinal
desireth to see the commission of the arch.

At the last maister Walsh being entred the cardinals chamber, began to plucke off his hood, and after kneeled downe to the cardinal. Vnto whom the cardinal said, Come hither gentleman & let me speake with you: Sir, here my lord of Northumberland hath arrested me, but by whose authoritie he sheweth not, if ye be ioined with him I praise you shew me. Indeed my lord (quoth maister Walsh) he sheweth you the truth. Well then (quoth the cardinal) I praise you let me see it. Sir I beseech you (quoth maister Walsh) hold vs excused: there is annexed to our commission certeine instructions, which you may not see. Well (quoth the cardinal) I trow ye are one of the kings priuie chamber, your name is Walsh, I am content to yeld to you, but not to my lord of Northumberland without I see his commission: the worst in the kings priuie chamber is sufficient to arrest the greatest pce of the realme by the kings commandement, without anye commission, therefore put your commission and authoritie in execution, spare not, I will obeye the kings will; I take God to iudge, I neuer offended the king in word nor deed.

committed to the custodie of the earls gentlemen.

Then the earle called into the chamber diuerse gentlemen of his owne seruants, and after they had taken the cardinals keyes from him, they put him in custodie of the earles gentlemen, and then they went about the house to set all things in an order. Then sent they doctor Augustine awaie to London with as much speed as they could, who was bound vnto the howse like a traitor. But it was sundae toward night per the cardinal was conueied from Calwood, who lodged that night in the abbeye of Pomfret. The next daie he remoued toward Doncaster, and was there lodged at the Blacke friers. The next daie he was remoued to Sheffield parke, where the earle of Shrewsburie with his table, and a traine of gentlemen and gentlewomen receiued him with much honour. Then departed all the great number of gentlemen that conducted him thither.

The cardinal
honourable receiued and serued at the earle of Shrewsbu-
ries house.

The cardinal being thus with the earle of Shrewsburie, continued there eightene daies after, vpon whome the earle appointed diuerse gentlemen to attend continuallie, to see that he should lacke nothing, being serued in his owne chamber as honorable as he had bene in his owne house, and once euerie daie the earle would repaire to him and commune with him. After the cardinal had thus remained with the earle of Shrewsburie about a fortnight, it came to passe at a certeine time as he sat at dinner in his owne chamber, hauing at his boyds end a messe of gentlemen and chapleins to keepe him companie, toward the end of his dinner, when he was come to eating his fruits, his colour was perceiued often to change, whereby he was iudged not to be in good health.

The cardinal
sickneth sitting at the table.

Wherevpon one of his gentlemen said, Sir, me seemes you are not well at ease. To whom he answered with lowd voice, Forsooth no more I am, for I am (quoth he) taken suddenlie with a thing about my stomack, that lieth there along as cold as a whetstone, which is no more but wind, I praise you go to the apothecarie, & inquire of him if he haue anye thing that will breake wind vpwart. Then went he to the earle and shewed him what estate the cardinal was in, and what he desired. With that, the earle caused the apothecarie to be called before him, & demanded of him if he had anye thing that would breake wind vpwart in a manahobie. And he answered he had such gære. Then (quoth the earle) fetch me some. Then the apothecarie fetched a white confession in a faire paper, & shewed it to the earle; who commanded one to giue the assaie thereof before him, and then the same to be brought to the cardinal, who receiued it by all at once into his mouth.

But immediatlie after suerlie, he auoided much wind vpwart: So (quoth he) ye may see that it was but wind, and now I am well eased, I thanke God, and so rose from the table, and went to his prayers. And that done, there came vnto him such a loosenesse, that it caused him to go to the stalle. And not long after the earle of Shrewsburie came into the gallerie to him, with whome the cardinal met: and then sitting downe vpon a bench, the earle asked him how he did, and he most lamentable answered him, and thanked him for his good intertainment. Sir (quoth the earle) if ye remember, ye haue often wished to come before the king, to make your answer; and I haue written to the king in that behalf, making him priuie of your lamentation that ye inwardlie haue receiued for his displeasure, who accepteth all your doings therein, as friends be accustomed to do in such cases: therefore I would aduise you to plucke by your hart, and be not agast of your eninies, I doubt not but this your tourne to his highnesse shall be much to your advancement.

saileth into a stee that cut him his life.

The king hath sent for you that worthy knight maister Kingston, and with him foure and twentie of your old seruants, now of the gard, to the intent ye may safely come to his maiestie. Sir (quoth the cardinal) I trow maister Kingston is constable of the Tower. Yea, what of that (quoth the erle) I assure you he is elected by the king for one of your friends. Well (quoth the cardinal, as God will, so be it, I am subiect to fortune, being a true man, ready to accept such chances as shall follow, and there an end; I praise you where is maister Kingston. Quoth the earle, I will send for him. I praise you so do (quoth the cardinal) at whose message he came. And as soone as the cardinal espied him, he made hast to encounter him, and at his comming he kneeled to him, and saluted him in the kings behalf, whome the cardinal bare-headed offered to take vp, and said: I praise you stand by, kneele not to me, I am but a wretched reple with miserie, not esteeming my selfe but as a vile abject, bitterlie cast awaie, without desert, as God knoweth.

Yea (quoth maister Kingston) and he commanded me to saie to you, that you should assure your selfe that he beareth you as much good will as euer he did, and willet you to be of good chere. And where report hath bene made, that ye should commit against him certeine heinous crimes, which he thinks to be vnture, yet he can do no lesse than send for you to your triall, & to take your iourne to him at your owne pleasure, commanding me to be attendant vpon you. Therefore sir I praise you, when it shall be your owne pleasure to take your iourne, I shall be ready to giue attendance. Maister Kingston (quoth he) I thanke you for your newes, and sir, if I were as lustie as I haue bene but of late, I would ride with you in post, but I am diseased with a flur that maketh me verie weake, but I shall with all speed make me ready to ride with you to me: retu.

with the laske, the which caused him continually to go to the skole all that night, in so much that he had that night fittie strokes: therefore in consideration of his infirmite, they caused him to tarrie all that day: and the next daie he took his iourne with master Kingston, and them of the gard, till he came to an house of the earle of Shrewesburie called Hardwike hall, where he late all night verie euill at ease. The next daie he rode to Nottingham, and there lodged that night moze sicke: and the next daie he rode to Leicester abbeie, and by the waie towared so sicke that he was almost fallen from his mule; so that it was night before he came to the abbeie of Leicester, where at his comming in at the gates, the abbat with all his convent met him with diuers torches light, whom they honozable receiued and welcomed.

So whom the cardinall said: Father abbat, I am come hither to lay my bones among you, riding so still untill he came to the staires of the chamber, where he alighted from his mule, and master Kingston let him vp the staires, and as sone as he was in his chamber he went to bed. This was on the saturday at night, and then increased he sicker and sicker, untill mondaie, that all men thought he would haue died: so on tuesday saint Andrewees euen, master Kingston came to him and bad him god morrow, for it was about six of the clocke, and asked him how he did: Sir (quoth he) I tarrie but the pleasure of God, to render vp my poore soule into his hands. Pat so sir (quoth master Kingston) with the grace of God, yee shall liue and doe verie well, if yee will be of god there. Nay in god soth master Kingston, my disease is such, that I can not liue: for I haue had some experience in physike.

Thus it is, I haue a fior with a continuall feuer, the nature whereof is, that if there be no alteration of the same within eight daies, either must insue excoitation of the intralles, or transie, or else present death, and the best of them is death, and (as I suppose) this is the eight daie, & if yee see no alteration in me, there is no remedie, saue (though I may liue a daie or twaine after) but death must insue. Sir (quoth master Kingston) you be in much penituenes, doubting that thing, that in god faith yee need not. Well, well, master Kingston (quoth the cardinall) I see the matter how it is framed: but if I had serued God as diligentlie as I haue done the king, he would not haue giuen me ouer in my greie haire: but it is the iust reward that I must receiue for the diligent paines and studie that I haue had to doe him seruite, not regarding my seruite to God, but onelie to satisfie his pleasure.

I praye you haue me most humble commended unto his roiall maiestie, & beseech him in my behalfe to call to his princelie remembrance all matters proceeding betwene him & me from the beginning of the world, and the progresse of the same, &c. Master Kingston fare well, I can no moze saie, but I wish all things to haue good successe, my time draweth on fast. And euen with that he began to draw his spech at length, & his tong to falle, his eyes being set, whose sight failed him. Then they did put him in remembrance of Christ his passion, & caused the peomen of the gard to stand by to see him die, and to witnesse of his wordes at his departure: & incontinent the clocke stroke eight, and then he gaue vp the ghost, and departed this present life: which caused some to call to remembrance how he said the daie before, that at eight of the clocke they should lose their master.

Here is the end and fall of pride and arrogancie of men exalted by fortune to dignitie: for in his time he was the hautiest man in all his proceedings a line, hauing moze respect to the honoz of his person, than he had to his spirituall profession, wher in should be shewed all meekenes, humilitie, and charitie. [An example (saith Guicciardin, who handleth this storie effectually, and sheweth the cause of this cardinals ruine) in our daies worthie of memorie, touching the power which fortune and ennie hath in the courts of princes.] He died in Leicester abbeie, & in the church of the same abbeie was buried. Such is the suertie of mans brittle state, doubtfull in birth, & no lesse feeble in life, which is as vncertaine, as death most certaine, and the meanes thereof manifold, which as in number they exceed; so in hangingenelle they passe: all degrees of ages & diuersities of seres being subiect to the same. In consideration whereof, it was notable said by one that wrote a whole volume of infirmities, diseases, and passions incident to children:

A primis vita diuersos humine morbos Perpetimur, diuis affumique malis: Donec in octavam redeat qui vixit ab ortu, Antea quam discat vivere, vita cadit.

Sebast. Astes-nius.

This cardinall (as Edmund Campian in his historie of Ireland describeth him) was a man undoubtedly borne to honoz: I thinke (saith he) some princes bastard, no butchers sonne, exceeding wise, faire spoken, high minded, full of reuenge, bitious of his bodie, loffie to his enemies, were they neuer so big, to those that accepted and sought his friendship wonderfull courteous, a ripe scholeman, thall to affections, brought a bed with flatterie, insatiable to get, and moze princelie in bestowing, as appeareth by his two colleges at Ipswich and Drenford, the one ouerthrowne with his fall, the other unfinished, and yet as it lieth for an house of students, considering all the appurtenances incomparable thorough Christendome, whereof Henrie the eight is now called founder, because he let it stand. He held and intioed at once the bishopricke of Dorke, Duresme, & Winchester, the dignities of lord cardinall, legat, & chancellor, the abbeie of saint Albons, diuerse priories, sundrie fat benefices in commendam, a great preferer of his seruants, an advancer of learning, stout in euerie quarell, neuer happie till this his ouerthrow. Wherein he shewed such moderation, and ended so perfectlie, that the houre of his death did him moze honoz, than all the pompe of his life passed. Thus far Campian. Here it is necessarie to adde that notable discourse, which I find in Iohn Stow, concerning the state of the cardinall, both in the yeares of his youth, and in his settled age: with his sudden comming vp from pferment to pferment; till he was aduanced to that step of honoz, which making him insolent, brought him to confusion.

This Thomas Wolseie was a poore mans sonne of Ipswich, in the countie of Suffolke, & there borne, and being but a child, verie apt to be learned, by the meanes of his parents he was conueied to the vniuersitie of Drenford, where he shortly prospered so in learning, as he was made bachelior of art, when he passed not fittene yeares of age, and was called most commonlie thorough the vniuersitie the boie bachelior. Thus prospering in learning, he was made fellow of Pawdeline college, and afterward appointed to be scholemaster of Pawdelin schole, at which time the lord marquesse Dorset had three of his sonnes there at schole, committing vnto him as well their education as their instruction. It pleased the said lord marquesse against a Christmas season to send as well for the scholemaster, as for his children home to his house for their recreation, in that pleasant and honozable feast.

Then being there, the lord their father, perceiving them to be right well imployed in learning for their time, he hauing a benefice in his gift, being at that time void, gaue the same to the scholemaster in reward of his diligence at his departure after Christmas.

to be the expositour to the king in all their procedings, in whome the king receiued such a leaning fantasie, for that he was most earnest and readiest of all the counsell to aduance the kings will and pleasure: the king therefore esteemed him so highly, that all the other counsellors were put from the great fauor that they before were in, insomuch that the king committed all his will vnto his disposition, which the almoner perceiuing, tooke vpon him therefore to discharge the king of the weightie and trouble some bur-sinesse, perswading the king that he should not need to spare any time of his pleasure for any businesse that should happen in the counsell.

And whereas the other counsellors would diuerse times perswade the king to haue sometime recourse into the counsell chamber, there to heare what was done; the almoner would perswade him to the contrarie, which delighted him much: and thus the almoner ruled all them that were before him, such did his politic and wit bring to passe. Who was now in high favor: but master almoner. And who ruled all vnder the king, but master almoner: Thus he persecuted in favor, vntill at last in came presents, gifts, and rewards so plentifullie, that he lacked nothing that might either please his fantasie, or enrich his coffers.

And thus proceeding in fortunes blissfulnesse, it chanced the warres betwene the realmes of England and France to be open, insomuch as the king was fullie perswaded in his most roiall person to trauaise his forren enemies with a puissant armie; wherefore it was necessarie that this roiall enterprize should be speedilie provided and furnished, in e-uerie degree of things apt & conuenient for the same, for the expedition wherof the king thought no mans wit to meet for politic and painefull traueile, as was his almoner, to whome therefore he committed his whole trust therein, and he tooke vpon him the whole charge of all the businesse, and brought all things to good passe in a decent order, as all manner of vittells, provisions, and other necessities conuenient for so noble a voyage and armie.

All things being by him perfected, the king aduanced to his roiall enterprize, passed the seas, and marched forward in good order of battell, vntill he came to the strong towne of Teruine, to the which he laid his siege, and assailed it verie strongly conti-nuallie with such vehement assaults, that within short space it was yielded vnto his maiestie, vnto the which place the emperor Maximilian repaired vnto the king with a great armie like a mightie prince, taking of the king his graces wages: which is a rare thing, and but seldom seene, an emperor to fight vnder a kings banner.

Thus after the king had obtained this puissant fort and taken the possession thereof, and set all things there in due order, for the defense and preservation thereof to his vse, he departed thence, and marched toward the citie of Torneie, and there laid his siege in like manner, to the which he gaue so fierce & sharpe assault, that they were constrained of fine force to render the towne vnto his victorious maiestie: at which time the king gaue the almoner the bishopricke of the same see, towards his paines and diligence sustained in that iournie. Now when the king had established all things agreeable to his will and pleasure, and furnished the same with noble capteines & men of warre for the safeguard of the towne, he returned againe into England, taking with him diuerse noble personages of France being prisoners, as the duke of Longue, and vicount Clarimont, with other which were taken there in a skirmish.

After whose returne, immediatlie the see of Lin-colne fell void, by the death of doctour Smith late bishop there, the which benefice his grace gaue to his almoner, late bishop of Torneie elect, who was not negligent to take possession thereof, and made all the speed he could for his consecration: the solemnization whereof ended, he found meanes that he gat the possession of all his predecessors goods into his hands.

It was not long after that doctour Wenzlike archbishop of Pozke died at Rome, being there the kings ambassador, vnto the which see the king immediatlie presented his late and new bishop of Lincoln; so that he had thre bishopricks in his hands in one pere giuen him.

Then prepared he for his translation from the see of Lincoln, vnto the see of Pozke, after which solemnization done, he being then an archbishop Primas Anglie, thought himselfe sufficient to compare with Canturburie, and thereupon erected his crosse in the court, and euerie other place, as well within the predict and iurisdiction of Canturburie, as in any other place. And forsomuch as Canturburie claimeth a superiortie ouer Pozke, as ouer all other bishopricks within England, and for that cause claimeth as a knowledge of an ancient obedience of Pozke, to abate the aduancing of his crosse, in presence of the crosse of Canturburie; notwithstanding, the archbishop of Pozke nothing minding to desist from bearing thereof, in maner as I said before, caused his crosse to be aduanced, as well in the presence of Canturburie as elsewhere. Wherefore Canturburie being moued therewith, gaue vnto Pozke a certine cheque for his presumption, by reason whereof, there ingendered some grudge betwene Pozke and Canturburie; Pozke intending to pro-uide some such meanes, that he would be rather superior in dignitie to Canturburie, than to be either obedient or equall to him. Wherefore he obtained to be made priest cardinal, and Legatus de latere: vnto whome the pope sent a cardinals hat with certine buls for his authoritie in that behalfe. Yet you shall vnderstand, that the pope sent him this worthie hat of dignitie, as a ietwell of his honor and authoritie, the which was conueied in a varlets budget, who semed to all men to be but a person of small estimation.

Wherefore Pozke being aduertised of the basenes of this messenger, & of the peoples opinion, thought it meete for his honor, that this ietwell should not be conueied by so simple a person, and therefore caused him to be stopped by the wate immediatlie after his arrivall in England, where he was newlie furnished in all manner of apparell, with all kind of costlie silks, which seemed decent for such an high ambassador, and that done, he was incountered vpon Blackheath, and there receiued with a great assemble of prelates, and lustie gallant gentlemen, and from thence conducted thorough London with great triumph. Then was great and speedie preparation made in Westminster abbey, for the confirmation and acceptance of this high order and dignitie, the which was executed by all the bishops and abbats about or nigh London, with their rich miters and copes, and other ornaments, which was done in so soleinne wise, as had not bene seene the like, vntill it had bene at the coronation of a mightie prince or king. Obtaining this dignitie, he thought himselfe meet to beare rule among the temporall power, & among the spiritual iurisdiction: wherefore, remembryng as well the taunts sustained of Canturburie, as hauing respect to the ad-uancement of worldlie honor & promotion, he found the meanes with the king, that he was made lord chancellor of England, and Canturburie which was chancellor dismissed, who had continued in that come long since before the deceasse of Henrie the seventh.
Now being in possession of the chancellorship, & car-indued with the promotions of the archbishop, & cardinall De Latere, hauing power to correct Canturburie, and all other bishops and spirituall persons, to assemble his conuocation when he would assigne, he took vpon him the correction of matters in all their iurisdiccions, and visited all the spirituall houses, hauing in euerie diocesse all maner of spirituall ministers, as commissaries, scribes, apparatoz, and all other officers to furnish his courts, and presented by pzeuention whome he pleased vnto all benefices throughout all this realme.

And to the aduancing further of his legantine iurisdiction and honor, he had masters of his faculties, masters Ceremoniarum, and such other, to the glorifying of his dignitie. Then had he his two great crosses of silver, the one of his archbishoprike, the other of his legacie, borne before him whither soeuer he went or rode, by two of the tallest priests that he could get within the realme. And to increase his gaines, he had also the bishoprike of Durham, and the abbete of saint Albons in commendation. And after, when doctor For bishop of Winchester died, he surrendered Durham into the kings hands, and toke to him Winchester. Then had he in his hand (as it were in farme) the bishoprikes of Bath, Worcester, & Hereford, so for much as the incumbents of them were strangers, and made their abode continually beyond the seas in their owne countries, or else at Rome, from whence they were sent in legation to this realme vnto the king, and for their reward at their departure, king Henrie the seuenth gaue them those bishoprikes.

But they being strangers, thought it more meet for the assurance to suffer the cardinall to haue their benefices for a conuenient sum of monie paid them yearelie, where they remained, than either to be troubled with the charges of the same, or to be yearelie burthened with the conueiance of their reuenues vnto them: so that all the spirituall livings and presentations of these bishoprikes were sulte in his disposition, to prefer whom he liked. He had also a great number daillie attending vpon him, both of noblemen & worthie gentlemen, with no small number of the tallest yeomen that he could get in all the realme, in so much that well was that nobleman and gentleman, that could preferre a tall yeoman to his seruice.

He shall vnderstand, that he had in his hall continually three bozds, kept with three severall principall officers, that is to saie, a steward which was alwaies a priest; a treasurer a knight; and a comptroller an esquier; also a cofferer being a doctor; three marshals; three yeomen vishers in the hall, besides two gromes, and almoners. Then in the hall kitchin, two clerks of the kitchin; a cleark the comptroller; a surueior of the dressto; a cleark of the spicerie, the which together kept also a continuall messe in the hall. Also in his hall kitchin he had of master cooks two, and of other cooks, labozers and children of the kitchin, twelue persons; foure yeomen of the scullerie, and foure yeomen of the silver scullerie; two yeomen of the pastrie, with two other pastlers vnder the yeomen.

Then in his priuie kitchin a master coke, who went daillie in velvet or in sattin, with a chaine of gold, with two other yeomen and a grome: in the scalding house, a yeoman and two gromes: in the pantrie two persons: in the butterie two yeomen, two gromes, and two pages: and in the yewrie likewise: in the cellar three yeomen, and three pages: in his chandrie two: in the wasarie two: in the wardrobe of beds, the master of the wardrobe, and ten other persons: in the landrie, a yeoman, a grome, thirtie pages, two yeomen purueioz, & one grome: in the bake-house, a yeoman and two gromes: in the wood-yard a yeoman, and a grome: in the barne one: in the garden a yeoman and two gromes: porters at the gate, two yeomen, and two gromes: a yeoman of his barge: and a maister of his horse: a cleark of the stable, a yeoman of the same: the sadler: the ferrier: a yeoman of his chariot: a sumpter man: a yeoman of his stirrop: a muleter: thirtene gromes of his stable, euerie of them kept foure geldings.

In the almozie a yeoman and a grome: in his chapell he had a deane, a great divine, and a man of excellent learning: a subdeane: a repeater of the quire: a gospeller: a pissler: of singing priests ten: a maister of the children: seculars of the chapell, singing men twelue: singing children ten, with one servant to await vpon the children: in the reuererie a yeoman, and two gromes, ouer and besides diuerse retainers that came thither at principall feasts, for the furniture of his chapell, it passeth my capacitie to declare the number of costlie ornaments and rich jewels that were to be occupied in the same continually: there hath bene scene in procession, about the hall, foure and fortie verie rich coapes of one sute two, besides the rich crosses and candlesticks, and other ornaments to the furniture of the same.

He had two crossebearers, and two pillerbearers in his great chamber: and in his priuie chamber these persons: first the chiefe chamberleine, and vicechamberleine: of gentlemen vishers, besides one in his priuie chamber, he had twelue daillie waiters; and of gentlemen waiters in his priuie chamber he had six, and of lordes nine or ten, who had each of them two men allowed them to attend vpon them, except the earle of Darbie, who had allowed five men: then had he of gentlemen, of cupbearers, caruers, and sewers, both of the priuie chamber, and of the great chamber, with gentlemen daillie waiters there, fortie persons: of yeomen vishers six: of gromes in his chamber eight: of yeomen in his chamber five and fortie daillie: he had also almes men sometime more

There was attending on his bozrd of doctors and chapleins, besides them of his chapell, thirtene daillie: a cleark of his closet: secretaries two: and two clerks of his signet: and foure counsellors learned in the law. And for so much as it was necessarie to haue diuerse officers of the Chancerie to attend vpon him, that is to saie, the clerke of the crowne: a riding cleark: a cleark of the hamper: and a chafer of the war: then a cleark of the checke, aswell vpon the chapleins, as of the yeoman of his chamber: he had also foure footmen which were garnished in rich running coats, when soeuer he rode in anye tourneie: then had he an herald of armes: and a sergeant of armes: a physician: an apothecarie: foure minstrels: a keeper of his tents: an armorier: an instructo of his wards: two yeomen of the wardrobe of his robes: and a keeper of his chamber continually in the court: he had also in his house the surueior of Porke, and a cleark of the greene cloth.

All these were daillie attending, downe lieng and vpyng, and at meales: he kept in his great chamber a continuall bozrd for the chamberers and gentlemen officers, hauing with them a messe of the young lordes, and another of gentlemen. Besides all these, there was neuer an officer, gentleman, or worthie person, but he was allowed in the house, some three, some two, and all other one at the least, which grew to a great number of persons. Thus farre out of the checker roll, besides other officers, seruants, retainers, and suters, that most commonlie dined in the hall. After that he was thus furnished, he was sent thence in ambassage to the emperor Charles the first, for diuerse urgent causes touching the kings maiestie, maitie, it was thought, that so noble a prince (the cardinal) was most meet to be sent: wherefore being ready to take upon him the charge thereof, he was furnished in all degrees and purposes, most like a great prince.

For first he proceeded forth furnished like a cardinal: his gentlemen being verie manie in number, were clothed in luerie coats of crimson veluet of the best, with chaines of gold about their necks, and his peomen and meane officers in coats of fine scarlet, garded with blacke veluet an hand broad. Thus furnished, he was twice sent into Flanders to the emperor then lieng in Bruges, whome he did most highlie intertaine, discharging all his charges and his mens. There was no house within the towne of Bruges, wherein anie gentleman of the cardinals was lodged, or had recourse, but that the owners were commanded by the emperours officers, that they, upon paine of their liues, should take no monie for anie thing that the cardinals seruants did take of anie kind of vittels, no although they were disposed to make anie costlie bankets.

Commanding furthermore their said hostes, to see that they lacked no such things as they honestlie required for their honestie and pleasure. Also the emperours officers euerie night went through the towne from house to house, whereas anie English gentlemen did repast or lodge, and serued their liueries for all night, which was done in this maner. First, the officers brought into the house a cask of fine manchet, and of siluer two great pots with white wine, and sugar to the weight of a pound: white lights and yelow lights of wax: a boll of siluer with a goblet to drinke in, and euerie night a staffe torch: this was the order of the liueries euerie night. And in the morning, when the same officers came to fetch awaie their stuffe, then would they account with the hostes for the gentlemen's costs spent in the daie before. Thus the emperor intertained the cardinal and all his traine for the time of his ambassage there. And that done, he returned into England with great triumph.

Now of his order in going to Westminster hall daile in the tearme. First per he came out of his private chamber, he heard seruice in his closet, and there said his seruice with his chapleine; then going againe to his private chamber, he would demand if his seruants were in a readinesse, and furnished his chamber of presence, and waiting chamber. Being thereof then aduertised, he came out of his private chamber about eight of the clocke, appareled all in red, that is to say, his upper garment either of fine scarlet, or else fine crimsin taffata, but most comonlie of fine crimsin sattin ingrained, his pillion of fine scarlet, with a necke set in the inner side with blacke veluet, and a tippet of sables about his necke, holding in his hand an orange, whereof the substance within was taken out, and filled up againe with the part of a sponge, wherein was vineger and other confections against the pestilent aires, the which he most commonlie held to his nose when he came among anie people, or else that he was pestered with manie fumes.

Before him was borne first the broad seale of England, and his cardinals hat, by a lord, or some gentleman of worship, right solemnlie: as sone as he was once entered into his chamber of presence, his two great crosses were there attending to be borne before him: then cried the gentlemen vsiers, going before him bare headed, and said: On before my lords and maisters, or before, make waie for my lords grace. Thus went he downe through the hall with a sergant of armes before him, bearing a great mace of siluer, and two gentlemen carlieng two great pillars of siluer. And when he came at the hall doze, there was his mule, being trapped all in crimsin veluet, with a saddle of the same stuffe, & gilt stirrups. Then was there attending upon him when he was mounted, his two crosse-bearers: & his pillar-bearers in like case upon great horses, trapped all in fine scarlet. Then marched he forward with a traine of noble men and gentlemen, having his footmen foure in number about him, bearing each of them a gilt pollax in their hands.

Thus passed he forth untill he came to Westminister hall doze, and there lighted, and went by after this maner into the Chancerie, or into the Starre-chamber: howbeit, most commonlie he would go into the Chancerie, and staie a while at a barre made for him beneath the Chancerie on the right hand, and there commune sometime with the iudges, and some time with other persons: and that done, he would repaire into the Chancerie, and sitting there untill eleuen of the clocke, hearing of sutes, and determining of other matters, from thence he would diuers times go into the Starre-chamber, as occasion serued. There he neither spared high nor low, but iudged euerie state according to his merits and deserts.

He used also euerie sundaie to resort to the court, then being for the most part of all the yeare at Crénewich, with his former triumphs, taking his barge at his obone staires, furnished with peomen standing upon the bails, and his gentlemen being within about him, and landed againe at the three cranes in the Wintrie: and from thence he rode upon his mule with his crosse, his pillars, his hat and broad seale carried afore him on horsebacke through Thames street, untill he came to Billingsgate, and there took his barge againe, and so was rowed to Crénewich, where he was receiued of the lords and chiefe officers of the kings house, as the treasurer, comptroller and others, and so conueied unto the kings chamber. When the court was wonderfullie furnished with noblemen and gentlemen: and after dinner among the lords, having some consultation with the king or with the counsell, he would depart homeward with the like triumph.

Thus in great honour, triumph, and glorie, he reigned a long season, ruling all things within the realme appertaining unto the king. His house was resorted to with noblemen and gentlemen, feasting and banquetting ambassadors diuerse times, and all other right noble. And when it pleased the king for his recreation to repaire to the cardinals house (as he did diuerse times in the yeare) there wanted no preparations or furniture: bankets were set forth with maskes and immumeries, in so gorgeous a sort and costlie maner, that it was an heauen to behold. There wanted no dames or damosels meet or apt to dance with the maskers, or to garnish the place for the time: then was there all kind of musike and harmony, with fine voices both of men and children.

On a time the king came suddenlie thither in a maske with a dozen maskers all in garments like shepheards, made of fine cloth of gold, and crimsin sattin pained, & caps of the same, with visards of good physnomie, their haire & beards either of fine gold-wire silke, or blacke silke, having sixteen torch-bearers, besides their drums and other persons with visards, all clothed in sattin of the same color. And before his entring into the hall, he came by water to the water gate without anie noise, where were laid diuerse chambers and guns charged with shot, and at his landing they were shot off, which made such a rumble in the aire, that it was like thunder: it made all the noblemen, gentlemen, ladies, and gentlewomen, to muse what it should meane, comming so suddenly, they sitting quiet at a solempne banquet, after this sort.

prince.

First ye shall vnderstand, that the tables were set in the chamber of presence lust couered, & the lord cardinall sitting vnder the cloth of estate, there hauing all his seruice alone: and then was there set a table with a noble man, or a gentleman and a gentlewoman throughout all the tables in the chamber on the one side, which were made and ioined as it were but one table, all which order and deuise was done by the lord Sandes then lord chamberleine to the king and by sir Henrie Gilford comptrolloz of the kings maiesties house. Then immediatlie after the great chamberleine, and the said comptrolloz, sent to lōke what it should meane (as though they knew nothing of the matter) who looking out of the windowes into the Thames, returned againe and shewed him, that it seemed they were noblemen and strangers that arrived at his bridge, comming as ambassadours from some forren prince.

The cardinall
knew not that the king was in the number.

With that (quothe the cardinall) I desire you, because you can speake French, to take the paines to go into the hall, there to receiue them according to their estates, and to conduct them into this chamber, where they shall see vs, and all these noble personages being more at our banquet, desiring them to sit downe with vs, and to take part of our fare. Then went he incontinent downe into the hall, whereas they receiued them with twentie new torches, and conueied them vp into the chamber, with such a noise of drums and flutes, as seldome had bene heard the like. At their entring into the chamber two and two together, they went directlie before the cardinall, where he sat and saluted him reuerentlie.

The cardinall
reuerentlie saluted of the maskers.

To whom the lord chamberleine for them said: Sir, for as much as they be strangers, and can not speake English, they haue desired me to declare vnto you, that they hauing vnderstanding of this your triumphant banquet, where was assembled such a number of excellent dames, they could do no lesse vnder support of your grace, but to repaire hither, to view as well their incomparable beautie, as for to accompanie them at mūn-chance, and then to danse with them: and sir, they require of your grace licence to accomplish the said cause of their coming. To whom the cardinall said he was verie well content they should so do. Then went the maskers, and first saluted all the dames, and returned to the most worshipful, and there opened their great cup of gold filled with crownes and other peeces of gold, to whome they set certaine peeces of gold to cast at.

plaieeth at dice.

Thus perusing all the ladies and gentlewomen, to some they lost, and of some they wone: and marking after this maner all the ladies, they returned to the cardinall with great reuerence, potvizing downe all their gold so left in their cup, which was about two hundred crownes: At all (quothe the cardinall) and so cast the dice and wan them, whereat was made a great noise and ioy. Then quothe the cardinall to the lord chamberleine, I praye you (quothe he) that you would shew them, that me seemeth there should be a nobleman amongst them, who is more meet to occupie this seat and place than I am, to whome I would most gladly surrender the same according to my dutie, if I knew him.

He suspecteth that the king is present and abateeth his estate.

Then spake the lord chamberleine to them in French, and they rounding him in the eare, the lord chamberleine said to my lord cardinall: Sir (quothe he) they confesse, that among them there is such a noble personage, whome, if your grace can appoint him out from the rest, he is content to disclose himselfe, and to accept your place. With that the cardinall taking good aduise among them, at the last (quothe he) me seemeth the gentleman with the blacke beard, should be even he: and with that he arose out of his chaire, and offered the same to the gentleman in the blacke beard with his cap in his hand. The person to whom he offered the chaire was sir Edward Penill a comelle knight, that much more resembled the kings person in that make than any other.

The king perceiuing the cardinall so detoured, could not so beare laughing, but pulled downe his visar and master Penill saw, and dashed out such a pleasant countenance and there, that all the noble estates there assembled, perceiving the king to be there among them, reioiced verie much. The cardinall estons desired his highnesse to take the place of estate. To whom the king answered, that he would go first and shift his apparell, and so departed into my lord cardinals chamber, and there new appareled him: in which time the dishes of the banquet were cleane taken vp, and the tables spread againe with new cleane perfumed cloths, euery man and woman sitting still, untill the king with all his maskers came aming them againe all new appareled.

Then the king took his seat vnder the cloth of estate, commanding euery person to sit still as they did before: in came a new banquet before the king, and to all the rest throughout all the tables, wherein were serued two hundred diuerse dishes, of costlie deuises and subtilties. Thus passed they forth the night with banquetting, dancing, and other triumphs, to the great comfort of the king, and pleasant regard of the nobilitie there assembled. And thus spent this cardinall his time from date to date, and yeare to yeare, in such wealth, ioy, triumph, and glorie, hauing alwaies on his side the kings especiall fauour, untill fortune enuied his prosperitie, and ouerthrew all the foundations of his glorie, which as they were laid vpon sand, so they shooke and slipt astate, whereby ensued the ruine of his estate, euen to the verie losse of his life, which (as a man of a guiltie conscience, and fearing capitall punishment due by law for his vndutifull demeanour against his soueraigne) Edward Hall saith (vpon report) he partly procured, willingly taking so great a quantitie of a strong purgation, as nature was therewith oppressed, and vnable to digest the same: so that in fine he gaue vp the ghost, and was buried in Leicester abbeye: of whome to saie more I will surceasse, concluding on this with a description which I find of him not impertinent for this place, sith wholie concerning his person.

This cardinall (as you may perceiue in this storie) was of a great stomach, for he compted himselfe quall with princes, & by craftie suggestion gat into his hands innumerable treasure: he forced little on simonie, and was not pittifull, and stood affectionate in his owne opinion: in open presence he would lie and saie vntruth, and was double both in speech and meaning: he would promise much & performe little: he was vicious of his bodie, & gaue the clergie euill example: he hated soze the citie of London & feared it: it was told him that he should die in the waie toward London, wherefore he feared least the commons of the citie would arise in riotous maner and so slay him, yet for all that he died in the waie toward London, carrieng more with him out of the world than he brought into it; namely a winding sheete, besides other necessaries thought meet for a dead man, as christian comelinesse required. This ruine of the cardinall was not so much as once dreamp vpon, when I. Leland the famous antiquarie wrote this welwishing octatichon vnto the said Wolseie (being then in the flower of his glorie, and the pearle of his pride) as hereafter followeth.

Sic vastus operum tantorum denigmoles Ab solus summo templa dicata Deo
Sis bonus & felix miles! entola Cambric Dicere merito & fulgum mea After the cardinall was dead, the king remanent from Hampton court to Crantenwich, where he with queene Katharine kept a solemne Christmasse, and on the Twelke night he sat in the hall at his estate, whereas were diuerse enterludes, rich masks and disports, and after that a great banquet. Now after Christmas he came to his manour of Westminster, which before was called Poike place: so after that the cardinall was atainted in the premunire, was gone northward, he made a feoffment of the same place to the king, and the chapter of the cathedrall church of Poike by their writing confirmed the same feoffment, when the king changed the name and called it the high shannoze of Westminster, and no more Poike place.

The whole cleargie of England was supposed and maintained the power legantine of the cardin-nall, therefore the kings learned counsellors said plainely that they were all in the premunire: the spirituall lords were called by pycesse into the kings house to answer, but before their date of appearance they in their conuocation concluded an humble submission in writing, and offered the king a hundred thousand pounds to be their good lord, & also to give them a pardon of all offences touching the premunire by act of parlement, the which offer with much labour was accepted, and their pardon promised. In this submission the cleargie called the king supreme head of the church of England, which thing they neuer confessed before, whereupon manie things followed after, as you shall heare.

When the parlement was begun the first date of Januarie, the pardon of the spirituall persons was signed with the kings hand, and sent to the lords, which in time convenient assented to the bill, and sent it to the commons in the lower house. Now when it was read, diuers stoward persons would in no wise assent to it except all men were pardoned, saying that all men which had any thing to do with the cardinall were in the same case. The wisser sort answered, that they would not compell the king to give them his pardon, & beside that it was uncharitable done of them to hurt the cleargie, and do themselves no good: therefore they aduised them to consent to the bill, and after to sue to the king for their pardon, which counsell was not followed, but they determined first to send the speaker to the king: per they would assent to the bill.

Whereupon Thomas Audlete speaker for the commons, with a convenient number of the common house, came to the kings presence, and there elo-quentlie declared to the king, how the commons fore lamented and bewailed their chance, to thinke or imagine themselves to be out of his gracions fauor, because that he had gracionlie given his pardon of the premunire to his spirituall subjects and not to them: wherefore they most humbly besought his grace of his accustomed goodnesse and clemencie to include them in the same pardon. The king wiselie answered that he was their pynce and soueraine lord, and that they ought not to restraine him of his libertie, nor to compell him to shew his mercie: for it was at his pleasure to vse the extremitie of his lawes or mitigate and pardon the same: wherefore sith they denied to assent to the pardon of the spirituall persons, which pardon (he said) he might give without their assent by his great seale, he would be well aduised per he pardoned them, because he would not be noted to be compelled to it.

With this answer the speaker and the commons departed verie solowfull and pensue, and some light persons said that Thomas Cummwell, which was newlie come to the fauour of the king, had disclosed the secrets of the commons, which thing caused the king to be so extreame. The king like a good pynce considered how solowfull his commons were of the answer that he made them, and thought that they were not quiet: wherefore of his owne motion he caused a pardon of the premunire to be drawne, and signed it with his hand, and sent it to the common house by Chastellor, which his attorneie, which bill was sone assented to. When the commons louinglie thanked the king, and much praised his wit, that he had denied it to them when they unworthilie demanded it, and had boundfullie granted it when he perceiued that they sorrowed and lamented.

While the parlement sat, on the thirtieth date of March at Westminster, there came into the common house the lord chancelor, and diuerse lords of the spirituallie and temporallie, to the number of twelue, and there the lord chancelor said: You of this worshipfull house (I am sure) be not so ignorant, but you know well, that the king our soueraine lord hath married his brothers wife, for he was both weped and bedded with his brother pynce Arthur, and therefore you may herlie saie that he hath married his brothers wife, & this marriage be good or no manie clerkes do doubt. Wherefore the king like a vertuos pynce willing to be satisfied in his conscience, & also for the better of his realme, hath with great deliberation consulted with profound clerkes, & hath sent my lord of London here present, to the chiefe vniuersities of all chrestendome, to know their opinion and iudgement in that behalfe. And although that the vniuersities of Cambridge and Oxford had bene sufficient to discusse the cause, yet because they be in his realme, and to avoid all suspicion of parcial-tie he hath sent into the realme of France, Italie, the popes dominions and Venecians, to haue their iudgement in that behalfe, which haue concluded, written, and sealed their determinations according as you shall heare read: When Sir Brian Luke took out of a booke certeine writings sealed, and read them word by word as after in such translated out of Latine into the English tong.

Determinations of diuerse vniuer-sities touching the unlawfulnessse of the kings marriage, and first the determination of the vniuersite of Orelance.

As long since there were put forth to vs the college of doctors, regents of the vni-uersitie of Orelance, these two questions that folloio. The first, whether it be lawfull by the law of God for the brother to take to wife that woman whom his brother hath left: The second, if this be forbidden by the law of God, whether this prohibition of the law of God may be remitted by the pope his dispensation: The foresaid college of doctors regents, according to our custome and v-sage came manie times together, and did sit diuerse times upon the discussing of these foresaid doubts and questions, and did examine and weigh as much as we might diuerse and manie places, both of the old testament and the new, and also the interpretors and declarers both of the law of God and the canon law.

After we had weighed & considered all things eractlie, with god leisure and deliberation we haue all determined and concluded, that these foresaid marriages cannot be attempted, nor enterprised, except a man do wrong, and plaine contrarie to the law of God;

And in witnesse of this conclusion and determination, we haue caused this present publike writing to be signed by the scribe of our said vniuersitie, and to be strengthened & fortified with the seale of the same. ### The determination of the facultie of decrees of the vniuersitie of Paris.

Lawiers of Paris.

In the name of the Lord so be it. There was put forth before vs the deane and college of the right counsellfull facultie of decrees of the vniuersitie of Paris, this question: Whether that the pope might dispense, that the brother might marrie the wife that his brother hath left, if marriage betwene his brother now dead and his wife were once consummate: The deane and college of the said facultie after manie disputations and reasons made of both sides vpon this matter, and after great and long turning and searching of booke, both of the law of God, and the popes law, and of the law ciuill, we counsell and saie that the pope hath no power to dispense in this foresaid case. In witnesse whereof we haue caused this present writing to be strengthened with the seale of our facultie and with the signe of our scribe or chiefe bedle. Deuen in the congregation or assemble at saint John Lateranense in Paris the second daie of Maie 1530.

The determination of ciuilians and canonists of the vniuersitie of Aniou.

Aniou.

Not long time since there were proposed vnto vs the rector and doctours regents in law canon and ciuill of the vniuersitie of Aniou, these two questions here following, that is to wit: Whether it is vnlawfull by the law of God & the law of nature for a man to marrie the wife of his brother, that is departed without children, so that the marriage was consummate: And againe, whether it is lawfull for the pope to dispense with such marriage: The foresaid rector and doctours haue according to our custome and vsage manie times communed together, and sitten to dispute these questions, and to find out the certaintie of them. And after that we had discussed and examined manie and diuerse places, as well of the law of God as of the law of man, which seemed to pertain to the same purpose, and after we had brought reasons for both parties, and examined them: all things faithfullie and after good conscience considered, and vpon sufficient deliberation and aduise-ment taken, we define and determine that neither by the law of God nor of nature, it is permitted for any christian man, no not euen with the authoritie of the se apostolike, or with anie dispensation granted by the pope, to marrie the wife that his brother hath left, although his brother be departed without children, after that the marriage is once finished and consummate. And for witness of the foresaid things, we haue commanded the scribe of our said vniuersitie to signe this present publike instrument, and it to be fortified with the great seale of our vniuersitie. Enacted in the church of saint Peter in Aniou, the ycare of our Lord 1530, the 7 daie of Maie.

The determination of the facultie of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Paris.

Paris.

The deane and the facultie of the holie diuinitie of the vniuersitie of Paris, to all them to whom this present writing shall come, wissheth safetie in our sauour Iesu Christ, which is the verie true safetie. Where of late there is risen a great controuersie of great difficultie, vpon the marriage betwene the most noble Henrie the eight king of England, defender of the faith, and lord of Ireland, &c: and the noble ladie Katharine queene of England, daughter to the catholike king: Ferdinand, which marriage was not onelie contract betwene him and his former husband, but also consummate and finished by carnall intermedling.

This question also was proposed to vs to discusse and examine according to iustice and truth, that is to saie: Whether to marrie him that one brother dead without children hath left, being so prohibited by the law of God and nature, that it can not be lawfull by the popes dispensation, that any christian man should marrie the wife that his brother hath left: The foresaid deane and facultie calling to our remembrance, how vertuous, and how holie a thing, and how agreeable to our profession, vnto our dutie of loue and charitie: it is for vs to shew the waie of iustice and right, of vertue and honestie, to them which desire to lead and passe ouer their life in the law of our Lord with pure and quiet conscience: could not but be readie to satisfie so honest and iust requests: wherevpon after our old wont, we came together vpon our oth in the church of S. Spaturine, and there for the same cause had a solempne masse with deuout praier to the Holie-ghost.

And also we toke an oth, euerie man to deliuer and to studie vpon the foresaid question, as should be to the pleasure of God & according to conscience. And after diuerse & manie sessions or sittings, which were had and continued in the church of saint Spaturine, and also in the college called Sorbon, from the eight daie of June to the second daie of Iulie: when we had searched and examined thorough and thorough, with as much diligence as we could, and with such reuerence and religion or conscience as becommeth in such a matter, both the booke of holie scripture, and also the most approved interpreters of the same: finalie the generall and synodall councils, decrees and constitutions of the sacre and holie church, which by long custome hath bene received and approbate.

The foresaid deane and facultie, disputing vpon the foresaid question, and making answer to the same, and that after the iudgement and full consent of the most part of the said facultie, haue concluded and determined, that the foresaid marriage with the brothers wife, departing without children, be so forbidden both by the law of God & of nature, that the pope hath no power to dispense with such marriages, whether they be contract or to be contract. And for credence, beléeve, and witnesse of this our assertion and determination, we haue caused the seale of our facultie, with our notaries signe, to be put vnto this present writing. Dated in our generall congregation that we keepe by an oth at saint Spaturines, the ycare of our Lord 1530, the second daie of Iulie.

The determination of the vniuersitie of Burges in Berrie or Biturs.

With the deane and facultie of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Burges (because we will do according to the example of S. Paule doctour of the gentiles, which doth likewise) will begin our writing with praier for all the beloued of God, among whom you most deare readers, vnto whom we write, be called: grace, peace, and quietnesse of conscience come to you from God the father, and from our Lord Iesu Christ. While we were gathered together

together all into one place (in the octaves of Whitsuntide) both in bodie and mind, and were sitting in the house of the said deane, there was a question put to vs againe, which had bene proposed to vs oftentimes before, being no small question, which was this: Whether the brother taking the wife of his brother now dead, and the marriage once consummate and perfect, doth a thing vnlawfull or no?

At the last when we had sought for the truth of the thing, and had perceiued and found it out by much labour and studie of euerie one of vs by himselfe, and by much and often turning of holie booke, euerie one of vs not corrupt, whereby we might the lesse o-beie the truth, began as the holie ghost did put in his mind, to giue euerie man one arbitrement and sentence, which was this. I haue well perceiued in ve-rie truth, without regard or respect of anie person, that those persons which be rehearsed in the 18 chapter of the Leuiticall law, be forbidden by the verie law of nature to contract matrimonie togither, and that this law can in no wise be released by anie au-thoritie of anie man, by the which there is made an abominable discouering of his brothers foulness.
And this is the signe of our common bedell or notarie, and the seale of our foresaid facultie put vnto this present writing the 10 daie of June, in the yeare of our Lord 1530. And because the foot of our writing shall be of one forme and fashion with the head, as we began with prayer, so let vs end after the example of S. Paule that we spake of before, and saie, the grace and fauour of our Lord Iesu Christ, the charitie and loue of God and the communication of the holie ghost be with you all, Amen.

The determination of the diuines in the popes vniuersitie of Bononie.

GOD best and mightiest taught first the old law and testament with his owne mouth, to forme and fashion according to loue and charitie the ma-ners and life of men. And secondarily the same God did take afterwards manhood vpon him for to be the redemer of man, and so made the new law or new testament, not onlie to forme and fashion according to loue and charitie the life and maners of men, but also to take awaie and to declare doubts, the which did arise in manie cases, which when they be once clerelie determined, shall helpe greatly to perfect vertue and goodnesse, that is to saie, to perfect loue and charitie.

Wherefore we thought it euermore, that it should be our part to followe these most holie doctrines and lawes of our father of heauen, and that we lightened by the light of God aboue & of the holie ghost, should giue our sentence and iudgement in high and doubt-full matters, after that we haue once leasurelie and sufficientlie taken aduiselement vpon the cause, and haue clerelie searched out and opened the thing by many reasons and writings of holie fathers, as well for the one part as for the other, doing nothing (as here as we can) rashlie or without deliberation.
Wherefore where certeine great and noble men did instantlie desire vs, that we would with all diligence possible looke for this case that after insuech, & afterwards to giue our iudgement vpon the same, according to most equitie, right, and conscience, sic-king onlie to the truth.

All the doctors of diuinitie of this vniuersitie, when we had euerie one by himselfe examined the matter at home in our houses, came all togither into one place, and there treated vpon it manie daies with as much cunning and learning as we could, we anon looked on the case togither, we examined it togither, we compared all things togither, we handling euerie thing by it selfe, did trie them euen as you would saie by line and rule, we brought forth all maner of reasons which we thought could be brought for the contrarie part, and afterward solved them, yea euen the reasons of the most reuerend father cardinal Caietane, yea and moreover the Deuteronomie dispensation of stirring vp the brothers seed, and tho:tie all other manner of reasons and opinions of the contrarie part, as manie as seemed to belong to this purpose.

And this question that was asked of vs, was this: Whether it was forbidden onlie by the ordinance of the church, or else by the law of God, that a man might not marrie the wife left of his brother departed without children? And if it were commanded by both the lawes not to be done, whether the pope may dispense with anie man to make such ma-riage? The which question now that we haue examined both by our selfe secretlie, and also openlie as diligentlie and exactlie as we could possible, and discussed it after the best manner that our wits would serue: we determine, giue iudgement, and saie, and as trillie as we can we witnesse, and without anie doubt dostedfastlie hold, that this marriage should be horrible, accursed, and to be cried out vpon, and vnterlie abhominable not onlie for a christian man, but for an infidell, vnfaithfull or heathen.

And that it is prohibited vnder grieuous paines and punishments by the law of God, of nature, and of man, and that the pope, though that he almost may do all things, vnto whome Christ did giue the keyes of the kingdome of heauen, hath no power to giue a dispensation to anie man for to contract such marriage for anie manner of cause, consideration or suggestion: and all we be readie at all times & in all places to defend & mainteine the truth of this our conclusion. In witnesse whereof we haue made this present writing, and haue fortified the same both with the seale of our vniuersitie, and also with the seale of our college of doctors of diuinitie, and haue subscribed & signed it with our generall and accustomed subscription in the cathedrall church of Bononie, the tenth daie of June, the yeare of our Lord 1530.

The determination of the facultie of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Padua in Italie.

They that haue written for the maintenance of the catholike faith, affirme that God (best and mightiest) did giue the precepts & commandements of the old law with his owne mouth, to be an example for vs, wherein we might see how we should order our life and maners, and this God had done before he became man: and after that he had put vpon him our manhood, & was become redemer or buier of mankind, he made the new law or testament, and of his mere liberalitie did giue it vs, not onlie for the cause aforesaid; but also to take awaie and declare all manner of doubts and questions that might arise, the which once opened and declared, that their verie true meaning is, to the intent that thereby we might be made perfectlie god, which be greatlie fruitfull vnto vs and wholesome.

And seeing that this was the mind of God in making these lawes, it hath bene our intent, and euermore shall be, as it becometh christian men, to follow these most solemnne ordinances of the most high workemaster God, & the helpe of his light, that is aboue the capacitie of nature, to offer our iudgment in all manner of doubts and hard questions. After we had once considered the thing after the best manner, and had by sufficient leasure made it cleare by manie evident reasons of both parties, and by manie authorities

thorities of the fathers of the church, determining nothing (as nere as we can) rashlye or without convenient deliberation. Seeing therefore that certeine great orators or ambassadoys did humblye require and praye vs, that we would vouchsafe to search out, with all the diligence we could this case following, and afterwards to giue our sentence vpon the same, plainelie and simplye looking onelie on the truth.

After the doctors of diuinitie of this vniuersitie came togither, and after that we had euerie man examined the thing particularlie in our owne houses, and had beaten it with all learning and cunning that we were able: anon when we were togither, we considered, craniued, and weied all things by themselves, and brought in all maner of reasons, which we thought might by anie meanes be made to the contrarie, and without all colour or cloke did sholie and clerie dissolue them and take them awate. And amongst all, the dispensation by the law of Deuteronomie, of stirring by the brothers seed, and all maner other reasons and determinations to the contrarie, that seemed to vs to pertaine anie thing to that purpose, we vterlye confuted and dispatched them.

The question that is put vnto vs is this: Whether to marrie the wife of our brother departed without children, is forbidden onelie by the law of the church, or by the law of God also? And if it be forbidden by both these laws, whether the pope make dispense with anie man for such matrimonie or no? Which question now that we haue discussed it, and as farre as we could, haue made it clere, both by natlie euerie man by himselfe, and after all togither openlie, we saie, iudge, decree, witnesse, and for a truth affirme, that such marriage is no marriage; yea and that it is abhorred and cursed of euerie christian man, and to be abhominable as a grieuous sinne; and that it is as cleere as can be forbidden vnder most cruell penalties by the lawes of nature, of God, and of man; and that the pope, vnto whome the keyes of the kingdome of heauen be committed by Christ the sonne of God, hath no power to dispense by the right of law for anie cause, suggestion, or excuse, that anie such matrimonie should be contracted.

For these things which be forbidden by the law of God, be not vnderneath his power, but aboue it; nor he is not the vicar of God as concerning these things, but onelie in such things as God hath not determined himselfe in his law; but hath left them to the determination and ordinance of man. And to mainteine the truth of this our sentence and conclusion, and for the most certeine and vndoubted defense of the same, we all of one mind and accord shall at all times and in euerie place be readie. In witnesse whereof we haue made this writing, and haue authorized it with the accustomed seale of our vniuersitie and also of our college of diuines. Dated at Padua in the church of the heremites of saint Augustine the first daie of Julie, in the yere of our Lord 1530.

The determination of the vniuersitie of Tholose.

Tholose.

There was treated in our vniuersitie of Tholose a verie hard question: Whether it be lawfull for the brother to marrie hir which had bene wife to his brother now departed, & that without children: Where was besides this an other thing that troubled vs verie sore; Whether, if the pope which hath the cure of Christs flocke, would by his dispensation (as men call it) suffer this, that then at the least wile it might be lawfull? The rector of the vniuersitie called to counsell all the doctors regents, that were at that time at Tholose for to shew thei minds on this question, and that not once, but twise: for he iudged that counsell giuing ought not to be hasted nor done by on head, and that we had need of time and space to do anie thing conuenientlie and as it ought to be.

At the last there came togither into one place all the best learned and cunningest doctors, both of holie diuinitie, and also doctors that were best learned in both lawes; yea, and finallye as manie as had anie experience in anie matter, and were able to do anie thing either by iudgement and discretion, or by eloquence or their excellent wits; and there did sweare that they would obeie the sacred and holie counsels, and would followe the decrees of the fathers, which no man that hath anie god conscience will violat or breake. And so euerie man said his mind, & the matter was debated and reasoned diffuselie and at large for both parts.

In conclusion, we fell so fast to this point, that this was the sentence and determination that our vniuersitie, with one voice of all, did determine and conclude with most pure and clere conscience, and defiled with no maner of leuen of corruption: That it is lawfull for no man, neither by the law of God, nor by the law of nature, to take hir to wife that his brother hath left: and seeing that it maie not be done by the law of God nor of nature, we answered all, that the pope can lose no man from that law, nor dispense with him. And as for that thing can not be contrarie to our sentence and verbid, that the brother in old time was compelled by the law of Deuteronomie to marrie the brothers wife departed without issue. For this law was but a shadow and a figure of things to come, which vanished awate as sone as euer the light and truth of the gospel appeared. And because these things be thus, we haue given our sentence after this forme aboue, and haue commanded the same to be signed by our notarie which is our secretarie, and to be fortified and authorized by the putting to of our authentickall seale of our vniuersitie aforesaid, at Tholose the calends of first daie of October, the yere of our Lord 1530.

After these determinations were read, there were shewed aboue an hundred books byaton by doctors of strange regions, which all agreed the kings marriage to be vnlawfull, which were not read, for the daie was spent. Then the chancelor said: Now you of this common house maie report in your countries what you haue seene and heard, & then all men shall openlie perceiue, that the king hath not attempted this matter of will and pleasure, as some strangers report, but onlie for the discharge of his conscience and suertie of the succession of his realme: this is the cause of our repaire hither to you, and now will we depart.

When these determinations were published, all wise men in the realme much abhorred that marriage: but women, and such as were more willfull than wise or learned, spake against the determination, and said that the vniuersities were corrupt and infected so to do, which is not to be thought. The king himselfe sore lamented his chance, and made no maner of mirth nor pastime as he was wont to do. He dined and resorted to the quene as he was accustomed, and diminished nothing of hir estate, and much loued and cherished their daughter the ladie Marie: but in no wise he would not come to hir bed. When Easter began to draw nere, the parlement for that time ended, and was proroged till the last daie of March, in the next yere. In the parlement aforesaid was an act made, that whosoever did poison any person, should be boiled in hot water to the death: which act was made, because one Richard Kose, in the parlement time had poisoned diuerse persons at the bishop the 21. iij.

When the vniuersitie aforesaid, and a great number of clearks and well learned men had determined the kings marriage to be vnlawfull, detestable, and against Gods law (as you haue heard) the king willing the quene to haue knowledge of the same, sent to his diuerse lordes of the counsell, the last daie of Maie, being the wednesdaie in Whitsun weeke: the which lordes, in his chamber at Greenwich, declared to him all the determinations (as you haue heard) and asked him whether he would (for the quietnesse of the kings conscience) put the matter to foure prelates, and foure temporall lordes of this realme, or abide by his appeal: the quene answered: The king my father which concluded my marriage, I am sure, was not so ignorant but he asked counsell of clearks and well learned men before he married me the second time: for if he had had any doubt in my marriage, he would not haue disbursed so great a treasure as he did, then all the doctors in a manner agreed my marriage to be good, inasmuch that the pope himselfe, which knew best what was to be done, did both dispense and ratifie the second marriage, against whose doings I maruell that any person will speake or write.

And as to the determination of the vniuersitie, I am a woman, and lacke wit and learning to answer to them, but to God I commit the iudgement of that, whether they haue done iustlie or partiallie: for this I am sure, that neither the kings father, nor my father would haue condescended to our marriage, if it had bene declared to be vnlawfull. And where you saie that I should put the cause to eight persons of this realme for quietnesse of the kings conscience, I pray God send his grace a quiet conscience. And this shall be your answer: that I saie I am his lawfull wife, and to him lawfullie married, and by the order of holie church I was to him espoused as his true wife (although I was not so worthie) and in that point I will abide till the court of Rome, which was please to the beginning, haue made thereof a determination and final ending. With this answer the lordes departed to the king, which was sozie to heare of his lawfull opinion, and in especiall that the more trusted in the popes law, than in keeping the precepts of God.]

in the name of the king and quene.

Forasmuch as merchant strangers, bringing their wares into the realme, did receiue readie monie for them, and euer deliuered the same monie to other merchants by exchange, not employing it vpon the commodities of the realme, a proclamation was set forth and made, that no person should make any exchange, contrarie to the meaning of a statute ordained in the time of king Richard the second: by reason whereof, clothes and other commodites of this realme shortly after were well sold, till they fell to exchange againe, and that this proclamation was forgotten. After Whitsuntide, the king & the quene removed to Windsor, and there continued till the fourteenth of Iulie, on the which daie the king removed to Woodstocke, and left the quene at Windsor, where she remained a while, & after removed to the Poore, and from thence to Stamford, whither the king sent to his diuerse lordes, to aduise him to be conformable to the law of God, shewing sundrie reasons to persuaade him to their purpose, and one among the rest used for that present this communication, as I find it left in writing, in the behaue of the king.

shew vnto you thus much, that his maiestie hauing heretofore sent vnto you a great number of his counsellors and learned men, to declare what great iniuries and wrongs by your procurement and solicitation were and yet be done vnto his maiestie and this his realme, in citing his highnesse in his owne person, or by his proxy to appeare at Rome, to make answer to your sute, contrarie to the determination of all lawes, as not onelie the famous vniuersities of christendome, as Paris and Orléans, but also as the most part of the learned men here or elsewhere in that facultie affirme, and as maister deane learned in that facultie can and will testifie vnto you, on his conscience, if it shall please you to heare him, and contrarie also to his estate roiall, and to the priuileges and prerogatiues of this his graces realme.

His highnesse perceiuing your grace not to regard their aduertisements in right and iustice, but still to perseuere and continue, and rather increase your iniurious procurements and solicitations in that behalfe, is not a little græued & displeased with your continuance and prosecution of this iniurie and manifest wrong towards his maiestie, and this his graces realme. The continuance of which your vnkind dealing hath compelled his highnesse not onelie to abstaine from the sight of you, but also to forbear to receiue any of your tokens, which do nothing else but renew and refresh his displeasure, inforcing him also to an indignation, to see tokens offered and sent by him, who continueth in prosecuting of so notable an iniurie and manifest wrong towards his maiestie, & this his realme, perceiuing also what boldnesse other outward princes might take to misintreat his highnesse, when they should vnderstand how his maiestie suffereth himselfe to be wronged by his pretended subject, and so notable wrong to be done to this his realme.

And vpon this cause and ground, like as the kings highnesse these certeine moneths past, hath disceuered your grace from his presence, so he intendeth yet to continue, and hath commanded vs to shew you, that his pleasure is ye shall be at your libertie, (as ye shall thinke most commodious) repaire to either of these three places, his manour of Woking, his manour of Stamford, or the monastrie of Wilham, and there to continue without further molesting of his highnesse with your sutes or requests to the contrary, as wherewith ye shall not preuaile; but more and more molesting and troubling his highnesse, procure his further displeasure towards you.

And though percase the pope shall best, as perceiuing now the matter of right he will, yet the kings highnesse cannot digest in his stomach this iniurie done, not to be amended or reformed at your graces procurement, but your grace rather saing and instanting the contrarie. And this is the charge, madam, which the kings highnesse hath committed vnto vs, to be spoken vnto you on his highnesse behalfe. And to saie to you as of my selfe, concerning the iniurie of the kings cause, as I haue heretofore said, I shall now repeat and rehearse againe vnto your grace; which is, that your grace being knowne by prince Arthur, ye be not lawfull wife to the kings highnesse our soveraigne lord in my conscience. This speech ended, others of the companie used their persuasorie talke to the quene: whose words notwithstanding did so little moue her, that the king himselfe in his first opinion, that she was his true and lawfull wife, and from the same would not by any means be removed.]

The priests of London being called afore the bishop that would haue had them contributaries to the payment of the hundred thousand pounds, granted to the king for his pardon of the premunice, kept such a stir in breaking into the chapter house (where the bishops sat) all at once, and striking and buffeting the bishops servants which gave them evil language, that the bishop was faine to give them his blessing, and suffer them to depart in quiet for that time. But after, upon complaint made to the lord chancellor, diverse of them and of their partakers were arrested, and committed to prison, to the number of sixtene priests, and five laie men, some to the Tower, and some to the Fleet, and to other places, where they remained long after. ¶ Thomas Bilneie, bachellor of law, was burnt at Norwich the nineteenth of August, and the fourth of December sir Rics Griffin was beheaded at the Tower hill, and his man named John Hetwos was drawn to Tiburne, and there hanged and quartered.

The five and twentieth of Maie, betwene London and Grauesend, were taken two great fishes called whorlepoles, male and female. ¶ In this season, there was in the realme much preaching, one learned man holding against another, namelie in the matter of the kings marriage. After Christmas, the parlement began to sit againe, in the which the commons found themselves soe greued with the crueltie of ordinaries, that called inche before them ex officio. At length, a booke was drawne of all the griefes of the commons, for the cruell deniaunce of the cleargie, and the same deliuered to the king by the speaker, humble beseeching him in the name of all the commons, to take such discretion therein, as to his high wisdom might seeme most expedient. The king answered, that he would take advise, and heare the partie accused speake. He was not so readie to gratifie the commons in their requests, as some thought that he would have bene, if they had not tricked and refused to passe a statute, which he had sent to them touching wards and primer seisons.

After this, was the parlement proroged till the tenth of Aprill. In this parlement was an act made, that bishops should paie no more annates or monie for their bulles to the pope: for it was proued that there had bene paid for bulles of bishops, since the fourth yeare of Henrie the seventh an hundred threescore thousand pounds sterling, beside other dispensations & pardons. When the parlement was begun againe after Easter, there was a motion made to helpe the king with monie toward his charges about the building of houses, piles, and other fortifications, upon the borders fore against Scotland, both for better habitation to be had there, & also for the restraint of the Scots that used to make inuasions. There was therefore a sixtenth granted, but not enacted at this session, because that the commons began a petition in Westminster, whereof the parlement was proroged, as ye shall heare in the next yeare.

In this yeare was an old toll demanded in Flanders of Englishmen called the toll of the hound, which is a river and a passage. The toll is twelve pence of a fardell. It had bene often demanded, but neuer paid, insomuch that king Henrie the seventh for the demand of that toll, prohibited all his subjects to keepe any mart at Antwerpe or Barrow, till it was promised that upon their returne the said toll should neuer be demanded. The king sent doctor Knight, and others to Calis, whither came the emperours commissioners, and there (upon talke) the matter was put in suspension for a time. The king having purchased of the cardinall after his attendure in the premonstratour his house at Westminster, called Bozke place, and got a confirmation of the cardinals feoffment thereof, made of the chapter of the cathedrall church of Bozke, purchased this yeare also all the medowes about saint James, and there made a faire mansion and a parke for his greater commoditie & pleasure.

And because he had a great affection to the said house at Westminster, he bestowed great cost in going forward with the building thereof, and changed the name, so that it was after called the kings palace of Westminster.

The fourteenth daie of Maie, the parlement was proroged till the fourth of february next coming. After which prorogation, sir Thomas Spore, chancellor of England, after long lutes made to the king to be discharged of his office, the sixteenth of Maie he deliuered to the king at Westminster the great seale of England, and was with the kings favour discharged, which seale the king kept till mondaie in Whitson weeke, on which daie he dubbed Thomas Audleie speaker of the parlement, knight, and made him lord keeper of the great seale, and so he was called. ¶ The king being informed, that the pope and the french king should meet in the beginning of the next spring at Paris, he thought good for diuerse considerations, to speake with the french king in his owne person; before the pope and he should come together: whereupon it was concluded, that in October following, both the princes should meet betwene Calis and Bullongne. Wherefore the king of England sent out his letters to his nobles, prelates, and seruants, commanding them to be readie at Canturburie the six and twentieth of September, to passe the seas with him, for the accomplishment of the interuiew betwixt him and the french king.

On the first of September being sundaie, the king being come to Windsor, created the lady Anne Bullongne marchionesse of Penbrooke, and gave to her one thousand pounds land by the yeare; and that solemnitie finished, he rode to the college, where after that seruice was ended, a new league was concluded and sworn betwene the king, and the french king, Messire Pomouate the french ambassador being present. On the tenth of October, the king came to Douer, and on the eleuenth daie in the morning at thre of the clocke hee took shipping at Douer rode, and before ten of the same daie, he with the lady marchionesse of Penbrooke landed at Calis, where he was receiued with all honour, and lodged at the Eschequer. There came to him whilst he laie in Calis, diuerse lords from the french court, and amongst other the lord great master of France, and the archbishop of Roane, which were honorable of him receiued, and with them hee took a date and place of meeting with the king their master.

Whereupon the one and twentieth of October, he marched out of Calis, accompanied with the dukes of Suffolke and Suffolke, the marqueses of Dorset and Cresser, the earles of Arundell, Orford, Surrey, Essex, Darbie, Rutland, Huntington, and Suffolk, with diuerse viscounts, barons, knights of the garter, and other of the nobilitie and gentlemen freshlie apparellled, and richlie trimmed; and coming to the place appointed, hee there met with the french king, who was come to receiue him with all honor that might be: and after salutations and embracing used in most louing maner, the king of England went with the french king to Bullongne; and by the waie was incountered by the french kings three sons, and other great lords that attended them, with welcomming the king of England; hee them gentlie receiued, and so all this noble companie came to Bullongne, where the king of England and his nobles were so noble intertained, feasted, banketed, and cheared, that wonder it was to consider the great plentie of viands, spices, wines, and all other prouision necessarie for man and horse, so that there was no more but aske and haue; and no man durst take any monie, for the french king paid for all.

The five and twentieth of October, whilst the king late thus in Boulloigne, the French king called a chapter of the companions of his order named St.
Michael, of whom the king of England was one, and so there elected the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk to be companions of the same order: and being brought to the chapter, they had their collars delivered to them, and were sworn to the statutes of the order, their obedience to their sovereign lord allwaile reserved. Thus the two kings late in Boulloigne, monday, Tuesday, and Thursday: and on Friday the five and twentieth of October, they departed out of Boulloigne to Calis. Without the towne of Calis about the distance of two miles, the duke of Richmond the kings base son, with a great company of noble men, which had not bene at Bulloigne, met them, and saluting the French king, embraced him in most honorable and courteous maner.

Thus they passed forward, and came to Newham bridge, and so to Calis, where was such provision made for the receiving of them, as well for lodgings, plate, and all such other furniture of household, as also of all sorts of viands, wines, and other necessaries, that it seemed wonderfull: in so much as the proportion assigned to the French lords oftentimes was so abundant, that they refused a great part thereof. The French kings traine was twelve hundred horses, or rather above. But there was lodging enough in Calis, not onlie for them, but also for manie other, so that there were above eight thousand persons lodged within the towne in that season. The French king coming thither on the Friday, tarried there till Tuesday the thirtieth of October, and then departed; the king of England accompanieng him out of the towne, till he came to enter into the French ground, and there either took leave of other with eight princelie countenance, loving behaviour, and so hartie words, that all men rejoiced that saw them.

Whilst the two kings late in Calis, the lord Arnas de Montmorencie earle of Beaumont, great master of the French kings house, & Philip de Chabot earle of Beaulieu, great admirall of France, were admitted into the order of the garter, the king calling a chapter for that purpose, of the knights of that order, at the which the French king was present, and wore a blew mantell, because he was one of the same order. Whilst the king was in the French kings dominion, he had the upper hand, and likewise had the French king in his dominion. And as the French king paid all the Englishmens charges at Boulloigne: so did the king of England at Calis.
There rose about the same season such fow weather, storms and rigorous winds, continuing for the more part at north and north-west, that the king staid at Calis for a convenient time till Tuesday the thirteenth of November at midnight, and then taking his ship, landed at Dover the next day about five of the clocke in the morning. And heretofore upon his returne, he married princelie the lady Anne Bol-loigne the same daie, being the fourteenth daie of November, and the feast daie of saint Erkenwald; which marriage was kept so secret, that verie few knew it till Easter next ensuing, when it was perceived that she was with child.

When the king should passe over the sea, he considered that the Scots would haplie attempt somewhat to the prejudice of his subjects in his absence, which liked not (he being within the realme) to rob both by sea and land. Wherefore to resist their malice, he appointed sir Arthur Warrice with three hundred men to go unto Berwick, to defend the borders from invasions of the Scots, who shortly after by the middle marches entered the realme, and came to a place called Fotherbie, and firing certeine villages in their waite, returned. The erle of Angus as then was at Berwick as a banished man; and the said sir Arthur determined to revenge this displeasure: and thereupon with foure hundred men made a rode into Scotland, and set a village on fire. Then immediatlie assembled together eight hundred Scots, and began to approach nere to the English men, who perceiving them, caused their trumpet to blow the retreat; and the erle and twentie with him showed himselfe on an hill, even in the face of the Scots, and the trumpet blew at their backs, so that the Scots thought that there had bene two companies, which caused the Scots to flee, and the English men followed and slew a great number of them, and tooke manie of them prisoners.

After Christmass the Thomas Audley lord keeper of the great scale was made high chancelor of England. And then the parliament began, because the office of the speaker was void, Humfrey Wylfield of Greis inne was chosen speaker. In this parliament was an act made, that no person should ap-peale for any cause out of this realme to the court of Rome, but from the commissarie to the bishop, and from the bishop to the archbishop, and from the archbishop to the king; and all causes of the king to be tried in the upper house of the convocation. It was also enacted the same time, that quene Katharine should no more be called quene, but princesse Dowager, as the widow of prince Arthur. In the season of the last summer died William Warham archbishop of Canturburie, and then was named to that sea Thomas Cranmer the kings chaplaine, a man of good learning, and of a vertuous life, which latelie before had bene ambassadoe from the king to the pope.

After that the king pertained his new wife to be with child, he caused all officers necessarie to be appointed to hir, and so on Easter even she went to hir closet openlie as quene; and then the king appointed the daie of hir coronation to be kept on Whitsunday next following: and writings were sent to all shiriffs, to certifie the names of men of fortie pounds to receive the order of knighthood, or else to make fine. The assentment of the fine was appointed to Thomas Cromwell, master of the kings treasury house, & counsellor to the king, a man newlie received into high favour. He so used the matter, that a great summe of monie was raised to the kings use by those fines. The matter of the quenes appeale whereunto she still sticked, and by no means could be removed from it, was communed of, both in the parliament house, and also in the convocation house, where it was so handled, that manie were of opinion, that not onlie hir appeale, but also all other appeales made to Rome were void and of none effect: for that in ancient times it had bene determined, that a cause rising in one province should be determined in the same.

This matter was opened with all the circumstances to the lady Katharine Dowager (for so was she then called) the which persisted still in hir former opinion, and would reuoke by no means hir ap-peale to the court of Rome. Whereupon the archbishop of Canturburie accompanied with the bishops of London, Winchester, Bath, Exeter, and divers other learned men in great number, rode to Dunstable, which is six miles from Amptill, where the princesse Dowager laie, and there by one doctor Lee she was cited to appeare before the said archbishop in cause of matrimonie in the said towne of Dunstable, and at the daie of appeare she appeared not, but made default, and so she was called peremptorie.

forie curie date fiftene daies together, and at the last, for lacke of appearance, by the assent of all the learned men there present, the was divorced from the king, and the marriage declared to be void and of none effect. Of this divorce and of the kings marriage with the ladie Anne Bullongne men spake diuerse lie; some said the king had done wisely, and so as became him to do in discharge of his conscience. Other offer wise iudged, and spake their fantasies as they thought good: but when euerie man had talked inough, then were they quiet, and all rested in good peace.

In Maie pope Clement sent an orator to the king, requiring him to appeare personallie at the generall councell which he had appointed to be kept the next fallowing. But when his commission was shewed, at the earnest request of the king, there was neither place nor time specified for the keeping of that coun-cell; and so with an uncerteine answer to an uncerteine demand he departed, but not unloaded. The king understanding that the pope, the emperor, & the French king shuld meet at Pise in Iulie folowing, appointed the duke of Norfolk, the lord Rochford brother to queene Anne, Sir William Paulet con-trollor of his house, Sir Anthoine Browne, and Sir Francis Wyah knights, to go in ambassage to the French king, and both to accompanie him to Pise, and also to commune with the pope there concerning his state in the kings divorce. These worthy personages made their prouision readie; and so with the number of eight score horses they went to Dover, and passing ouer to Calis, toke their waie through France, to accomplish their ambassage as they had in commandement.

In the beginning of Maie, the king caused open proclamations to be made, that all men that claimed to do anie seruice, or execute anie office at the solemne feast of the coronation by the waie of tenure, grant, or prescription, should put their grant three weekes after Easter in the Starre chamber before Charles duke of Suffolke, for that time high steward of England, and the lord chancellor and other commissioners. The duke of Norfolk claimed to be erle marshall, and to exercise his office at that feast; the erle of Arundell claimed to be high butler, and to exercise the same; the erle of Oxford claimed to be chamberlaine; the vicount Aisle claimed to be pantler; the lord Aburgauennie to be chiefe larderer; and the lord Wate claimed to be almoner, and Sir Henrie What knight claimed to be trower. All these noble personages desired their offices with their fees.

Beside these, the maior of London claimed to serue the queene with a cup of gold; and a cup of as-saie of the same, and that twelue citizens should attend on the cupbord, and the maior to haue the cup and cup of assaie for his laboz: which petition was allowed. The siue ports claimed to beare a canopie ouer the queens head the daie of the coronation with fourte gilt belles, and to haue the same for a reward, which to them was allowed. Diuerse other put in petie claimers which were not allowed, because they seemed onlie to be done at the kings coronation. All this season great purueance was made of all manner of vittells: & lords, knights & squiers were sent for out of all countries, which came to London at their daie with a great number of people.

After that the kings highnesse had addressed his gratious letters to the maior and communalitie of the citie, significg to them, that his pleasure was to solemnize and celebrate the coronation of his most deare and welbeloued wife queene Anne, at Westminster the Whitsundae next insuing, willed them to make preparation, as well to fetch his grace from Greenwich to the Tower by water, as to see the citie adorned and garnished with pagants in places accustomed, for the honoz of his grace. When the shuld be conuied from the Tower to Westminster, there was a common counsell called, and commandement was giuen to the haberdashers (of which craft the maior Sir Stephan Boccoke then was) that they shuld prepare a barge for the bachelors, with a waile and a foist, garnished with banners and streamers likewise, as they use to do. When the maior is presented at Westminster on the morrow after Simon and Jude. Also all other crafts were commanded to prepare barges, and to garnish them, not alonely with their banners accustomed, but also to decke them with targets by the sides of the barges, and to set up all such seemelie banners and ban-nerets as they had in their halles, or could get met to furnish their said barges, and euerie barge to haue minstrellie: according to which commandements great preparation was made for all things necessarie for such a noble triumph.

The nineteenth daie of Maie, the maior and his brethren all in scarlet, and such as were knights had collars of S S, and the remnant hauing god chains, and the counsell of the citie with them, assembled at saint Marie hill, and at one of the clocke descended to the new staire to their barge, which was garnished with manie goodlie banners and streamers, and rich-lie couered. In which barge were shalmes, bagbu-thes, and diuerse other instruments, which continu-allie made goodlie harmonie. After that the maior and his brethren were in their barge, seeing that all the companies to the number of fiftie barges were readie to wait upon them, they gaue commandement to the companies, that no barge should rowe nearer to another than twise the length of the barge vpon a great paine. And to see the order kept, there were three light sheries prepared, and in euerie one of them two officers to call on them to keepe their order, after which commandement giuen, they set forth in order as hereafter is described.

First before the maiors barge was a foist or waile full of ordinance, in which foist was a great bagon continuallie mouing and casting wild fire: and round about the said foist stood terrible monsters and wild men casting fire, and making hideous noises. Next after the foist a good distance came the maiors barge: on whose right hand was the bachelors barge, in the which were trumpets and diuerse other melodious instruments; the decks of the said barge and the sailyards, with the top castles were hanged with rich cloth of gold and silke: at the foreship and the sterne were two great banners rich, beaten with the armes of the king and the queene, and on the top castell also was a long streamer netolie beaten with the said armes. The sides of the barge were set full of flags and banners of the deuises of the companie of the haberdashers and merchants aduenturers, and the coards were hanged with innumerable pennellies, hauing little belles at the ends, which made a goodlie noise and a goodlie sight, wauering in the wind. On the outside of the barge were three dozen sentillions in mettall of arms of the king and the queene, which were beate upon square bucram diuided, so that the right side had the kings colours, and the left side the queenes, which sentil-lions were fastened on the clothes of gold and siluer, hanging on the decks on the left hand.

On the left hand of the maior was another foist, in the which was a mount, and on the same stood a white falcon crowned, vpon a roate of gold inuoi-ned with white roses and red, which was the queens deuise; about which mount sat virgins singing and plaieng sweetlie. Next after the maior, follewed his felie with fellowship the haberdashers; next after them the mercers, then the grocers, and so euerie companie in his order, and last of all the maior and shiriffes officers, euerie companie hauing melodie in his barge by himselfe, and goodlie garnished with banners, and some garnished with silke, and some with arras and rich carpets, which was a goodlie sight to behold: and in this order they rowed to Greenwich, to the point next beyond Greenwich, and there they turned backward in another order, that is to wit, the maior and shiriffes officers first, and the meanest craft next, and so ascending to the uttermost crafts in order, and the maior last, as they go to Wanles at Christmas, and in that order they rowed downe toward to Greenwich towne, and there cast anchor, making great melodie.

At thre of the clocke the quene appeared in rich cloth of gold, entring into hir barge accompanied with diuerse ladies and gentlewomen: and incontinent the citizens set forwarde in their order, their minstrelles continuallie playing, and the bachelors barge going on the quenes right hand, which she toke great pleasure to behold. About the quenes barge were manie noble men, as the duke of Suffolke, the marques Dowset, the erle of Willshire hir father, the erles of Arundell, Darbie, Rutland, Worcester, Huntingdon, Suffe, Oxford, and manie bishops and noble men, euerie one in his barge, which was a goodlie sight to behold. She thus being accompanied rowed toward the towne: and in the meane wate the ships which were commanded to lie on the shore for letting of the barges, shot diuerse peales of guns, and per the was landed, there was a marvellous shot out of the towne as euer was heard there. And at hir landing there, met with hir the lord chamberlaine with the officers of armes, and brought hir to the king, which received hir with louing countenance, at the pierside by the water side, and then she turned backe againe, and thanked the maior and the citizens with manie goodlie words, and so entred into the towne. After which entrie the citizens all this while howered before the towne, making great melodie, and went not on land, for none were assigned to land but the maior, the recorder, and two aldermen. But for to speake of the people that stood on either shore to behold the sight, he that saw it not would scarce beleue it.

On Fridaie at dinner, serued the king all such as were appointed by his highnesse to be knights of the bath, which after dinner were brought to their chambers, and that night were bathed and shirren, according to the old usage of England; and the next daie in the morning the king dubbed them according to the ceremonies thereto belonging; whose names inue, the marques Dowset, the erle of Darbie, the lord Cliford, the lord Fitzwater, the lord Hastings, the lord Mounteagle, Sir John Howard, the lord Blay, Sir Henrie Parker, Sir William Willshire, Sir Francis Weston, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir John Hulston, Sir Thomas Dornibys, Sir Henrie Russell, Sir George Fitzwilliam, Sir John Lamball, Sir Thomas Jermie.

To the intent that the horses should not stide on the pavement, nor that the people should not be hurt by horses, the high streets where the quene should passe were all grauelled from the towne to temple barre, and railed on the one side, with which railed the craft, along by their orders from Grace church, where the merchants of the Shilders stood till the little conduit in Cheape, where the aldermen stood: and on the other side of the street stood the constables of the citie, armed in velvet and silke, with great flayes in their hands, to cause the people to keepe come and good order. And when the streets were somewhat ordered, the maior clothed in a gowne of crimsin velvet, and a rich collar of S S S, with two spemen clad in white and red damaske, rode to the towne to giue his attendance on the quene, on whom the shiriffes with their officers did wait till they came to tower hill, where they taking their leaue, rode downe the high streets, commanding the constables to keepe come and good order kept, and so went and stood by the aldermen in Cheape.

Now before the quene and hir traine should come, Cornhill and Grations street were hanged with fine scarlet, crimsin, and other grained cloths, and in some place with rich arras, tapistrie, and carpets; and the most part of the Cheape was hanged with cloth of tissue, gold, velvet, and manie rich hangings, which made a goodlie shew, and all the windows were replenished with ladies and gentlewomen, to behold the quene and hir traine as they should passe by. The first of the quenes companie that set forward were twelue Frenchmen, which were belonging to the french ambassadoe, clothed in coates of blew velvet, with sleeves of yellow and blew velvet, and their horses trapped with close trappers of blew sarsenet powdered with white crosses: after them marched gentlemen, esquires and knights two and two: after them the iudges, and after them the knights of the bath in violet gownes, with hoods purdied with minster like doctors; after them abbats, then barons; after them bishops, then earls and marquesses; then the lord chancellor of England; after him the archbishop of York, and the ambassadoe of Venice, after him the archbishop of Canturburie and the ambassadoe of France, after rode two esquires of honor with robes of estat rolled and woone bauldrike-wise about their necks, with caps of estat, representing the dukes of Normandie, Aquitaine: after them rode the maior of London with his mace and garter in his cote of armes, which maior bare his mace to Westminster hall.

After all these rode the lord William Howard with the marshalles robe, deputie to his brother the duke of Suffolke marshall of England, which was ambassadoe then in France: and on his right hand rode Charles duke of Suffolke, for that daie high constable of England, bearing the berder of silver appertaining to the office of constableness, and all the lords for the most part were clothed in crimsin velvet, and all the quenes servants or officers of armes in scarlet. Next before the quene rode hir chancellor bareheaded, the sargeants and officers of armes rode on both the sides of the lords. When came the quene in a litter of white cloth of gold, not covered, nor habited, which was lead by two palfries clad in white damaske downe to the ground, head and all, led by hir footmen. She had on a circlet of white cloth of tissue, and a mantell of the same furred with ermine; hir haire hanged downe, but on hir head she had a coiffe with a circlet about it full of rich stones. Over hir was borne a canopie of cloth of gold, with foure gault staves and foure silver beles. For the bearing of which canopie were appointed striders halghts, foure to beare it one space on foot, and three foure another space, according to their owne appointment.

After the quene rode the lord Borough with hir chamberlaine, next after him William Coffin marshall of the horses, leading a spare horse with a side saddle trapped downe with cloth of tissue. After him rode seauen ladies in crimsin velvet turned by with cloth of gold and of tissue; and their horses trapped with cloth of gold, after them two chariots covered with red cloth of gold. In the first chariot were two ladies, which were the old dutchesse of Suffolke, and the old marquesse Dowset. In the second chariot were foure ladies all in crimson beluet. Then rode seauen ladies in the same lute, their horses trappers and all. Then came the third chariot all white, with six ladies in crimson beluet; next after them came the fourth chariot all red with eight ladies also in crimson beluet: after whom followed thirtie gentlewomen all in beluet and silke in the luerie of their ladies, on whom they gaue their attendance. After them followed the gard in cotes of goldsmiths tooke.

Sundrie pageants with the descriptions of their deuises.

Thus they rode forth till they came to Fanchurch, where was made a pageant all with children, apparelled like merchants, which welcommed him to the citie, with two proper propositions both in French and English. And from thence he rode to Gratious church corner, where was a collie and a maruelous cunning pageant made by the merchants of the Stilliard, for there was the mount Parnassus with the founteine of Helicon, which was of white marble, and foure streames without pipe did rise an ell high, and met together in a little cup aboue the founteine, which founteine ran abundantly rached with wine till night. On the mounteine sat Apollo, and at his feet sat Calliope, and on euery side of the mounteine sat foure muses playing on several sweet instruments, and at their feet epigrams and poesies were written in golden letters, in the which euery muse according to his propriety praised the quene.

The quene from thence passed to Leaden hall, where was a goodlie pageant with a type and a heauenlie rose, and under the type was a rose of gold set on a little mounteine inclosed with red roses and white: out of the type came downe a falcon all white & sat upon the rose, and incontinent came downe an angel with great melodie, and set a close crowne of gold on the falcons head. And in the same pageant sat saint Anne with all her kinne beneath her, and under sparie Cleop sat her foure children, of the which children one made a goodlie oration to the quene of the fruitfulness of saint Anne and of her generation, trusting that like fruit should come of her. Then she passed to the conduit in Cornhill, where were three graces set in a throne; afore whom was the spring of grace continually running wine. Afores the founteine sat a poet declaring the properties of euery grace: and that done euery lady by his selfe, according to his propriety, gaue to the quene a several gift of grace.

An oration made to the quene by one of the children in the pageant.

The conduit in Cheape runneth wine white and claret.

The recorder presenteth a 1000 marks in gold to the quene for a gratuite in cities behalle.

That done, they passed by the great conduit in cheape, which was newlie painted with armes of deuises: out of the which conduit by a goodlie founteine set at the one end ran continually wine both white and claret all that afternoon, and so they rode to the Standard which was richly painted with images of kings and quenes, and hanged with banners of armes, and in the top was marvellous sweet harmonie both of song and instrument. Then they went forward to the crosse, which was newlie gilded, till they came where the aldermen stood, and then master Becher the recorder came to him with low reuerence, making a proper and briefe proposition, and gaue to him in the name of the citie a thousand marks in a purse of gold, which the thankfullie accepted with manie goodlie words, and so rode to the little conduit, where was a rich pageant full of melodie and song.

In this pageant was Pallas, Juno and Venus, and before them stood Mercury, which in the name of the three goddesses gaue to him a ball of gold divided in three, signifying three gifts which the three goddesses gaue to him, that is to say, wisdom, riches, and felicitie. As he entered into Paules gate there was a pretie pageant, in which sat three ladies richly clothed, and in a circle on their head was written

Regina Anna prosperè procede & regna. Et labie in the middes had a tablet, in the which was written Veni amica coronaberis, and under the tablet sat an angel with a close crosone, and the lady sitting on the right hand had a tablet of silver in which was written, Domine dirigè gressus meos, & the third lady had a tablet of gold with letters azure written, Confido in Domino, & under their feet was written in legible letters:

Regina Anna novum regis de sanguine natum Cum paries populus aurea seclatus.

And these ladies cast downe wafers, on the which the two verses were written. From thence they passed to the east end of Paules churchyard against the schole, where stood on a scaffold two hundred children well apparelled, which said to him diuerse goodlie verses of poets translated into English, to the honour of the king and him, which he highly commended. And when they came to Ludgate, the gate was newlie garnished with gold & bise. And on the leads of saint Martin church stood a goodlie quere of singing men and children, which song new balads made in praise of him. After that they were passed Ludgate, they proceeded toward Fleetstreet, where the conduit was newlie painted, and all the armes and angels refreshed, & the chime melodiously sounding. Upon the conduit was made a towre with foure turrets, and in euery turret stood one of the cardinal virtues with their tokens and properties, which had several speeches, promising the quene neuer to leave him, but to be alway and comforting him: and in the midst of the towre close was such several solemn instruments, that it seemed to be an heauenlie noise, and was much regarded and praised: and beside this the said conduit ran wine claret and red all the afternoon.

So they with all his companie and the mayor rode forth to Temple barre, which was newlie painted and repaired, where stood also diuerse singing men and children, till they came to Westminster hall, which was richly hanged with cloth of arras, and new-glazed. And in the midst of the hall the was taken out of his litter, & so led up to the higher desk under the cloth of estate, on whose left hand was a cupbord of ten images marvellous rich and beautiful to behold: and within a little season was brought to the quene with a solemn service in great standing spice plates, a boid of spice and subtilties with porras and other wines, which she sent downe to her ladies, and when the ladies had drank, she gaue parties thanks to the lords and ladies, with the mayor and other that had given their attendance on him, and so with downe his selfe with a few ladies to the White hall and so to her chamber, and there he dined, and after went into his barge to seek for the king to his manour of Westminster, where he rested that night.

On Sunday the ninth eld he crimsin beluet and with his chair, and all the aldermen and sherikes in scarlet, and the countess of the citie took their barge at the stairs by seauen of the clocke and came to Westminster, where they were welcomed & brought into the hall by master treasurer and others of the kings house, and so gaue their attendance till the quene should come forth. Between eight and nine she came into the hall and stood under the cloth of estate, and the knights in the kings chapel, and the monks of Westminster all in rich copes, and manie bishops and abbats in copes and miters they went into the midst of the hall, and there stood a season. Then was there a rare cloth spread from the quenes standing in the hall through the palace and sanduarie, which was railed on both sides to the high altar of Westminster. After that the rare cloth was cast, the officers of armes appointed the order accustomed.

first went gentlemen, then esquires, then knights, then the aldermen of the citie in their cloaks of scarlet, after them the judges in their mantels of scarlet and coffes. Then followed the knights of the bath being no lordes; euerie man having a white lace on his left sleeve, then followed barons and biconts in their payement robes of scarlet. After them came earls, marquesses and dukes in their robes of estate of crimlin beluet furred with ermine powdered according to their degrées. After them came the lord chancellor in a robe of scarlet open before, bordered with lettise; after him came the kings chapell and the monks solemnelie singing with procession, then came abbats and bishops mitered, then sargeants and officers of armes, then after them went the mayor of London with his mace and garter in his cote of armes, then went the marquesse Dorset in a robe of estate which bare the scepter of gold, and the earle of Arundell which bare the rod of suozie with the doue both together.

Then went alone the earle of Drford high chamberleine of England which bare the crowne, after him went the duke of Suffolke in his robe of estate also for that daie being high steward of England, hauing a long white rod in his hand, and the lord William Howard with the rod of the marshalschip, and euerie knight of the garter had on his collar of the order. Then proceeded forth the quene in a circot and robe of purple beluet furred with ermine in hir here coffe and circlet as she had the saturdaye, and ouer hir was bozine the canopie by foure of the five ports, all crimlin with points of blue and red hanging on their sleeves, and the bishops of London and Winchester bare by the laps of the quenes robe. The quenes traine which was verie long was bozine by the old duchess of Suffolke; after hir followed ladies being lords wives, which had circots of scarlet with narrow sleeves, the best all lettise with bars of borders according to their degrées, and ouer that they had mantels of scarlet furred, and euerie mantell had lettise about the necke like a neckercher like white powdered, so that by the powderings their degrée was knowen. Then followed ladies being knights wives in gownes of scarlet, with narrow sleeves without traines, onlie edged with lettise, and likewise had all the quenes gentlewomen.

When she was thus brought to the high place made in the middell of the church, betwene the quere and the high altar, she was set in a rich chaire. And after that she had rested a while, she descended downe to the high altar and there prostrate hir selfe while the archbishop of Canturburie said certeine collectes: then she rose, and the bishop annointed hir on the head and on the breast, and then she was led by againe, where after diuerse orisons said, the archbishop set the crowne of saint Edward on hir head, and then deliuered hir the scepter of gold in hir right hand, and the rod of suozie with the doue in the left hand, and then all the quere song Te Deum, &c. Which done, the bishop toke off the crowne of saint Edward being heauie and set on the crowne made for hir. Then went she to saint Edwards thizine and there offered, after which offering done she withdrew hir into a little place made for the nones on the one side of the quere.

Now in the meane season euerie duchess had put on their bonets a coronall of gold wrought with flowers, and euerie marquesse put on a demie coronall of gold, euerie countesse a plaine circlet of gold without flowers, and euerie king of armes put on a crowne of copar and guilt, all which were woone till night. When the quene had a little repored hir, the companie returned in the same order that they set forth, and the quene went crowned and so did the la-des afore said. His right hand was sustained by the earle of Wiltshire his father, and his left hand by the lord Talbot deputie for the earle of Shrewsburie and lord Foxinfall his father. Now when she was out of the sanctuarie and appeared within the palace, the trumpets played marvellous freshtie, then she was brought to Westminster hall, & so to hir withdrawing chamber: during which time the lordes, iudges, maiors and aldermen put off their robes, mantels and clokes, and toke their hoods from their necks and cast them about their shoulders, and the lordes sat onlie in their circots, and the iudges and aldermen in their gownes. And all the lordes that serued that daie serued in their circots and their hoods about their shoulders: also diuerse officers of the kings house being no lordes had circots and hoods of scarlet edged with mineuer, as the treasurer, contrapoller, & master of the sewell house, but their circots were not gullt.

While the quene was in hir chamber, euerie lord and other that ought to do seruice at coronations, did prepare them according to their dutie, as the duke of Suffolke high steward of England which was richly apparelled, his doublet and iacket set with orient pearle, his gowne of crimlin beluet embroidered, his courter trapped with a cloth trapper head and all to the ground of crimlin beluet, set full of letters of gold of goldsmiths worke, hauing a long white rod in his hand; on his left hand rode the lord William, deputie for his brother as earle marshall with the marshals rod, whose gowne was crimlin beluet, and his horse trapper purple beluet cut on white sattin embroidered with white lions. The earle of Wrenford was high chamberleine, the earle of Essex caruer, the earle of Suffolke sewer, the earle of Arundell chiefe butler, on whom twelue citizens of London did giue their attendance at the cupboz. The earle of Warbie cupbearer, the bicont Little pantler, the lord of Aburgaine chiefe larder, the lord Haze almoner for him and his coparteners, and the maiors of Drford kept the buttrie bar, and Thomas Wallat was chiefe euer for Sir Henrie Wallat his father.

When all things were redie, the quene vnder hir canopie came to the hall, and washed and sat downe in the middell of the table vnder the cloth of estate. On the right side of the chaire stood the countesse of Drford widow, and on the left side stood the countesse of Worcester all the dinner season, which diuerse times in the dinner time did hold a fine cloth before the quenes face when she list to spee or do otherwise at hir pleasure. At the tables end sat the archbishop of Canturburie on the right hand of the quene, and in the middell betwene the archbishop and the countesse of Drford stood the earle of Drford with a white stasse all dinner time, and at the quenes feet vnder the table sat two gentlewomen all dinner time. When all these things were thus ordered, in came the duke of Suffolke and the lord William Howard on horsebacke, and the sargeants of armes before them, and after them the sewer, and then the knights of the bath bringing in the first course which was eightene dishes, besides subtilties and ships made of wax marvellous gorgeous to behold, all which time of seruice the trumpets standing in the window at the nether end of the hall played melodiously.

When hir grace was serued of two dishes, then the archbishops seruice was set downe, whose sewer came equall with the third dish of the quenes seruice on his left hand. After that the quene and the archbishop was serued, the barons of the ports began the table on the right hand next the wall, next them at the table sat the masters and clearks of the Chancerie, and beneath them at the table other doctors and gentlemen. The table next the wall on the the iudges, sargeants, & the kings counsell, beneath them the knights of the bath. At the table on the left hand, in the middle part, sat dutchesses, marquesses, countesses, baronesses, in their robes, and other ladies in circots, and gentlewomen in gownes. All which ladies and gentlewomen sat on the left side of the table along, and none on the right side.

When all were thus set, they were incontinent serued, and so quicklie that it was maruell : for the seruitors gaue such good attendance, that meat or drinke nor any thing else needed not to be called for, which in so great a multitude was maruell. As touching the fare, there could be deuised no more costlier dishes nor subtilties. The mayo<sup>r</sup> of London was ser-ued with thre and thirtie dishes at two courses, and so were all his brethren, and such as sat at his table.
The queene had at hir second course foure and thertie dishes, and thirtie at the thirde course : & betwene the two last courses, the kings of armes cried larges, in thre parts of the hall : and after stood in their place, which was in the bekins at the kings bench.
And on the right hand out of the cloister of S. Ste-phans, was made a little closet, in which the king with diuers ambassado<sup>r</sup>s stood to behold the seruices.
The duke of Suffolke and the lord William rode often times about the hall, chering the lords, ladies, and the mayo<sup>r</sup> and his brethren. After they all had dined, they had wafers and ipocras, and then they washed, and were commanded to rise, and to stand still in their places, before the table or on the formes till the queene had washed.

When she had taken wafers and ipocras, the table was taken up, and the earle of Kentland brought up the surnap, and laid it at the boyds end, which im-mediatlie was drawne, and cast by master Rode, marshall of the hall : and the queene washed, and after the archbishop, and when the surnap was drawne off, she arose and stood in the middell of the palace hall : to whome the earle of Suffolke in a god-lie spice plate brought a vobd of spice and comets.
After him the mayo<sup>r</sup> of London brought a standing cup of gold, set in a cup of assaie of gold, and after that he had dronke, he gaue the mayo<sup>r</sup> the cup, with the cup of assaie, because there was no letar, according to the claime of the citie, thanking him and all his brethren, for their paine. When the vnder hir cano-pie departed to hir chamber, and at the entrie of hir chamber, she gaue the canopie with bells and all, to the barons of the ports, according to their claime, with great thanks. When the mayo<sup>r</sup> of London bearing his cup in his hand, with his brethren, went through the hall to their barge, and so did all other noble men and gentlemen, for it was six of the clocke.
On mondaie were the iusts at the tilt, before the kings gate, where the mayo<sup>r</sup> and his brethren had a godlie standing : but there were verie few speares broken, by reason the horses would not cope. On wednesdaie, the king sent for the mayo<sup>r</sup> and his brethren to Westminster, and there he himselfe gaue to them hartie thanks, with manie godlie words.
On Wednesday daie after, the ladie Marie the French queene died in Suffolke, who was the late wife to Lewis the twelue, & after married to Charles duke of Suffolke, & was buried at S. Edmundsbu-rie. The king kept his progresse about London, because of the queene. The seuerith of September being sun-daie, betwene thre & four of the clocke in the after-none, the queene was deliuered of a faire young ladie, on which daie the duke of Suffolke came hemato the christening, which was appointed on the wednesdaie next following, and was accordinglie accomplished on the same daie, with all such solemne ceremonies as were thought conuenient. The godfather at the font, was the lord archbishop of Canturburie, the godmothers, the old dutches of Suffolke, & the old marchionesse Dorset widow, and at the confirmation the ladie marchionesse of Exeter was godmother : the child was named Elizabeth.

Upon the daie of the christening, the mayo<sup>r</sup> sir Stephan Beascocke, in a gobone of crimson velvet, with his collar of S.S. and all the aldermen in scarlet, with collars and chaines, and all the counsell of the citie with them, toke their barge after dinner, at one of the clocke, and the citizens had another barge, and so rowed to Greenwiche, where were manie lords, knights, and gentlemen assembled. All the walles betwene the kings palace & the friers were hanged with arras, and all the waie drawed with greene rushes : the friers church was also hanged with arras.

The font was of silver, and stood in the middell of the church, thre steps high, which was couered with a fine cloth, and diuers gentlemen with aprens and towels about their necks gaue attendance about it, that no filth should come in the font, ouer it being a square canopie of crimson sattin, fringed with gold, about it was a raille couered with red saie, betwene the quier and the bodie of the church was a close place with a pan of fire, to make the child reade in.
When all these things were ordered, the child was brought to the hall, and then euerie man set forward, first the citizens two and two, then gentlemen, elquiers and chapeins, next after them the aldermen and the mayo<sup>r</sup> alone : next the mayo<sup>r</sup> the kings counsell, the kings chappell in copes : then barons, bishops, earles, then came the earle of Essex, bearing the co-uered bakins gilt, after him the marquesse of Exester with the taper of virgin wax, next him the mar-quesse Dorset bearing the salt.

Behind him the ladie Marie of Suffolke, bearing the crêsome which was verie rich of pearle and stone, the old dutches of Suffolke bare the child in a mantell of purple velvet, with a long traine furred with ermine. The duke of Suffolke with his marshall rod went on the right hand of the said dutches, and the duke of Suffolke on the left hand, and before them went the officers of armes. The countesse of Kent bare the long traine of the childs mantell, and betwene the countesse of Kent and the child went the earle of Wilshire on the right hand, and the earle of Darbie on the left hand, supporting the said traine : in the middell ouer the said child was borne a cano-pie, by the lord Rochford, the lord Husie, the lord William Howard, and by the lord Thomas Howard the elder, after the child followed manie ladies and gentlewomen. When the child was come to the church dore, the bishop of London met it with diuers bishops and abbats mitred.

When the ceremonies and christening were ended, Carter chiefe king of armes cried aloud, God of his infinite godnesse send prosperous life & long to the high and mightie princeesse of England Elizabeth : & then the trumpets blew. When the archbishop of Canturburie gaue to the princeesse a standing cup of gold : the dutches of Suffolke gaue to hir a standing cup of gold, fretted with pearle : the mar-chionesse of Dorset gaue thre gilt bolles, pounced with a couer : and the marchionesse of Exeter gaue thre standing bolles grauen, all gilt with a couer.

When was brought in waters, comfort, and pleasure in such pleasure, that every man had as much as he would desire. Then they set forth the stately going before in the same order, to the high place, as they did when they came to the water, following that the gifts of the godfather and the god-mothers gave; were borne before the child by some persons, that is to say: first Sir John Dupleire bore the gift of the lady of Wyke, the Lord Thomas Howard the yonger bore the gift of the lady of Dorset, the Lord Fitzwater bore the gift of the lady of Norfolk,
the Lord Fitzwater bore the gift of the lady of Norfolk, the archbishop of Canturbury, all the one side as they went was full of staffe to the number of five hundred, borne by the gard and other of the kings servants, and about the child were borne: manie by the proper to the by gentlemen.

In this order they brought the pryncesse to the chamber, & tarried there a while, in the morning when the aldermen, and at the last the dukes of Borholke & Suffolke came out to the king, thanking them hartlie, who commanded them to give thanks in his name: which being done with their countesses they departed, & so went to their barges. From that time forward (God him selfe undertaking the tuition of this yong pryncesse, having predestinated her to the accomplishment of his diuine purpose) she pro-spired under the Kings hand, as a chosen plant of his watering, & after the reuolution of certeine yeares with great felicitie and joy of all English hearts attained to the crowne of this realme, and now reigneth ouer the same: whose heart the Lord direct in his waies, and long preserve her in life, to his goodlie will and pleasure; and the comfort of all true and faithfull subiects. Of the blessed natiuitie of this most gratious birgine queene, as also of her baptisme and confirmation in the christian faith, with all the solemn-ties and ceremonies recorded in our English annales, her education, her knowledge in diuerse languages, her peaceable gouernement, and manie other trim discourses C. O. in his Engharchia, or Elizabetha hath made honorable mention, saying:

This yeere also, one Dauter the towne clerke of the citie of London, hanged himselfe, which suerly was a man that in no wise could abide to heare the gospell shoud be in English. And I my selfe heard him once saie to me and other that were by, swearing a great oth, that if he thought the kings highnesse would let forth the scripture in English, and let it be read of the people by his authoritie, rather than he would so long liue, he would cut his owne throat, but he brake promise, for (as you haue heard) he hanged himselfe: but of what mind and intent he so did, maie be some gathered. For God had (no doubt) appointed him to that iudgement: no less heane than his offence was heinous, namely the contempt of Gods word, the knowledge of Gods damnable, preferring it before gold and silver, yea before pearls and precious stones, the riches, and before honore and the honore some in doubt was, as the said phrase noteth, saying: [Eob. Hess. in p. 41. 119.]

About this time the pope, by lingering sicknesses, (whose greatest in the said apprehension was the pains of the stomach, which was doing with them to the point of a fever and other accidents) kept him long time weakened and weakened, sometimes seeming to be reduced to the point of death, and sometimes raised and relieved, that he gave to others but not to himselfe a kind of hope of recouering, being no longer able to make resistance against his maladic, & changed his life the five and twentieth of September, leauing behind him in the castell of saint Anged manie rich stones and iewels, more than was expected of him, and in the chamber of the se apostolike infinit offices, contrarie to custome and good order, but in the treasure a bette small store of monie, therein he beguiled the opinion of all men. He was raised from basse degree to the place of the pope with towverfull felicitie; but in managing the place he proued a bette great variation of fortune, wherein if both the properties of fortune be euellie balanced the one with the other, the worse fortune without all comparison was farre more familiar with him than the better.

For as there could happen to him no greater in-felicitie than the adueritie of his imprisonment (for that with his stone eyes he beheld with so great a ruine and destruction the sacke of Rome; a desolation which his fortune suffered him to bewaile with pite and compassion, but not to turne awaie or remedie the harme) so also by him moued the generall desolation of his naturall countrie, to the which by how much more he was bound by perpetuall obligations, by so much greater was his adueritie to be a chiefe instrument in the ruine of the place where he had taken his first being.

He died hated of all the court, suspected to most princes, and for the discourse of his life, he left behind him a rethoric rather hatefull than acceptable: for he was accounted courteous, of little fidelitie, and naturallie farre off from doing pleasures to men.
And in that humo: albeit during his time of pope he created one and thirtie cardinals; yet upon none of them did he impose that dignitie to content himselfe but was aware as it were by the violent law of ne-cessitie and to please others yea he called to that dignitie the cardinall of Apedicia, not of his proper and free election, but at the contemplation and persuation of others, and at that time when being oppressed with a dangerous maladic, if he had died, he had left his friends and kindred in the state of beggars and deprived of all aid. Fewer the lesse he was in counsell betre graue, and in his actions much foreseeing; touching passions and affections a conqueror of himselfe, and for the facultie of his mind a spirit of great capacitie and power, if timorousnesse had not oftentimes corrupted his iudgement.

Immediately after his death the cardinals going the same night into the conclave, elected in his place with full voice, Alexander of the familie of Farne-sa, a Roman by nation, and for his time the most ancient cardinall of the court: in which election their voices seemed conformable to the iudgement and instance that Clement had made, the person elected being most worthy to be preferred before all the other man in the priozie of saint Sepulchres at Canturburie, to whome the said Edward Boeking had comenlie his resort, not without suspition of incontinencie, pretending to be his ghostlie father by Gods appointment. And by conspiracie betwene him and him, the will continued in practising his dissembled traufes, alleging, that in the same he had revelations from almightie God and his saints, and amongst other, that which (as before we have mentioned) toucheth the kings marriage, as ye have heard.

This matter proceeded so farre, that there was a booke written by his complices, and namelie by Thomas Laurence, register to the archbishop of Canturburie, of his feigned and counterfeit miracles, revelations, and hypocritical holinesse. All things were handled so craftilie, that not one lie the simple, but also the wise and learned sort were deceived by the same, insomuch that William Warham the late archbishop of Canturburie, and John Fisher bishop of Rochester, and divers others, being informed thereof, gave credit thereto. All which matters and manie other had bene traitorously practised and imagined amongst the parties manie peres, chieflie to interrupt the diuorfe and to destroe the king, and to depriue him from the crowne and dignitie roiall of this realme, as in the act of their attainder made more at large it maie appeare, and likewise in the chronicles of maister Edward Hall. Therefore to conclude with him and his adherents, on the one and twentieth of Aprill next following, the with diuerse of them before condemned, was drawn to Tlburne, and there executed, as iustlie they had deserued; where and when she made this confession following, even at the present time that she suffered, in the hearing of the people.

The words of Elizabeth Barton, otherwise called the holie maid of Kent at the houre of hir death in maner of a confession.

After am I come to die, and I haue not bene the onelie cause of mine owne death, which most iustlie I haue deserued, but also I am the cause of the death of all these persons which at this time here suffer: and yet to say the truth, I am not so much to be blamed, considering that it was wel known unto these learned men, that I was a poore wench, without learning, and therefore they might haue easilie perceiued, that the things that were done by me, could not proceed in any such sort, but their capacities and learning could right well iudge from whence they proceeded, and that they were altogether feined: but bicause the things which I feined were profitable unto them, therefore they much praised me, and bare me in hand that it was the holie ghost, and not I that did them, and then I being puffed up with their praises, fell into a certeine pride and foolish fantasie with my selfe, and thought I might feine what I would, which thing hath brought me to this case, and for the which now I crie God and the kings highnes most hartilie mercie, and desire all you good people to praye to God to haue mercie on me, and on all them that suffer here with me.

In this parlement also was made the act of succession, for the establishing of the crowne, to the which euerie person being of lawfull age should be sworne. On mondaie the thirte twentieth of March in the parlement time, were solemnlie received into London ambassadours from James the first king of Scots, the bishop of Aberdine, the abbat of Lincolns, and Adam Otterborne the kings attourneie, with diuerse gentlemen on them attendant, which were brought to the tailors hall, and there lodged. And on the daie of the Annunciation, they were brought to the kings palace at Westminster, where they shewed their commission and message, for the which the king appointed them dates to counsell. During the parlement time, euerie sundaie at Pauls crosse preached a bishop, declaring the pope not to be supreme head of the church.

The thirtieth of March was the parlement prorogued, and there euerie lord, knight, and burges, and all other were sworne to the act of succession, and subscribed their hands to a parchment fixed to the same. The parlement was prorogued till the third of November next. After this were commissioners sent into all parts of the realme, to take the oth of all men and women to the act of succession. Doctor John Fisher, and sir Thomas More knight, and doctor Nicholas Wilson parson of saint Thomas apostles in London, exprelie denied at Lambeth before the archbishop of Canturburie, to receiue that oth. The two first stood in their opinion to the verie death (as after ye shall heare) but doctor Wilson was better aduised at length, and so dissembling the matter escaped out of further danger.

In this yere it chanced that two merchant strangers fell in loue with a harlot, which was called Wolfes wife, and this harlot had often hanted the strangers chambers. And so on a time the said harlot appointed these strangers to come to Westminster, and she had prepared for them a bote, in the which bote was but one man to row which was a strong theefe, and in the end of the bote laie Wolfe his husband, couered with a leather that botemen vse to couer their cushions with, and so these strangers sat them down mistrusting nothing. Now when this boteman had brought them as farre as a place called the turning tree, suddenlie stepped by the said Wolfe, and with his dagger thrust the one of them through: the other cried out to save his life, and offered great sums of monie to the boteman and him to saue his life. But no proffers would be heard, nor mercie would they extend, but as cruell murderers without pitie slue the other also, and bound them face to face, and so threw them into the Thames in the foresaid place, where they were long after before they were found. But immediatlie the harlot Wolfes wife went to the strangers chambers, and toke from thence so much as she could come by. And at the last she and her husband (as they deserued) were apprehended, arraigned, and hanged at the aforesaid turning tree.

On the ninth of Julie was the lord Dacres of the north arraigned at Westminster of high treason, where the duke of Norfolkke sat as iudge, and high steward of England. The said lord Dacres being brought to the barre, with the are of the Tower before him, after his indictment read, so impudently the same, answering euerie part and matter therein contained, and so plainlie and diuallie confuted his accusers, which were there readie to anouch their accusations, that to their great shames, and his high honor, he was found that day by his peres not guilty, whereof the commons not a little reioised, as by their shout and crie made at those words, not guilty, they shal lie testified.

The two and twentieth of Julie was John Frith burned in Smithfield, for the opinion of the sacrament: and with him the same time, and at the same stake, suffered also one Andrew Hewet, a young man,

The eleventh of August were all the places of the obseruant friers suppressed, as Greenwiche, Canturburie, Richmond, Beuarke, and Petworth, and in their places were set Augustine friers, and the obseruant friers were placed in the houses of the grate friers. ¶ The one and twentieth of September, doctor Tailor master of the rolles, was discharged of that office, and Thomas Cromwell sworne in his place the nineteenth of October. Whereover the third of November, the parliament began againe, in the which was concluded the act of supremacy, which authorised the kings highnes to be supreme head of the church of England, and the authoritie of the pope abolished out of the realme. ¶ In the same parlement also was giuen to the king, the first fruits and tenths of all spirituall dignities and promotions. This yeare came the great admerall of France into England, ambassadour from the French king, and was honozable receiued.

In this time died the earle of Hildare, prisoner in the Tower, and his sonne Thomas Fitzgaret began to rebel, and toke all the kings ordinance, and sent to the emperour, requiring him to take his part: also he sūe the bishop of Dublin, and robbed all such as would not obrie him. In the beginning of this yeare, the duke of Suffolke and the bishop of Ely went to Calis, and thither came the admerall of France. On the two & twentieth of Aprill the prior of the Charterhouse at London, the prior of Beuall, the prior of Erham, Keinalds a brother of Sion, & John bicar of Chisleworth, were arreigned and condemned of treason: and thereupon drawne, hanged and quartered at Tyburne the fourth of Maie: their heads and quarters were set ouer the bridge & gates of the citie, one quarter excepted, which was set vp at the Charterhouse at London. ¶ On the eight of Maie, the king commanded that all belonging to the court should poll their heads, & to giue example, caused his owne head to be polled, and his beard from thenceforth was cut round, but not shauen, which fashion the courtiers imbraced, and would (no doubt) haue put in practise, though they had not bene there, vnto bound by precept: for the people imitate the prince, as the poet long ago well noted, saieing:

On the nineteenth of June were three monkes of the Charterhouse hanged, drawne, and quartered at Tyburne, and their heads and quarters set vp about London, for denieng the king to be supreme head of the church: their names were, Ermele, Middleton, and Pudigate. Also the one and twentieth of the same moneth, and for the same cause, doctor John Fisher bishop of Rocheſter was beheaded for denieng of the supremacy, and his head set vpon London bridge, but his bodie buried within Bar, king churchyard. This bishop was of manie soze lamented, for he was reported to be a man of great learning, and of a verie good life. The pope had elected him a cardinall, and sent his hat as far as Calis, but his head was off before his hat was on: so that they met not. On the first of Iulie was sir Thomas More beheaded for the like crime, that is to wit, for denieng the king to be supreme head. And then the bodie of doctor Fisher was taken vp, and buried with sir Thomas Mores in the Tower. This man was both learned and wise, and giuen much to a certaine pleasure in inerie taunts and teasking in most of his communication, which manner he forgot not at the verie houre of his death.

¶ I cannot tell (saith master Hall) whether I should call him a foolish wise man, or a wise foolish man, for vndoubtedly he beside his learning, had a great wit, but it was so mingled with taunting and mocking, that it seemed to them that best knew him, that he thought nothing to be well spoken except he had misused some mocke in the communication. Inasmuch as at his coming to the Tower, one of the officers demanded his upper garment for his use, meaning his gowne: and he answered, he should haue it, and toke him his cap, saieing it was the uppermost garment that he had. The wife euen going to his death at the Tower gate, a poore woman called vnto him, and besought him to declare what he had done with euidences of his in the time that he was in office (which after he was apprehended she could not come by) and that he would intreat she might haue them againe, or else she was vndone. He answered, good woman, haue patience a little while, for the king is so good vnto me, that euen with in this halfe houre he will discharge me of all businesse, and helpe thee himselfe.

Also when he went vnto the staires on the scaffold, he desired one of the shirifes officers to giue him his hand to helpe him vp, and said: When I come downe againe, let me shift for my selfe as well as I can. Also the hangman kneeled downe to him, asking him forgiveness of his death (as the maner is) to whom he said, I forgive thee, but I promise thee thou shalt neuer haue honestie by striking off my head, my necke is so short. Also euen when he should laie downe his head on the blocke, he hauing a great graie beard, stroked out his beard, and said to the hangman, I praye you let me laie my beard ouer the blocke, least you should cut it. Thus with a mocke he ended his life.

God had in most bountifull sort powred his blessings vpon this man, induing him with eloquence, wisdom and knowledge: but the grace of God withdrawinge from him, he had the right vse of none, no not of reason as it should be rightlie used. God had extraordinary blessed his children, and namelie his three daughters, to whom he had giuen an admirable dexteritie in the science of songs and arts, as John Leland our reuerend antiquarie noteth in a proper and learned epigramme, saieing:

*Desine facundus nimium laudare disertū Natas Hortensiam maxima Romanū Candida tres Charites nam Mori cura posuit Obscurant multis nomina vestramodū Non illud studium Miletia vellera dextris Carpere, non facili ducere sila manus Sed iuuat eloqui crebro monumenta Latini Persare, & doctus pingere verba notis, Nec minus aures Græcas enothere, Homerum Et quæsi dicendi gloria prima manet.
Et nec Aristotelis dicam quo persare libros Scrutentur, sophia mystica dona dea.
Turpe viris posthac erit ignoscere Minerva Artes, græci adeo quas mulieribus amet.*

And yet was not the will of God for the infusing of spirituall graces, so linked to that of temporall, as because the one was granted; therefore the other must not be denied. For the blessings of God which be outward, are common to the wicked with the good:

To of his death and martyrdome, read the martyrologie of Iohn Fox our ecclesiasticall chonographer Anno 1536. fab Hen. 8.

On Paie date were solempne iusts kept at Crænwich, and suddenlie from the iusts the king departed, not hauing aboue six persons with him, and in the euening came to Westminster. Of this sudden departing many mused, but most chieflie the queene.
¶ On the next morrowe, the lord Rochford brother to the queene, and Henrie Norris were brought to the tower of London prisoners. Also the same date about fise of the clocke in the after none, queene Anne of Bullongne was brought to the tower of London, by sir Thomas Audley lord chancelor, the duke of Suffolke, Thomas Cromwell secretarie, and sir William Kingston constable of the tower; and when she came to the tower gate, entering in she fell on hir knees before the said lord, beseeching God to helpe hir, as she was not guiltie of that whereof she was accused, and then desired the said lords to beseech the kings grace to be good vnto hir, and so they left hir there prisoner. On the fifteenth of Maie queene Anne was arreigned in the tower of London on a scaffold for that purpose, made in the kings hall, before the duke of Suffolke, who sat vnder the cloth of estate as high steward of England, with the lord chancelor on his right hand, the duke of Suffolke on his left hand, with marquesses and lords, &c. and the earle of Surrie sat before the duke of Suffolke his father, as earle marshall of England. The kings commission being read, the constable of the tower, and the lieutenant brought the queene to the barre, where was made a chaire for hir to sit doونه in, and there hir indictment was read, wherevnto she made so wise and discret answers, that she seemed fullie to clere hir selfe of all matters laid to hir charge: but being tried by hir pères, whereof the duke of Suffolke was chiefe, she was by them found guiltie, and had iudgement pronounced by the duke of Suffolke.

Immediatlie the lord Rochford the queenes brother was likewise arreigned and condemned: the lord maior of London, his brethren the aldermen, the wardens and foure persons mo of euerye the twelue principall companies being present. The seauen-teenth of Maie, the lord Rochford brother to the queene, Henrie Norris, Marke Smeton, William Brierton, and Francis Weston, all of the kings private chamber, about matters touching the queene were beheaded on the tolwer hill: the lord Roch-fords bodie with the head was buried in the chappell of the tolwer, the other foure in the churchyard there.
On the nineteenth of Maie queene Anne was on a scaffold (made for that purpose) vpon the greene within the tower of London, beheaded with the sword of Calis, by the hands of the hangman of that towne: hir bodie with the head was buried in the quere of the chappell in the tower.]

The words of queene Anne at hir death.

God christian people, I am come hither to die, for according to the law, and by the law I am iudged to die, and therefore I will speake nothing against it. I am come hither to accuse no man, nor to speake anie thing of that whereof I am accused & condemned to die, but I praise God saue the king and send him long to reigne ouer you, for a gentler, nor a more mercifull prince was there neuer, and to me he was euer a good, a gentle, and a souereigne lord. And if anie person will meddle of my cause, I require them to iudge the best. And thus I take my leaue of the world, and of you all, and I hartilie desire you all to prae for me. Oh Lord haue mercie on me, to God I commend my soule, Iesu receiue my soule: di-uerse times repeating those words, till that hir head was stricken off with the sword.

Now because I might rather saie much than summentlie through in praise of this noble queene, as well for hir singular wit and other excellent qualities of mind, as also for hir fauouring of learned men, zeale of religion, and liberaltie in distributing almes in reliefe of the poore, I will refer the reader vnto master Fox his volume of Acts and Monuments, where he commendeth hir mild nature in taking admonition, proueth hir marriage lawfull, defendeth hir succession, ouerthroweth the sinister iudgements, opinions and objections of backbiters against that ver-tuous queene, sheweth hir faith and trust in Christ at hir death, and finally how the protestants of Ger-manie forsooke king Henrie for the death of so good a princesse. ¶ Anglorum praelia faith, that this good queene was forwarned of hir death in a dreame, wherein Morpheus the god of sleepe (in the likeness of hir grandfather) appeared vnto hir, and after a long narration of the vanities of this world (how enuie reigneth in the courts of princes, maligning the fortunate estate of the vertuous, how king Henrie the eight and his issue should be the bitter overthrow and expulsion of poperie out of England, and that the go-uernment of queene Elizabeth should be established in tranquillitie & peace) he saith vnto hir in conclusion by waie of prophesie, as our poet hath recorded:

*Fortis animo, triblis si nunciatus adsum, Insuperata tua velox necis aduenit hora, Intra triginta spacium moriere dierum:
Hoc magnam mortis solamen habeto futura, Elizabetha suis praeclare filia gestis Nomen ad astra feret patris, matrisque, suumque.]*

Immediatlie after hir death, in the weeke before Whitsuntide, the king married the ladie Jane Seimmer, daughter to sir John Seimer knight, which at Whitsuntide was openlie shewed as queene. And on the tuesday in Whitsun weeke, hir brother sir Edw.
Seimer was created vicount Beauchampe, and sir Walter Hungerford, lord Hungerford. The eight of June began the parlement, during the which the lord Thomas Howard, without the kings assent, affied the ladie Margaret Douglas daughter to the queene of Scots, and neece to the king, for which act he was atteinted of treason, and an act made for like offenders, and so he died in the tower, and she remained long there as prisoner. In the time of this parlement the bishops and all the cleargie of the realme held a solempne conuocation at Pauls church in London, where after much disputation and debating of matters, they published a booke of religion, intituled Articles deuised by the kings highnesse, &c. In this booke is speciallie mentioned but thre sacraments.
Also before this booke certeine intunitions were gi-uen forth, wherby a number of their holie daies were abrogated, & speciallie those that fell in harvest time.
¶ The nine & twentieth of June, the king held a great tussing and triumph at Westminster, where were ordered two lighters made like ships to fight vpon the water, one of the which brake in the midst, wherby one Gates a gentleman, & servant to sp. Rincet was drowned in his harnesse. In the other a gun brake hir chamber, & maimed two of the mariners.

maister of the tols, was made lord keeper of the pri-uie seale, and the ninth of Julie the lord Fitzwarren was created erle of Bath, and the moztow after the said lord Cromwell was created lord Cromwell.
The eighteenth of Julie he was made knight, and vicar generall under the king over the spiritualitye, and sat diuerse times in the conuocation amongst the bishops as head ouer them. The two and twentieth of Julie, Henrie duke of Richmond and Summerfet, earle of Northampton, base sonne to the king, begot of the ladie Taillebois then called Elizabeth Blunt, departed this life at saint James, and was buried at Westford in Northfolke, of whome you shall find more in the treatise of the dukes of this land.

In September, Thomas Cromwell lord priuie seale and vicegerent, sent abroad under the kings spirituall priuie seale certeine iniunctions, commanding that the persons and curats should teach their parishioners the Pater noster, the Ave & Creed, with the ten comandements, and articles of the faith in English. These articles and iniunctions being established by authoritie of parlement, and now to the people deliuered, bred a great mistaking in the harts of the common people, which had bene euer brought up and trained in contrarie doctrine. And here with diuerse of the cleargie as monks, priests, and others, took occasion herby to speake euill of the late proceedings of the king, touching matters of religion, affirming that if speedie remedie were not in time prouided, the faith would shortly be utterly destroyed, and all prayer and diuine seruice quite abolished and taken awate.

Spanis sinister reports, slanderous tales, and scilned fables were blowne abroad, and put into the peoples eares, and diuerse of the nobilitie did also what they coult to stir the commons to rebellion, faithful-lie promising both aid and succour against the king.
The people thus prouoked to mischief, and deceived through ouer light credence, incontinentlie as it were to mainteine that religion, which had so manie yeares continued, and bene esteemed, they distelle and stoultie conspired together, and in a part of Lincolnshire they first assembled, and shortly after ioi-ned into an armie, being (as it was supposed) of men apt for the warres, in number about twentie thousand. Against these rebels with all the hast that might be, the king in his proper person vpon intelligence therof had marched towards them, being furnished with a warlike armie, perfectlie appointed of all things that to such a companie should apper-teine.

The rebels hearing that his person was present with his power to come thus against them, began to feare what would follow of their doings: and such nobles and gentlemen as at the first fauoured their cause, fell from them and withdrew, so that they being destitute of capitaines, at length put certeine petitions in writing, which they exhibited to the king, professing that they neuer intended hurt towards his roial person. The king received their petitions, which consisted in choise of counsellors, suppression of religious houses, maintenance of the seruice of almighty God, the statute of vses, the release of the fifteenth, and receiuing of the first fruits, with such other matters as nothing appertained to them: wherevpon he made them answer in pithie sentence, reproouing them of their presumptuous follie and rebellious attempt, to meddle in anie such matters and weightie affaires, the direction whereof onelie belonged to him, and to such noble men and counsellors as his pleasure should be to elect and choise to haue the ordering of the same.

Wherefore he aduised them to remember their rash and inconsiderate doings, and that now in anie wise they should resort home to their houses, and no more to assemble contrarie to his lawes and their owne allegiances; and also to cause the prouokers of this mischiefe to be deliuered to the hands of his lieutenant, and further to submit themselves wholie to such punishment as he and his nobles should thinke them worthy to receiue: for otherwise he would not suffer that inturbe at their hands to go vnreueged. After the Lincolnshire men had receiued the kings answer thus made, to their petitions, each mistrusting other, who should be noted the greatest meddler, sud-denlie they began to thinke, and got them home to their houses without longer abode.

Here with the duke of Suffolke the kings lieutenant was appointed to go with the armie, to see the countrie set in quiet, accompanied with the lord ad-mirall, sir Francis Walsan, and sir John Russell that were ioined with him also in commission for the ordering of things there within the countie of Lin-colne. The duke entred into the citie of Lincoln the seuenteenth of October. On the nineteenth all the inhabitants of Louth (according to order giuen by the duke) came to Lincoln, and there in the castell made their submission, holding up their hands, and crying for the kings mercie. And her with were chosen forth Nicholas Pelton, capteine Cobler, & thirtene more, which were commanded to ward, and all the residue were new sware to the king, renouncing their former oth receiued in time of their rebellion, and then departed home to their houses in the kings peace.
After this were proclamations made abroad in the countrie in euerie market towne by the heralds of armes, Summerfet and Winsore, that the capitaine and souldiers of the dukes armie should not take anie mans goods, cattels, or vittels, except they paid or agreed with the owners of the same.

And further commandement was giuen, that all inhabitants and dwellers within the townes and villages about, should repaire to the citie of Lin-colne, with all maner of vittels as well for men as horses, where they should receiue payment at reasonable prices for the same. After this, there was likewise proclamation made for the apprehending of all such lewd persons, as had sowne anie false rumors abrode in the countrie (the chiefe occasion of this rebellion) bryting that the king pretended to haue the gold in the hands of his subjects brought into the tower to be touched, and all their cattell unmarked, the chalices, gods, and ornaments of parish churches, fines for christenings, weddings, and buriengs, licences to eat white meat, bread, pig, goose, or capon, with manie other slanderous, false, and detestable tales and lies, forged of diuelish purpose to in-courage the people to rebellion. If therefore anie man could apprehend such as had bene the setters forth and sowers of such seditious reports, they that brought them in, should be so rewarded, as they should thinke their labour well bestowed.

Moreover, if there were anie assemblies made in anie part of the realme without the kings licence, by anie barrule persons, and would not depart to their houses vpon warning by his graces proclamations, they should not looke for further mercie at the kings hand, but to be prosecuted with fire and sword to the vttermost. To conclude, by the wise and sage direction taken in appeasing the countrie by that noble duke, all things were quieted in those parties. Di-uerse of the principall offenders were sent vnto London. He that took vpon him as chiefe capteine of the rout, was the same that called himselfe capteine Cobler: but he was indeed a monk named doctor Pakarell, which afterwards with diuerse others was executed.

was sent forwards into Lincolnshire, within six daies after the king was trulie informed, that there was a new sir begun in the north parts by the people there, which had assembled themselves into an huge armie of warlike men & well appointed, both with capitaine; horses, armor, and artillerie, to the number of forty thousand men, which had incamped themselves in Yorkshire. These men declared by their proclamations solemnly made, that this their rising and commotion should extend no further, but onelie to the maintenance and defense of the faith of Christ, and deliuerance of holie church, sore decayed and oppressed, and also for the furtherance as well of pinate as publicke matters in the realme, touching the wealth of all the kings poore subjects.

An holie pilgrimage.

They named this their seditious voyage, an holie and blessed pilgrimage: they had also certeine banners in the field, in which was painted Christ hanging on the crosse on the one side, and a chalice with a painted cake in it on the other side, with diuers other banners of like hypocrisie and feigned holinesse. The souldiers had also imbrodered on the sleeves of their cotes in steed of a badge; the similitude of the five wounds of our saviour, and in the middell thereof was written the name of our Lord. Thus had the rebels host of sathan with false and counterfeit signes of holinesse set out themselves, onelie to deceive the simple people in that their wicked and rebellious enterprise against their liege lord and naturall prince, whome by the law of nations and by Gods commandments they were bound in conscience to obey, and so farre to be from lifting up the least finger of their hand, as rather to put life and goods in hazard for his sake, to testifie their allegiance.

The faithfull diligence of
Shrewsburie

The speciall diligence and loiall dutie which was found at that present in the worthy countess George earle of Shrewsburie, is not to be forgotten, who immediatlie after he understood how the northerne men were thus by in armes, considering how much it importeth to stop them of their passage before they should aduance too far forwards, where by they might both increase in power, and put all other parts of the realme in hazard, through feare or hope to incline to their wicked purposes, he sent abroad with all speed possible to raise such power of his seruants, tenants, and friends, as by any means he might make, and withall dispatched one of his seruants to the king, both to aduertise him what he had done, and also to purchase his pardon, for making such leuie of power, before he had receiued his maiesties commission so to do.

and make good
the action.

I haue heard by relation of men of good credit that were there present: that when such knights and gentlemen as were of his counsell, and other of his especiall friends were come vnto him, he put forth this question to them; Whether his fact in raising a power of armed men without the kings commission (although he had done it to resist the rebels) were treason or not? Wherevnto when answer was made by some that were knowne to haue skill in the laws of the realme, how that by no means it could be intended treason, sith his intent was good, and no euill thereby meant, but contrarie the aduancement of the kings seruice dutifullie sought: He answered (quoth the earle) I know it in substance to be treason, and I would thinke my selfe in an hard case, if I thought I had not my pardon comming.

The loialtie of the earle.

Such a reuerend regard had this noble earle vnto his bounden allegiance towards his prince, that whatsoeuer seemed but as it were to sound in any breach to the breach thereof, it so troubled his loiall mind, that he could not be satisfied, till as it were in confessing his fault: where according to the truth there was none at all. He had signified his assured delitie in crauing pardon, where otherwise he might haue looked for thanks, which indeed he receiued with his pardon, according to his petition, and a commission to proceed as he had begun. Moreover, whereas there were diuerse speeches amongst the souldiers in the armie, uttered by some not altogether haplie well disposed, that the said earle had so good liking of the northerne mens cause, that when it came to the point of triall, he would surely ioin with them against that part, which he yet pretended to mainteine.

To put that matter out of doubt, he caused the multitude of his souldiers to come before him, and there declared to them, that he understood what lewd talke had bene raised of his meaning among them in the campe, as if he had fauoured the part of the rebels: But (saith he) whatsoeuer their colourable pretence may be, true it is, that traitors they are in this their wicked attempt. And whereas my ancestors haue bene euer true to the crowne, I meane not to staine my blood now in joining with such a sort of traitors, but to liue and die in defense of the crowne, if it stand but vpon a stake: and therefore those that will take my part in this quarrell, I haue to thanke them, and if there be any that be otherwise minded, I would wish them hence. And herewith he caused his chapelaine to minister an oth to him, which he receiued to the effect aforesaid, in the presence of them all.

And verelie this was thought to be done not without great cause that moued him thereto: for whereas the more part of his souldiers consisted of the countrie people, who with forged tales and wicked surmises were easilie led to beleue whatsoeuer was reported in fauor of the rebels, and disfauor of such as were then chiefe counsellors to the king, against whome they pretended to rise (although there was no reasonable occasion leading them thereto) it was greatlie to be suspected, least they might through some traitorous practise haue bene induced to forget their dutifull allegiance to their souereigne, and souldierlike obedience to their leaders, inasmuch that the captaine of the rebels were perswaded (and some of them reported no lesse) that they might haue fought with the duke of Norfolk, and the earle of Shrewsburie, on this hither side of the riuer of Dun, euen with their owne men, not needing to haue brought a man of their armie with them.

Therefore it was thought, that the oth which the earle of Shrewsburie in that sort receiued before all his people there openlie in field, serued to great purpose; to put out of his souldiers wauering heads all such lewd expectation that he would turne to the enemies, staing thereby their fickle minds; sith they were now assured, that he being their chiefe captain, meant no dissimulation. A matter trulie of no small importance, considering the fauor which the commons bare towards him, and the opinion they had conceiued of his high prowesse; so that which waie he inclined, it was thought verelie the game were likelie to go. But now after the king was aduertised of that perilous commotion of the northerne men, he appointed not onelie the said earle of Shrewsburie to raise a power to resist them: but also ordered the duke of Norfolk his lieutenant generall, with the marquisse of Excester, and the said earle of Shrewsburie, the earles of Huntington and Rutland, accompanied with a mightie power to go against them.

These lords raising such retinues of souldiers and men of warre as were to them assigned, made forward to the place where the armie of the rebels was then incamped, which was beyond the towne of Doncaster, in the high waie towards Poole. But first the laid earle of Shrewesburie, with the earles of Huntingdon; and Rutland, and such other that were next adjoining to those parties, with their powers assembled out of the shires of Salop, Stafford, Leicestershire, Rutland, Nottingham, and Derby, came to a place in Nottinghamshire called Withlow, and there taking the musters of their people, straightwaies passed forth to Doncaster, and appointed certaine bands of their men, to lie in places where anie fords or passages late over the river of Dun, runneth by the northside of Doncaster, to staie the enemies if they should attempt to come over. Shortly after came the duke of Suffolke, and finallye the marquisse of Creake with a iollie companie of transferrers men, well and perfectly appointed.

When these captains, and sage counsellors being here assembled, understood the manner of the nothern men, their number, and readiness to battell, they first practised with great policie, to haue pacified the matter without bloodshedding: but the nothern men were so bent to mainteine their wilfull enterprise, that there was no hope to take by the matter without battell: the refoze a daie was set, on the which they should trie the quarrell betwixt them with dint of sword. But so the chance. The night before the daie assigned for this bloodie and unnaturall battell, to haue being fought betwixt men of one nation, and subiects to one king; there fell a raine not great to speake of, but yet as it were by miracle, the ruier of Dun rose suddenlie on such a height, that fel-dome had bene scene there the like hugeness of water: so that the daie when the houre of battell should come, it was not possible for the one armie to come at the other, and so the appointment made betwene both the armies for trial of the matter by force of arms, was by Gods god providence disappoynted, and manie an innocent mans life preferred, that should haue died, if their purposes had taken place.

After this by the great wisdome and policie of the nobles and capteins, a communication was had, and an agreement made vpon the kings pardon, obtained for all the capteins and chiefe dmers in this insurrection, and promise made that they should be gentlie heard, to declare such things as they found themselves grieved with: and that vpon their articles presented to the king, their reasonable petitions should be granted, as by him & his counsell it should be thought expedient, whereby all troubles might be quieted, and ech thing brought to a good conclusion. Wherewith euerie man departed, and those which before came as hot as fire to fight, letted of their desperate purpose, by Gods mercifull providence, returned now peaceable to their houses without any more businesse.

At the selfe same time that these northerne men were lodged nere to Doncaster, and the kings partye ready to stop them of their passage (as before ye haue heard) there was an other armie ready to haue marched southwards through Lancashire: but by the faithfull diligence of the earle of Derby; who with the forces of Lancashire and Cheshire was appointed to resist them, they were likewise kept backe, and brought to quiet; notwithstanding they were a verie great number assembled together of the commons out of Cumberland, Westmerland, and of the north parts of Lancashire. The earle of Suffol was sent downe by the king, to come in assistance with the earle of Derby; who causing diuerse of the chiefe procurers of that rebellion in those parties to be apprehended and arraigned, they being found guiltie had iudgement, and were executed, as the abbats of Walleie, Sauleie, and others.

In time of this rebellion, a priest that by a butcher dwelling within five miles of Colindale, had been procured to preach in fauor of the rebels, and the butcher (as well for procuring the priest thereto, as for words spoken as he sold his meat in Windsoꝛ) were hanged: the priest on a tree at the foot of Windsoꝛ bridge, and the butcher on a pake of new gallowes set vp before the cassell gate, at the end of the same bridge. The words which the butcher spake were these. When one had him lesse for the carcase of a sheepe than he thought he could make of it : Saie by Gods soule (saide he) I had rather the godd fellowes of the north had it, and a scoze more of the best I haue, than I would so sell it. This priest and butcher being accused on a mondaie in the morning whilst the kings armie was in the field, and the king himselfe lying at Windsoꝛ, they confessed their faultes vpon their examinations, and by the law martiall they were adioyded to death, and suffered as before is mentioned. This yeare in December, the Thames was frozen ouer : insomuch that the king and queene rode thorough London to Grenewich.

In Christmas the king by his messengers and heralds sent downe into the north his generall pardons to all the offenders; and shortly after Aske that had bene the principall procurer, & as it were chiefe captaine of the northerne rebels, came to London, and now was both pardoned and receiued into fauor, receiuing of the kings bounteous liberalitie, apparell, and diuerse other rewards, whereof he was most vntwofold: for there liued not (as Hall saith) a better wretch, as well in person as conditions and deeds, speciallie towards the kings maiestie, as after appeared. ¶ Sir Iane Cuers kept Scarbrow castell in the north, being six weeks besieged by the rebels, twentie daies whereof he and all his companie (which were his onelie friends, seruants, and tenants, and serued for god will to him) were forced to susteine themselves with bread and water, and yet he kept the same to the end of that rebellion; and so deliuered it to king Henrie, who sent him sone after to serue in the borders against Scotland, where in great credit he continued his seruice, keeping the Scots without doing hurt to England, and with such obedience of them, as within twentie miles of the borders of Scotland fore against him, there was not a Scot but at his commandement: and so continued, till he was killed in the yeare 1545.]

The twelue of Nouember, fir Thomas Betoman mas Fitzgaret sonne and heire to the earle of Sal-dare was beheaded, and siue of his vnckles were draiue, hanged, and quartered at Tiborne for treason. In the same moneth Nicholas Pusgrauce, Thomas Albie, with others, began a new rebellion at Iarlshie Steptan in Westmerland, who hauing got together eight thousand men, besieged the citie of Carlisle, from whence they were beaten with the on-lie power of the citie: and in returning from thense, the duke of Northfolke, who then was lieutenant of the north, encountered with them, toke the capitaine, and according to the late martill aigned sentence and foure of them, whome he hanged on Carlisle walls, but Pusgrauce escaped.

In the same moneth of februarye began a new commotion, by the procurement of sir Francis Wi-god, who being intitled to that mischieuous enterpise by certeine wicked persons, forgot his dutie to his prince, although he had bene a man (as Hall saith) that vndoubtedlie loued God, and reuerenced his pzince with a right obedient and loving feare: but such are men when God leaueeth them, and that they will take in hand things which Gods most holie word vtterlie forbiddeth. This last rebellion began in it was quicklie suppressed, and the said sir Francis Wigod apprehended, and brought to the Tower. The said sir Francis & one Halam, having raised a great compaignie of rebels, meant to have taken the towne of Hull, there to have fortified themselves, and to have assembled more power; but by the wisdom of sir Wase Ellerhar, & the mayo of the towne of Hull, the said Halam, & therscore other of the rebels with out anie slaughter were taken, which Halam was afterwards hanged in chaines, and two other with him, at the said towne of Hull. Sir Francis Wigod fled, & could not be heard of for a time, but at length he was also apprehended.

Moreover, about the latter end of this twentieth and eight yeare, the lord Darcie, Aske, sir Robert Constable, sir John Bulmer and his wife, sir Thomas Persie brother to the erle of Northumberland, sir Stephan Hamilton, Nicholas Tempest esquier, William Lomleie, began effones to conspire, although euerie of them before had received their pardons: and now were they all taken and brought to the Tower of London as prisoners. This yeare Robert Wackington a mercer of London, a man both rich, wise, and of good credit, dwelling at the signe of the leg in Chrapside, on a morning going (as his custom was) about foure of the clocke to heare masse, in the church then called S. Thomas of Acres, & now the Percers chappell, as he crossed over the street from his house to the church, was suddenlie murdered with a gun, the cracke whereof was heard of the neighbors, and of a great number of labozers that stood at Shoper lane end, and saw the said Wackington go forth of his house: but there was such a thicke mist that morning, as the like had not bene seen, by covert whereof the murderer found thist the more easilie to escape.

Robert Wackington murdered.

Spanie were suspected, but none found in fault, albeit forsomuch as he was one that would speake his mind frelie, and was at the same time one of the burgessees of the parlement for the cite of London, and had talked somewhat against the couetousnesse and crueltie practised by the cleargie, it was mistrusted least by some of them he came thus to his end. At length the murderer in deed was condemned at Wimburie in Dorsetshire, to die for a felonie which he afterwards committed: and when he came to the gallows on which he suffered, he confessed that he did this murder, and till that time he was neuer had in anie suspicion thereof. ¶ The nine and twentieth of March, were twelue of the Lincolneshire rebels drayne to Tyburne, and there hanged and quartered, five of them were priests, the residue laic men. One of the priests was doctor Spakarell, and an other was the vicar of Louth.

About this season the maner of casting pipes of lead for the conuenance of water vnder the ground, without occupieng of soulder to the same, was inuented by Robert Brocke clearke, then one of the kings chapleins, an inuention right necessarie for the sauing of expences: for two men and a boie will do that in one day, which before could not be done by manie men in manie daies. Robert Coper goldsmith was the first that made the instruments, and put this inuention in practise. ¶ In the berie beginning of this yeare, certeine commissioners being sent into Summerstethire to take vp corne, the people began to make an insurrection: but by the wisdom and diligence of young master Paulet & others the same was suppressed, and the beginners thereof, to the number of therscore, were apprehended & condemned, and fourtene of them were hanged and quartered, one of the number being a woman, the residue were saued by the kings mercifull pardon.

Anno reg. 29.

In June the lord Darcie & the lord Huseie were arreigned at Westminster before the marquisse of Exeter then high steward, where they were found guilty, and had iudgement, as in cases of high treason. Shortly after also were arreigned sir Robert Constable, sir Thomas Persie, sir Francis Wigod, sir Stephan Hamilton, sir John Bulmer, and his wife, or rather (as some report) his paramour: also William Lomleie, Nicholas Tempest, William Thurst abbat of Founteins, Adam Subburie abbat of Teruene, William Wolloprie of Wirlington, also the abbat of Kluers, and Robert Aske. They were all found guilty of high treason, and all put to death. Sir Robert Constable was hanged in chains ouer Beuerleie gate at Hull, and Robert Aske was also hanged in chains on a tower at Porke, and Margaret Cheineie sir John Bulmers paramour burnt in Smithfield in London. The other suffered at Tyburne.

In the latter end of June, was the lord Darcie beheaded at the Tower hill, and shortly after the lord Huseie was likewise beheaded at Lincoln. This yeare at saint Georges feast, was the lord Cromwell made knight of the garter. In October on saint Edwards euent, which falleth on the twelfth of that moneth, at Hampton court the quene was deliuered of hir sonne named Edward, for whose birth great iote was made thorough the realme, with thanksgiuing to almighty God, who had sent such a young prince to succede his father in the crowne of this realme (as afterwards he did) by the name of king Edward the first. His godfathers at the fontaine were the archbishop of Canturburie & the duke of Northfolke, the ladie Marie was his godmother, and at the bishopping, the duke of Suffolke was his godfather. On the eighteenth of October he was made prince of Wales, duke of Cornewall, and erle of Chester.

But as iote is often mixed with sorow, so at that time it came to passe by the death of his mother, that noble and vertuous ladie quene Jane, which departed out of this life the fourteenth daie of this moneth of October, to the great griefe of the whole realme: but namely the king hir husband toke it most grievouslie of all other, who remaining to Westminster, there kept himselfe close a great while after. The eight of November, the corps of the quene was carried to Windosor, with great solemnitie, and there buried in the midst of the quire in the castell church. There was also a solempne hearse made for hir in Paules church, and funerall erequies celebrated, as well as in all other churches within the cite of London. Thus was the king left againe a widower, and so continued the space of two yeares together. Upon the death of which quene Jane, and the birth of prince Edward hir son this dischord following was made:

This yeare Edward Selmer viscount Beauchampe the quenes brother was created earle of Hertford, & sir William Fitzwilliams lord high admerall was created earle of Southampton, & master Paulet was made vicechancellor, sir John Russell comptroller of the kings house, master Henedge, master Long, master Bineuet of the kings priuite chamber, knights; master Coffin, master A. star, & master Selmer the quenes brother, knights. tith of Februarie, being sundaie, the rod of Borleie in Kent, called the rod of grace, made with diuerse vices, to moue the eies and lips, was shewed at Pauls crosse by the preacher, which was the bishop of Rochester, and there it was broken and plucked in peeces.

The five and twentieth of Februarie, sir John Allen priest, and also an Irish gentleman of the Carets were hanged & quartered at Tyburne. The second of March, the image of the rood, called saint Sancio, at Bermonseie abbey in Southwiche, was taken downe by the kings commandement. The one and twentieth of March, Henrie Barham customer of Plimmonth, and Thomas Cwell, were hanged and quartered at Tyburne. In Maie a frier obseruant called frier Forrest was apprehended, for that he was knowne in secret confessions to haue declared to manie of the kings liege people, that the king was not supreme head of the church, where he had by his oth neuer thelesse affirmed him so to be. Whereupon in his examination, that point being laid to his charge, he answered that he toke his oth with his outward man, but his inward man neuer consented thereunto. But being further accused of diuerse he-reticall and damnable opinions that he held & maintained contrarie to the scripture, at length being not able to defend the same, he submitted himselfe to the punishment of the church.

Now when upon this his submission, hauing more libertie than before he had to talke with whome he would, and other hauing libertie to talke with him, he was incensed by some such as had conference with him, that when his formall abjuratioun was sent him to read and peruse, he utterly refused it, and obstinately stood in all his heresies and treasons. Whereupon he was condemned, & afterwards on a paire of new gallowes prepared for him in Smithfield, he was hanged by the middle and armeholes all quick, and vnder the gallowes was made a fire wherewith he was consumed and burnt to death. There were diuerse of the counsell present at his death ready to haue granted him pardon, if a nie sparke of repentance would haue appeared in him. There was also a pulpit prepared, in which that renowned preacher Hugh Latimer, then bishop of Worcester, by manifest scriptures confuted the friers errors, and with manie godlie exhortations moued him to repentance, but he would neither heare nor speake.

A little before the execution, an huge and great image was brought to the gallowes. This image was fetched out of Wales, which the Welshmen had in great reuerence: and it was named Daruell Gatheren. They had a prophesie in Wales, that this image should set a whole forest on fire, which prophesie was now thought to take effect, for he set this frier Forrest on fire, and consumed him to nothing. The frier when he saw the fire come, caught hold on the ladder, which he would not let go, but in that fort vi-patiently toke his death, so as if one might haue seen him by his outward man, he appeared (saith Hall) to haue small knowledge of God, and lesse trust in him at his ending: otherwise he would haue bene persuaded to patience, and a christian farewell to the world. Upon the gallowes that he died on, was set up in great letters these verses here following:

David Daruell Gatheren, As saith the Welshmen, Fetched outlawes out of hell:
Now is he come with speare and shield, In harness to burne in Smithfield, For in Wales he maie not dwell.

In Iulie was Edmund Cuninghame attainted of treason, for counterfeiting the kings signe ma-nuell, and in August was Edward Clifford for the same cause attainted, and both put to execution as traitors at Tyburne. In September by the speciall motion of the Lord Cromwell, all the notable images, vnto the which were made anie especiall pilgriimages and offerings, were utterly taken away, as the images of Walsingham, Ipswich, Worcester, the ladie of Wilton, with manie other, and likewise the shynes of counterfeit saints, as that of Thomas Becket, and others. And euen forthwith, by means of the said Cromwell, all the orders of friers and nuns, with their cloisters and houses, were suppressed and put downe. As for the images of our ladie of Walsingham, and Ipswich, were brought by to London, with all the iewels that hong about them, and diuerse other images both in England & Wales, whereunto anie common pilgrimage was vsed, for auoiding of idolatrie, all which were burnt at Chelise by the lord priuie seale.

On the first of September being sundaie, one Gratnell hangman of London and two other were hanged at the wyexling place by Clearkes well, for robbing a booth in Bartholomew faire, at which execution were aboute twentie thousand people, as Edward Hall himselfe (then a present beholder) iudged.
This moneth of September, Thomas Cromwell lord priuie seale, vicegerent to the kings highnesse, sent forth instructions to all bishops & curats through the realme, charging them to see that in euery parish church, the bible of the largest volume, printed in Englisch, were placed for all men to read on: and that a booke of register were also provided and kept in euery parish church, wherein shall be written eue-rie wedding, chistening, and burleng, within the same parish for euer.

Saint Augustines abbey at Canturburie was suppressed, and the shyne & gods taken to the kings treasurie, as also the shyne of Thomas Becket in the priorie of Wykes church was likewise taken to the kings vse, and his bones, scull and all, which was there found, with a peece broken out by the wound of his death, were all burnt in the same church by the lord Cromwell. The monks there were commanded to change their habits, &c. The one and twentieth of October, the church of Thomas Becket in London called the hospitall of saint Thomas of Acres was suppressed. Nicholas Gibson groser, for this yeare shiriffe of London, builded a free schole at Ratchiffe, nere vnto London, appointing to the same, for the instruction of thre score poore mens chyliden, a schole-master and vther, with a stipend of ten pounds by the pere to the master, and six pounds thirtene shillings four pence to the vther. He also builded there cer-teine almes houses for fouretene poore and aged persons, who quarterlie receiue six shillings eight pence

In this season sute was made to the king by the emperour, to take to wife the duchesse of Spillan: but thoxtlie after that sute brake off, because (as was thought) the emperours counsell ment by a cautell to haue brought the king in mind to sue for a licence bert, a priest, was accused of heresie, for holding opinion against the bodilie presence in the sacrament of the altar. He appealed to the kings maiestie, who favourable consented to heare him at a daie appointed, against which daie, in the kings palace at Westminster, within the kings hall, there was set up a throne or seat roiall for the king, with scaffolds for all the lords, and a stage for Nicholason to stand upon.

This Nicholason was esteemed to be a man well learned, but that daie he uttered no such knowledge (saith Hall) as was thought to be in a man of that estimation. Diuerse arguments were ministred to him by the bishops, but namelie the king pressed him soze, and in the end offered him pardon if he would renounce his opinion: but he would not consent thereto, and therefore he was there condemned, and had indgement, and so shortly after he was drawne into Smithfield, and there burnt to ashes. The third of Nouember, Henrie Courtneie marques of Excestre and earle of Deuonshire, Henrie Pole lord Pontacate, and sir Edward Neuill brother to the lord Aborgaennie, were sent to the tower, being accused by sir Gessfreie Pole, brother to the lord Pontacate, of high treason. They were indicted for deuling to mainteine, promote, & aduance one Reginald Pole, late deane of Excestre, enemie to the king beyond the sea, & to depriue the king. The marques, and the lord Pontacate were arreigned the last of December at Westminster before the lord Audleie that was chancellor, and for that present time high steward of England, and there they found him giltye.

The third daie after were arreigned sir Edward Neuill, sir Gessfreie Pole, two priests called Cross and Collins, & one Holland a mariner, & all atteinted. The sixteenth of Nouember, was the blacke friers in London suppressed, the next daie the wyse friers, the grate friers, and the monks of the Charterhouse, and so all the other immediatlie. The foure and twentieth of Nouember, the bishop of Rochester preached at Paules crosse, & there shewed the bloud of Hales, and affirmed the same to be no bloud, but honie clarified, and coloured with saffron, as it had bene euidentlie proued before the king and his counsell. Also foure anabaptists, three men, and one woman, all Dutch, bare sagots at Paules crosse the same daie. The nineteenth of Nouember, a man and a woman Dutch anabaptists, were burnt in Smithfield.]

The ninth of Januarie, the lord marques, and the lord Pontacate, with sir Edward Neuill lost their heads on the Tower hill. The two priests and Holland were drawne to Thurne, and there hanged and quartered. Sir Gessfreie Pole had his pardon. On Wednesdaye, John Johns, John Potter, & William Panering, were hanged in the princes lieries (because they were the princes seruants) on the southside of Paules churchyard, for killing Roger Cholmelcie esquier in that place, of malice prepened. The third of March, sir Nicholas Carew of Bedington in the countie of Surrie knight of the garter, and maister of the kings horse, condemned before of treason, was beheaded on the Tower hill, where he made a godlie confession, both of his fault, and superstitious faith, giuing God thanks, for that his hap was to be prisoner in the Tower, where he first sauored the pleasant tast of Gods holie word, meaning the bible in English, which there he read by the exhortation of one Thomas Philips then keeper of that prison, and sometime a citizen and point-maker of London, who had bene in some trouble for religion, and examined before doctor Stokellie bishop of London, and sir Thomas More, but through his wise demeanor and mild answers, he escaped their hands.

The ninth of March, the king created sir William Paulet knight treasurer of his house, lord saint John, and sir John Russell comptroller of his household, lord Russell. Also either then or shortly after, was sir William Par created lord Par. The new abbey of white monks at the Tower hill, and the spinories, huns without Algate, were suppressed on the last of March. The same time the king caused all the hauens to be fenced with bulwarks, and blockhouses, and riding to Dover, he took order to haue bulwarks made alongst the sea coasts, and sent commission to haue generall musters made thorough the realme. Moreover on Easter daie there were threescore faile discovered that late in the Dobones, and for that it was neither knowne what they were, nor what they intended to do, all the able men in Kent rose and mustered in armour the same daie. The eight and twentieth of Aprill began a parlement at Westminster, in the which Margaret countesse of Salisbury, Gertrude wife to the marques of Excestre, Reginald Pole cardinal, brother unto the lord Pontacate, sir Adrian Folkew, & Thomas Dingleie knight of saint Johns, and diuerse other were atteinted of high treason, which Folkew and Dingleie the tenth of Iulie were beheaded.

In this parlement the act of the six articles was established. Of some it was named the blodie statute, as if proued indeed to manie. And even shortly after the making thereof, when the first inquest for inquirie of the offenders of the same statute sat in London at the mercers chappell, those that were of that inquest were so chosen forth for the purpose, as there was not one amongst them that wished not to haue the said statute put in execution to the bittermost, inasmuch that they were not contented onelie to inquire of those that offended in the six articles contained in that statute, but also they beailed to inquire of certeine branches (as they took the matter) belonging to the same, as of those that came seldom to heare masse, that held not up their hands at the sacring time, who took no holie bread nor holie water, who used to read the bible in churches, or in communication seemed to despise priests, or images in the churches, &c. To conclude, they inquired so diligently of them that had so offended in anie of those articles or the branches, that they indicted & presented to the number of five hundred persons and above, so that if the king had not granted his pardon, for that he was informed by the lord Audleie then lord chancellor that they were indicted of malice, a great manie of them which already were in prison, had died for it in Smithfield, in frieing a saggot. But although the king at that present granted his gracious pardon, and forgane all those offenses: yet afterwards, during the time that this statute stood in force, which was for the space of eight years ensuing, they brought manie an honest and simple person to death. For such was the rigor of that law, that if two witnesses, true or false, had accused anie, and aduouched that they had spoken against the sacrament, there was no waite but death; for it boted him not to confesse that his faith was contrarie, or that he said not as the accusers reported, for the witnesses (for the most part) were beleued.

The king being informed that the pope by instructions of cardinal Pole, had moued and stirred diuers great princes and potentats of christendome to invade the realme of England; without all delaye rode himselfe toward the sea coasts, and sent diuerse of his nobles and counsellors to surueie all the ports and places of danger on the coast, where anie meet and conuentent landing place might be doubted, as well in the borders of England, as also of Wales: in which dangerous places he caused bulwarks and forts to be erected. And further, he caused the lord admiral earle of Southampton to prepare in a readinesse his name of ships, for defense of the coasts. Beside this, he sent forth commissions to haue generall musters taken throughout the realme, to vnderstand what number of able men he might make account of: and further to haue the armoz and weapons sene and shewed. Nothing left he vndone that tended to the foresaying and preventing of a mischiefe to insue, which in a prince is counted a vertue, because such prouidence and circumspection is reputed no lesse in a priuat & ordinarie man, as the poet Plautus saith; Primum est, vbi causa admodum, diffidere.

Sir William Forrester knight, at that present maior of London, was commanded to certifie the names of all the able men within the citie and liberties thereof, betwene the ages of thre score and of fiftene, with the number of armoz and weapons of all kinds of sorts. Whereupon the said maior and his brethren ech one in his ward, by the oth of the common counsell and constable, toke the number of men, armoz, and weapons. And after well considering of the matter, by view of their booke, they thought it not expedient to admit the whole number certified for apt and able men: and therefore assembling themselves againe, they chose forth the most able persons, and put by the residue, speciallie such as had no armoz, nor for whom anie could be prouided. But when they were credibly aduertised by Thomas Cromwell lord priuie seale (to whom the citie was greatlie beholden) that the king himselfe would see the people of the citie muster in a conuenient number, and not to set forth all their powder, but to leaue some at home to keepe the citie; then euerie alderman repaired to his ward, and there put aside all such as had iacks, cotes of plate of maille, and brigandines, and appointed none but such as had white armoz, except such as should beare morris pikes, which were no armoz but scabbles, and there was no stranger (although he were a dentline) permitted to be in this muster.

Euerie man being of anie abilitie, prouided himselfe a cote of white silke, and garnished their basenets with tresses like caps of silke, set with owtches, furnished with chaines of gold and feathers, or caused their armoz to be gilt, and likewise their halberds and pollaxes. Some, and especiallie certeine goldsmiths, had their whole armoz of silver bullion. The lord maior, the recorder, the aldermen, and euerie other officer beside were gorgeously trimmed, as for their degrees was thought seemelie. The maior had fiftene tall fellows on foot attending on him with gilt halberds, apparelled in white silke doublets, and their hose and shoes were likewise white, cut after the Almaine guise, pounsed and pulled out with red farsenet: their ierkins were of white leather cut, and chains about their necks, with feathers and bwoches in their caps. The recorder and euerie alderman had about him foure halberders trimmed also in warlike sort. The chamberleine of the citie, the counsellors & aldermens deputies were appointed to be waiters on horsebacke, which aloft on their armoz wore white damask cotes, mounted on good horses well trapped, with great chaines about their necks, and proper sauelins or battell ares in their hands, and caps of velvet richlie trimmed.

The waiters on foot, being in number foure hundred proper light persons, were clad in white ierkins of leather cut, with white hose and shoes, euerie man with a sauelin or slaughtsword in his hands, to keepe the people in arraie. They had chaines about their necks, and feathers in their caps. The minstrels were in white, with the armes of the citie, and so was euerie other person at this muster without anie diuerstie; the lord maior, recorder, and aldermen, onelic excepted, who had crosses of velvet or satin purpled with gold. The standard bearers were the tallest men of euerie ward, for whom were made thirtie new standards of the deuse of the citie, beside banners. Euerie alderman mustred his own ward in the fields, to see that euerie man were in furniture prouided as was requisite.

The eight of Maie being the daie appointed for to shew themselves before the king, euerie alderman in order of battell with those of his ward came into the fields at Spile end, and then all the gunners scattered themselves into one place, the pikers into another, and the archers into an other, and likewise the billmen, and there cast themselves in rings, and other formes of battell, which was a beautifull sight to behold: for all the fields from white Chapell to Spile end, and from Bednall greene to Katcliffe & Stepnie, were all couered with armour, men, and weapons, and especiallie the battell of pikers seemed to be as it had bene a great forest. Then was euerie part diuided into thre battels, a for-ward, a middle-ward, and a reere-ward.

About seauen of the clocke marched forward the light peeces of ordinance, with stone and powder. After them followed the drums and fifes, and immediately after them a guidon of the armes of the citie. Then followed master Sadler capteine of the gunners on horsebacke armed, and in a cote of velvet, with a chaine of gold, and foure halberders about him apparelled as before is recited. Then followed the gunners foure in a ranke, euerie one going five foot in sunder, which shot altogether in diuerse places berie liuelie, and in speciallie before the kings maiestie, which at that time sat in his new gatehouse at his palace of Westminster, where he viewed all the whole compaignie. In like maner passed the other compaignies of all the thre battels in good and seemelie order. The foremost capteine at nine of the clocke in the morning, by the little conduit came and entered into Paules churchyard, and from thence directed to Westminster, and so through the sanctuary, and round about the parke of S. James, and by into the field, comming home through Holborne, and as the first capteine entered againe to the little conduit, the last of the muster entered Paules churchyard, which was then about foure of the clocke in the afternoon. The number, beside the waiters, and of other waiters was fiftene thousand.

The eight of Iulie, Griffith Clarke, bicar of Wandsworth, with his chapleine and his seruant, & frier Waite, were all foure hanged and quartered at S. Thomas Waterings. The tenth of Iulie sir Adrian Forstescue, and Thomas Dingleie were beheaded. The ninth of September, the nunnerie of Clerkentwell and diuerse others were suppressed. This yeare the sixteenth of September came to London duke Frederike of Banier, the Palgrave of the Rhine, and the eighteenth of the same moneth came to London the marshall of Flanders Frederike prince elector of Saronie, and the chancelor of William duke of Cleue, Guliche, Gelberland, and Berghen. The Palgrave was receiued and conducted to Windsor by the duke of Suffolke, and the other were accompanied with other noble men, and the thre and twentieth of the same moneth they all came to Windsor, where eight daies together they were continually feasted, and had pastime shewed them; in hunting and other pleasures, so much as might be. The Palgrave shortly after departed homewards and was princelie rewarded, & at that present was the marriage concluded betwixt the king and the ladie Anne, sister vnto duke William of Cleue, and a great preparation was made for the receiuing of hir. The twelue of October the nunnerie of Haliwell, & southwith the priorie of S. Marie oueries in Southwoke, and S. Bartholomeus in Smithfield, were suppressed, & all their lands & goods taken to the kings vse. Thomas Huntlow of London for this yeare thiriffe, gaue the haberdashers certeine tene-ments, for the which they be bound to giue to ten poze almes people of the same companie, euerie one of them eight pence euerie fridate for euer: and also at euerie quarter dinner kept by the masters, to be giuen to euerie one of those ten poze people a penie loose, a pottell of ale, a peece of beefe worth foure pence in a platter, with pozage, and foure pence in monie.]

The fouretenth of Nouember Hugh Feringdon abbat of Reding, and two priests, the one called Rug, and the other Dunion, atainted of high treason for denieng the supremacie of the king ouer the church of England, were drowne, hanged, and quartered at Reding. The same daie was Richard Whiting abbat of Glasseburie likewise hanged and quartered on Towze hill beside his monastirie, for the same matter and other treasons whereof he had bene convicted. The first of December was John Bech abbat of Colchester put to death for the like offense. In December were appointed to wait on the kings person fiftie gentlemen called pensioners, of speares, vnto whome was assigned the sum of fiftie pounds percelie a peece, for the maintenance of themselves and two horses, or one horse and a gelding of service.

The eleuenth daie of December at the turne pike on this side Graueling, was the ladie Anne of Cleue receiued by the lord deputie of the towne of Calis, and with the speares and horsemen belonging to the retinue there. When she came within little more than a mile of the towne of Calis, she was met by the erle of Southampton high admerall of England, who had in his companie thirtie gentlemen of the kings household, as sir Francis Wyan, sir Thomas Seimer, and others, beside a great number of gentlemen of his owne retinue clad in blue velvet, and crimson satin, and his yeomen in damaske of the same colours. The mariners of his ship were apparelled in satin of Byldges, cotes & slops of the same colour. The lord admerall brought hir into Calis by Lanterne gate. There was such a peale of ordinance shot off at hir entrie, as was marvellous to the hearers. The malso presented hir with an hundred markes in gold, the merchants of the Staple with an hundred soueraignes of gold in a rich purse. She was lodged in the kings place called the Chexher, and there she laie fiftene daies for want of prosperous wind.

During which time, goodlie iusts and coslie baykets were made to hir, for hir solace and recreation. And on S. Johns daie in Chistmasse, she with fiftie saile toke passage about none, and landed at Dele in the Dolones about fve of the clocke, where sir Thomas Cheney lord Warden of the ports receiued hir. She taried there a certeine space in a castell newlie built, and thither came the duke of Suffolke, and the dutches of Suffolke, and the bishop of Chichester with a great number of knights and esquires, and ladies of Kent and other, which welcomed hir grace, and brought hir that night vnto Dover castell, where she rested till mondaie, on which date (notwithstanding it was verie foule and stormie weather) she passed towards Canturburie, and on Waram dovene met hir the archbishop of Canturburie, with the bishops of Elie, S. Asse, S. Daues, and Dover, and so brought hir to S. Augustins without Canturburie, where she laie that night. The next daie she came to Sittingburne, and laie there that night. As she passed towards Rochester on Petweares even, on Ketnam dovene met hir the duke of Suffolke, and the lord Wacres of the south, and the lord Spontioie, with a great companie of knights and esquires of Suffolke and Suffolke, with the barons of the eschequer which brought hir to Rochester, where she laie in the palace all Petweares daie. On which daie, the king (longing to see hir) accompanied with no more but eight persons of his priue chamber, both he and they all apparelled in marble cotes, prillie comming to Rochester, suddenlie came to hir presence, whereof at the first she was somewhat affonied, but after he had spoken to hir and welcomed hir, she with loving countenance and gracions behaviour him receiued, and welcomed him on hir knees, whom he gentlie toke vp and kissed, and all that after none communed and deuised with hir, supped that night with hir, and the next daie he departed to Greene-wich, and she came forward to Dartford.

On the morrow the thirde daie of Januarie being saturday, in a faire plaine of Blackheath, more nere to the foot of Shoters hill, than the ascendent of the same, called Blackheath hill, was pitched a pavilion of rich cloth of gold, and diuerse other tents and pavilions, in which were made fiers and perfumes for hir and such ladies as were appointed to receiue hir: and from the tents to the parke gate of Greene-wich, all the bushes and firs were cut downe, and a large open waie made for the shew of all persons. And first next to the parke pale on the east side stood the merchants of the Stillard, and on the west side stood the merchants of Genoa, Florence and Venice, and the Spaniards in cotes of velvet. Then on both sides the waie stood the merchants of the citie of London, and the aldermen, with the counsellors of the said citie, to the number of a hundred and threescore which were mingled with the esquires; then the fiftie gentlemen pensioners: and all these were apparelled in velvet and chaines of gold, trulle accounted to the number of twelue hundred & above, beside them that came with the king and hir, which were sir hundred in velvet cotes and chaines of gold. Behind the gentlemen stood the seruicemen in good order well horsed and apparelled, that who so ever had well viewed them, might haue said, that they for tall and comelie personages, and cleane of lim and bodie, were able to giue the greatest prince in chrisendome a mortall breakfast, if he had bene the kings enemie.

About twelue of the clocke, hir grace with all the companie which were of hir owne nation, to the number of an hundred horse, accompanied with the dukes of Suffolke and Suffolke, the archbishop of Canturburie, and other bishops, lords, and knights, which had receiued and conueied hir, came downe Shoters hill towards the tents, and a good space from the tents met hir the earle of Rutland appointed lord chamberlaine to hir grace, sir Thomas Wernise hir chancellor, and all hir counsellors and officers, amongst whom doctor Daie (appointed to be hir almoner) made to hir an eloquent oration in Latine, presenting to hir on the kings behalfe all the officers and seruants: which oration was answered vnto by the duke hir brothers secretarie, there being present: which done the ladie Margaret Dowglas, daughter to the quene of Scots, the ladie marquesse Dowset, daughter to the French quene, being nextes to the king, and the dutches of Richmond the countesses of Rutland and Hereford, with diuers other ladies and gentlewomen, to the number of threescore and fve, saluted and welcomed hir grace, who alighted out of hir chariot in the which she had rid all hir long iourneie, and with courteous demeanour louing countenance, gaue to them hartie thanks, and kissed them all, and after all hir counsellors and officers kissed hir hand: which done, she with all the ladies entered the tents, and there warmed them a space.

When the king knew that she was arrived in hir tent, he with all diligence set out through the parke. And first issued the kings trumpets, then the kings officers sworne of his priue chamber, after them follo- 10 wed barons, the yongest first, and sir William Hollis lord maior of London rode with the lord Warthat was the yongest baron. Then followed the bishops, and immediatlie after them the earles, and then the duke of Bauere, and countie Palatine of the Rhine, with the liverie of the Colson or golden sleece about his necke.

Then came the ambassadours of the French king and emperor, next to whome followed the lord pri-ue seale lord Cromwell, and the lord chancellour, 20 then Carter king at armes, and the other officers and sargeants of armes gaue their attendance on each side the lord. The lord marquesse Dorset bare the sword of estate, and after him a good distance followed the kings highnesse, mounted on a goodlie courser. To speake of the rich and gorgeous apparell that was there to be seene that daie, I haue thought it not greatlie necessarie, with each man may well thinke it was right sumptuous, and as the time then serued, verie faire and coslie, as they that are desir- 30 ous to vnderstand the same may read in maister Halles chronicle more at large, which in this part I haue thought good to abridge.

After the king followed the lord chamberleine, then came sir Anthonie Browne maister of his horses, a goodlie gentleman, and of personage verie femilie, richlie mounted, & leading the kings horse of estate by a long reine of gold. Then followed his pages of honour riding on great couriers, and lastlie followed sir Anthonie Wingfield capteine of the gard, and then the gard well habited, and in their rich cotes. In this order rode the king till he came to the last end of the ranke of the pensioners, & there e-uerie person that came with him placed himselfe on the one side or the other, the king standing in the middlest.

When hir grace vnderstood that the king was come, she came forth of hir tent, and at the doore ther-of, being set on a faire and beautiful horse richlie traped, she rode forth towards the king, who perceiuing hir to appoach, came forward somewhat beyond the croffe on Blackheath, and there staid till she came nether, & then putting off his cap, he made forward to hir, and with most louing countenance and princelie behauiour saluted, welcomed, and imbraced hir, to the great reioysing of the beholders: and the like wise not forgetting hir dutie, with most amiable aspect and womanlie behauiour receiued him with manie apt words and thanks, as was most to purpose. Whilste they were thus talking together, the fiftie pensioners with the gard departed to furnish the hall at Greenwich. After the king had talked with hir a small while, he put hir on his right hand, and so with their footmen they rode together, and with their companies being thus met, returned in this manner through the ranks of the knights and squires (which staid still all this while and remoued not.)

First hir trumpets set forward, being twelue in number, beside two kettledrums on horsebacke; then followed the kings trumpeters, then the kings coun-cellors, then the gentlemen of the priue chamber, after them the gentlemen of hir graces countrie in rotes of beluet, and all on great horses. When the maior of London with the yongest baron, then all the barons: next them the bishops, then the earles, with whom rode the earles of Duerstein and Wal-dec hir countmen, then the dukes of Suffolke and Suffolke, and the archbishop of Canturburie, and duke Phillip of Banier: next followed the ambassadors, then the lord priue seale, and the lord chancellour, then the lord marquesse Dorset that bare the sword; next followed the king himselfe equalie riding with the ladie Anne, and behind him rode sir Anthonie Browne with the kings horse of estate, as yee haue heard, and behind him rode sir John Doble master of his horses, leading hir spare horse traped in rich tisse downe to the ground; after them followed hensmen and pages of honor.

Then followed the ladie Margaret Douglas, the ladie marquesse Dorset, the dutches of Richmond and Suffolke, the countesses of Rutland and Hertford, and other countesses. Then came hir chariot in which she had rid all hir iourne, well carued and gilt with the armes of hir countrie curiously wrought & couered with cloth of gold, all the horses were trapped with blacke beluet, and on them rode pages of honor, in which chariot rode two ancient ladies of hir countrie: next after the chariot, followed sir ladies and gentlewomen of hir countrie verie beautifull and richlie apparellled, and with them rode sir ladies of England. Then followed an other chariot, gilt and furnished, then ten English ladies, and next them an other chariot couered with blacke cloth, and therein rode foure gentlewomen that were hir chamberers. Then followed all the remnant of the ladies, gentlewomen and damosels in great number: and last of all came an other chariot all blacke, with three launders appertaining to hir grace; next after followed an hostler of cloth of gold and crimsin beluet vpon beluet paled, with horses trapt accordinglie, which the king had sent to hir. Then followed the seruicemen of hir traine, all clothed in blacke, mounted on great horses, euerie one in due place and decent order, so that it was verie magnificall and more than princelie brauerie that then was exhibited to the beholders eyes, as the poet saith:

Cernitur hic plusquam regia pompa comes.

In this order they rode through the ranks and through the parke, till they came at the late friers wall, where all men alighted except the king, the two maisters of the horse, and the hensmen, which rode to the hall doore, & the ladies rode to the court gate, & as they passed, they might behold on the wharfe, how the citizens of London were rowing vp and downe on the Thames right before them, euerie craft with his barge garnished with banners, flags, streamers, pencels, and targets, painted and beateen with the kings armes, some with hir armes, and some with the armes of their craft and mystrie.

There was also a barge called the bachelors barke, richlie decked, on the which waited a foist that shot great peeces of artillerie, and in euerie barge was great store of instruments of diuerse sorts, and men and children singing and plaing altogether, as the king and the ladie Anne passed by on the wharfe.
When the king and she were within the bitter court, they alighted from their horses, and the king louing-lie imbraced hir, kissed hir, & bad hir welcome to hir stone, leading hir by the left arme through the hall, which was furnished beneath the harth with the gard and about the harth with the fiftie pensioners, with their battell ares; and so the king brought hir vp to hir priue chamber, where he left hir for that time.
Alone as the king and she were entered the court, a great peale of artillerie was shot off from the tower of Greenwich, and there about.

come with in the parke (as before ye haue heard) then all the horsemen on Blackheath brake their arate, and had licence to depart to London or otherwhere to their lodgings.

On the tuesday following, being the daie of the Epiphanie, the mariage was solemnized betwixt the king and the said ladie. She was fetched from hir chamber by the lords, so that she going betwene the earle of Duerstaine, and the grand master Holcon-der, which had the conduct and order to see the mariage performed, she passed through the kings chamber & all the lords before hir, till she came into the galle-rie, where the king was readie, stateng for hir, to whom she made three low obeisances and courtesies.
Then the archbishop of Canturburie received them, and married them together, and the earle of Duer-staine did giue hir. When the mariage was celebrate they went hand in hand into the kings closet, and there hearing masse, offered their tapers, and after masse was ended, they had wine and spices. And that done, the king departed to his chamber, and all the ladies waited on hir to hir chamber, the duke of Norfolke going on hir right hand, and the duke of Suffolke on hir left.

After nine of the clocke, the king having shifted his apparell, came to his closet, & the likewise in hir came to hir closet with hir sargeant at armes, & all hir officers before hir like a queene, & so the king and she went openlie in procession, and offered and dined together. After they had supped together, there were bankets and maskes, and diuerse sports shewed, till time came, that it pleased the king and hir to take rest. On the sundaye after were kept solenne tussis, which greatly contented the strangers. This daie she was apparellled after the English manner, with a French hood, which became hir exceeding well.

and ladies which had giuen their attendance on hir and intertained of the king and other of the nobles, they toke leaue, and had great gifts giuen to them; both in monie and plate, and so returned toward their countrie, leaving behind them the erle of Wal-decke, and diuerse gentlemen and damoels to re-maine with hir, till she were better acquainted in the realme.

ships shot off, and likewise from the towre, a great peale of ordinance went off lustilie. The twelue of Februarye, the duke of Norfolke was sent in amintertained, and in the end of the same moneth he re-parish church.

After Christmas, the priorie church of S. Marie Magneries in Southwiche was purchased of the king by the inhabitants of the Borow, W. Gardner bishop of Winchester putting to his helping hand: they made thereof a parish church, and the little church of Marie Magdalen joining to the same priorie, was made all one church, and saint Margarets in Southwiche a parish, was admitted to the same parish.

Erle of Essex
deceased.

The twelue of March, Henrie Bourcher erle of Essex riding a porig horse, was cast, & brake his necke, at his manour in Essex: he was the eldest erle in England. The nineteenth of March, John Clerc erle of Oxford, high chamberleine of England, deceased at his manour in Essex. The tenth of April, sir Willam Peterston priest, late commissarie of Celis, and sir William Richardson priest of S. Maries in Ca-lis, were both there beheaded, hanged, and quartered in the market place for denieng obstinatelie the kings supremacie.]

The thirde sundaye in Lent, one doctor Barnes preached at Paules crosse, and in his sermon inuicighed against the bishop of Winchester, for doctrine by him preached in the same place, the first sundaye of that Lent, intracating of iustificacion. Among other taunts that Barnes offered against the bishop, this was one, that if he & the bishop were both at Rome, he knew that great sums of monie would not save his life, where but for the bishop, there was no great feare, but by all intreatance would serue. The bishop offended herewith, complained of Barnes to the la, and had him examined, & at length by the kings commandement he came to the bishops house, where the matter was so handled at this time, that Barnes with two other preachers, the one named Hierome, and the other Garret (of whom hereafter more shall be said) were appointed to preach at S. Maries spittle by London in the Easter weeke. In that sermon which Barnes made before all the people, he asked the bishop forgiveness, for speaking so irreuerentlie of him in his former sermon, and required the bishop (if he did forgive him) in token thereof to hold by his hand, which like as it was long before he did, so (as manie thought afterward) it was but a signed forgiveness.

The twelue of April began a parlement, and sir Nicholas Hare was restored to the office of speaker, who together with sir Humfrey Wolborne knight, and William Cornesbie esquier, the thre and twentieth of Februarye last past, had bin called before the lords into the Star chamber, for being of counsell with sir John Shelton knight, in making a fraudulent will of his lands, to the hinderance of the kings prerogative, and contrarie to the statute of Anno 27, for the which offense they were all at that time dismissed of their offices and seruices to the king, and the two knights were immediatlie sent to the tower, and three daies after Cornesbie was committed thither also. They remained there in ward about ten daies, and were then deliuered. Sir Humfrey Wolborne was the kings sargeant at law, sir Nicholas Hare was one of the kings counsellors, and speaker of the parlement, who being then depeined, was now againe thereto restored. William Cornesbie was attorneye of the dutchie of Lancaster. In this par-lement, were frelie granted without contraditions, foure shires and a subside of two shillings of lands, and twelue pence of goods, toward the kings great charges of making Bulwikes.

The eighteenth of April at Westminster was Thomas lord Cromwell created earle of Essex, and ordained great chamberleine of England; which office the earles of Oxford were wont ener to enioie; also Gregorie his sonne was made lord Cromwell.

The foure and twentieth of April, Thomas lord Audley, & chancelor of England, with sir Anthoine Wolborne, master of the kings horses, were made knights of the right honourable order of the garter.
On Paiesdaie, was a great triumph of iusting at Westminster, which iustis had bene proclaimed in France, Flanders, Scotland, and Spaine, for all commers that would, against the challengers of England; which were, sir John Audley, sir Thomas Belmer, sir Thomas Pointings, sir George Carew knights, Anthoine Kingston, and Richard Cromwell esquiers, which said challengers came into the lists that daie richlie apparellled, and their horses trapped all in white beluet, with certeine knights and gentlemen riding afoze them, apparellled all in white veluet, and white farlenet, and all their servants in white dublets, and hozen cut after the Burgonion fashion: and there came to iust against them the said daie, of defendants fortye fir, the earle of Surrie being the foremost, lord William Howard, lord Clinton, and lord Cromwell, sonne and heite to Thomas Cromwell earle of Essex, and chamberleine of England, with other, which were richlie apparelled.

And that day, sir John Dunleie was overthorne in the field, by mischance of his horse, by one master Jerome defendant, neuerthelesse he brake diuerse speares balliantlie after that. And after the said iusts were done, the said challengers rode to Durham place, where they kept open household, and feasted the king and quene, with hir ladies, and all the court. The second of Maie, Anthonte Kingston & Richard Cromwell were made knights at the said place. The third of Maie, the said challengers did tournie on horsebacke with swords, & against them came nine and twentie defendants; sir John Dunleie, and the earle of Surrie running first, who in the first course lost both their gantlets: and that daie, sir Richard Cromwell overthrew master Palmer in the field off his horse, to the great honor of the challengers. On the fift of Maie, the said challengers fought on foot at the barriers, and against them came thirtie defendants, which fought balliantlie: but sir Richard Cromwell overthrew that daie at the barriers master Calpeper in the field.

The said challengers brake by their household, after they had kept open hospitalitie, and feasted the king, quene, and all the lords, beside all the knights and burgeses of the common house in time of the parlement, and the maiors, aldermen, and all their wiues to their no small honor, though great expense. In the parlement which began the eighteenth of April last past, the religion of saint Johns in England, commonlie called the order of knights of the Rhodes, was dissolued; & on the ascension day, being the fift of Maie, sir William Welleson knight, prior of saint Johns departed this life for thought (as was reported) which he toke to the heart, after he heard of that dissolution of his order. & For the king toke all the lands that belonged to that order into his hands, to the augmentation of his crowne, and gaue vnto euerie of the challengers above written for a reward of their balliantnesse, a hundred marks, and a house to dwell in of pearelie reuenues out of the said lands for euer.]

The same moneth were sent to the Tower doctor Samson, bishop of Chichester, and doctor Wilson, for releuing certeine traitorous persons: and for the same offense was one Richard Farmer, a grocer of London, a rich and welthie man, and of good estimation in the citie, committed to the Marshalsee, & after at Westminster hall arraigned, and atteinted in the premunire; so that he lost all his goods. & The ninth daie of Iulie, Thomas lord Cromwell, late made earle of Essex (as before you haue heard) being in the counsell chamber, was suddenlie apprehended & committed to the Tower of London: the which manie lamented, but more reioised, and spectallie such as either had bene religious men, or fauoured religious persons, for they banketed & triumphed together that night, manie wishing that that daie had bene seven yeares before; & some fearing that he should escape, although he were imprisoned, could not be merie.

Other who knew nothing but truth by him, both lamented him, and heartilie praised for him. But this is true, that of certeine of the cleargie he was detestable hated, and spectallie such as had borne swinge and by his means were put from it: for in deed he was a man that in all his doings seemed not to fauor anie kind of poperie, nor could not abide the smutting pride of some prelates, which briddable (whatsoeuer else was the cause of his death) did shorten his life, and procured the end that he was brought vnto: which was, that the nineteenth daie of the said moneth he was atteinted by parlement, and neuer came to his answer: which law manie reported that he caused first to be made, howbeit the plaine truth thereof I know not. The articles for which he died appeare in the records, where his attainder is written, which are too long here to be rehearsed; but to conclude he was there atteinted of heresse and high treason, and the eight & twentieth of Iulie was brought to the scaffold on the Tower hill, where he said these words following.

The words of the lord Cromwell spoken at his death.

I Am come hither to die, and not to purge my selfe, as may happen some thinke that I will, for if I should so doo, I were a verie bozetch and a miser. I am by the law condemned to die, and thanke my Lord God, that hath appointed me this death for mine offense. For since the time that I came to yeares of discretion I haue liued a sinner, and offended my Lord God, for the which I aske him hartilie forgiveness. And it is not unknowne to manie of you, that I haue bene a great trauelier in the world, and being but of a bale degree, was called to high estate. And since the time I came therevnto, I haue offended my prince, for the which I aske him hartilie forgiveness, and beseech you all to praie to God with me, that he will forgive me. O Father forgive me, O Sonne forgive me, O Holie ghost forgive me, O thre persons and one God forgive me. And now I praie you that be here, to beare me record, I die in the catholike faith, not doubting in anie article of my faith, no nor doubting in anie sacrament of the church. Manie haue slandered me, and reported that I haue bene a bearer of such as haue mainteined euill opinions, which is untrue: but I confesse, that like as God by his holie spirit dooth instruct vs in the truth, so the diuell is ready to seduce vs, and I haue bene seduced: but beare me witness, that I die in the catholike faith of the holie church, and I hartilie desire you to praie for the kings grace, that he may long liue with you in health and prosperitie, & after him that his sonne prince Edward, that goodlie tyme may long reigne ouer you. And once againe I desire you to praie for me, that so long as life remaineth in this flesh, I wauer nothing in my faith.

Then made he his praier, which was long, but not so long as goodlie and learned, and after committed his soule to the hands of God, and so patientlie suffered the stroke of the ax, by a ragged and butcherlie miser, which ill fauouredlie performed the office. This man being borne in Putneie, a village in Surreie by the Thames side, foure miles distant from London, was sonne to a Smith, after whose deceasse, his mother was married to a Shereman. But notwithstanding the basenesse of his birth and lacke

of the birth of Thomas Cromwell
and other circumstances.

lacke of maintenance was at the beginning (as it happeneth to manie others) a great let and hindrance for vertue to shew hir selfe: yet through a singular excellencie of wit, joined with an industrious diligence of mind, and helpe of knowledge, gathered by painefull trauell, and marking the courses of states and governments as well of his native countrie at home, as in foren parties abroad, he grew to such a sufficient ripenesse of understanding and skill, in ordering of weightie affaires, that he was thought apt and fit for anie rōme or office wher to he should be admitted.

Thomas Cromwell in most authority under the king.

Which being perceived of cardinall Wolseie, then archbishop of Yorke, he toke him into his service, and making him his solicitor, imploied him about businesse oftentimes of most importance, wherein he acquitted himselfe with such dexteritie, as answered alwaies the credit committed to him. After the cardinals fall; he was advanced to the kings service, behauing himselfe so aduisedlie in matters which he toke in hand, that within a small time he rose to high authoritie, and was admitted to be of the priue councill, bearing most rule of all other under the king, as partlie ye haue heard: so that by him it well appeared, that the excellencie of herofall vertues, which aduance men to fame and honoz, resteth not onelie in birth and blood, as a priuilege appropriate and alonely annexed vnto noble houses, but remaineth at the disposition of almighty God the giuer: disposer of all gifts, who raiseth the poore manie times from the basest degre, and setteth him vp with princes, according to the saying of Ecclesiastes:

Qui iacuit tetro quandoque in carcere vincit, Paria suis meritis regia sceptru tulit.

Peuerthelesse, concerning the lord Cromwell earle of Essex, if we shall consider his comming vp to such high degre of honoz as he attained vnto, we maie doubt whether there be cause more to maruell at his good fortune, or at his worthie and industrious demeanoz. But sith in the booke of Acts and Spontaneities ye maie find a sufficient discourse hereof, we need not to spend more time about it, saue onelie as master Fox hath trulie noted, such was his actiuitie and forward ripenesse of nature, so readie and pregnant of wit, so discret and well aduised in iudgement, so eloquent of tong, so faithfull and diligent in service, of such an incomparable memoize, so bold of stomach and hardie, and could do so well with his pen, that being conuerfant in the sight of men, he could not long continue vnelpied, nor yet vnprouted of fauoz and helpe of friends, to set him forward in place and office.

John Fox in the Acts and Spontaneities.

Thankfull he was and liberall, not forgetting benefits received, as by his great courtesie shewed to Frisicobald the Italian it well appeared: a fauourer of the poore in their suites, and readie to reloue them that were in danger to be oppressed by their mightie aduersaries: a fauourer of the gospel, and an enuie to the pride of prelates, verie stout, and not able well to put vp injuries, which wā him shewd enemies that ceased not (as was thought) to seeke his curethow, till at length they had brought to passe that they wished. Carefull he was for his seruants, and readie to do them good, so that fearing the thing which came to passe, he prouided well for the moze part of them, notwithstanding his fall. And thus much for the lord Cromwell. The moztow after Midsummer daie, the king caused the queene to remoue to Richmont, supposing it to be moze for hir health, and moze for hir pleasure.

The marriage betwixt the king and the ladie Anne of Cleue aduanced by lawfull.

The first of Iulie, certeine lords came downe into the nether house, & expresselie declared causes, for the which the kings marriage was not to be taken lawfull: & in conclusion, the matter was by the conuocation clarelie determined, that the king might lawfullie marrie where he would, and so might she. And thus were they clarelie binorsed, and by the parliament it was enacted, that she should be taken no more for queene, but called the ladie Anne of Cleue. In this yeare, the lord Leonard Greie, brother vnto Thomas marquisse Dorset, being the kings lieutenant in Ireland, was reuoked home, and vpon his comming to London was sent to the Tower. In Iulie the priue of Salernie, and the lord d'ois Da uola came into England to see the king, & after they were departed, Don Fredericks, marquisse of Padua, brother to the duke of Ferrara, the priue of Spacedonie, the marquisse of Terra d'onia, & monsieur de flagie, with other, came from the emperors court into England to see the king, the which on Marie Magdalens daie came to the court at Westminster, and after they had bene highlie feasted, and noble intertained, they were richlie rewarded as the other, and so departed.

The eight and twentieth of Iulie (as ye haue heard before) the lord Cromwell was beheaded, and likewise with him the lord Hungerford of Hertsford, who at the houre of his death seemed vnquiet, as manie iudged him rather in a frensie than otherwise: he suffered for buggerie. The thirteenth of Iulie were drawn on hurdels from the Tower to Smithfield, Robert Baris doctor of diuinitie, Thomas Garard, and William Jeron bachelors in diuinitie; Jeron was vicar of Stepnte, and Garard was person of Honie laie: also Dowell, Fetherston, and Abell priests. The first thre were drawn to a stake, there before set vp, and then burned. The other thre were drawn to the gallows, and hanged, beheaded and quartered. The thre first (as is found in their atteindoz) were executed for diuerse heresies, but none alledged, whereat (saith Hall) I haue much marvelled, that their heresies were so manie, and not one alledged as a speciall cause of their death. And verelie at their deaths they asked the shiriffs what was their offense for which they were condemned: Who answered, they could not tell: but most men said it was for preaching against the doctrine of Stephan Gardiner bishop of Winchester, who chiefe (as the same Hall saith) procured their deaths. The last thre, to wit, Dowell, Fetherston, and Abell, suffered for treason, as in their atteindoz was speciall mention made, to wit, for denieng the kings supremacie, and affirming his marriage with the ladie Katharin Dowager to be good.

The fourth of August, Thomas Empton some time a monke of Westminster, which had bene in prison for treason in Petogate now for the space of thre yeares and moze, came before the iudices of gaole deliuerie at Petogate, and for that he would not aske the kings pardon, nor be swozne to be true to him, his monks garment was plucked from his backe, and he repriued, till the king were informed of his malicious obstinacie: and this was the last monke that was scene in his clothing in England till queene Maries daies. The fourth of August were drawn from the Tower of London to Tiburne, Giles Heron gentleman, Clement Philpot gentleman, late of Calis, and servant to the lord Aile, Darbie Gerning, Edmund Windholme priest, chapleine to the said lord Aile, William Horne late a late brother of the Charterhouse of London, and an other offendo: which six persons were there hanged and quartered, and had bene atteindoz of treason by parliament. The same daie also was one Charles Carew gentleman hanged for robbing of the ladie Carew.

The eight of August was the ladie Katharine Howard neere to the duke of Norfolk, and daughter ter to the lord Edmund Howard thewed openlie as quene at Hampton court. The eleuenth of September a stranger was hanged in Apprehefeld, named James Rianatian, who had slaine his maister, one Capon a Florentine in a garden, for his harlot. In the latter end of this summer, was vniuersallie through the most parts of this realme great death by a strange kind of hot agues and aures, and some pestilence, in which season was such a drought, that wells and small riuers were cleane dried vp, so that much cattell died for lacke of water, and the Thames was so shallow, & the fresh water of so small strength that the salt water flowed aboue London brydge, till the raine had increased the fresh waters.

On the two and twentieth of September, Rafe Egerton, seruant to the lord Audley, lord chancellor, and one Thomas Harman seruant to one maister flightwood, were drawne, hanged, and quartered, the one for counterfeiting and antebating of the kings seale in a signet, wherewith he sealed licences for denizens, vnder the name of the clearkes of the chancerie: and the other, that is to saie Harman, for writing them. One Luckefield, being of their faction, robbed the lord Audleys chappell and fled, who being afterward apprehended at Calis, which towne he would haue betraied, he due himselfe with a dagger. In the end of this yeare, the French king made a strong castell at Ard, and also a brydge ouer into the English pale, which brydge the crew of Calis did beat downe, and the Frenchmen built it vp againe, but the Englishmen beat it downe againe. After this, the king sent about fiftene hundred workemen to fortifie the towne of Guisnes, and sent with them fise hundred men of warre to gard them.

It was reported in France, that a mightie armie was come ouer forth of England with great ordinance: which brate caused the French king to send to the frontiers of Picardie the duke of Anandome, and other capitains with all speed to defend the same. The king of England hearing thereof, sent the earles of Surrie, and Southampton, and the lord Russell, high admerall into the marches of Calis, to set order there, and after them he likewise sent two hundred light horsemen of the borders of Scotland, whom the Frenchmen called Stradiots. The lords hauing set order in things, thortlie returned. A boie, one Richard Spekins, not past fiftene yeares of age, was burnt in Smithfield, for speaking against the sacrament, and contrarie to the statute of the six articles. The bishop of London was thought in great fault, for procuring that terrible execution, seeing the yong fellow was but an ignorant sole without learning, and gladlie recanted that wherewith he was charged.

About the latter end of this yeare, doctor Samson bishop of Chichester, and doctor Willson, which had bene committed to the tower (as before ye haue heard) were now pardoned of the king, and set againe at libertie. In the beginning of this yeare, fise priests in Dorsetshire began a new rebellion, with the assent of one Leigh, a gentleman, and nine tempoall men, all which persons were apprehended, and in diuers places put to execution. The said Leigh and two other, the one named Waterfall a clothier, & the other Thojnton a peoman, on the seuententh of Maie, were drawne through London to Tiburne, and there executed. And sir John Hewill knight, and ten other persons, died for the same cause at Pothe. The same daie, Margaret countesse of Salisbury, that had remained a long time prisoner in the tower, was beheaded there within the tower. She was the last of the right line and name of Plantagenet. The ninth of June for example sake, two of the kings gard, the one named Dampoz, and the other Chapman, were hanged at Greenwich by the kiers wall, for robberies which they had committed.

On the tenth of June, sir Edmund Raneet knight, of Dorsetshire, was arraigned before the kings iustices (sitting in the great hall at Grene- wich) maister Coge, comptroller of the kings house, hold, maister Southwell, sir Anthonie Browne, sir Anthonie Winkelfield, maister Wrisleie, and Edmund Beckham, cofferer of the kings household, for striking of one maister Clerke of Dorsetshire, seruant with the earle of Surrie, within the kings house in the tenis court. There was first chosen to go vpon the said Edmund, a quest of gentlemen, and a quest of peomen, to inquite of the said strike, by the which in- quests he was found gilty, and had iudgement to lose his right hand. Wherevpon was called to do the execution, first the sergeant surgion with his instruments appertaining to his office: the sergeant of the woodyard with the mallet, and a blocke where- vpon the hand should lie: the maister cooke for the king, with the knife: the sergeant of the larder, to set the knife right on the ioint: the sergeant ferrer, with the searing irons to seare the veines: the sergeant of the poultrie, with a cocke, which cocke should haue his head smitten off vpon the same blocke, and with the same knife: the peoman of the chanzie, with seare cloths: the peoman of the skullerie, with a pan of fire to heate the irons, a chaser of water to cole the ends of the irons, and two fozmes for all officers to set their stiffe on: the sergeant of the cellar, with wine, ale, and here: the peoman of the peltrie in the sergeants tread, who was absent, with bason, ewer, and towels.

Thus euerie man in his office readie to do the execution, there was called forth sir William Pic- kerling knight marshall, to bring in the said Ed- mund Raneet: and when he was brought to the bar, the chiefe iustice declared to him his trespass, and the said Raneet confessing himselfe to be gilty, humbly submitted him to the kings mercie: for this offense he was not onelie indged to lose his hand, but also his bodie to remaine in prison, and his lands and goods at the kings pleasure. Then the said sir Ed- mund Raneet desired that the king of his benigne grace would pardon him of his right hand, and take the left, for (quoth he) if my right hand be spared, I maie hereafter do such good seruice to his grace, as shall please him to appoint. At this submission and request the iustices forthwith informed the king, who of his goodnesse, considering the gentle heart of the said Edmund, and the good report of the lords, gran- ted him his pardon, that he should lose neither hand, lauds, nor goods, but should go free at libertie.

The lord Leonard Greie being indicted of cer- teine points of treason by him committed, as was alledged against him, during the season that he was the kings lieutenant in Ireland, to wit, for deliue- ring his nephew Girald Fitzgerard brother vnto Thomas Fitzgerard before executed, and also for that he caused certeine Irishmen to invade the lands of the kings friends, whome he fauoured not: on the five and twentieth of June he was arraigned at Westminster in the kings bench, and appointed to be tried by knights, because he was a lord by name, and no lord of the parlement; but he discharged the iurie, and confessed the indictment, wherevpon he had iudgement, and on the eight and twentieth of June being saint Peters euen, he was beheaded at tower hill, where he ended his life verie quietlie and godlie.

This noble man as he was come of high linage, so was he a right valiant and hardie personage, ha- uing in his time done his prince and countrie good seruice, both in Ireland, France, and other pla- A a a a. j.

res, greatlie to his commendation, although now his hap was thus to lose his head, as conuicted by law, and his renowne (ouercast with a cloud of disgrace) banished, as future chances befell, to the abolishing of the present honoz which sometime he intored. Whobbeit, his estimation he might haue preserued unblemished, had prouident circumspection undertaken the direction of his doings, and that he had bozne his eyes in his forehead, to foresee all afterclaps, which a wise man will in no case neglect:

Nam sapiens in fronte oculos habet, omnia spectans, Omnia prudenti cum ratione videns.

The same daie that he suffered, there was erected at saint Thomas Waterings thre gentlemen, John Pantell, John Frotods, and George Kordon: they died for a murther committed in Suller (as their indictment imported) in companie of Thomas Fines lord Dacres of the south. The truth whereof was thus. The said lord Dacres, through the letw persuation of some of them, as hath bene reported, meaning to hunt in the parke of Nicholas Delham esquire at Laughton, in the same countie of Suller, being accompanied with the said Pantell, Frotods, and Kordon, John Chetrie and Thomas Illete gentlemen, Richard Middleton and John Goldwell yeomen, passed from his house of Hurkmonseur, the last of Aprill in the night season, toward the same parke, where they intended so to hunt; and coming vnto a place called Pikehaie in the parish of Hilinglesle, they found one John Busbyg, James Watbyg, and Richard Sumner standing together; and as it fell out through quarelling, there ensued a fraie betwixt the said lord Dacres and his companie on the one partie, and the said John and James Busbyg and Richard Sumner on the other: insomuch that the said John Busbyg receiued such hurt, that he died thereof the second of Maie next ensuing.

Wherevpon, as well the said lord Dacres as those that were there with him, and diuerse other likewise that were appointed to go an other waie to meet them at the said parke, were indicted of murther: and the seauen and twentieth of June the lord Dacres himselfe was arreigned before the lord Audleie of Walben then lord chancelloz, sitting that daie as high steward of England, with other pères of the realme about him, who then and there condemned the said lord Dacres to die for that transgression. And afterward the nine and twentieth of June being saint Peters daie, at eleuen of the clocke in the forenone, the shriffs of London, accordinglie as they were appointed, were readie at the towler to haue receiued the said prisoner, and him to haue lead to execution on the towler hill. But as the prisoner should come forth of the towler, one Heire a gentleman of the lord chancelloz house came, and in the kings name commanded to fraie the execution till two of the clocke in the afternone, which caused manie to thinke that the king would haue granted his pardon. But neuerthelesse, at thre of the clocke in the same afternone, he was brought forth of the towler, and deliuered to the shriffs, who lead him on foot betwixt them vnto Tiburne, where he died. His bodie was buried in the church of saint Sepulchers. He was not past foure and twentie yeres of age, when he came through this great mishap to his end, for whome manie fore lamented, and likewise for the other thre gentlemen, Pantell, Frotods, and Kordon. But for the sad yong lord, being a right towardlie gentleman, and such a one, as manie had conceiued great hope of better pzoofe, no small mone and lamentation was made; the more indeed, for that it was thought he was induced to attempt such follie, which occasioned his death, by some light brads that were then about him.

The first of Iulie a Welchman a minstrell was hanged and quartered for singing of songs, which were interpreted to be prophetes against the king. This summer the king toke his progresse to Poike, and passed through Lincolnshire, where was made to him an humble submission by the temporalitie, and confessing their faults, they humbly thanked him for his pardon, which he had granted them. The towne of Stanfords gaue to him twentie pounds, the cite of Lincoln fortie pounds, Boston fiftie pounds, that part of the shire which is called Lindsey gaue thre hundred pounds, and Kesteven and the church of Lincoln presented him with fiftie pounds. At his entring into Dorsetshire, he was met with two hundred gentlemen of the same shire, in coates of beluet, and foure thousand tall yeomen and serving men well horsed, which on their knees made their submission, by the mouth of sir Robert Botwes, and gaue to the king nine hundred pounds. On Barnetdale the archbishop of Poike, with thre hundred priests and more met the king, and making a like submission, gaue to him six hundred pounds. The like submission was made by the maiors of Poike, Newcastle, and Hull, and ech of them gaue to the king an hundred pounds.

After he had bene at Poike twelue daies, he came to Hull, where he deuised certeine fortifications. This done, he passed ouer the water of Hamber, and so through Lincolnshire, returned toward the south parts, and at Alhallowen tide came to Hampton court. About the same time, the king had knowledge that the quene liued dissolute, in vsing the vnlawfull companie of one Francis Diram, with whome she had bene so familiar before hir maralage with the king; & not meaning to forgo his companie now in time of hir marriage, without regard had either to the feare of God, or the king hir husband, the last summer being in progresse with the king at Domfret, the seuen and twentieth of August, he retained the said Francis Diram in hir seruice, to the intent she might vse his companie in such vnlawfull sort the more frelie: and not satisfied with him, she also vied the vnlawfull companie of Thomas Culpeper esquire, one of the gentlemen of the kings priue chamber, as well at Domfret as of old on the nine and twentieth and last of August as of old said, and on the first of September, as at diuerse other times and places before and after. Wherevpon, the thirtieth of Nouember, sir Thomas Wriothesle knight the kings secretarie, came to Hampton court vnto the said quene, and called all hir ladies, gentlewomen, and seruants into hir great chamber, & there openlie in presence of them all, declared hir offenses committed in abusing of hir bodie before hir marriage, & therewith he discharged hir household. The morrow after she was conuicted to Sion, the ladie Watton and certeine gentlewomen and some of hir seruants being appointed to wait vpon hir there, till the kings pleasure might be further knowne. Culpeper, Diram, and others were had to the towler. Diram in his examination being charged with the familiaritie which had bene betwixt them, before she was married to the king, confessed that he and the said quene had made a precontract together, and that he concealed it for hir preferment in marriage to the king, after he understood the king began to cast a li king towards hir.

The first of December, Culpeper and Diram were arreigned at the Guildhall in London, before the lord maioz sitting there in iudgement as chiefe iudge, hauing the lord chancelloz vpon his right hand, and the duke of Suffolke vpon his left hand, the duke of Suffolke the lord priue seale, the earles of Suller and Hereford, with diuerse other of the council councell sitting there as Iudges in commission that daie: the prisoners in the end confessed the indictment, and had Iudgement to die, as in cases of treason.

The tenth of December, the said Culpeper and Diram were drawn from the tower unto Tyburne and there Culpeper had his head stricken off, and Diram was hanged, dismembred and headed. Culpeper's bodie was buried in S. Sepulchers church, but both their heads were set on London bridge. The two and twentieth of December were arraigned in the kings bench at Westminster, the ladie Margaret Howard, wife to the lord William Howard, Katharine Tilneye, & Alice Kestwold gentlewomen, Joane Bulmer, wife to Anthoine Bulmer gentleman, Anne Howard, wife to Henrie Howard esquier, and brother to the late queene, Maiein Tilneye widow, Margaret Benet, wife to John Benet gentleman, Edward Malgraue gentleman, William Ashbie gentleman; all these were condemned of misprision of treason, for concealing the queenes misdeemeanour. And the same daie in the afternone, the lord William Howard, and Dampson a gentleman were likewise arraigned, and condemned of the same offense, and as well these as the other were adjudged to lose their goods, & the profits of their lands during life, and to remaine in perpetuall prison.

The firste of Januarie the parlement began at Westminster, in the which the lords and commons exhibited certeine petitions to the king. First, that he would not vex himselfe with the queenes offense, and that he and the ladie Rochford might be attained by parlement: and to avoid protracting of time, they besought him to give his roiall assent thereto, under his great seale, without stateng for the end of the parlement. Also, that Diram and Culpeper be soe attained by the common law, might also be attained by parlement, & that Agnes duchess of Norfolk, and Katharine countesse of Widdewater his daughter, which for concealing the said offense, were committed to the towre, and indicted of misprision, & the lord William Howard arraigned of the same, might likewise be attained. Also, that who soever had spoken or done anie thing in detestation of his naughtie life, should be pardoned.

To these petitions the king granted, thanking the commons, for that it appeared they took his griefe to be theirs: whereupon the queene and the ladie Rochford were attained by both the houses. On the tenth of Februarye, the queene was conveyed from Sion to the towre by water, the duke of Suffolke, the lord priuie seale, and the lord great chamberleine, having the conduction of hir. The next daie after being Saturdaye, and the eleventh of Februarye, the king did send his roiall assent by his great seale, and then all the lords were in their robes, and the common house called by, & there the act was read, and his assent declared. And so on the thirteenth daie, those two ladies were beheaded on the greene within the towre with an ax, where they confessed their offenses, and died repentant.

Before this, on the three and twentieth daie of Januarie was the king proclaimed king of Ireland, as it was enacted both by authoritie of the parlement here, and also of an other parlement holden at Dublin in Ireland, there begun the thirteenth of June last past, before sir Anthoine Saintleger knight, and the kings deputie there, where as till that time the kings of England were onlie intituled lords of Ireland. In the beginning of March died sir Arthur Plantagenet vicount Lisle, bastard sonne to Edward the fourth, in the towre of London unattainted, when he should haue bene deliuered and set at libertie.

The occasion of his trouble for the which he was committed to the towre, rose upon suspicion that he should be priuie to a practise, which some of his men (as Hilipot and Bindholme executed the last yeare as before ye haue heard) had consented vnto, for the betraying of Calis to the French, whilste he was the kings lieutenant there. But after that by due trial it was knowne that he was nothing guiltie to the matter, the king appointed sir Thomas Wriotheslie his maiesties secretaire, to go vnto him, and to deliuer to him a ring, with a rich diamond for a token from him, & to will him to be of good cheere. For although in that so weightie a matter, he would not haue done lesse to him if he had bene his owne son; yet now upon through trial had, sith it was manifestly proued that he was void of all offense, he was soze that he had bene occasioned so farre to trie his truth: and therefore willed him to be of good cheere and comfort, for he should find that he would make accompt of him as of his most true and faithfull kinsman, and not onelie restore him to his former libertie, but otherwise soze he readie to pleasure him in what he could. After secretaire set forth this message with such effectuall words, as he was an eloquent and well spoken man, that the lord Lisle took such immoderate ioy thereof, that his hart being oppressed therewith, he died the night following through too much reioicing. After his decesse, the twelue of the same moneth of March, sir John Aubeleie sonne and heire to the said lord Lises wife, was at Westminster created vicount Lisle. The seuenteenth of March one Margaret Danie a yong woman, being a seruant, was boyled in Smithfield for poisoning of hir mistres with whome she dwelt, and diuerse other persons.

In the Lent season, whilste the parlement yet continued, one George Ferrers gentleman, seruant to the king, being elected a burgesse for the towne of Blimmouth in the countie of Deuonshire, in going to the parlement house, was arrested in London by a procelle out of the Kings bench, at the sute of one White, for the sum of two hundred markes or thereabouts, wherein he was late afoze condemned, as a suertie for the debt of one Welbon of Salisburie: which arrest being signified to sir Thomas Spolls knight, then speaker of the parlement, and to the knights and burgesse there, order was taken, that the sargeant of the parlement, called S. John, should forthwith repaire to the counter in Widdestreet (whither the said Ferrers was caried) and there demand deliuerie of the prisoner.

The sargeant (as he had in charge) went to the counter, and declared to the clerks there what he had in commandement. But they and other officers of the citie were so farre from obeyeng the said commandement, as after manie stout words they forcibly resisted the said sargeant, whereof ensued a frays within the counter gates, betwene the said Ferrers and the said officers, not without hurt of either part: so that the said sargeant was dynen to defend himselfe with his mace of armes, & had the crowne thereof broken by bearing off a stroke, and his man stricken downe. During this brawl, the shiriffes of London, called Rotoland Wyll, and Henrie Snelkiffe came thither, to whome the sargeant complained of this iniurie, and required of them the deliuerie of the said burgesse, as afoze. But they hearing with their officers, made little accompt either of his complaint or of his message, reiecting the same contemptuously, with much proud language, so as the sargeant was forced to returne without the prisoner, whereas if they had obeyed authoritie, and shewed the seruice necessarilie required in their office and person, they might by their discretion haue appeased

The occasion of sir Arthur Plantagenets trouble.

The lord Lisle took such immoderate ioy thereof.

George Ferrers a burgesse of the parlement arrested, and what mischief ensued.

The shiriffes and officers denied the deliuerie of the burgesse.

all the houle, for wisdometh the outrage & unrefrainable furiousnes of war, as the poet saith: Instrumenta feri vincit sapientia belli.

The sargeant thus hardlie intreated, made returne to the parlement houle, and finding the speaker, and all the burgesses set in their places, declared unto them the whole case as it fell, who took the same in so ill part, that they altogether (of whom there were not a few, as well of the kings private counsell, as also of his private chamber) would sit no longer without their burgess, but rose up whole, and repaired to the upper houle, where the whole case was declared by the mouth of the speaker, before sir Thomas Andle knight then lord chancelor of England, and all the lords and iudges there assembled, who iudging the contempt to be verie great, referred the punishment thereof to the order of the common houle. They returning to their places againe, upon new debate of the case, took order, that their sargeant should estowies repaire to the shiriffe of London, and require deliverte of the said burgesse, without anie writ or warrant had for the same, but onelie as afore.

And yet the lord chancelor offered there to grant a writ, which they of the common houle refused, being in a clere opinion, that all commandements and other acts of proceeding from the nether houle, were to be done and executed by their sargeant without writ, onelie by shew of his mace, which was his warrant. But before the sargeants returne into London, the shiriffes having intelligence how heinouslie the matter was taken, became somewhat more mild, so as upon the said second demand, they delivured the prisoner without anie deniall. But the sargeant having then further in commandement from those of the nether houle, charged the said shiriffes to appeere personallie on the morrow, by eight of the cloche before the speaker in the nether houle, and to bring thither the clerks of the counter, and such officers as were parties to the said affraie, and in like manner to take into his custodie the said White, which wittinglie procured the said arrest, in contempt of the privilege of the parlement.

Which commandement being done by the said sargeant accordingly, on the morrow the two shiriffes, with one of the clerks of the counter (which was the chiefe occasion of the said affraie) together with the said White, appeared in the common houle, where the speaker charging them with their contempt and misdemeanors afore said, they were compelled to make immediat answer, without being admitted to anie counsell. Albeit, sir Roger Cholmeleite, then recorder of London, and other of the counsell of the citie there present, offered to speake in the cause, which were all put to silence, and none suffered to speake, but the parties themselves: whereupon in conclusion, the said shiriffes and the same White, were committed to the Tower of London, and the said clerke (which was the occasion of the affraie) to a place there called litle ease, and the officer of London which did the arrest, called Tallow, with foure other officers to Pelugate, where they remained from the eight & twentieth untill the thirtieth of March, and then they were delivured, not without humble sute made by the mayor of London & other their friends.

And for so much as the said Ferrers being in execution upon a condemnation of debt, and set at large by privilege of parlement, was not by law to be brought againe into execution, and so the partie with out remedie for his debt, as well against him as his principall debtor; after long debate of the same by the space of nine or ten daies together, at last they resolved upon an act of parlement to be made, and to reuise the execution of the said debt against the said Melben which was principall debtor, and to discharge the said Ferrers. But before this came to passe, the common houle was divided upon the question: howbeit in conclusion, the act passed for the said Ferrers, twine by fourtene voices.

The king then being advertised of all this proceeding, called immediatlie before him the lord chancelor of England and his iudges, with the speaker of the parlement, and other of the grauest persons of the nether houle, to whom he declared his opinion to this effect. First commending their wisdomes in maintaining the privileges of their houle (which he would not haue to be infringed in anie point) he alleged that he being head of the parlement, and attending in his owne person upon the business thereof, ought in reason to haue privilege for him and all his servants attending there upon him. So that if the said Ferrers had bene no burgesse, but onlie his servant, yet in respect thereof he was to haue the privilege as well as anie other.

For I understand (quoth he) that you not onelie for your owne persons, but also for your necessarie servants, even to your cookes and housekeepers, inioie the said privilege; in so much as my lord chancelor here present hath informed us, that he being speaker of the parlement, the coke of the Temple was arrested in London, and in execution upon a statute of the staple. And for so much as the said coke, during all the parlement, served the speaker in that office, he was taken out of execution, by the privilege of the parlement. And further we be informed by our iudges, that we at no time stand so highlie in our estate roiall, as in the time of parlement, wherein we as head, and you as members, are consoined and knit together into one bodie politike, so as whatfoever offense or iniurie (during that time) is offered to the meaneest member of the houle, is to be iudged as done against our person, and the whole court of parlement. Which prerogative of the court is so great (as our learned counsell informeth us) as all our and processes comming out of anie other inferior courts must for the time cease and giue place to the highest.

And touching the partie, it was a great presumption in him, knowing our servant to be one of this houle, and being warned thereof before, would nevertheless prosecute this matter out of time, and thereupon was well worthy to haue lost his debt (which I would not wish) and therefore do commend your equitie, that hauing lost the same by law, haue restored him to the same against him who was his debtor. And if it be well considered, what a charge hath it bene to us and you all, not onelie in expence of our substance, but also in losse of time, which should haue bene imployed about the affaires of our realme, to sit here twelue or one whole fortnight about this one private case, he may thinke himselfe better used than his desert. And this may be a good example to other to learne good maners, & not to attempt anie thing against the privilege of this court, but to take their time better. This is mine opinion, and if I erre, I must referre my selfe to the iudgement of our iustices here present, and other learned in our lawes.

Whereupon sir Edm. Spontacote lord chiefe iustice, verie grauelie told his opinion, confirming by diuers reasons all that the king had said, which was asserted unto by all the residue, none speaking to the contrary. The act in deed passed not the higher houle, for the lords had not time to consider of it, by reason of the dissolution of the parlement, the feast of Easter then approaching. Because this case hath bene diuerslie reported, and is commonlie alleged as a precedent for the privilege of the parlement; I haue endeavored my selfe to learne the truth thereof, and so set it ing to their instructions, who ought best both to know and remember it.

This yeare in Spaine the king took a lode of mo-nie of all such as were valued at fiftie pounds and upward in the subsidie booke. The lord priuie seale, the bishop of Winchester, sir John Baker, and sir Thomas Wriothesley were commissioners about this lode in London, where they so handled the matter, that of some head citizens they obtained a thousand markes in prest to the kings vse. They that laid forth anie summe in this wise, had priuie scales for the repayment thereof within two yeares next insu-ing. Diuerse of the Irish nobilitie came this yeare into England, and made their submission to the king as in the Irish chronicle it is more particularlie touched. Also wars fell out betwixt England and Scotland, the causes whereof (as appereth by a declaration set forth by the king of England at this present) in effect were these. First there were diuerse of the English rebels, such as had moued the commotion in the north and Lincolnshire, that fled into Scotland, and were there maintained: and although request had bene made that they might be deliuered, yet it would not be granted.

Moreover, where the king of Scots had promised to repaire vnto Poike the last yeare, and there to meet his uncle the king of England, whereupon the king of England to his great charges had made preparation for their meeting there; the same was not onlie disappointed, but also at the kings being at Poike, in lieu thereof an inuasion was made by the Scots, as it was in contempt and despite of the king of England, who notwithstanding imputing the default of meeting to the aduise of his nephues councell, and the inuasion to the lewdnesse of his subjects, was contented to giue courteous audience vnto such ambassadozs as the same king of Scots sent into England, which came to the king at Christmas last, and with manie sweet and pleasant wordes excused that which was done amisse, & sought to persuade kindnesse and perfect amitie in time to come. And for the better accomplishment thereof, they offered to send commissioners to the borders, there to determine the debate betwixt them of the confines, if it would please the king likewise to send commissioners for his part, which to doe he grationlike condescended, desirous to make triall of his nephue in some correspondence of deeds, to the faire and pleasant messages in wordes which he had receined from him.

Whereupon commissioners were sent from either king, the which met and talked. But where the Englishmen chalenged a peece of ground, vndoubtedlie biurped by the Scots, being for the same shewed such euidence as more substantiall, or more autentike can not be brought forth for anie ground within the realme; the same was neuertheless by the Scots denied and reiected, onlie for that it was made (as they alleged) by Englishmen, and yet was it so ancient, as it could not be counterfeited now, and the value of the ground so little, and of so small weight, as no man would attempt to falsifie a writing for such a matter. But yet this deniall notwithstanding, the English commissioners departed from the Sco-tish commissioners as friends, taking order, as hath bene accustomed, for good rule vpon the borders in the meane time to be obserued.

After their departure, the lord Sparwell warden of the west marches in Scotland, made proclamation in deed for good rule to be kept: but neuertheless added therewith, that the borderers of Scotland shuld withstand their goods from the borders of England, and incontinentlie after the Scottish borderers, on the fourth of Iulie entered into England suddenlie, & spoiled the kings subjects, contrarie to the league, and euen after the plaine maner of warre. Where-vpon the king of England greatlie maruelling, was driuen to furnish his borders with a garrison for defense of the same, as mistrusting a further mis-chiefe intended by the enimie, whose treacherie & loose dealing became a whetstone to the kings wrath, and set him in a heat of indignation, as the poet saith:

Iam Scotus Henrici instam irritauerat iram Faciisq.

Then was James Leirmouth master of the Sco-tish kings household sent into England with letters deuised in the best maner, offering a good redress of all attempts: and yet neuertheless at the entrie of the said Leirmouth into England, a great number of Scots then not looked for, made a rode into England, to the great annoiance of the English borders, which dealing, though it much moued the king of England to take displeasure against the Scots, yet he gaue gentle audience to Leirmouth at his com-ming vnto him, and by his faire wordes and promises was partlie pacified. But in the meane time, the deeds of the Scottish borderers were as extreme as might be. And in a rode made by sir Robert Wolues for reuenge thereof, the same sir Robert, and manie other with him, were taken prisoners, and could not be deliuered, nor admitted to paie their fine and ransome, as hath bene euer accustomed betwixt them on the borders.

And where at the same time, an assurance was made on both sides for a season, at the sute of the said Leirmouth, the Scots ceased not to make sundrie inuasions into England, in such wise, as the king no longer trusting to their faire wordes, but weleing their deeds, put an armie in a readinesse for defense of his subjects, as the due meane to attaine such a peace, as for the safetie of his people and dominions, he thought it stood with his honour to procure.
After which preparation made, and knowledge thereof had, the king of Scots made new sute to haue the matter taken vp by treatie. Whereupon the king caused the armie to staie about Poike, and appointed the duke of Suffolke his lieutenant generall, the lord priuie seale, the bishop of Durham, & sir Anthonie Wolone master of his houses, to treat & conclude with the ambassadozs of Scotland some friendlie peace, vpon reasonable and indifferent conditions, as should be thought requisite, for the a-uoiding of warres, than by sundrie inuasions of the Scots made open and manifest. But after they had viewed ech others commissions, and began to propone articles, the Scottish commissioners to protract time, at the first seemed to like such articles as the English commissioners had proponed, and made semblance as if there were no doubt, but that in case their king & ours might meet, all matters shuld be quietlie compounded and ended: and so taking it as for a thing sure and certeine, they onlie desired six daies to obtaine answer from their master, and our armie for that time to staie: wherevnto the English commissioners accorded.

After those six daies was sent a commission out of Scotland, to conclude a meeting precise, at such a place as they knew well could not in the winter season be obserued nor kept. Wherewith when the English commissioners seemed nothing content, the Scottish commissioners shewed forth instructions, wherein libertie was giuen to them to errede their commission in the appointing of a place, & to consent to anie other by the English commissioners thought meet and conuenient. But when the English commissioners refused to deale with men wanting sufficient commission to warrant their doings, the Scottish

lish commissioners required other six daies respite, to send for a larger commission, which being granted, at the end of those six daies, they brought forth a commission made in good forme, and without exception or restraint of place: but therewith they shewed instructions containing a like restraint, as in the former commission was expressed. And thus differing forth the matter by trifling, upon purpose onlie to win time, they hoped thereby through the winter comming on, that the English armie should not be able much to annoie their countrey for that year. And so their talke brake by without any conclusion of agreement at all; and forthwith was the armie set forward, a good part whereof had lien all this time of the treatie in Porke, and in the countreies thereabouts.

The English armie entirely into Scotland.

When the whole power was assembled, the duke of Norfolk then lieutenant generall, accompanied with the earles of Sheshburie, Derby, Cumberland, Surreie, Hertford, Angus, Rutland, and the lords of the north parts, and sir Anthoine Browne master of the houses, sir John Cage controller of the kings house, and others, having with them twentie thousand men well and warlike appointed, entred Scotland the one and twentieth of October, and tarried there eight daies, without hauing any battell offered vnto them, in which space they burnt these townes and villages, Darton, Kamrige, Stine, Cradin, Shilles, lang Conem, Newton, Skittshell, Newborne, Smellem spittle, the two Herdens, Sledericke, and the two Worlawes, Floris, and the Faire croft, Conem spittle, Korbrough, Kellscie and the abbete, long Spzonstow, Kiden, and Hadenston. For they had determined with fire and sword to take vttter reuenge, crying out, as the poet saith;

Vindice ferro opus esse, opus esse & vindice flamma, Acclamant omnes.

Now while the duke was at Farnton, the fourth daie after his comming into Scotland, there came to speake with him halfe a mile into the campe, the bishop of Orkenele, and James Leirmouth sent from the king of Scots to intreat of peace, but they agreed not. Finally, after the Englishmen had lien so long within Scotland as they might recouer vittels, at length for necessitie they returned to Berwick. In all which iourneie the standard of the earle of Southampton, late lord prinie seale (which died at Newcastell before their entring into Scotland) was borne in the foreward, because he was appointed captaine of the same.

The earle of Southampton, late lord prinie seale.

The king of Scots, hearing that the English armie was returned, raised a power of fiftene thousand men forth of all parts of his realme, vnder the guiding of the lord Sparwell (or rather of Oliver Sinclair, as the Scots affirme) boasting to carrie as long in England, as the duke of Norfolk had tarried in Scotland. And so on fridaie being saint Katharins euen, they passed ouer the water of Cleke, and burnt certeine houses of the Greues on the berie border. Thomas bassard Dacres, with Iacke of Pulgrau sent word to sir Thomas Wharton lord Warden for the king vpon the west marches, to come forward to succour them. But in the meane while the Scots entring verie fierclie, the aforesaid two valiant captaines, bassard Dacres and Pulgrau, manfullie set vpon the Scots with one hundred light horses, and left a skale on the side of a hill, wherewith the Scots were wonderfullie dismayed, thinking that either the duke of Norfolk with his whole armie had bene come to those west marches, or that some other great power had bene comming against them, when they saw onlie sir Thomas Wharton with three hundred men marching forward toward them. But so it fortuneed at that time undoubtedlie, as God would haue it, that the Scots fled at the first brunt; whome the Englishmen followed, and took prisoners at their pleasure; for there was small resistance, or none at all shewed by the Scots.

Amongst others that were taken, we find these men of name, the earle of Caill and Glencarne, the lord Sparwell admirall of Scotland, and warden of the west marches, the lord Fleuning, the lord Sumerwell, the lord Olphant, the lord Greie, sir Oliver Sinclair the kings minion, John Kellie lord of Oragie, Robert Crislin son to the lord Crislin, Carre lord of Breddon, the lord Sparwell's two nephews, John Kellie bassard son to the earle of Rothes, George Hume lord of Hermiton, John Spauland lord of White castell, James Pringell, James Sinclair brother to Oliver Sinclair, John Carnell captaine of Craisforth, Patrike Hebborne esquire, John Seton esquire son in law to the lord Crislin, William Seton esquire, John Stewart cousin to the king, John Sparrowe esquire, Heurie Dowmont esquire, James Pitton esquire, John Carmurth esquire captaine of Craisforth, James Pitton esquire, and other esquires and gentlemen (beside the earles and lords before mentioned) to the number of two hundred and above, and more than eight hundred other persons of meaner calling; so that some one Englishman, yea some women had three or foure prisoners. They took also foure and twentie peeces of ordinance, foure carts laden with speares, and ten paulions, with other things of price; so that this might well be said to be the handie worke of God; and the verse of the psalme verified:

Contemplans dixi, Haec est militum dextra Numinis excelsi mortalia cuncta gubernans.

The king of Scots took such griefe and inward thought for his ouerthrow, and also for the murder of an English herald that was slaine at Dunbar, by one Lech an Englishman (the which for the rebellion in Lincolnshire was fled into Scotland) that he fell into a hot ague, and thereof died, although manie reported that he was at the bickering, and recovered there his death wound, and fled therewith into Scotland. But of his death, and of the birth of his daughter ye may see more in the historie of Scotland.

Of these prisoners before named, one and twentie of them were brought to London, and on the nineteenth of December entred into the citie by Bishops gate, and so were conueied to the tower, where they remained for the space of two daies: and vpon saint Thomas daie the apostle, being the one and twentieth of December, they were conueied to Westminster, sir John Cage constable of the tower riding before them, and the lieutenant of the same tower riding behind them. They rode two and two together, and eight of them being earls and lords, had new gowns of blacke damaske furred with blacke conie, cotes of blacke veluet, and doublets of sattin, with shirts and other apparell bought new for them at the kings charges.

Thus being solemnlie conueied through the streets of London vnto Westminster, they came before the counsell sitting in the Star chamber, and there the lord chancelor declared to them their vntrath, unkindnesse, and false dissimulation, declaring further how the king had cause of war against them, both for denieng of their homages, and also for their traitorous invasions made into his realme without defiance, and for keeping his subjects prisoners without redemption, contrarie to the ancient laws of the marches; for which doings, God (as they might perceiue) had scourged them. Wherewith the king more regarding his honor than his princelie power, was was content to shew them kindnesse for bakind-nesse, and right for wrong. And although he might keepe them in strett prison by iust law of armes, yet he was content that they should haue libertie to be with the nobles of his realme in their houses, and so according to their estates, they were appointed to dukes, earles, bishops, knights, and gentlemen, which so interteined them, that they confessed themselues neuer to be better bled, nor to haue had greater chere in all their life times.

The earle of Caills was appointed to be with the archbishop of Canturburie, the earle of Glencarne with the duke of Norfolke, the lord Fleming with the lord priue seale, the lord Sparwell with sir Antho-sir Edward North, the lord Greie, James Scheler, and John Lisle, were appointed to men of such credit, as were thought meet to answer for their safe keeping.

The two and twentieth of December, tidings came of the king of Scots death, and upon S. Johns daie in Christmas weeke the foresaid lords of Scotland were brought to the court, which was then at Orcenwich, where they had great chere, and went before the king to the chappell, and were lodged with in the court. Hereupon ye must consider, that where as the king of Scots had left no issue behind him in life but onelie one daughter, the king and his coun-cell perceiving a meane now offered, whereby without waere the two realmes might be united, these Scottish lords hauing first made the motion themselues, for a marriage to be had betwixt prince Edward and their young queene, the king required their helpe unto the furtherance of that matter, which might be a great benefitt to themselves and their coun-trie. This they promised faithfullie to do, and aswell by themselves as by their friends, to bring the same to effect, so much as the king could require. Whereupon the king was not onelie contented to release them home, but also highlie rewarded them with rich and costlie gifts of sundrie sorts, in most bountifull wise, as Anglorum prelia notet verie uell, sateng:

Præterea ex auro captiuos torquibus ornat,

Et sumptum, vestes, argentum donat et aurum.

34. 35.

The thirtieth of December they departed from the court, and the morrow after, eight of them dined with sir John Cotes then lord maior of London, and the rest with the shiriffes, and had verie great chere. On Newyears daie they departed from London homewards towards Scotland, and rode to Enfield to see the prince, and there dined that day, greatlie reioicing, as by their words and countenance it seemed, to behold so proper and towarlike an impe. From thence they kept on their iournie till they came to the north parts, where they found the duke of Suffolke the kings lieutenant there, and with him remained till such pledges were come forth of Scotland, as it was couenanted they should leane behind them.

The duke then after he had receiued the hostages, permitted them to depart, and so they returned into Scotland, where they were gladlie welcomed by their kinsmen and friends. With them went also the earle of Angus, who had bene banished Scotland, and hauing remained here in England a long time, receiued of the kings fee, a thousand marks by yeare; and likewise his brother sir George Douglas, who had five hundred marks yearelie likewise of the kings gift. They were now both restored home into their countie, and that (as was said) by the kings last will. The said earle of Angus, and diuerse of the lords that had bene prisoners here in England, were made of the priue councill of the realme by the earle of Araine, that was chosen gouernour to the young queene, and of the realme, as next better appoint: notwithstanding that the archbishop of saint Andrews, and cardinal of the see of Rome, came and sett vnto the king of England for the popes cause (and partly set on by the French king) had for-gea will, expelling how the king had made him gouernour (associated with two earles of his affinitie) as well of the queene as realme, contrarie to the lawes of Scotland. Whereupon the said earle of Ar-aine, according to his right (as he pretended) with the helpe of his friends, tooke upon him the au-thoritie of gouernour, and put the said cardinal in prison, and deliuered sir Robert Bowes, and the other English prisoners, by their bonds, according to the custome of the marches.

All this yeare was neither perfect peace nor open waere betwixt England and France, but the merchants ships were taken and robbed on both parts, and at length merchants goods were seized, and the ambassadoes of both realmes staied. Howbeit, shortlie after the ambassadoes were deliuered: but the merchants still were robbed, and no waere proclaimed. In the end of this yeare came from the go-uernour of Scotland as ambassadoes, sir William Hamilton, and James Leirmouth the secretarie of Scotland, whose message was so meane like, that they were faine to send an herald into Scotland for other ambassadoes, and so came hither the earle of Glencarne, and sir George Douglas: but what foruer their answer was, sir George returned in post, and within twentie daies came backe againe with an answer that was well liked of. But shortlie after they brake promise, and went from that which they had couenanted, greatlie to their reproch.

Woad was sold verie deare in the winter season of this yeare, and likewise bittels both flesh and fish grew to an high price towards the spring, by reason (as was thought) of the vntemperate wet summer last past, causing great death among cattell. A quarter of mutton was sold for two shillings, or seuen grotes, a lambe at three shillings, or three and foure pence, which afore that time was esteemed scarce worth sixteen pence. Against Easter at a court of aldermen kept in the Guildhall the twentieth of March 1542, it was enacted by the lord maior and his brethren, that the maior and shiriffes should be serued at their tables but with one course at dinner and supper in their houses; the maior to haue but seuen di-shes at the most at one messe for his owne table, and the shiriffes and euerie other alderman but six dishes, upon paine to forfeit for euerie dish fortie shillings at euerie time when they offended in this ordinance.
Also that the fargeants and peomen of their houses should haue but three dishes at dinner or supper, the swordbearers messe onlie excepted, which should be allowed to haue one dish more. It was also enacted, that from the feast of Easter then next ensuing, neither the maior nor his brethren should buie anie crane, swan, or bussard, upon paine to forfeit for eu-rie foule by them so bought, twentie shillings, the offense to be tried by oth, if it should be presented.

king and the emperor at Hampton court, either of them to be friends to the others friends, and enemies to the others enemies. ¶ In this yeare also a proclamation was made, whereby the people were licensed to eat white meats in Lent, but straitly forbidden the eating of flesh. Whereupon shortly after the earle of Surrie, with diuerse lords, knights, and gentlemen, were imprisoned for eating of flesh in the same Lent, contrarie to the said proclamation. The eight of Maie, one Leech, sometimes bailie of Louth, who had killed Summerfet one of our heralds of armes at Dunbar in Scotland, was hanged to Tiburne, and there hanged and quartered. And the twelfth of June, Edward Leech his brother, and with him a priest, for the same fact were likewise executed at Tiburne.

This yeare the first cast pieces of iron that ever were made in England, were made at Buckstead in Suffex, by Rafe Hoge, and Peter Walde. The third of June came to the court from the realme of Ireland, thre Irish lords, Dyrin, Macke William a Burgh, and Macke Gilpatrick. In Iulie the said Dyrin was created earle of Downon, Macke William a Burgh earle of Claunrickford, and sir Dunon Dyrin was made baron of Chankie, and so with rewards they toke leave and returned. The same moneth also, the Scottish ambassadoers returned with great rewards. The twelfth of Iulie, at Hampton court, the king married the ladie Katharine Dar, widow, late wife unto the lord Latimer deceased, and then she was nominated quene, and so proclaimed.

In the parliament holden this yeare at Westminster, a subsidie was granted to the king, to be paid in thre yeares. Euerie Englishman being worth in goods twentie shillings & upward to five pounds, paid foure pence of euerie pound. From five pounds to ten pounds, eight pence. From ten pounds to twentie pounds, sixtene pence. From twentie pounds and upward, of euerie pound two shillings. Strangers as well denizens as other, being inhabitants, doubled this summe: and euerie stranger not being an inhabitant, that was sixtene years of age and upward, paid foure pence for euerie poll. And for lands, fees, and annuities, euerie one borne within the kings dominions, paid eight pence of the pound, from twentie shillings to five pounds. And from five pounds to ten pounds, sixtene pence. From ten pounds to twentie pounds, two shillings. And from twentie pounds and upward, thre shillings; strangers still doubling this summe. The cleargie granted a subsidie of six shillings the pound, to be paid of their benefices in perpetuities in thre yeares ensuing: and euerie priest hauing no perpetuities, but an annuall stipend, paid yearelie (during the said thre yeares) six shillings and eight pence.

About the same time, the king and the emperor sent Carter and Tolson Do. kings at armes, to demand the performance of certaine articles of the French king, which if he denied, they were commanded then to desie him, but he would not suffer them to come within his land, so they returned. Whereupon the king caused the said demands to be declared to the French ambassadoer at Westminster. And in Iulie the king sent ouer sir Thos. men, under the leading of sir John Mallop, appointed to haue the generall conduction of them, accompanied with diuerse other knights, esquires and gentlemen right hardie and valiant. Sir Thomas Selmer was marshall of that armie, sir Robert Wolves treasurer, sir Richard Cromwell capteine of the footmen, and sir George Carew his lieutenant. There were likewise sir Thomas Palmer, sir John Keinsforth, sir

John saint John, and sir John Gascoigne, knights, that were capteines of the footmen. They were appointed to ioin with the emperours power, and so to make warre into France. They departed from Calis the two and twentieth of Iulie. The third of August open warre was proclaimed in London betwixt the emperor and the king of England on the one part, and the French king on the other, as enemy mortall to them both, and to all other christian princes beside, as he that had confederated himselfe with the Turke.

The armie that was sent ouer under the leading of sir John Mallop, passed south from the marches of Calis, and keeping alongst betwixt the borders of the French and Burgonion pales and confines, and joining with the emperours forces, Spaniards, Wallons, and Dutch, came at length before Landerseie, a towne latelie fortified by the French, within the borders of the emperours dominions, to the which they laid a strong siege. At length the emperor hauing dispatched his wars against the duke of Cleue, who had submitted himselfe unto him, came now to the siege of Landerseie, with a mightie power of sundrie nations, so that the towne was sore constrained and in danger to haue bene lost, if at that present the French king had not likewise with an huge armie of Frenchmen, Switzers, Lantiquenets, Italians, and others, come to the rescue, pitching downe his campe, making countenance as if he ment presentlie to giue battell: and verelie it was thought that two such powers as were there at that time so nere together, should neuer haue departed without battell. The emperor thinking surelie to fight, raised his siege, and drew his people into the field. The Frenchmen thereby espying their auantage, put as well fresh men as vittells, and all kind of munition necessarie into the towne, and in the meane while kept the emperours people occupied with hot skirmishes.

But now after the towne was thus releued, which thing the French king onelie wished to accomplish, the next daie when the emperor was readie with his armie ranged in battell to haue fought with his aduersaries, the French king put his armie also in order, but hauing no mind to come forward, he trilled south that daie, and in the night following, secretlie departed with as much haste as was possible. When the next morning had discovered the Frenchmens flight (for manie so termed this their sudden retire) it was no need to bid diuerse troops of the emperours armie to hie after them: but some made too much haste, for the French king suspecting what would ensue, appointed his eldest sonne Henrie the Dolphin to remaine behind with the reterward, accompanied with diuerse noble capteins, which ordered their people in their retire with such warinesse and heedfull skill, as the reason of warre required, that such of the emperours campe as adventured ouer rashlie, and shewed themselves more forward than wise, fell within danger of such ambushments as were by the waie couertlie laid in places of auantage: and so diuerse were taken, as sir George Carew, sir Thomas Palmer knight porter of Calis, Edward Bellingham, and others. But neuertheless a great number of such Frenchmen as could not make waie, and keepe pale with their maine troops, were snapped up, slaine, and taken in no small numbers by their enemies, who followed them as egre as tigers, and as the describer of that pursute saith:

his campe and licenced the most part of his people to depart home into their countreies, for all hope to win Landerseie at that time was cleane cut off, sith it was vittelled and newlie furnished with fresh men and munition. After that the warres were once open betwixt England and France, sundrie enterprises were attempted by the parties on either side in the marches of Calis and Bullognois, in which, for the most part, the Englishmen got the vpper hand of their enemies.

At one time the Frenchmen, to the number of eight hundred, comming in the night season to enter into the English pale by the turne pike at Hammes, in purpose to make some spoile in the countrie there, were assailed upon the sudden by sir George Sumner, and sir William Walgraue, latelie before come ouer with two hundred men out of Suffolke, to strengthen the English pale against the enemies, and at this time did behaue themselves so valiantlie, that they disappointed the enemies of their purpose. 20 For whereas they were entered into a lane inclosed with hedges on either side, sir Gene archers getting into the grounds on the backe side of the hedges lying alongst the lane, through which the Frenchmen were marching, placed the rafelues as they saw their advantage, and so beset their shot, that they galled the Frenchmen in such wise, that they were forced to recule in so great disorder, that other of the Englishmen comming upon them, easilie slue and took of them no small number.

Beside this, at sundrie times the Englishmen invading the countrie of Bullognois, walled the towne and villages, brought awaie great botties of goods and cattell, to the great impouerishing of the countrie. They burnt at one time the towne of Audinghen, and took the steeple of the church there, into the which were fled sir score pezzants with their wives and children, whome the Englishmen threw downe headlong out of the steeple, because they had most stubbornele refused to yeld. In this yeare a 40 great death of the pestilence reigned in London, and therefore Michellmasse terme was adourned to St. Albons, and there kept till the end thereof. The eighteenth of December the archbishop of Canturburies palace at Canturburie was burnt, and therein was burnt his brother in law, and other men.

In Christmasse weeke came to the king lieng at Hampton court, Ferdinando Gonzaga viceroy of Sicillie, prince of Palseta, duke of Juano, the emperours capteine generall. The chiefest cause of his comming was, to appoint what time the emperours armie should be readie to invade France. He had great chere, and at his departure was rewarded with a hundred and fiftie thre ounces of gold in plate, and foure thousand and thre ounces in guilt plate, all verie curiously wrought, and all the time of his being here, his charges were borne by the king. The sundrie before Christmas, the lord William Par brother to the quene, who had married the daughter & heire of Henrie Bourchier erle of Essex, at Hampton court was created earle of Essex, & sir 60 Will. Par knight uncle to them both, was made lord Par of Hoxton, & chamberleine to the quene.

On ffele yeares daie, was sir Thomas Wriotheslie the kings secretarie made lord Wriotheslie of Wichefeld. 1544 This yeare chanced foure eclipses, one of the sunne the fourteenth of Januarie, and thre of the moone. On the seventh of March, Germaine Gardner, and Larke person of Chesseie were executed at Tiburne, for denieng the kings supremacie, & with whom was executed for other offenses one Simgleston. And shortly after Albete was likewise executed for the supremacie. In this yeare sir John Allen (who had bin twice maior of London, & of coun-cell to the king) departing out of this life, did give to the citie of London a rich collar of gold, to be worn by the maior: which collar was first worn by sir William Lorton on St. Edwards daie, to the election of the new maior, who gave to everie ward in London twentie pounds to be distributed to the poore houtholders, besides to one hundred and twentie persons, thre score men everie of them a gowne of hyde cloth, and a blacke cap, and thre score women, to everie of them a gowne of the like cloth, and a white kerchiefe. Humfreis Bonmouth, and John Cotes which were thirtees in his maiestie, in the beginning of their yeare put awaie twelve large- 10 ants and twelve peomen, till they were forced by a court of common counsell to take them againe.

Shiriffes put officers.

In this meane while was the cardinal of Scotland delivred forth of prison, and shortly after got into his hands againe all such conclusions as were made touching the marriage betwixt the quene of Scots and prince Edward, procuring in maner all the lords and nobles of the realme to renounce that which they had promised to the king of England, as well bluerle of those whome the said king had released home out of captivitie, as others. Therewith the king took such fore displeasure, that he prepared an armie to passe into Scotland by sea, and ordered the lord Edward Seimer, earle of Hertford to be lieutenant of the north parts, and to have the leading of the same armie: who went thither in March, as well 30 for defense of the borders, as to foresee all things in order for the armie that should thus go into Scotland, whereof he was appointed generall.

The earle of

the north.

When all things were in a readinesse for the navie which was rigged to set forward towards Scotland, and that the soldiers were come which were appointed to go with sir John Dudley lord Lisle, and high admerall of England in that voyage, they were embarked, and so the two and twentieth of March the said lord admerall, with sir Nicholas Pointz, and divers other knights and capteins departed from the port of London towards the north parts; and coming to Newcastle, found the earle of Hertford ready 40 with such power as was appointed to be there at a daie assigned, forth of those countreies that lie from Trent northwards. And now wanted nothing to further their iourne, but a convenient wind; which caused them to staie certeine daies at the said towne of Newcastle, and in the villages thereabouts.

After that the earle of Hertford, and the lord admerall, accompanied with the earle of Shrewesburie, the lords Cobham, Clinton, Counters, Skinton, the lord William Howard, and manie other right valiant knights, gentlemen, and capteines, had lien with the armie and manie readie at Newcastle a certeine time, looking for a prosperous wind to set forward on their purposed iourne, at length the same came about verie fit to serve their turne, and then with all speed the soldiers were bestowed aboard, everie companie in their appointed vessels: and here 60 with by went the sailes, and forth they got into the maine seas, making their course directlie towards the Forth, a gulfe or river in Scotland, able to beate vessels fiftie miles by within the countrie. There were at the least two hundred sailes which the lord admerall had caused to come together, according to his commission, rigged, trimmed, and furnished with all things necessarie for the conduction of such an armie, esteemed to be about ten thousand men.

order of warre, marched on towards the said towne of Litch. The lord admerall led the foreward, the lord lieutenant the battell, and the earle of Shrewsburie governed the reereward. Before they came to the towne of Litch, they found in their waie readie to impeach their passage sir thousand horsemen beside footmen. At the first the Scots made towards the Englishmen, as if they had ment to set upon the forward; but being manfully assailed by the batquebutters, five hundred in number, and shewdly by them curried and galled, they had no mind to come forward, but perceiving how willing the Englishmen were to encounter with them, after certeine shot on both sides, they made a sudden retreat, and leaving their artillerie behind them, they fled to Edinburgh.

The first man that fled (as the talke went) was the cardinal, who perceiving the deuotion which the Englishmen had to his holinesse, had no mind to followe him. With him also fled the gouernour, the earles of Huntley, Murray, and Bothwell: as for their soldiers, they were disparted, and feared the English forces as the lambe doth the wolfe, the doe the dog, or the hart the lion: to vse the words of Anglorum praelia berie fitly describing this battell, and saying:

The Englishmen thus hauing put their enemies to flight, & seized upon their artillerie, made straight to the towne of Litch, and entered it without any great resistance, wherein they incamped themselves the same night to their most ease and aduantage, and afterwards landed their vittels and great artillerie. They found also in this towne such plenty of riches as they looked not to haue found in any one towne of Scotland.

The first of Maie they went towards Edinburgh, and as they approached nere the towne, the prouost of the same towne accompanied with one or two burgesses, and two or three officers at armes, desired to speake with the kings lieutenant, and in the name of all the towne, said that the heies of the towne should be deliuered unto his lordship, conditionally that they might go with bag & baggage, and the towne to be saved from fire. Whereunto answer was made by the said lord lieutenant, that where the Scots had so manifestly broken their promises confirmed by oaths and seales, and certified by the whole parliament, as was euidently knowne to the world, he was sent thither by the kings highnesse to take vengeance of their detestable falschood, to declare and shew the force of his highnesse sword to all such as should make any resistance unto his graces power sent thither for that purpose. And therefore he told them resolutely, that unless they would yeld by their towne franke without condition, and cause man, woman, and child, to issue forth into the fields, submitting them to his will and pleasure, he would put them to the sword, and their towne to the fire. The prouost answered it were better to stand to their defense.

Whereupon charge was given to the said prouost and officer at armes, upon their perill to depart. And forthwith the lord lieutenant sent to the forward, commanding that they should march towards the towne, which right hardily they did, and the English gunners manfully assailed the gates; namely sir Christopher Poince master of the ordinance, in such sort that the Scots were beaten from their ordinance, and the gate called Canogate beaten open with shot of the great artillerie, and there with the Englishmen entering the same gate by fine force, beat downe & slew a great number of Scots, and continually without tarrying was the great ordinance beaten by the great to the castell gates: but those that were within the castell shot so freely at the Englishmen thus approaching with their great artillerie, that diuerse were slaine, the artillerie of the castell beat so direly alongest the high street, as the Englishmen came by the same. At length also one of the Englishmens culuerings was stricken, and dismounted, and thereupon they were forced to retire backe and giue ouer their enterprise of making batterie to the castell, wanting pioners, baskets, and other things necessarie for such a purpose.

This daie the Englishmen set fire in diuerse parts of the towne, but they had not leasure to mainteine it, by reason of the smoke rising and troubling them so extremly, that no great hurt could be done that daie, for that the night also came on, and so they departed backe againe to their campe at Litch. But the next daie, a certeine number of Englishmen vnder the leading of doctor Leigh, went againe to Edinburgh, and did what they could, vntill they destroyed the whole towne with fire, and so continued all that daie & the two daies next following. During all this violence offered by the English to the enemy, & nothing left but despaire of life, the women and children beholding this desolation, made such outrageous exclamations and woofull lamentations, that heauen it selfe rang with their noise, as berie pittie is described by Chr. O. in his report, saying:

Femine! sexu gemitis ad sidera grandis Tolluntur strepitus, puerorum clamor in auribus, Nil nisi trisle fuit, facieque miserrima rerum.

In the meane time, foure thousand light horsemen, vnder the leading of the lord Evers, came from our borders, as order was taken afore, and joined themselves with the armie thus lying in Litch, where after their comming, they did such exploits, in riding and waiking the countrey, that within fouen miles euery waie of Edinburgh, they left few places, either pile, village, or house vnburnt. And beside this, they brought great numbers of cattell daile into the armie, and met with much good stuffe, which the inhabitants of Edinburgh had for the safetie of the same conueied out of the towne.

The names of the knights made at Litch after the burning of Edinburgh by the earle of Hertford, gouernor of the kings armie there, on sundae the eleuenth of Maie, in the six & thirtieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, in the yeare 1544, as they were deliuered to me by sir Gilbert Deshike knight, alias Carter, king of armes, are as followeth: The lord Clinton, the lord Coners, sir William Wroughton, sir Thomas Holcroft, sir Edward Dorell, sir John Luttrell, sir John Fenins, sir Thomas Waterton, sir Charles Howard, sir George Blunt, sir Peter Dewtas, sir Edward Warner, sir Rafe Bulmer, sir Hugh Cholmeleie, sir Thomas Leigh, alias doctor Leigh, sir Richard Leigh, sir Peter Leigh, sir John Leigh of Both, sir Lawrence Smith, sir William Maunslour, sir Richard Shirburne, sir Robert Stapleton, sir Thomas Holt, sir William Danenport, sir Rafe Leicester, sir Humfrie Baddorne, sir Thomas Halliuerie, sir Francis Bothome, sir John Galle, sir Leonard Beckwith, sir Thomas Cokaine, sir Peter Freshwell, sir Richard Egerton, sir Anthoine Penill, sir John Penill, sir William Katchiffe, sir George Wolues, sir Brian Bereton, sir William Bereton, sir Roger Bereton, sir Edward Warren, sir Brian Leiton, sir Robert Warfeleie, sir Thomas Talbot, sir Hugh Caluerleie, sir John Clerc, sir Richard Holland, sir Thomas Menables, sir John Constable, sir Edmund Trafford, sir John Aberton, sir Richard Cholmeleie, sir Philip Egerton, sir Hugh Willoughbie, sir Thomas Constable, sir William Woodhouse, sir Edmund Sanage, and sir Thomas Gerard.

downe the piers of the haven of Liff, and burnt everie sickle of it. This done, and having shipped their great artillerie, and taken forth all such Scottis ships as were meet to serve, appointing them to attend on their ships, they took upon them to returne home by land. Amongst other ships which the Englishmen had in Liff haven, there were two of notable fairenesse, the one called the Salamander, given by the French king at the marriage of his daughter into Scotland, the other called the Christome, made by the said Scottis king. The ballast of these two ships was cannon shot which they found in the rowne, to the number of foure score thousand. The rest of the Scottis ships being taken away together with their owne ships, which they brought with them, were for the moze part possessed with the spoile and booties of the said ships and their crewes. On the fifteenth of Aprill, their armie and their fleet departed from Liff both in one booke, the towne being set on fire and burned to the ground.

The English armie incamped that night at a place called Seaton, seven miles from Liff, where they burnt the castell, and destroyed the orchards and gardens with the moze despite, for that the lord Seaton owner of the place, was the chiefe laborer to helpe the lord cardinal out of prison. The same daie was Haddington burnt, with a great nurrie and house of friers there. The next night they incamped beside Dunbar, where they had an alarm given them, but in the morning they burnt the towne of Dunbar, and marched forth, though somewhat staid by the waite, by reason of the mist and fog, which was verie thicke, continuing all the forenoon, and because also they understood how the lords of Seton & Hume with the lord of Bouclough, and others, had assembled a power of men of warre, and were minded to impeach their passage at a streit named the Pease.

But after that the mist brake up, which was about two of the clocke in the afternone, the Englishmen came forthward, and passed the same streit without any resistance, for the Scottis lords perceiving that they were not of power sufficient to encounter with the Englishmen, minded not to put their people in their danger, but wiselie retired, suffering the Englishmen to passe at their pleasure, who that night lodged at Kanton, eight miles distant from our borders, where having overthowne a pile which stood there, they dislodged the next morrow, and the same daie being the eighteenth of Aprill, they entered into Berwick: so ending their voyage with great tole and gladnesse, not having lost past forty persons in all this tourne.

The names of the chiefe townes, castles, and places burned in this voyage, were these: the burrow and towne of Edinburgh, with the abbey called holicood house, and the kings palace adjoining to the same. The towne of Liff burnt, and the haven and piers destroyed, the castle and village of Cragmiller, the abbey of Helybottle, part of Hufkelburow towne, with the chappell of our ladie of Lauret, Preston towne and the castell, Seton castell, Haddington towne, with the friers and nurrie, a castell of Duner Sinclers, the towne of Dunbar, Lanrethton with the grange, Dilat, Wester crag, Cunderligh, the pile, and the towne, Broughton, Thesler fields, Crawnab, Wodiston, Stan house, the ficket, Beruerton, Cranent, Shenston, Parkle, Trappen, Kirkland hill, Hatherwike, Belton, east Barnes, Botoland, Butterden, Nickelwood, Blackeburne, Kanton, Bilde and the Tower, Kirkcubine, faint apnes, the quenes ferrie, part of Petin Maines, and the burnt island, were burned by the fleet on the sea. For during the continuance of the armie at Liff, the ships laie not idle, but scowling the river, burnt diverse places, and left neither ship, craier, nor bote belonging to ante village, towne, crake, or haven, upon either side of the fowd, betwene Sterling, and the mouth of the river, unburned, or brought awaie, which space containeth fiftie miles in length. About the same time the earle of Lenox fled out of Scotland into the rebine of England, where he was right gladlie received by king Henrie, and shortly he obtained in marriage the ladie Marie Dologlas, neere to the king of England, and returned some after into Scotland by sea, accompanied with a good competent crewe of English. But finding no such friendship among his countrie men as he looked to have done, he was constrained to returne without attaining the enterprize which he had taken in hand, in hope of such assistance by his friends, as now failed him at need.

In the moneth of Aprill proclamation was made for the inhancing of gold to eight & forty shillings, & silver foure shillings the ounce. Also the lb. caused to be coined hafe monie, which was since that time called dovine, the first yeare of Edward the first, and called in the second of quene Elizabeth. In the same moneth also passed through the cite of London in warlike maner, to the number of seaven hundred Irishmen, having for their weapons, darts, and handguns, with bagpipes before them: and in faint James parke besides Westminster they mustered before the king. In June the letanie or procession was set forth in English, with commandement by the king to be generallie used in parish churches. About the same time that the armie before remembred, was set forward into Scotland under the guiding of the earle of Hertford, as before ye have heard, the king by advice of his counsell took order for the levieing of a nightie armie, to passe over into France, according to the appointment taken with his confederate, friend and colleague, the emperor, against the French king, at that present common aduersarie to them both, and not long before had entered in leagus with the Turks, as Ch. Oc. noteth:

Iunxerat, heu nimium res est indigna relatu, Christicolam facere hoc, qui religionis amanti Se proficiens, titulum pietatis vendidit orbi.*

There were appointed three battels, the forward under the leading of the duke of Norfolk, the battell under the guiding of the duke of Suffolke, which also was reckoned to be the kings battell, because his maiestie ment to be present with the same in person, and the reere-ward was led by the lord Russell lord priute seale. Those of the fore-ward were appareled in blew cotes garbed with red, and had caps and hosen after the same sute, partie blue and partie red, their caps made fit for their sculs, which were put in to the same. The battell in cotes, caps, and hosen, after the like fashon, but their colours were red and yello.

The duke of Norfolk and the lord priute seale, accompanied with diverse other noble men, as the earle of Surreie sonne to the said duke of Norfolk, marshall of the field, the earle of Arford, the lord Crete of Milton lieutenant of Hammes, whose name even then began to grow famous, the lord Ferrers of Charteleie, and sir Richard Deucreur his sonne and heire, that brought with them a great number of Welshmen, sir Thomas Cheint lord warden of the cinque ports, the lord Mountioie a forwardlie yong gentleman, well learned, and for his time perfect in all points and qualities fit for a noble man, sir Francis Bizian knight, one of the kings priute chamber, and no lesse affectioned to his service, than of him favoured and well esteemed, sir Thomas Poinings capitaine of Guilnes, and diverse others others beside, no lesse woorthie to be remembered for their valure and merits, if time would permit to tel hearse them; passed over to Calis about Whitsun tide, and from thence marching forward to France, left Bullongne on their right hand, & keeping forth towards Puttrel, joined with an armie which the emperor had raised for that purpose, under the leading of the countie de Buren, admerall of the low countries, and so these armies being united in one, came before Puttrel, and there laid siege to that towne, being well manned and furnished with all things necessarie for defense, as well in vittels as munition. The chiefe captaine of which towne was monsieur de Biez, one of the marshalls of France, and gouverneur also in the absence of monsieur de Glandoune of Picardie, who being within Bullongne & hearing how the English armie was passed by, and drew towards Puttrel, he left Bullongne, and with all speed got him into Puttrel, not mistrusting anie thing of that policie which the king of England went about, which was, to send this armie to besiege Puttrel, to the end the Frenchmen might be kept occupied further off, while he with the residue of his power should come and besiege Bullongne, which towne standing most commodious for his purpose, he went by force to bring under his subiection.

Whereupon was the duke of Suffolke appointed with the kings armie to passe over, accompanied with the earle of Arundell marshall of the field, the lord saint John, and the bishop of Winchester, sir John Cope comptroller of the kings house, sir Anthony Browne maister of the kings horse, with diuerse other woorthie captaines, all which the nineteenth of Julie came before Bullongne, incamped on the east side of the said towne aloft upon the hill, and after for his more safetie removed into a vallie, where after manie sharpe skirmishes they first entered the base towne, being left and forsaken by the inhabitants, which hauing set fire on their fishing nets, and other such baggage, under couert of the smoke, got them vp into the high towne, before the Englishmen could espie them. After this, the old man, otherwise called Le tour d'ordre, standing without the towne for a direction to them that were to enter the hauen, and now being kept by sirène souldiers, was yielded by by them, upon presenting the canon before it.

The Frenchmen within the towne, being despoiled of those two places, yet spared not to shot off from their wallles and bulwokes, doing what damage they might deuise, and namelie from the castle and grène bulwoke they did much hurt to the Englishmen with their shot, whereof they made no spare, till at length they were forced to be quiet: for the Englishmen so applied them with such plentie of their shot, that the Frenchmen had no oportunitie to do them anie great hurt with their artillerie. The fourteenth of Julie, the king in person, accompanied with diuers of the nobilitie, passed the seas from Dover to Calis; and the six and twentieth of the same moneth incamped himselfe before Bullongne on the north side, within lesse than thre quarters of a mile of the towne, where he remained, till the towne was surrendered into his hands. The king being then in campe, it was a matter of ease to discerne which was he, for none of the rest came nere him in tallnesse by the head: as for his proportion of lims, it was answerable to his godlie stature and making: a memorabile description whereof, as also of his artificall armour, I find reported as followeth:

Rex capite Henricum reliquos supereminet omnes, Heros præualidus sen fortia brachia pectus, Sensuras quas fuluo opifex incluserat auro, Sine virile ducis præstanti pectore corpus, Nulla vi domitum, nullo penetrabile ferro, &c.

Beside the trenches which were cast, and brought in manner round about the towne, there was a mount raised upon the east side, and diuerse peeces of artillerie planted aloft on the same, the which together with the mosten peeces, was directed from within, & battered to the top the steeple of our ladies church. To conclude: the batterie was made in most forcible wise in those several places, and the wallles, towers, and castles were undermined; and the towne within so beaten with shot out of the campe, and from the mount and trench by the upper peeces, that there were verie few houses left whole therein. The towns thus standing in great distresse, there were two hundred Frenchmen and halpards, which entered under the couert of night, to enter the towne in couert of the night, which exploit they so warlike achieved, that by meanes of a priest that could speake the English tongue, they passed by the scouts, & through the watch, so as the most part of them were got vnder the trenches, yet it was knowne that they were: to the number of six score of them got into the towne, but the residue after they were once detected, being intercepted, were taken or slaine. Although this small succour somewhat relieved them within, and put them in some hope to defend the towne somewhat longer against the kings power: yet at length when a pece of the castell was blowen by, and the breaches made, as was thought reasonable, the assault was given by the lord admerall Dudley, that was comethither from the sea, which he had scouered after his returne from Scotland.

This assault was couragiously given, and to speake a truth, no lesse manfully defended: so that when the assailants had perceiued in what state the breaches stood, and what provision they within had made for defense of their towne, which undoubtedly was great (for nothing was by them omitted, that might either auantage the defendants, or annoy the assailants) those that were appointed in this sort to give the assault, were called backe, and so they retired, but not without losse on both sides, and namelie of them within. For during the time of the assault, the great artillerie did beat still upon them that presented themselves at the breaches to repell the assailants, and so diuerse of their valiant captaines and brave souldiers were slaine at this assault, & among other, captaine Philip Cose. Shortly after, the captaines within the towne, doubting to be easies assaulted, and perceluing themselves in extreme danger to lose the towne by force, if they prolonged not the sooner, by rendering it to saue themselves: they sent forth two of their chiefe captaines, monsieur Sembelmont, and monsieur de Hales, which declared vnto the king, that monsieur de Teruine gouverneur of the towne, with his retinue, was contented to deliuer the towne vnto his grace, with condition that they might passe with bag and baggage. Which request the king, like a noble and mercifull prince, freely granted: and so the next date, the duke of Suffolke rode into Bullongne, vnto whom in the kings name the keies of the towne were deliuered, & in the afternone departed out of Bullongne all the Frenchmen with heauie hearts, to the number of six thousand, as C. O. witnesseth, saing:

his approach to the place where the king stood, alighted from his horse, and came to the king, and after he had talked with him a space, the king took him by the hand, and he reuerentlie kneeling upon his knees, kissed his hand, and afterward mounted upon his horse, and so departed, following his companie.

The eight of September, the king hauing the sword borne before him by the lord marques Dorset, like a puissant conqueror rode into Bullongne, and the trumpeters standing on the walles, sounded their trumpets at the time of his entering, to the great comfort of the beholders. In the entering, there met him the duke of Suffolke, and deliuered to him the keies of the towne, and so he rode forth to his lodging that was prepared for him on the south side of the towne. Within two daies after, the king rode about the towne within the walles, and appointed that our ladie church of Bullongne should be taken downe, and in the place thereof a mount to be made, for the more strengthening of the towne. Finallye after he had set things in order for the safe keeping of this his towne of Bullongne, by his princely force thus wonne out of the possession of his aduersaries hands, he appointed the lord Lisle high admiral of the seas, to be his deputie of the same towne, and then determining not to stae there any longer, he took the seas, & returned into England, landing at Dover the first of October.

In this meane time, whilst the king of England laie (as ye haue heard) with his siege about Bullongne, and the duke of Suffolke, and lord priuie seale about Putterell, the emperor invaded France by Champeigne, winning diuerse castles and townes, as Comersis, Lignie, saint Desir, Chantreaux, Hyerie, and others. But at the length, meanes were made by treatie to haue the matter taken by, as in the end it was, and a peace concluded without consent of the king of England, although there was place left for him and other princes to enter into this agreement of peace. But the king of England hauing now defraied no small quantitie of treasure in these warres, beside the trauell of his owne person and his people, and hauing the thing now in a manner sure in his possession, which he chiefly went about to obtaine, that is to wit, the strong towne of Bullongne, he would not agree vnto any peace, except he might inioy that towne, at that instant redie to be deliuered into his hands. And euen now after it was to him deliuered, hearing that for certaine, the peace was concluded betwixt the emperor and the French king, he determined to breake by his camps: but neuertheless to keepe Bullongne in his possession, in despite of all his aduersaries. But here, before we proceed any further, we haue thought good somewhat to speake touching the siege which all this while continued afore Putterell, where the Englishmen and Burgonians inforced themselves by all waies and meanes they could deuise, how to confreine their enemies within the towne. On the other part, monsieur de Biez, and those that were with him in gard of the same towne, lest nothing vndone that might serue for their defense, and make to the annoiance of their enemies.

There were with monsieur de Biez within the towne, an hundred men at armes of the retinue of the constable of France, vnder the leading of the lord de la Guich an expert man of war. There were also with the lord of Genlie, foure enignes of French footmen. Count Berenger a Neapolitane with a thousand footmen Italians. Capteine Francisco de Chiaramont, a Neapolitane also, with the like number of Italian footmen. So that the towne might seeme sufficientlie furnished with men, and they wanted neither shot nor powder requisite, so that there was no spare thereof when occasion serued on either part.

The duke of Suffolke and the lord priuie seale caused a mount to be raised, and aloft thereon were certaine peeces of artillerie planted to shot into the towne. Whereouer they compassed the walles so on each hand with their seuerall camps and trenches, that hardlie might any escape either in or out vnespied. Sir Francis Biazan was appointed with certaine bands, containing about the number of a thousand men, to lodge in a campe fortified by himselfe, ouer against one part of the towne, to stop certeine passages on that side, that no succors should enter by the same to the relæse of them within. There were skilfull men with the dailie betwixt them that sallied forth of the gates, and the Englishmen that watched and warred in the trenches, and other places, inso much that diuerse lost their liues, and some were irreconurable wounded, as Anglorum praelia witneseth, saing:

Confossi sano moriuntur vulnere multis Disperso cerebro, faciei nulla figura.

On a daie as sir Thomas Poinings soldours were warding in one of the trenches, an Italian secretly comming forth of the towne, fetched awaie the said sir Thomas Poinings his ensigne; and notwithstanding the pursute that was made after him, he escaped and got into the towne with it, to the great displeasure of the whole campe. But as the enemies sometimes went awaie with the aduantage of their attempted enterprises, so oftentimes againe they paid for their aduenturing ouer rashlie about the common price of the market.

But here I cannot but lament the negligence used in that season: for there is not one English writer to be found extant, that hath writtten any thing effectualle of the exploits atchieued in that toznie; so as we are dyuen to borrow of the aduersaries that haue writtten thereof, wanting other helps of our owne nation to furnish our booke herin according to our wished purpose. But neuertheless, to giue occasion to those that yet liue, and can best do it, to set forth hereafter a more perfect discourse thereof, I haue thought it not amisse to recite in part what I haue read and learned of such things as then were accounted worthy of relation, and now like to be buried in the dimme booke of oblivion, unless some fauourer of notable euent chancing in the assiegement of those two townes, Bullongne and Putterell, will put to his helping hand to report the same to posteritie.

Among other stratagems, one I remember, devised and put in practise by the lord Mountioie, as thus. The enemies had espied a place of aduantage without the towne, where vnder fauour of the shot of certaine peeces of great artillerie lodged upon some platforms or bulwarks within the towne, they might lie without the walles betwixt the Englishmens trenches and the towne ditches, and there couer themselves within a litle trench or counterscarpe made for the purpose, and out of the same be readie with their harquebusses to shot at the Englishmen, so some as any of them should once shew his head out of the trenches, to the great danger of them that warred in the same.

The lord Mountioie perceiuing this, deuised with himselfe how to rouse the enemies out of that lurking place, and withall came to the duke of Suffolke, and desired licence to put the deuise (which he had already forecass in his mind) in practise. But the duke being not willing that he should put himselfe in such danger, was loth to grant thereto, but rather perswaded with him not to attempt it: for (said he) my lord, ye may do the king better seruice than so to hazard your life, and cast your selfe awaie, as it is beris like you should, in aduenturing vpon such a desperat peece of seruice, and therefore I would not wissh you to meddle therewith, for we shall otherwise prouide for the matter well enough. But the lord Mountioie still persisted in his sute berie earnestlie, declaring that he doubted not (by Gods helpe) but to atchiue his purpose to his god contentation without anie great danger, if that were executed which he toke to be necessarie for the accomplishment of his deuise: and that was to haue certeine peces of the great ordinance shot off that waie forth, at what time the wind shod meet to carrie the smoke full vpon the place where the Frenchmen laie. At length vpon his earnest sute, the duke gaue him licence to trie what he could do, commanding the great ordinance to be laid and charged ready to shot off as he should appoint it. Herewith the lord Mountioie taking with him fourtēne of his olde soldiors (of the which number one of them forsoke to go through with him when it came to the point) immediatlie vpon the shooting off of the artillerie, & that all the ground about was couered ouer with smoke, he came to the place where those Frenchmen laie under conert of their trench, and so displaced them, that they had no liking efflonies to lodge so nere vnto such vnfriendlie neighbors.

Manie other valiant and politike feats (no doubt) were atchiued during this siege, & happilie as worthie the rehearfall as this. But sith it was the inuention of so noble a yong gentleman, I haue esteemed it not impertinent to speake thereof, and withall to lament the losse of the inuentor, who being taken a waie hostlie after in his returne homewards, by vntimelie death, was like (if he had liued to greater yeers of exerpience) to haue proued comparable in valor to anie of his noble progenitors. But now to speake of other incidents that chanced whilest this siege remained before Sputtrell, you must understand that the most part of the vittels that was spent in the campe was brought to them either from the kings campe at Bullongne, or else from S. Omers, to conueie the same so far off, it was needfull to haue the carriage garded with good troops and bands both of hozsmen and footmen: for the French fortresses were stronglie furnished with great numbers of men of war, which vpon occasions were ready to take aduantages offered.

And as it fortuneth at one time among other, there was a conuoie of certeine wagons loden with vittels appointed to come from saint Omers, the same being garded with diuerse bands of Englishmen and Burgonions, sent thither for that purpose, the which marching forward from saint Omers, kept not so good order as had bene requisit: whereof certeine companies of French hozsmen that were abroad being auaire, set vpon the Burgonions that were attendant vpon the foremost carriages, and finding them in some disorder, easilie discomfited them, followed, and slue them in the chafe, till they came to the hindermost carriages, where sir hundred Englishmen that attended on the same, impaled themselves with their wagons, so as the Frenchmen could take no aduantage: but with shot of the English archers were so curried and galled that they were driuen to retire, and that in such hast, as they left diuerse of their companie captiues in the Englishmens hands beside those that were saire laid to take their last sleepe there on the ground. Heretofore, of the Burgonions there were saine foure hundred, and much good vittels lost, the bottoms of the hogtheads and other vessels being beaten out, and manie a good Flemish mare killed or taken. For the Frenchmen found small resistance (as before ye haue heard) till they approached to the Englishmen, by whose accustomed manhood, some part of the vittels of that conuoie was saued, to the releefe of the campe, which notwithstanding by losse of the residue suffered great want for the time.

Moreouer, somewhat towards the latter end of this siege, the earle of Surreie son vnto the duke of Suffolke and marshall of his field, accompanied with the lord warden of the cinque ports, and tursie other valiant capteins English & Burgonions marched forth into the countrie towards Abule, where they toke and burnt a proper towne called saint Requiers: and after comming to another towne called Aien, they found no bodie at home but women and children, for the men were departed out of it before their comming thither. When they had taken their pleasure in sacking all such goods as they found there fit to be carried a waie, they spared the towne from fire, and so departed. And thus after they had bene twos dales and two nights abroad in the countrie, they returned home to the campe with a great botie of beasts, sheepe, and other things which they had got in that vorage.

But now to conclude with this siege of Sputtrell, after the king had wone Bullongne, and understood how the emperour had agreed with his aduersarie the French king, he resolved to haue his armie to raise that siege which thus had lien before Sputtrell, and with all conuenient speed to draw toward Calis. And because it was signified that the Dolphin of France Henrie was comming forward with a great power, which had bene raised by his father the French king to resist the emperour, and now was sent vnder the conduct of the said Dolphin, to the succours of them that were besieged in Sputtrell, the king sent the earle of Arundell, sir John Coge, sir George Carew, sir John Keinsford, and others, with a chosen number of lustie soldiors vnto Sputtrell, to reinforce his armie there, that in leuieng the campe, and withdrawing backe, they might be the better able to withstand anie attempt which the enemies might put in execution to their annoyance. And beelie this was done with good aduise and necessarie consideration, for the Englishmen that had lien so long time at the siege before Sputtrell, wanting such behouefull refreshment as those were stored with that late before Bullongne, hauing the seas open, and all things at pleasure brought vnto them forth of England, were soze weakened and decayed by death and sicknesse, and now in raising their campe had manie things to loke vnto, as well for the conueieng of their ordinance, trusse, and baggage, as their feeble and diseased persons: so that if the Dolphin with his armie might haue made such speed forward as to haue overtaken them with his maine power before they had come to Bullongne, it was to be feared least he might haue put them in danger of a plaine distresse. But with such timelie foresight as was vsed the siege was raised, and the armie retired first to Bullongne, and after to Calis without losse, although the French hozsmen in great number followed, and sundrie times made proud proffers to giue the charge vpon the hindermost companies; but nothing was done to make great account of, except certeine skirmishes that were procured, and alarums giuen, as in such cases it fortuneth.

The Dolphin notwithstanding that the siege was thus raised from Sputtrell, yet he could come thither, yet he kept forward his iourneie, to prouue what he might do to recover Bullongne, which towne the king of England (as ye haue heard) had left in the keeping of the lord Lisle high admerall. The same towne being then weake, God knoweth, on all sides through batterte and minings, which by the kings power had been made, so bring it into his subiectors, and the trenches not cast downe, nor the ordinance mounted.

The Dolphin being come befoze the towne, sent certene bands of his best soldiors by night to giue a camfado to the bafe towne. They that thus were sent, entred the same the ninth of October, about two of the clocke in the morning, where they toke the stand wat ches, and slue (beside a great number of sicke and weake persons) as well soldiors as other, befoze they could arate themselves, or well get out of their beds. But after, the Frenchmen and Italians fell to rising and breakeing bp of coffers, scattering here and there abroad, and began to fall to their bit tles, which they found there in good plentie. The Eng lishmen that were dyuen vp to the gates of the high towne, got weapons that were throwne downe vnto them forth of the same, & assembling togither, fierce ly entred in amongst the pzease of their enimies. And herewith there sallied forth of the high towne sir Thomas Poinings with a band of two hundred soldiors, the which togither with the other so besirred themselves, that they manfullie beat backe the eni mies, slue to the number of eight hundred of them, and chased the residue out of the towne, which fled ou er the sands vp to the hill, where the Dolphin him selfe stood with a great trope of horsemen about him, and durst not once come downe to the rescue of his people, for feare of the great artillerie that with plentie of bullets saluted the enimies, after that the lacke of the daie had once discovered them in sight. Amongst other that were slaine in this repulse of the Frenchmen, le seigneur de Froquesolles, another of the marshall de Viez his sons in law, and sene schall of Bullongne was one.
Thus the Dolphin, perceiuing that it would no thing auail him to make anie further attempt a gainst Bullongne, passed forth toward Guilnes, & shortly after through want of vittels, and sicknesse which soze infested his campe, brake vp his armie, and returned into France: so that the proud enterprises of the vainglorious and most insolent French turned to their olone great shame, as C. O. tralle saith:
Sic Galli in magnam cesserunt dedecus ausu.
But shortly after Christmas came downe an ar mie of fourtene thousand, vnder the conduction of monsieur de Viez, the which the six and twentieth of Januarie incamped on the west side of Bullongne beyond the hauen, where they laie ten daies: but on the first of Februarie, the earle of Hertford, the lord admerall, as then lord lieutenant of the towne of Bullongne, the lord Greie of Wilton, sir Thomas Poinings & others, hauing assembled out of the ga risons on that side the seas, to the number of foure thousand footmen, & seuen hundred horsemen, whereof an hundred or foure score were Albanoises, issued forth of Bullongne about foure of the clocke in the morning, and comming to the place where the king had incamped during the time of the siege, they staid there, and put the mselves in order of battell: and a bout six of the clocke, it being then a low water, cap teine Edward Bezie, with three hundred shot, was appointed to passe ouer, and to giue the enimies an alarm in their campe.
At which instant the trumpets sounded, and the drums stroke vp in the English armie, and here with they being diuided into three battels, and to ech one his gard of two hundred horsemen, beside the od hundred that attended as a defense to the residue, they shewed themselves to their enimies. The Frenchmen perceiuing this, packed aboate with all haste possible, marching toward Hardilo in two battels. Whereupon the English captains leauing their footmen behind them, and taking onclie with them the horsemen, followed with all speed after their enimies, and comming to the bridge commonlie cal led pont de Bique, which certene English carpent ers garded with a number of harquebutters, and foure small field pieces, had forced and repaired the same that night: and so the horsemen finding it suf ficiently repaired, passed ouer, and comming to S. Estienne, they found there five hundred Dutch horse men, commonlie called Swart ritters, that were lodged there to keepe that passage: but being surpris ed on the sudden by the English horsemen, and sherpelie assailed, they were wholie distressed, and the most part of them taken prisoners, and there with left with the followers of the armie, were as ter slaine, because they knew not where to bestow them.

But now the hill of saint Estienne being thus gained by the English horsemen, they put themselves in order of battell againe, appointing an hundred of their men at armes to follow and keepe aloofe as a stalle to relieue their fellowes in time of need, when they saw them in anie danger. The lords, to incou rage euerie one to do his dutie, rode bp and downe about the troops, & vsing manie comfortable words, desired them, that although they were but an hand full in comparison to the number of their enimies, they would yet in regard of the honour of the realme of England, make a proffer of an onset to the eni mies, that they might perceiue that there they were to giue them battell, and to follow, as they should see them their captains and gouernors to lead them the waie. Herewith forward they make towards the enimie, and overtaking them three miles on the hi ther side of Hardilo sands, they valiantlie gaue the charge, and thrusting in betwixt the two French bat tels, ouerthrew their carriages, toke their ordinance and munitions, slue and bare downe manie of them that pzeased forth to defend the same.
Monsieur de Viez being in the fore ward, brought backe the strongest and best armed men he had to re sist his enimies, ranging them in order so, as he ment to haue inclosed the English horsemen betwixt his battels and the sea, and so to haue distressed them. But this purpose being espied first of all by the lord admerall, the Englishmen by his valiant incou ragement gaue a new charge, and breaking through their ranks by force, came backe againe vnto their hundred men of armes that kept aloofe, and there staid till their footmen might come to them, who by this time were aduanced within sight of them, but distant yet by the space of two English miles, or little lesse.
Monsieur de Viez, perceiuing that the English footmen began thus to approach, made forward againe with his armie, so fast as was possible for his people to march, drawing still his armed men and best sol diors to the hinder most ranks, there to be readie to with stand the Englishmen, as they should offer to assaile them: and in this order the Frenchmen made away, and rested not till they came to Hardilo sands, being a place of such strength and aduantage, by rea son of the streit, that after they were once got thither, they might account themselves out of all danger, and therefore there they staid, and dispatched an he rald vnto the chieffes of the English armie, to sig nifie vnto them, that there they ment to abide and to giue them battell, if they would aduance forward to fight with them: but yet they would not in anie wise come forth of their strength vnto some euery ground, although they were earnestlie required therevnto. Whereupon the Englishmen, to light them a candle that they might see where they were, set all the villages & houses about on a light fire, con tinuing the same all that afternone, and most part of the night following, and the next morning betwixt

The same peces of armour were sent ouer into England to the king for a witnesse of the good successe that had thus happened to his people in this famous enterpryse, in the attacking wherof there were not past halfe a dozen Englishmen slaine, besides those that were hurt, which neither were manie, as vnder halfe a score at the most.

Whilost such things were in doing about Bullongne, and other places (as before ye haue heard in this twentieth and first yeare) the ships of the west countrie and other coasts of this realme waisted abroad on the seas, and toke to the number of three hundred & 80 French ships, so that the Graie friers church in London was laid full of wine, the Austine friers and Blache friers full of herring, and other fish that was taken, as the same should haue bene conueied into France. About the same season the king demanded a beneuolence of his subiects spirituall and temporall, towards the maintenance of the warres against the Frenchmen and Scots. ¶ On the twelfe of Januarie, the lord chancellour, the duke of Suffolke, and other of the kings counsell, began to sit at Wainards castell, where they first called before them the maior and aldermen, &c. And because Richard Head alderman would not agree to paie as they set him; he was commanded vpon paine to serue the king in his warres of Scotland, who departed from London the thre and twentieth of Januarie.

and burning of the towne of Redwoth, which enterpryse was achieved the tenth of June, beside diuerse other exploits fortunatelie brought to passe by his high ballancie and manhood, till his hap was at this present to finish his daies: whose life though then it toke end, yet shall not his fame & good report (purchased by martiall courage, policie, and dangerous adventures) perishe or decaye; as the poet trulie saith:

Parla labore volat et aethum bona fama per orbem, Hec veluti Phœbus non moritura manet.

This yeare on saint Georges daie sir Thomas Wriotheslie lord chancellour of England was made knight of the garter. Also Trinitie terme was adourned by reason of the warres, but the eschequer and the court of the tenths were open, for those that were accomptable in either of the said courts. The thirteenth of June Robert Luken seruant to sir Humfric Brokone one of the iustices of the kings Bench, Anne Askew gentlewoman, otherwile called Anne Kine, wife to one Kine, a gentleman of Lincolnshire, and Jone Sauterere, wife to John Sauterere of London, were arreigned in the Guildhall of London, for speaking against the sacrament of the altar (as they tearmed it) contrarie to the statute of the six articles: but because no witnesse appeared against the women, nor against Luken, one onelie excepted, who was thought to accuse him rather of malice, than otherwise, they were by twelve honest substantiall men of the citie (sworne to passe vpon their indictments) clerelie acquitted and discharged.

The same daie also was a pewterer named Thomas Daie discharged, by the pardon granted in the last parlement, after he had remained in prison in Newgate the space of three yeares now past, condemned long before the date of the same pardon, for the article of surcular confession compised within the same statute. About the same time, to wit the seventh of June a great armie of Frenchmen came downe to Bullongne, and nere to the haven incamped themselves. In this armie were reckoned to be twelve thousand lanceknights, twelve thousand French footmen, six thousand Italians, foure thousand of legionarie soldours of France, & a thousand or twelve hundred men of armes, beside seven or eight hundred light horsemen. After some skirmishes not greatlie to their aduantage, they began yet to build a fort, which at length they accomplished, as after shall appeare. ¶ About the six & twentieth of June, was a great tempest in Derbyshe, where thorough trees were ouerturned, & diuerse churches, chapels, and houses were vncouered. Also in Lancashire, there fell hailstones as big as mens fists, which had diuerse prints in them, some like mens faces, some like gun holes, &c.]

The same moneth also the lord Lisle admerall of England with the English fleet entered the mouth of Saine, and came before Newhaven, where a great manie of the Frenchmen laie, to the number of a two hundred ships, and six and twentieth gallees, wherof the pope (as was reported) had sent twentieth well furnished with men and morie, to the aid of the French king. The Englishmen being not past an hundred and threescore saile, and all great ships, determined not to set vpon the Frenchmen where they laie: but yet approaching nere vnto them, shot off certeine peces of ordnance at them, and thereby caused the gallees to come abroad, which changed shot againe with the Englishmen. The gallees at the first had great aduantage, by reason of the great calme. Twise either part assaulted other with shot of their great artillerie, but suddenlie the wind rose so high, that the gallees could not indure the rage of the seas, and so the Englishmen for feare of flats were compelled to enter the maine seas, and so sailed vnto

Portsmouth where the king late, for he had knowledge by his espials that the Frenchmen intended to land in the Ile of Wight, wherefore he repaired to that coast, to see his realme defended.

After this, the eighteenth of Julie the admerall of France in misieur Daneballe holled by sailes, and with his whole nauie came forth into the seas, and arrived on the coast of Sussex before bright Hampton, and set certeine of his soldiors on land, to burne and spoile the countrie: but the beacons were fired, and the inhabitants thereabouts came downe so thicke, that the Frenchmen were driuen to flie with losse of diuerse of their numbers: so that they did little hurt there. Immediatlie hereupon they made to the point of the Ile of Wight, called saint Helens point, and there in good order upon their arrivall they cast anchors, and sent daillie firtene of their gallies to the verie haven of Portsmouth. The English nauie lying there in the same haven, made them readie, and set out toward the enimies, and still the one shot hotlie at the other: but the wind was so calme, that the kings ships could beare no saile, which greatlie grieved the minds of the Englishmen, and made the enimies more bold to approach with their gallies, and to assaile the ships with their shot even within the haven.

The twentieth of Julie, the whole nauie of the Englishmen made out, & purposed to set on the Frenchmen, but in setting forthward, thorough too much folie, one of the kings ships called the Marie Rose was drowned in the midst of the haven, by reason that she was overladen with ordinance, and had the ports left open, which were verie low, and the great artillerie unbraced; so that when the ship should turne, the water entered, and suddenlie she suncke. In hir was sir George Carew knight and foure hundred soldiors vnder his guiding. There escaped not past forty persons of all the whole number. On the morrow after about two thousand of the Frenchmen landed in the Ile of Wight, where one of their chiefe captaine named le cheualier Daur, a Breuencois was slaine with manie other, and the residue with losse and shame driuen backe againe to their gallies.

The king perceiving the great Armada of the Frenchmen to approach, caused the beacons to be fired, and by letters sent into Hamptonshire, Summersetshire, Willeshire, and into diuerse other countries adjoining, gaue knowledge to such as were appointed to be readie for that purpose, to come with all speed to encounter the enimies. Whereupon they repaired to his presence in great numbers well furnished with armor, weapon, bittels, and all other things necessaerie, so that the Ile was garnished, and all the frontiers alongest the coasts fortified with crading great multitudes of men. The French captaine hauing knowledge by certeine fishermen, whom they toke, that the king was present, & so huge a power readie to resist them, they disanchored and drew along the coast of Sussex, and a small number of them landed againe in Sussex, of whome few returned to their ships: for diuerse gentlemen of the countrie, as sir Nicholas Delham, and others, with such power as was raised, upon the sudden, toke them by the waite and quickelie distressed them.

When they had searched euerie where by the coast, and saw men still readie to receiue them with battell, they turned sterne, and so got them home againe without anye act atchieued worthy to be mentioned. The number of the Frenchmen was great, so that diuerse of them that were taken prisoners in the Ile of Wight, and in Sussex, did report that they were three score thousand. The French king advertised the emperor most vnturly by letters, that his armie had gotten the Ile of Wight with the ports of Hampton, and Portsmouth, and diuerse other places. In August following, the earle of Hertford entered againe into Scotland with twelue thousand men, and destroyed all the townes in the middle marches, burned Coldingham abbey, and passed to the west marches, fore annoieng and indamaging the Scots, and yet neither they, nor the Frenchmen that were sent into Scotland this yeare to the aid of the Scots, vnder the leading of monsieur de Logges, Montgomerie his father, durst once come forth into the field to encounter with him.

Also in the beginning of this moneth the citie of London set forth a thousand soldiors of archers, harquebutters, pikes, and bills, which went to Dover, and so passed ouer into Calis, to serue the king in his wars on that side the seas. In the same moneth that valiant captaine sir Thomas Poinings knight, lord Poinings, and the kings lieutenant of his towne and marches of Bullogne departed this life, after he had to his great honor atchieued manie worthy enterprises in seruice of his prince against the enimies, so that his death was much lamented. A gentleman vndoubtedly deseruing to be had in perpetuall memorie: and pittie it is, that diuerse such valiant feats as he in his life time atchieued, were not committed to writing, to remaine for examples sake to posteritie.

Also in the same moneth at Gullford died the noble and valiant duke of Suffolke Charles Brandon lord great maister of the kings household, a right hardie gentleman, and yet not so hardie, as almost of all estates and degrees of men, high & low, rich and poore, hartlie beloued, & his death of them greatlie lamented: his bodie was honorablie buried at Windsor, at the kings costs. This man in his daies had done to the king and realme right agreeable seruices, as well in peace, as in wars, both in England, France, Scotland, and Ireland, he died the kings generall lieutenant of his armie then appointed to resist the Frenchmen, if they durst haue landed.

But now, whereas in this meane time we haue spoken nothing of the doings in Scotland, where the warre was still continued, the king of France sent thither certeine bands of Frenchmen, vnder the gouernement of monsieur de Logges, to aid the Scots against the Englishmen; and the king of England waged manie strangers, and sent them with certeine Englishmen to the borders, for defense of the same against the inuasions of the enimies: for after the arrivall of the Frenchmen, a great armie of Scots was raised, and approached nere to the borders, where for a certeine time they incamped, so that manie thought some notable enterprise would haue bene attempted. But after they had laine in campe a certeine time, they brake vp, and departed without attempting anye further exploit.

Shortlie after the earle of Hertford lying on the borders, as lieutenant of the north parts of England, calling to him an armie of twelue thousand men, or thereabouts, what of Englishmen and strangers, entred Scotland with the same, and burnt a great part of the pers, and Leithdale, as Kelsae abbey and the towne; Helroffe abbey & Dalborne abbey, also Jedworth abbey, and diuerse other places, townes, and villages, to the number of fise score. Kelsae abbey was defended a while by three hundred Scots, but in the end the most part of them were slaine, & taken by the strangers and others that gaue the assault. Thus the earle of Hertford fore indamaged the Scots by this inuasion, and yet neither they, nor the Frenchmen their assistants, durst come forth into the field once to encounter with him.

Scots and Frenchmen attempted to enter into England on the east borders. But the Englishmen perceiving them about to passe by a certeine streit, set upon them, and slue and toke of them to the number of seven score. Among the prisoners that were taken, the lord of Humes sonne, and a French capteine were accompted chiefest. Also in another rode made into the west borders, the lord Marwels sonne, and diuerse others were taken. But at an other time about the same season also, certeine Englishmen to the number of five hundred, making their entrie by the west borders into Scotland, were discomfited by the Scots, and the more part of them either taken or slaine. Thus were they occupied as well on the borders betwixt England and Scotland, in this season, as also in the marches of Calis, Guisnes, and Bullognois, where the garrisons lying in those places, made continuall rodes & forraies into the marches of the enemies cuntry, and oftentimes chanced to encounter with some of their troops.

The capteine of Ard, monsieur de Dampierre, having got for a supplie from the French campe at Bullogne, the companie of the men of armes that belonged to the duke of Orleans, led by his lieutenant monsieur de Cauannes, chanced on a daie to encounter with the Englishmen guided by that valiant baron the lord Greie of Wilton, capteine of the towne of Guisnes, who being accompanied with a number of valiant gentlemen & soldiers, distressed their enemies, & slue the capteine of Ard the foresaid lord de Dampierre there in field. Diuerse other skirmishes and encounters chanced in that summer, on the further side the seas. And moreover, now after that the French naue was withdrawen (as ye haue heard) from the coasts about Portsmouth, that martiall chiefeine, sir John Dudley, lord Aisle, and high admerall of England, having all his ships, men, munition, & furniture readie, set forward from Portsmouth haven, to haue fought with the Frenchmen, if they had still kept the seas, but they were withdrawn home into harborough.

Whereupon the lord admerall meaning to reuenge their brauados, and presumptuous attempts made at Portsmouth, and in the Ile of Wight, approached to the coasts of Normandie, and landed with sir thousand men at Treport, burnt the suburbs of that towne, with the abbeye, and certeine villages and houses thereabouts. Also they destroyed thirtie ships, and a barke there found in the haven: and after they had wrought their pleasures, they returned to the sea, and so home, not having lost past fourtēne persons in the execution of this whole enterpryse. Of this great spoile & overthrow giuen at Treport, by the kings admerall, I find these verses remembred:

Treportem passibus equis

In this meane while monsieur de Biez, being incamped nere to Bullogne with such a puissant armie (as before you haue heard) busied about the building of a fort, there was not such diligence used therein, as was promised on his part in accomplishing the same, to the French kings great displeasure (as some write) who had meant with that armie (if this fort had bene finished at the appointed time) to haue gone to besiege the towne and castell of Guisnes: but now the time being prolonged, and not without some suspicion least monsieur de Biez cared not how long the warres indured in that sort, so as he might command ouer so manie princes and great lords as were there under his gouernance, at length before the fort were fullie finished, he remoued to mount Lambert with the more part of the armie, pretending as though he meant to fight with the Englishmen, the which (as he said) he understood were purposed to come with a conuoy of vittells from Calis to Bullogne.

Whilest he there remained, manie princes and great lords came from the court, that late at an abbey called forest Pontier, eleuen leagues from Bullogne beyond Sputtrell, on the waie towards Abuille, in hope that battell should haue followed betwixt the English and French armies. Among other that came thither are these remembred as principall, monsieur Dangouen, monsieur Daumalle, monsieur le duc de Peuers, monsieur le conte de Launall, and monsieur de la Trimoille. Monsieur Daumalle eldest sonne to the duke of Guise, being lodged in the bantgard that was gouerned by monsieur de Bissac, chanced on a daie to be present at a skirmish, where shewing himselfe verie forward, he was stricken through the sight of his helmet, with a light horsemans staffe, that pearcing in betwixt his nose and his eie, entred halfe a foot into his head, as monsieur de Langeie writeth, and breaking off a two fingers beneath the iron, the same iron remained still within his head: but yet escaping out of the English mens hands, he came backe to the campe, had the truncheon and iron pulled out of his head, and being dressed was conueied in a litter to Piquignie, where he laie for two or thre daies in such danger, that no man looked that he should haue escaped with life.

There were manie of these skirmishes, wherein the Englishmen bare themselves so valiantlie, that the Frenchmen went awaie oftentimes with losse of manie of their noble men and best soldiers. At one time they lost the lord Menaintuille brother to the lord de Lislebonne, being slaine with stroke of lance and pike. At another time they lost likewise a yong lord of Picardie called le seigneur de Fretote. At length, after their new fort or bastillon was brought in some strength, they furnished it in most defensible wise with men, munition and vittells, naming it Monpleastre. Herewith monsieur de Biez departing from mount Lambert with part of the armie, came downe towards Calis, and entring into the English pale beside Grauelin, wan certeine bulwarks, and incontring diuerse new bands of Welchmen and others, latelie before sent ouer, distressed them, and after burnt certeine villages, forraied the cuntry almost to Sparke, and afterwards in great haile with their bowtie and pillage they turned. This enterpryse was exploited by the French men about the thirteenth daie in September.

There were with monsieur de Biez at this enterpryse the lord of Bissac, who gouerned the bantgard, and had with him his owne companie of men of armes, and the light horsemen of whome he had the generall conduct. There was also the companie of men at armes that belonged to the constable of France, led by the lord Gulch, & fiftie men of armes vnder the gouernance of the lord of Belleie, the companie also of the lord of Boisse, the companie of the lord Escars, and that of the lord de la Roch du Maine, & others. There was also monsieur de Laues generall of the French footmen, and manie yong princes and lords of high estate, as monsieur Francis de Bourbon, duc Danguen, Francis de Lorraine, duke Daumalle latelie recovered of his hurt, the duke of Peuers, and the earle de Launall that in this voiage was hurt with an harquebus shot in the armie.

of Henrie the eighth.

The thre and twentieth of Nouember, a parlement began at Westminster, in the which was granted to the king a subsidie of the spiritualtie of six shillings the pound, to be paid in two yeares next ensuing: and of the temporaltie two shillings and eight pence of the pound in goods, and foure shillings of the pound in lands, to be paid likewise within two yeares. Also in this parlement all colleges, chanteries, and hospitals were committed to the king, to order, by altering or transposing the same as to him should seeme expedient, which at the prorogation of the same parlement he promised should be done to the glorie of God, and the common profit of the realme. The foure and twentieth of December, the said parlement was proroged, on which daie the king coming into the house, to giue his rofall assent vnto such acts as were passed, the speaker made vnto him an eloquent oration, to the which although the custome hath euer bene that the lord chancellor should make answer, it pleased the king at that present to make the answer himselfe, which he vttered as here ensueth.

The kings oration in the parlement house.

Although my chancellor, for the time being, hath before this time vsed verie eloquentlie and substantiallie, to make answer to such orations as hath bene set forth in this high court of parlement; yet is he not so able to open and set forth my mind and meaning, and the secrets of my heart, in so plaine and ample manner, as I my selfe am and can doe. Wherefore I taking vpon me to answer your eloquent oration master speaker, saie, that where you in the name of our welbeloued commons, haue both praised and extolled me, for the notable qualittes that you haue conceiued to be in me: I most hartlie thanke you all, that you haue put me in remembrance of my dutie, which is to indenour my selfe to obtaine and get such excellent qualittes, and necessarie vertues, as a prince or gouernour should or ought to haue, of which gifts I recognise my selfe both bare and barren, but of such small qualittes as God hath indueed me withall. I render to his goodnesse my most humble thanks, intending with all my wit and diligence to get and acquire to me such notable vertues and princelie qualittes, as you haue alledged to be incorporated in my person. These thanks for your louing admonition and good counsell first remembred, I esteemes thanke you. Again, because that you considering our great charge, not for our pleasure, but for your defense, not for our gaine, but to our great cost, which we haue lately sustained, aswell in defense of our and your enemies, as for the conquest of that fortreffe, which was to this realme most displeasing and noisome, and shalbe (by Gods grace) hereafter to our nation most profitable and pleasant, haue frælie of your owne minds granted to vs a certeine subsidie, here in an act specified, which verelie we take in good part, regarding more your kindnesse, than the profit thereof, as he that setteth more by your louing harts than by your substance. Beside this hartie kindnesse, I cannot a little reioice, when I consider the perfect trust and confidence, which you haue put in me, as men hauing vndoubted hope and vniuersed beleefe in my good doings and iust proceedings for you, without my desire or request, haue committed to mine order and disposition all chanteries, colleges, hospitals, and other places specified in a certeine act, firmly trusting that I will order them to the glorie of God, and the profit of the common wealth. Surelie if I (contrarie to your expectation) should suffer the ministers of the church to decaie, or learning (which is so great a iewel) to be diminished, or worse and miserable to be vntelued, you might saie that I being put in so speciall a trust, as I am in this case, were no trustie friend to you, nor charitable to mine euen christian, neither a louer to the public wealth, nor yet one that feared God, to whome account must be rendered of all our doings. Doubt not I praie you, but your expectation shall be serued, more godlie and goodlie than you will wish or desire, as hereafter you shall plainlie perceiue.

Now sith I find such kindnesse on your part towards me, I cannot chuse but loue and fauour you, affirming that no prince in the world more fauoreth his subiects than I doe you; nor no subiects or commons more loued and obeyed their soueraigne lord, than I perceiue you doe me, for whose defense my treasure shall not be hidden, nor if necessitie require, my person shall not be vndauentured. Yet although I wish you, and you wish me, to be in this perfect loue and concord, this frændlie amitie cannot continue, except both you my lords temporal, and my lords spiritual, and you my louing subiects, sturdie and take paine to amende one thing, which surelie is amisse, and farre out of order, to the which I most hartlie require you: which is, that charitie and concord is not among you, but discord and dissention beareth rule in euerie place. Saint Paule saith to the Corinthians, and the thirtenth chapter: Charitie is gentle, charitie is not enuious, charitie is not proud, and so forth in the said chapter. Behold then what loue and charitie is among you, when the one calleth an other heretike and anabaptist, and he calleth him againe papist, hypocrite, and sharpe. Are these signes of fraternall loue betwene you? No, no, I assure you that this lacke of charitie amongst your selues will be the hinderance and allwaging of the seruer betwene vs, as I said before, except this two. First, be salued, and cleerlie made whole. I must needs iudge the fault and occasion of this discord to be partly by negligence of you the fathers and preachers of the spiritualtie: for if I know a man which lieth in adulterie, I must iudge him a lecherous and a carnall person: if I see a man boast and brag himselfe, I cannot but deeme him a proud man. I see here daile that you of the cleargie preach one against another, teach one contrarie to another, inueigh one against an other without charitie or discretion: some be too stiff in their old Mumpimus, other be too buisie and curious in their new Sumpimus: thus all men almost be in varietie and discord, and few or none preacheth trulie and sincerelie the word of God, according as they ought to doe. Shall I iudge you charitable persons doing this? No, no, I cannot so doe. Alas, how can the poore soules liue in concord, when you preachers sow amongst them in your sermons debate and discord? If you they looke for light, and you bring them to darkenesse. Amend these crimes I exhort you, and set forth Gods word, both by true preaching and good example giuing: or else I, whome God hath appointed his vicar and high minister here, will see these diuisions extinct, and these enomittes corrected according to my verie dutie, or else I am an vnprofitable seruant, and an vntrue officer. Although I saie the spiritual men be in some fault, that charitie is not kept amongst you; yet you of the temporaltie be not cleare and vnspotted of malice and enuie: for you raile on bishops, speake slanderouslie of preests, and rebuke and taunt preachers, both contrarie to god order and christian fraternitie. If you know surelie that a bishop or preacher erreth, or teacheth peruerse doctrine, come and declare it to some of our counsell, or to vs, to whome is committed by God the Charitie and concord in commonwealths be things most necessarie: but in matters of religion, charitie and concord is not enough, without veritie and true doctrine of God.

high authoritie to reforme and order such causes and behaviors, and be not iudges your selues, of your owne fantastickall opintions and vaine expostions, for in such high causes you may lightlie erre. And although you be permitted to read holie scriptures, and to haue the word of God in your mother tong, you must vnderstand, that it is licenced you so to do, onlie to informe your owne consciences, and to instruct your children and familie, and not to dispute, and make scripture a railing and a taunting stocke against priests and preachers, as manie light persons doe. I am verie soie to know and heare, how virecurrentlie that most pretious iewel the word of God is disputed, rined, song, and tangled in euerie alehouse and tauerne, contrarie to the true meaning and doctrine of the same: and yet I am euen as much soie, that the readers of the same follow it in doing so faintlie and coldlie. For of this I am sure, that charitie was neuer so faint amongst you, and ver-tuous and godlie living was neuer lesse vsed, nor God himselfe amongst christians was neuer lesse reuerenced, honored, or serued. Therefore (as I said before) be in charitie one with an other, like brother and brother: loue, or ead, and serue God, to the which I as your supream head and souereigne lord exhort and require you, and then I doubt not, but that loue and league that I spake of in the beginning, shall neuer be dissolued or broken betwene vs. And to the making of laws which we haue now made and concluded, I exhort you the makers to be as diligent in putting them in execution, as you were in making a furthering of the same: or else your labour shall be in vaine, & your common-wealth nothing releued.
Now to your petition, concerning our roiall assent to be given to such acts as haue passed both houses, they shall be read openlie that ye may heare them.

Then were they openlie read, and to manie his grace assented, and diuerse he assented not vnto.
Thus the kings oration was to his subiects there present such comfort, that the like soie could not be vnto them in this world. And thus the acts read (as the manner is) and his assent giuen, his grace rose and departed. Manie proper seats of armes were exploited and done in this meane while, betwixt the parties English and French about Bullongne. On the morrow after the feast of the Epiphanie, there came a conuioe of vittels towards the French fort, garded with three or foure thousand lancequenets; vnder their coronell the Keingraue and certeine French horsemen. The earle of Surreie then lieutenant of Bullongne aduertised thereof, made out with such powder as he might conuenientlie spare of them within Bullongne and the Old man, to cut off those vittels: but comming to encounter with the enimies at saint Eustiens, he was put to flight: sir Edward Poynings capteine of a band called the kings gard of Bullongne was slaine in that conflict with fiftene or sixtene other capteins, beside officers and common soldiers. About the same time the Frenchmen made a volage vnto the Isle of Wasill, with a ship called the barke Ager, which they had taken from the Englishmen before: and in their wate they met with a little craier, of the which one Col-ding was master, a proper man and an hardie. The barke perceiuing the craier to be an Englishman, shot at hir and botoged hir. Whereupon straitwaies the craier drev to the great barke, and sir or seauen of the Englishmen leapt into hir. In the meane time while the Frenchmen, without regard of perill towards themselves, looked ouer hatches to behold how the craier sunke there at hand before them, not mistrusting anie thing that the Englishmen might do against them, it fortuned that those Englishmen which got by into the barke, found in the end thereof a great number of lime pots, which they with water quenched, or rather (as the nature thereof is) set them on fire, and threw them so thickly at the Frenchmen which were there aboard, that they blinded them, in such wise as those few Englishmen that entered the ship banquished the Frenchmen, and driuing them vnder hatches, shut the same, and brought the barke a waie with them home into England. In the latter end of March the bothell houses called the Stues on the banke side in Southwoike were conuerted from such filthy vices by the kings commandment, the balwds and ruffians being put out, and other persons of honest behauior placed in their rooms to inhabit in the same houses. This was done by proclamation and sound of trumpet by an herald of armes.

On the seuen and twentieth of Aprill being tuesdaie in Easter weeke William Forleie pot-maker for the mint of the Towler of London fell all aspeand so continued sleeping, and could not be wakened with picking, cramping, or otherwise burning what-soener, till the first daie of the next terme, which was full fourtene daies, and as manie nights or more, for that Easter terme beginneth not before seauentene daies after Easter. The cause of his thus sleeping could not be knowen, though it were diligentlie searched for by the kings physicians and other learned men, yea the king himselfe examining the said William Forleie, who was in all points found at his waking to be but as if he had slept but one night:

Cutbert Tunstall bishop of Duresme, sir William Paget his secretarie, and doctor Tregonell: and the French king sent to Ard a bishop, the chiefe president of Rouen, and a notarie, but no conclusion followed of their trauell. Whereupon the king of England hauing perfect knowledge how the Frenchmen intended to build a fortreffe at saint Johns rode be-twene Bullongne and Calis, to the great annoyance of both those places, if they might haue compassed their purpose, he meant to prevent that deuise of his aduersaries, sending ouer the earle of Hertford and the lord Lisle high admerall of England, with manie balliant capteins, which got the rode but two daies before the Frenchmen had appointed to be there. But when they vnderstood that the Englishmen had so prevented them, they staied about Harb-low, where monsieur de Bie; their generall gaue order to incampe, and durst not once come forward to assaie the English forces: so that without anie impeachment by land, the Englishmen built certeine fortresses, to wit, two at the same place of saint Johns rode, otherwise called Hamble Thew, and an other about a two miles from thence at a place called Blacke Hesse. There was in the earle of Hertfords campe beside Englishmen diuerse Frangers, Almains, Spaniards and Italians. And because it is not much impertinent to the matter, we haue thought good here to set downe the whole number of all the kings forces at that present in his paie that were there vnder the said earle of Hertford: the kings generall lieutenant. First the earle had two hundred, the lord William Sturton three hundred, the lord John Creie brother to the marques Dorset two hundred, the lord Baie one hundred, sir Thomas Seimer knight marshall of the host one hundred, sir Henrie Baneuet capteine of the horsemen one hundred, sir John Harrington treasurer of the armie one hundred, sir Thomas Wat master of the ord.

ordinance one hundred, sir Spauris Barkleie three hundred, sir Thomas Wolcroft two hundred, sir Walter Dennis two hundred, sir George Blewet two hundred, sir Richard Cranesfield two hundred, sir George Cornwell two hundred, sir John Luttrell one hundred, sir Edmund Huslie one hundred, George Holmwood two hundred, capteine Brough-ton two hundred, capteine Palmer two hundred, capteine Chancie two hundred, capteine Windam two hundred, capteine Stukeleie one hundred, capteine Blewet one hundred, capteine Sidnam one hundred, capteine Bret one hundred, capteine Dier one hundred, capteine Evans one hundred, Spaniards fifteen hundred, Italians two hundred, Cle-ners three hundred, lancequenets under the govern-ment of their coronell Conrade Henning, common-ly called Courtpernie, three thousand. The summe of all the soldiors in Bullongne & Bullongnois were 97000. Here you must note, that whilst the Eng-lish armie laie thus in the field till the foyts of Ham-ble Thew and Blacke Pesse were in building, the French gallies were on the seas, and now and then came and approached nere to the shore, where the Eng-lish armie laie in campe, at the which they shot off their ordinance: and the Englishmen answered them againe with the like. They came also before Calke, and shot off at the towne. But the lord ad-merall being there, made out to encounter them, notwithstanding they did first much hurt, and toke awaie diuerse of the English vessels laden with bittels.

The eighteenth daie of Maie there were foure of the kings ships, and foure pinases abroad on the seas afoze the haue of Hamble Thew, and there came eightene of the French gallies to set vpon them, and so there was great shooting betwene them: and at length one of their gallies was taken, in the which were abowd fourtene score soldiors and seauen score rowlers: the rest of their gallies packed awaie. Moreover, whilst the campe laie thus at Hamble Thew, it chanced that on a daie a mutinie rose among the lancequenets against their capteine, so that they got themselves into order of battell, seized vpon the great artillerie, and shewed countenance as if they would haue set vpon the residue of the whole campe. Herevpon euerie soldior was com-manded to repaire to his ensigne, and the Spaniards came and joined with the Englishmen, readie to take such part as they did. At length by the diligence of the chieftaines, and good countenance of the Eng-lish soldiors and Spaniards the tumult was staied, and six of the principall beginners were hanged.

The one and twentieth of Maie the French armie came and incamped beyond Bullongne at the church on the hill: and the morrow after the earle of Hert-ford marched with his power to a place within two miles of them, and certeine footmen and horsemen went forth and skirmished with them; and in the meane time the artillerie ceased not to shoot off, as well from the French campe and fortresse as from Bullongne and the Old man. This daie were slaine fourtene Frenchmen and two taken prisoners; and three of the English part were likewise taken, and so the earle of Hertford returned to his campe, and left the lancequenets vpon the hill, incamped before the enemies faces, not two miles distant from them, in which place a fort was begun to be raised, which was after called the fort of Bullongne Berg. The next daie, to wit, the three and twentieth of Maie the soldiors of Bullongne and the lancequenets skirmi-shed with the Frenchmen, slue and toke of them se-uen score and aboue, of the which there were fortie that were in cotes of beluet, and diuerse also with chaines,

Here you must vnderstand, that now in this meane while by the motion of diuerse princes, a mee-ting was had of sundrie commissioners, appointed to treat of some peace, to be concluded betwixt the two kings of England and France. Herevpon there came to Guisnes for the king of England the earle of Hertford, the bishop of Winchester, sir John Dupleie viscount Lille baron of Gaupas, and high admerall of England, sir William Paget the kings secretarie, and doctor Nicholas Wotton deane of Canturburie. For the French king there came to Ard monsieur Claude Danebanlt admerall of France, being also one of the foure marshals of that realme, the bishop of Curcur, monsieur Keimund chiefe president of Rome, the secretarie Bouchetell. Diuerse times they met betwixt Ard and Guisnes, and after long debating of matters, and diuerse breakings off: yet at length the seauenth of Iune a peace was concluded, and proclaimed as well in the court as in the citie of London on Whitfundaie the thirteenth of Iune, with sound of trumpet, accord-ing to the manner: and in like sort the same daie it was proclaimed at Paris and at Rome. The chieftest article of which peace was this, that the French king paieing to the king of England 800000 crownes within the terme of eight peares, should haue Bul-longne againe to him restored, which in the meane time should remaine in the hands and possession of the king of England, as a pledge and gage for assu-rance of the said moneie.

On the seuen & twentieth of Iune doctor Crome recanted at Paules crosse: which recantation was bzged vpon this occasion. When the chanteries & col-leges were given by act of parlement into the kings hands (as is aboue remembred) which was about the moneth of December 1545, the next lent following doctor Crome preaching in the mercers chappell, among other reasons and persuations, to rouse the peo-ple from the baine opinion of purgatorie, inferred this, grounding vpon the said act of parlement: that if trentals and chanterie masses could auail the soules in purgatorie, then did the parlement not well in giuing awaie monasteries, colleges, & chan-teries, which serued principallie to that purpose. But if the parlement did well (as no man could denie) in dissolving them & bestowing the same vpon the king, then is it a plaine case, that such chanteries and pri-uat masses do nothing conferre to releue them in purgatorie. This Dilemma of doctor Crome, no doubt, was insoluble: but notwithstanding the charitable prelates (for all the kings late exhortation vnto chari-tie) were so charitable to him that they brought him Coram nobis, and so handled him that they made him recant his words. ¶ On the sixteenth of Iune were letters patents deliuered to sir Thomas Cheinie treasurer of the kings household, and lord warden of the cinque ports, whereby he was authorized to be the kings agent in chassening the Dolphins daughter of France named Elizabeth. A true copie of which let-ters patents is here recorded, because the said adion hath bene ignozantlie transferred from the said sir Thomas Cheinie to sir Henrie Inuenc: as appeareth in Holinsheds chronicle published 1577, pag. 1608.

The king hauing passed ouer the foresaid letters patents to sir Thomas, and he in forwardnesse to execute his charge, to the intent that his retinue and attendants should no waies offendiuely behaue themselves against the French, with whom the king was verie carefull to continue and mainteine the peace interchangeably agreed vpon and concluded, his maiestie to preuent and cut off all occasions that might anie waie impeach, interrupt, or violate this peace, commanded the lords of his counsell to direct letters withall expedition to the said sir Thomas, then vpon his vottage into France, containing a prescript forme of demeanour, which the gentlemen & yeomen attendant vpon him in France should vse, during the time of their abode in those foren parts: a copie of which letter, being a testimoniall of the king of Englands inclinable mind to peace hereafter followeth out of the verie originall, as the same was subscribed by the lords.

A copie of the said letters sent in post to sir Thomas Cheinie being vpon his vorage into France.

After our right hartie commendations to your good lordship. The kings maiestie hath willed vs to signifie vnto you, that his highnesse expresse pleasure and commandement is, ye should in his maiesties name declare to such gentlemen as accompanie you into France, that they haue in remembrance so to vse & behaue them selues among the Frenchmen as well on the waie as at the court, in such sort as they by communication vpon feats of the warre passed giue no occasion of priuat displeasure. Wherein therefore it shall be expedient, that either they saie nothing, vnlesse they be prouoked; or in that case call the things happened fortune de la guerre, without comparison of things chanced on our part or on theirs, but turne the communication to reioise in peace. In the conditions whereof they shall pretend ignorance, without speaking of the keeping still of Bullogne, or deliuerance of it againe, but as shall please the princes for the continuance of peace, wherein by Gods grace the crueltie of warre shall be conuerted into extremitie of friendship, to the weale and commoditie of both realmes.

And forsomuch as there want not in the world naughtie men of the state of monks and friers, who for malice of the alteration of their estate here, would gladlie defame our religion towards God, as though we had with them cast out all; his highnesse expresse pleasure and commandement is, that considering at this first entrie of you, the behauiour of your companie shall be much marked and noted in matters of religion and circumstances: of the same they should therfore haue so much the more regard both to their communications and also behauiours, and not onelie in speech to forbear to dispute or intermedle with the state of their policy there, but also in their diet on the fifth daie and deuout hearing of masse, follow the order of the kings maiesties relme, so as their conuersation & behauior maie be cōfution to such as would defame this realme in the contrarie. Thus fare your good lordship right hartilie well. From Greenwich the nineteenth of Iune 1546. Your lordships assured louing friends, Thomas Wriothesleye counc. W. Saint-Iohn. I. Russell. Cuth. Duresme. Steph. Winton. Anthonie Brenne. William Petres. This letter was thus indorsed. To our assured louing friend sir Thomas Cheinie knight of the order, treasuror of the kings maiesties household, and lord warden of the cinque ports, presentlie in speciall commission from the kings maiestie into France. Hast, post hast for thy life, to Douer, Calis, or where he shall chance to be: hast, hast.

Thus farre of sir Thomas Cheinie, imployed about the kings affaires in France; namelie the chrestening of the Dolphins daughter: wherein we haue bene the more copious in words, because it hath ben published, that sir Henrie Kneuet was therunto personallie deputed: which to be vntreue, both the letters patents and the letter misliue do sufficiently proue: both which we receiued at the hands of an ancient seruitor, attendant vpon the same sir Thomas at his being in France to execute his charge in the kings behalfe. Of which word the knight when we come to the yeare and daie of his death, we will deliuer further report to his high commendation, but yet none otherwise than as by warranted intelligence we shall be directed.]

The same time was a combat fought before the French king betwixt two Spaniards, Julian Romerou, and one Poroto. They both serued the king of England in the last wars against France: but Poroto had revolted from his seruice to the French kings, and for certaine speeches which he had vttered, was challenged to fight the said combat by the said Julian, for whome sir Henrie Kneuet undertooke that he should stand to his challenge, and trie it with his aduersarie, which he now did, and vanquished him in lists; the fight being appointed on horse backe. Incontinentlie after, sir Henrie Kneuet sickened and died at Coibell, and was buried in Paris within the church of S. Paule. Whereouer, for the full establishment of the peace, and to receiue the French kings oth, the vicount Lisle lord admerall, with the bishop of Duresme, and diuerse other lords, and gentlemen, Henrie Tennant.

element, to the number of one hundred and above, all in velvet cotes and chaines of gold, with fine and forye pomeyn right semelle appointed, went into France, departing from Bullogne the tenth of July, and came to Spelune a towne beyond Paris, where the French king then late, by whom and the Dolphin his sonne they were roialtie receiued, sealed, and banketed: and hauing done that for the which he was sent, the said lord admerall vnderle the first of August toke his leaue of the French king, who rewarded him with a cupbord of plate all gold, valued at 1500 pounds. The lords also and gentlemen had chaines of gold giuen to them, and the people had two hundred crownes bestowed amongst them, and so the lord admerall returned into England. This lord admerall, during the time that he had to deale with the French, so valiantlie demeaned himselfe, and was such a terror and astonishment to the enimie, as it is left written of him, that they durst not quench in his presence, but were like a fozt of timorous cattell, giuing roome to the raging lion ranging ouer the pastures with his yonglings, and making the verie heauens to ring with his ro-ring, after he hath filled his selfe with bulles fleshy, and laid his selfe downe to rest being wearie with eating; the comparison verie aptlie followeth:

præque iracundo cedunt armenta leoni, Pascha cum plenus bacchante furore peragrat Solum cum catulis, celum, & rugibus implens Conspicitur, postquam ratorum carnibus atra sit saturata fames, lassusque recumbit edendo: Tantus terror erat Gallis Dupleius Heros.

In the same moneth of August monsieur Dane-bail high admerall of France, accompanied with the bishop of Carreux, the earle of Maunell knight of the order, the earle of Williers, the chiefe president of Moan, secretaire Bouchetell, monsieur de Cana-ples knight of the order, monsieur de Laes knight of the order, monsieur de Wallerie viceadmerall of France, monsieur de Dese, the baron de la Gard, with diuerse other lords and capitaines of honor, beside two hundred gentlemen well appointed, leased from Depe with twelve gallies and a right faire ship called the Sacre of Depe, and so making saile he sailed not anie where to take land, till he came into the Thames, where at Blacketwall he was recei-ued into the kings barge by the earles of Warbie and Clee, who brought him to Grenewich, where he landed, and lodged there that night.

The next daie he came vp with all his gallies, and landed at the Tower wharfe. Upon all the banks by the water side were laid peeces of artillerie, which shot off frellie, and so likewise did all the artillerie in the ships, but speciallie from the Tower was shot a maruellous great peale of ordinance. From whence being landed, they rode thorough London in great triumph (the maior and the crafts standing in the streets in verie good order) unto the bishops palace by Pauls, where the French admerall lodged till Bartholomeu euen, on which daie he was conueied toward Hampton court, where in the waie the prince hauing with him the archbishop of Yorke, the earles of Hertford and Huntingdon, and about two thousand horse, met him and imbraced him in such courteous and honorable wise, that all the beholders greatlie reioiced, and much marvelled at the said princes high wit and great audacitie, and so the French admerall came to the court, giuing the prince the upper hand as they rode. And at the utter gate of the court, the lord chancellor, and all the kings counsell receiued him, and brought him to his lodging.

On Bartholomeu daie the king admitting him to his presence, welcomed him, and in great triumph went to the chappell, where the king receiued his oath to performe the articles of the league, as it was couenanted. To speake of the banquettings, huntings, and such like honorable sorts of interteinements, it were much to bitter, and hard to beleue. But on Fri-daie following, being the seuen and twentieth of August, he being rewarded with a cupbord of plate, to the value of twelve hundred pounds, returned to London, and on the sundae next ensuing toke his gallies and departed. Beside the kings gifts, he had giuen to him by the citie of London two flaggons guilt, and two other that were parcell guilt, valued at one hundred thirtie six pounds, beside wine, war, and torches. There were diuerse of his companie also that went not afoate unrewarded, hauing both plate, and also manie horses, and greibounds giuen them.

Although this peace pleased both the English and French nations, yet suerlie both mistrusted the continuance thereof. And verelie the old proverbe seemed to be thoroughlie verified, which saith, that what the eye seeth, the hart rueeth: for the Frenchmen still longed for Bullogne, and the Englishmen meant not willinglie to giue it ouer. For during the French admerals being in England, monsieur de Chatillon capitaine of Pontplaisier began to make a new ba-dilion euen at the verie mouth of the haven, naming it Chatillons garden. Whereupon that noble gentleman the lord Grete of Wiltton, shortly after appointed to be deputie of the towne and countie of Bullogne, percelting the great inconuenience that this new building would bring to the towne if it went forwards, did aduertise the king thereof, ear-nestlie beseeching his grace, that the matter might be thoroughlie considered of. Sir Thomas Palmer was the messenger.

The king vpon the intelligence, asked his coun-cels aduise, which onelie went wholie, that the conditions of the peace were not in anie wise to be in firm-ged. This resolved, secretaire Paget then knight, and afterwards lord, was commanded accordingly to draw a letter to the lord Grete, the which the king himselfe did signe, willing that the messenger should further know of his pleasure before he departed.
Whereupon Sir Thomas Palmer, hauing his dispatch at the secretaries hands, did get word to be giuen to the king, who presentlie sent for him into his priue chamber, and betwixt them two, these wordes: Palmer, you haue there a letter from vs to the lord Grete, that he do in no wise deale in the matter that he hath by you aduertised vs of. Notwithstanding, I will that you deliuer him this message from vs.

Bid him call to mind how that his brethren and himselfe not a short time, but euen from tender yeares, no farre off, but still nere to our person, we haue brought him vp, which (tell him) not vnuslie, if that be in him that we conceiue doth breed in vs an od trust of seruencie to serue vs of him, more than a common seruant or subiect. By that token will him what soeuer I haue written to the contrarie, that he presentlie impeach the fortification of Chatillons garden, and rase it if it be possible: and this my message shall be his clearing therein, & the seruice gratefullie accepted. Sir Thomas Palmer some what astonied hereat, considering the weightinesse of the cause, and the contrarietie of the letter and message, began to put the king in mind of the small credit that his bare errand of right was like to haue, so that against that which his maiesties letters imposed.
But the king cutting off his tales, Deliuer thou the message (quoth he) at his choller then be the executing thereof.

Sir Thomas thus dispatched, with great speed arriued ruied at Bullogne immediatlie vpon the opening of the gates at after none. His letters and message deliuered, the lord Greie straight assembled the council, shewed them the kings letters, which read, he caused sir Thomas to pronounce before them the message also. Euerie man was to saie his aduise: it went roundlie through the board without anie question, that the letter was to be followed, the message not to be staied on. The lord Greie hauing heard, and not replieng anie thing, willed sir Thomas to be called in againe, bad him repeat his message, and therwhilest made a cleaerke of the council to write the same Verbatim. This done, he praised the whole table to set their hands vnto it, which they did, and the lord Greie taking the same into his hands, without further opening, declaring his resolution, brake vp council, commanded straight the gates to be shut, gaue priuie warning, that certeine bands with armour and weapon, and likewise pioners should that night by an houre be in a readines.

Chatillions garden ouerthrowen and rased downe.

The houre came, himselfe with the warned company issued out, passed ouer the water, and without anie alarum of the enimie, did ouerthrow in thre or foure houres, what in two or thre moneths had bin raised, and so in great quietnesse returned into the towne. Presentlie he dispatched sir Thomas Palmer backe againe to the king with the newes, whose returne was so sudden, as the king himselfe being in the chamber of presence, & seeing him, said aloud: What? Will he do it or no? Sir Thomas giuing no other answer, but presenting his letters, and saying, that thereby his maiestie should know. The king againe in earnest mod, saie tell vs I saie, whether he will do it or not? When sir Thomas told him that it was done, and the whole fortification cleane rased. Whereat the king taking great ioy, presentlie called to certeine of the lords of the council that were by, and said: How saie you my lords, Chatillions garden the new fort is laid as flat as this floore. One straight amongst them gaue iudgement, that he that had done it, was worthe to lose his head. The king straight replied, he had rather lose a dozen such heads as his was that so iudged, than one such servants as had done it: and herewith he commanded, that the lord Greies pardon should presentlie be made, the which with a letter of great thanks, and promise of reward, was returned by the said sir Thomas Palmer to the said lord Greie; but the reward failed, the king not continuing long after in life: the like hap thereof had oftentimes happened vnto diuerse of his worthy ancestors vpon their due deserts to haue bene considered of, and therefore the case the lesse strange.

The lord Greies seruice bene honorably accepted of the king.

This haue I set downe the more willingly, for that I haue receiued it from them, which haue heard it reported, not onlie by the lord Greies owne mouth, but also by the relation of sir Thomas Palmer, and others that were present: the same not tending so much to the lord Greies owne praise, as to the bettering of the kings noble courage, and the great secret trust which he worthilie reposed in the said lord Greie. Here is to be noted also, lest any man should mistake the matter, as if the king dealt indirecylie herein, that his maiestie knowing how the Frenchmen in going about to build this fort, did more than they might by the covenants of the peace; and therefore was resolved at the first aduertisement thereof, to haue it rased. But yet for that it might hapilie haue bene signified ouer vnto the Frenchmen, before my lord Greie could haue accomplished the feat, he therefore wiselie wrote one thing in his letters, whereunto manie might be priuie, and sent secret knowledge by words contrarie to the contents of the same letters, so as if the messenger were trusie, his pleasure might not be discovered to the hinderance or dispaipointing of the same. But now to our purpose.

The French king after this, because as yet he would not seme to breake the peace, commanded the trenches and new fortifications made about this fortreffe, called Chatillions garden thus cast downe, to be filled by his owne people, and so it rested during the life of king Henrie: but afterwards it was begun againe, and finished, as after ye shall heare. About Michaellmas in this present yeare, Thomas duke of Suffolke, and Henrie earle of Surrie that was his sonne and heire, vpon certeine surmises of treason, were committed to the tower of London, and immediatlie after Christmas, the thirtieth of Januarie, the king then lieng in the extremitie of death, the said earle was arreigned in the Guildhall of London, before the lord maior, the lord chancellor, and diuerse other lords and iudges being there in commission. Where if he had tempered his answers with such modestie as he shewed token of a right perfect and readie wit, his praise had bene the greater. Some things he flatlie denied, seeking to weaken the credit of his accusers by certeine circumstances: other he excused with interpretations of his meaning, to proue the same to be far other wise than was alleged against him.

And one speciall matter amongst other where with he was charged, was, for bearing certeine arms that were said to belong to the king, and to the prince. The bearing whereof he iustified and maintained, that (as he toke it) he might beare them as belonging to diuerse of his ancestors, and withall affirmed, that he had the opinion of heralds therein. But yet to his indictment he pleaded not guiltie: and for that he was no lord of the parlement, he was inforced to stand to the triall of a common inquest of his countrie, which found him guiltie, and therevpon he had iudgement of death: and shortly after, to wit, the 19 of Januarie, he was beheaded on the tower hill. ¶ In this moneth of Januarie, the church of the late grate friers in London was opened, and masse song there: and that daie preached at Pauls crosse the bishop of Rochester, who declared the kings gift to the citie of London, for the relieuing of the poore people, which was by patent under his great seale. Saint Bartholome was spittle, the church of the grate friers, and two parish churches, the one of saint Nicholas in the Shambles, the other saint Ewine in Fleetgate market, all to be mude on parish church of the grate friers church; and in lands he gaue for the maintenance of the same 500 markes by yeare for ever, & this church to be named Christs church, founded by king Henrie the eight.

The duke was atteinted by parlement, and the atteindor after reuerfed in the first yeare of quene Marie. The euill hap as well of the father, as of the sonne, was greatlly lamented of manie, not onelie for the good seruice which the duke had done in his daies in defense of this realme, but also for that the earle was a gentleman well learned, and knowne to haue an excellent wit, if he had bene thankfull to God for the same, and other such good gifts as he had indued him withall. The king now lieng at the point of death, made his last will and testament, wherein he not onelie yielded himselfe to almightie God, but also toke order, that during the minority of his sonne prince Edward, his executors should be counsellors and aiders to him in all things, as well concerning priuate as publicke affaires. They were firste in number, whose names were as hereafter followeth.

So some as the noble king had finished his last will and testament, as afoze is said, he thought thereupon yielded by his spirit to almighty God, departing this world the eight and thirtieth date of Janu-arie, in the eight and thirtieth yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare of our Lord 1546, after the accompt of the church of England; but after the accompt which we follow in this booke 1547, beginning our yeare the first of Januarie. He reigned thirtie and seuen yeares, nine moneths and od daies. His bodie (according to his will in that behalfe) was conueted to Windsor with all funerall pompe, and in the college there interred. Of this treisnoble and trespuissant monarch, I find these few verses, which maie serue in god stead of an epitaph or funerall inscription:

*Henricus princeps prope lustra peregrat octo, Et populum magna prudens cum laude regebat, Ex quo magna solistractant sceptrum Britannia Cum Deus omnipotens, morbo obrepente, moueret Hinc emigrandum de vita. Proh dolor ingens!
Quod pia plebs lachrymis quam tristibus ora rigant?
Quam grauius regni priores plangere cubantem?
Anglia tota iacet maribus, lacubris & anens, Nil opus apportant medici, nil profuit herba Qua solent humanis membris adferre salutem, Pharmaca nil profunt, praebeatur potius fustis Heu nulla tristis mors est medicabilis arte.*

This noble prince was right fortunate in all his doings, so that commonlie whatsoeuer he attented, had good successe, as well in matters of peace as of wars: Of personage he was tall and mightie, in his latter daies somewhat grosse, or as we term it, beuillie: in wit and memorie verie perfect of such maiestie tempered with humanitie, as best became a noble and high aristate: a great fauourer of learning; as he that was not ignorant of good letters himselfe: he was of great magnificence and liberalty, in somuch that Iohn Leland that worthy antiquarie, hauing tasted of his royall bountyfullnesse, hath left vs these testifies to the world in a proper epigram which I will not omit, least I should wil-fullye keele a manifest protestation of his thank-fulnesse to his most excellent maiesty.

*Ante suos Phœbus radios, ante huc mundum Definet, & claras Cynthia pulchra faces: Ante suet rapidum, deitæ, sine pectus, insequor Spinifer & nullam sentio habebit quem Ante sacra quercus cessabunt spargere ramos, Florida sollicita pingere prata manu:
Quam rex diue tuum labatur pectore noster Nomen, quod studijs portus & auribus.*

And the same Iohn Leland, who deseruedlie had tasted the fruits of the kings largesse, was not unacquainted with the fame of his renowne, which had made it selfe knowne by restles flight to nations far and neare, some to their smart hauing felt the valor of his forces, and others submitting themselves for fear of utter desolation. Whereupon he became a terroze to his enemies, and yet none more desirous of peace than he, if by any other meanes (besides violence) the same might haue bene obtained. Sufficient cannot be said in his high & merited commendation, considering that as his victories were singular, so were they also manifold; and hard it is for the pen of a cunning rhetorician to paint him out according to his dignitie: howbeit the said Iohn Leland hath left in writing a proper epigram, deuised in praise of his most excellent king, by way of comparison, to his immortall commendation, as here followeth:

*Quantum punicis nouo rosetis Cedunt vere suis rubeta spinis?
Quantum lilio amoenioris hortus Gemma omnes alia nitore cedunt: Quantum cetera punicis decoro Malis poma quidem rubore cedunt: Quantum confertis breues myrica Concedunt quog gloria cupressus: Quantum stellis ero repressa tellus Cala mole sua & nigrore cedit: Tantum omnes alij, celebritate, Fama, nomine gloriaq, vera (Et mittam ingenij valentioris Lumen, flumina, fulmen atq, vires Rari iudicij tui perennet) Concedunt tibi principes sereni: Henrice, o patria tua columna Talis, qualis erat celebris illa Olim quam extulit Henricus triumphans.*

Comparatio

potentissimæ.

the sixt, king of England, France, and Ireland, de-1547

Shortlie hereupon the earle of Hertford with other of the lords resorted to Hatfield, where the yong king then late, from whence they conducted him with a great and right honorable companie to the Tower of London. During the time of his abode there, for the god gouvernement of the realme, the honour and suretie of his maiesties person, his uncle Edward earle of Hertford, was by order of the counsell, and the assent of his maiestie (as one most meetest to occupie that roome) appointed gouernour of his roiall person, and protector of his realmes, dominions and subiects, and so proclaimed the first of Februarie by an herald at armes, and sound of trumpet through the citie of London in the vsuall places thereof, as it was thought expedient.

Hertford cho-

The first daie of Februarie the earle of Hertford lord protector, adorne king Edward with the order of knighthood, remaining then in the Tower, and therewith the king standing by, called for Henrie Hubbeshorne lord maior of the citie of London, who coming before his presence, the king took the sword of the lord protector, and dubbed the said Hubbeshorne knight, he being the first that euer he made. The seauenteenth of Februarie the lord protector was created duke of Summerset, the earle of Essex was created marquesse of Northampton, the lord Lisle high admerall of England was created earle of Warwick and high chamberlaine of England, sir Thomas Wriothesley lord chancellor was created earle of Northampton, sir Thomas

Lord protec-

Seimer was aduanced to the honour of lord of Sudleie and high admerall of England, which office the earle of Warwick then resigned, sir Richard Rich was made lord Rich, and sir William Willoughbie was created lord Willoughbie of Barrham, sir Edmund Sheffield was made lord Sheffield of Butterwike; and as saith a late writer of this action:

Et quisque est ditior potentior, autius honore, Et noua virtutis sumens insignia fulget.

At the same time great preparation was made for the kings coronation, so that the foure and twentieth of Februarie next ensuing, his maiestie came from the Tower, and so rode through London vnto Westminster, with as great roialtie as might be, the streets being hong, and pageants in diuerse places erected, to testifie the good willes of the citizens, reioi-sing that it had pleased God to deale so fauourable with the English nation to grant them such a to-wardlie yong prince to their king and soueraigne thus to succed in place of his noble father. ¶ Now as he rode through London toward Westminster, and passed on the south part of Pauls churchyard, an Argoline came from the battlements of the steeple of Pauls church vpon a cable, being made fast to an himselfe neither with hand nor foot, and after ascen-

The morrow after being Shrouesundaie and the five and twentieth of Februarie, his coronation was solemnized in due forme and order, with all the roialtie and honour which therevnto appertained. Shortlie after the coronation, to wit, the first of March, the erte of Southhampton, lord chancellor of England, for his too much repugnancie (as was reported) in matters of counsell to the residue of the counsellors about the king, was not onelie depriued of his office of chancellor, but also removed from his place and authoritie in counsell, and the custodie of the great seale was taken from him, and deliuered vnto sir great master of the kings household.

Also shortlie after his coronation, the kings maiestie by the aduise of his uncle the lord protector, and other of his priuie counsell, minding first of all to seeke Gods honor and glozie, and thereupon intending a reformation, did not onelie set forth by cer-teine commissioners, sundrie intunditions for the remouing of images out of all churches, to the suppressing and auoiding of idolatrie and superstition within his realmes and dominions, but also caused certeine homilies or sermons to be drawne by sundrie godlie & learned men, that the same might be read in churches to the people, which were afterward roughout the realme, for the better instruction of the people, published and put in use. At Easter next following, he set out also an order thorough all the realme, that the supper of the lord should be ministered to the laic people in both kinds. ¶ On the fifth tenth of Maie doctor Smith recanted at Paules crosse.]

All these things done concerning religion (as before is said) the lord protector and the rest of the counsell, calling to mind the evil dealing and craftie dissimulation of the Scots, concerning the matter of marriage betwixt the kings maiestie, and the queene of Scotland (which marriage as ye have heard, in the five and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the eight, was by authoritie of parlement in Scotland fullie concluded) thought it not to stand with the kings honor to be in such maner by them deluded, and withall considering how greatlie it shuld turne to the quietnesse and safetie of both realmes to haue these two princes contained in matrimonte, they did devise sundrie waies and meanes how the same might be brought to passe, and the rather (as some doo write) for that king Henrie (before his death) had giuen them in speciall charge by all indentours to procure that the said marriage might take place, as whole wishing by the coniunction of those two yong princes, the uniting of the two kingdoms in perpetuall amitie and faithfull league of loue; as our poet saith:

Aeternam pacem hinc aeternaque federa iungi.

But the lords of Scotland were so inuiegled and corrupted by the French king, and abused by cardinal Beton, archbishop of saint Andrews, and other of their clergie, that they not onelie shanke from that which they had promised, but also sought to destroye those that favored the king of Englands part: whereupon a great and puissant armie was now prepared to passe by land into Scotland, and likewise a nauie to passe by sea to attend upon the same: whereof the great gallie and foure and twentie tall ships were thoroughlie furnished with men and munition for the warres, besides manie merchants ships and other small vessels, which serued for carriage of vittells, and other necessaries.

But now to shew what noble men and other were ordeined officers, and assigned to haue the conduction as well of the armie by land, as of the fleet by sea; ye shall vnderstand, that first the duke of Summerset, lord protector, toke vpon him to go himselfe in person, as generall of the whole armie, and capteine also of the battell of middle-ward, wherein were foure thousand footmen. The marshall erle of Warwicke appointed lord lieutenant of the same armie, led the fore-ward containing thre thousand footmen. The lord Dacres gouerned in the reere-ward, where in were other thre thousand footmen. The lord Greie of Wiltton was ordeined high marshall of the said armie & capteine generall of all the horsemen, being in number six thousand. Sir Rafe Sadler knight treasurer of the armie. Sir Francis Brian knight, capteine of the light horsemen, in number two thousand.

Sir Rafe Wane knight lieutenant of all the men of armes and demilances. Sir Thomas Darcie knight capteine of all the kings maiesties pensioners, and men at armes. Sir Richard Leigh knight deuiler of the fortifications. Sir Peter Helotas knight capteine of the harquebutters, which were in number six hundred. Sir Peter Gamboa knight, capteine of two hundred harquebutters on horsebacke. Sir Francis Fleming knight was master of the ordinance. Sir George Blaag & sir Thomas Wolceroff commissioners of the musters. Edward Shelleie, the lord Greies lieutenant of the men of armes of Bullongne, who was the first that gaue the onset in the date of battell, and died most honorable in the same. John Wyenne capteine of the pioners being in number a thousand foure hundred. Thomas Audeleie and Edward Chamberleine harbingers of the field.

The lord Edward Clinton admerall of the fleet: sir William Woodhouse knight his viceadmerall. There were in the armie of great ordinance fifteene paces, and of carriages nine hundred carts, besides manie wagons, whereof the commissarie generall was George Ferrers. As some as the armie by land was in a readinesse, and set forward to come to Berwicke at a date appointed, the nauie likewise toke the sea, and by the helpe of Gods god guiding had so prosperous speed in their passage, that they arrived at Berwicke in time convenient, wither vpon the thirtieth of August being tuesday, the lord protector came, and laic in the castell with sir Nicholas Strelleie knight, capteine there. The next date commandement was giuen that euerie man shoud provide himselfe for foure daies vittells to be caried forth with them in carts.

On thursdaie the first of September the lord protector, not with manie more than with his owne band of horsemen, rode to a towne standing on the sea coast, a six miles from Berwicke within Scotland called Almouth, whereat there runneth a riuer into the sea, which he caused to be founded, and finding the same well able to serue for an haue, caused afterwards a foztresse to be raised there, appointing Thomas Cotter, that was marshall of Berwicke, to be capteine thereof. On fridaye, all sailing the counsell departed the towne of Berwicke, and incamped a two flight shots off, by the sea side, toward Scotland. And the same daie the lord Clinton with his fleet toke the seas from Berwicke, to the end that in case the wind shoud not serue them to keepe course with the armie by land; yet were it but with the declining of tides, they might vpon anie need of munition or vittells be still at hand, or not long from them.

The same daie the earle of Warwicke, and sir Rafe Sadler treasurer of the armie, came to Berwicke from Petercastell, where they had staid till then, for the full dispatch of the rest of the armie, and the next daie the earle of Warwicke incamped in field with the armie. On which daie a proclamation with sound of trumpet was made by an herald in thre euerrall places of the campe, signifying the cause of the coming of the kings armie at that present into Scotland, which in effect was, to aduertise all the Scottish nation, that their coming was not to deprive them of their liberties, but to aduance the marriage already concluded and agreed vpon betwixt the kings maiestie of England and their queene, and no hostilitie ment to such as shoud shew themselves furtherers thereof. On the fourth of September being sundaie, the lord protector came from out of the towne, and the armie raised, and marched that daie a six miles, and camped by a village called Koston in the baronrie of Boukendall.

The order of their march was this. Sir Francis Brian capteine of the light horsemen, with foure hundred of his band, tended to the skout a mile or two before. The carriages kept along the sea coast, and the men at armes and demilances diuided into thre troops, answering the thre wards, rid in arraye directlie against the carriages a two flight shots asunder from them. The thre sot battels kept order in place betwixt them both, the fore-ward foremost, the battell in the middell, the reere-ward hindermost, each ward hauing his trope of horsemen and gard of ordinance, his aid of pioners for amendment of waies, waies, where need should be. The first of September they marched an eight miles, untill they came to the peath, a clough or ballie, running for a six miles west freight eastward, and toward the sea a twentie score yode from banke to banke above, and a five score in the bottome, wherein runnes a little river. Stape is this ballie on either side, and deepe in the bottome.

The Scots had cast trenches ouerthwart the side waies on either side, in manie places, to make the passage more cumbersome: but by the pioners the same were sone filled, and the waie made plaine, that the armie, carriage, & ordinance were quite set ouer sone after sun set, & there they pitched downe their campe. Whilest the armie was thus passing ouer this cumbersome passage, an herald was sent from the lord protector, to summon a castell, that stood at the end of the same ballie, a mile from the place where they passed downe towards the sea. Matthew Hume capteine thereof, a brothers sonne of the lord Humes, vpon his summons required to speake with the lord protector. It was granted, and he came, whome the lord protector handled in such sort with effectuall words, putting him in choise whether he would yeld, or stand to the aduenture, to haue the place wome of him by force, that he was contented to render all at his graces pleasure.

And so being commanded to go fetch his compaignie out of the house, he went and brought them, being in all one and twentie persons. The capteine and six other were staied and commanded to the keeping of the marshall, the residue were suffered to depart whither they thought good. After this surrender, the lord John Greie brother to the marques Dorset, was appointed to seise & take possession of the house, being capteine of a great number of demilances, as for his appoyued worthinesse and balliance right well he might, agreable to the deserued report remaining of him in print in foiren speech as followeth:

Ob summam belli cataphractis praeiit artem.*

The spoile was not rich sure, but of white bread, oaten cakes, and Scotch ale indifferent good store, and some bestowed among my lordes soldiors; for swordes, bucklers, pikes, pots, pans, yarne, linnen, hempe, and heaps of such baggage, which the countrie people there about had brought into that pile, to haue it in more suretie, the soldiors would scarce vouchsafe to stope and take the same vp.

In the meane time the lord protector appointed the house to be ouerthstone, which by the capteine of the pioners was done, though with some trauell, by reason the walles were so thicke, and the foundation so deepe, and thereto set vpon so craggie a plot. Tuesdaye the first of September, the armie dislodged and marched forward. In the waie as they should go, a mile and an halfe from Dunglas northward were two piles of holds, Thoznton & Anderwiike, set both on craggie foundations, & diuided a stones cast a funder by a deepe gut, wherein ran a little river. Thoznton belonged to the lord Hume, and was kept by one Thom Trotter, who vpon summons giuen him to render the house, lockt vp a sixtene poze soules like the soldiors of Dunglas fast within the house, toke the keyes with him, commanding them to defend the place till his returne, which should be on the morrow, with munition and releefe: and this done, he and his pickers pryckt (as saith maister Patten) quite their waies.

Anderwiike pertained to the lord of Hambleton, and was kept by his son and heire, whome of custome they call the master of Hambleton, & eight more gentlemen for the most part, as was reported. The lord protector at his comming nigh, sent vnto both these places, which vpon summons refusing to render, were freight assailed; Thoznton by batterie of sone great peeces of ordinance, and certeine of sir Peter Helwas hackbutters, and Anderwiike by a sort of the same hackbutters, who so well beset them, that where these keepers had rammed by their oute doores, cloied and stopt their staires within, and kept themselves for defense of their house about the battlements, the hackbutters got in, and fired them vnderneath, whereby being greatlie troubled with smoke, they cried for mercie, which the lord protector meant to grant them; but yet the messenger came, the hackbutters were got vp to them, & killed right of them aloft: one leapt ouer the walles, and running more than a furlong, was after slaine without in a water.

Anderwiike

All this while at Thoznton was the assault on the English part, and the defense by them within stoutlie continued: but at length when they perceived in what danger they stood, and how little able they were to helpe themselves, or to anniole the assailants, they pluckt in a banner which they had hong forth, in token of defiance, and put forth a white linnen clout tied to a stickes end, crying all with one tune for mercie: but hauing answer by the whole voices of the assailers that they were traitors, and that it was too late, they pluckt in their stickes, and set vpon againe their banner of defiance, and shot off, hurled stones, & did what else they could with great courage of their side, & small hurt of the assailants. Wherefore perceiving that they could not long keepe out, being on the one side battered, and mined on the other, kept in with hackbutters on ech side, and some of the Englishmen being got into the house below, for they hauing shot vp themselves also in the highest of their house, pluckt in againe their banner, and cried estones for mercie, but being answered generallie by the assailants, that they should neuer loke for it, they fell to make this petition, that if they should needs die, they might rather suffer by hanging, and so reconcile themselves to God, than to die in malice with so great danger of their soules.

This sute was so furthered to the dukes grace by sir Miles Partridge that was nere at hand when they made this sute, that it was granted; and they comming forth, humbled themselves, and without more hurt they were but commanded to the prison marshall, who kept them for a time, and were after released. The house was shortly after so blowen with powder, that more than the one halfe of it fell freight downe to dust and rubbish, the rest stood all to shaken with rifts and chinks. Anderwiike also was burned, and all the houses of office, and stacks of coine about them both. While this was in doing the dukes grace, in turning but about, saw the fall of Dunglas, which likewise was vndermined and blowen vp with powder.

This done, about none the armie marched, and passing by Dunbar, the castell sent them diuerse shots of artillerie, but all in vaine. The Scotch pickers shewed themselves in the field with proffer of skirmish, but to no great purpose, one of them being killed with a shot of one of Bartheulls men an hackbutter on horsebacke. The armie hauing marched that daie a ten miles, lodged at night nere vnto Tantallon, and had a blind alarm. Marching the next morning a two miles, they came to a river called Lin, where there is a stone brydge, named Lin-ton brydge of a towne thereby on the right hand as the armie marched, and standing eastward vpon the same river: the horsemen and carriages passed thorough the water, for it was not verie deepe, and the footmen ouer the brydge. The passage was strict for an armie, and therefore the longer in setting ouer.

CCCC. liij. Beyond.

Wales castle.

Beyond this bridge about a mile westward upon the same river, on the south side standeth a proper castle called Wailes, pertaining to the earle of Bothwell, but kept as then by the gouernours appointment, who held the earle in prison. Out of this castell as the lord protector passed forward in following the foreward, there were roundlie shot off (but without hurt) six or seven peeces, the which before that (though some of the armie had bene verie nigh) yet kept they all couert. In the meane time rose a thicke mist, which caused a great disorder in the rereward, by reason they could not see about them. The earle of Marwick therefore doubting least the enemies, who had been picking vp and downe nere to the armie, and offered skirmish the same morning, should now by occasion of the mist attempt some feat to the annoyance of the Englishmen in their passage, his lordship himselfe scant with firtene horses (whereof Barteuill, and John de Ribaud Frenchmen were two, seven or eight light horsemen more, and the rest being his owne seruants) returned toward the passage to see the arrate againe.

A subtle planne of the Scots.

The Scottish horsemen perceiuing our horsemen to haue passed on before, and thinking (as the truth was) that some capitaine of honor did staie for the looking to the order of this rereward, they keeping the south side of the river, did call ouer to some of the armie, to know whether there were anie noble man nigh there? They were asked whie they asked? One of them answered, that he was such a one whose name the Englishmen knew to be honorable among the Scots, and would come in to the dukes grace, so that he might be sure to come in safetie. Some young soldiers nothing suspecting the craftie falshood of the Scots, told him that the earle of Marwick was nigh there, by whose tuition, he should be safetie brought to my lord protectors presence. They had cand their lesson & fell to their practice, which was this. Hauiug come ouer the water, in the waie as the earle should passe, they had colouched about two hundred of their pickers, and had sent forth beside to search where my lord was, whome when they had found, part of them pickt verie nigh, whome ten or twelue of the earles small companie did boldlie encounter, and droue them well nigh home to their ambush, fleeing perchance not so much for feare as for falshood, to bring them within their danger. But hereby informed that the earle was so nigh, they sent out a bigger number, and kept the rest more secret vpon this purpose, that they might either by a plaine onset distresse him, or else by fainting of sight to haue trained him within danger of their ambush. And thus instructed, they came picking toward his lordship apace. Whie (quoth he) & wilt not these knaues be ruled? Giue me my staffe. The which then with so valiant a courage he charged at one (as it was thought) Dandie Car, a capitaine among them, that he did not onelie compell Car to turne, and himselfe chased him about twelue score together, all the waie at the speares point, so that if Cars horse had not bene exceeding good and wight, his lordship had surely run him through in this race; but also with his little band caused all the rest to flee amaine. After whome as Henrie Clane, a gentle man of the said earles, and one of his companie did fiercelie pursue foure or fise Scots, suddenlie turned, and set vpon him, and though they did not altogether escape his hands free, yet by belwing and mangling his head, bodie, and manie places else, they did so cruelie intreat him, as if rescue had not come the sooner, they had slaine him outright. Here was Barteuill run at sideling, and hurt in the buttocke, and one of the Englishmen slaine: of Scots againe none slaine, but three taken prisoners, wherof one was Richard Bartwell, and hurt in the thigh, who had bene long in England not long before, and had receiued right manie benefits, both of the late kings liberalitie, and of the earle of Marwick, and of manie other nobles and gentlemen in the court beside.

But to conclude, if the earle of Marwick had not thus valiantlie encountered them, per they could haue warned their ambush how weaklie he was guarded, he had bene beset round about by them per he could haue bin aware of them, or rescued of other. Whereas hereby his lordship vndoubtedlie shewed his wanted valor, saved his companie, and discerned the enimie. As Barteuill the Frenchman that daie had right honestlie serued, so did the lords right honorable acquite it: for the earle of Marwick did get him a furlong, and desired he was, straight after laid and conueied in the lord protectors owne chariot. The rest that were hurt were here also dyed, 20 Scots and others.

The armie hauiug marched that same daie nine miles, incamped at night by a towne standing on the frith called Lang Raddrie. The next morning being thursdaie the eight of September, in time of the dislodging of the English camp, signe was made to some of the ships (whereof the most part and chieftest laie a ten or twelue miles in the forth, beyond vs, ouer against Lielh & Edenborough) that the lord admerall should come a shore, to speake with the lord protectors. In the meane time, somewhat earlie as our gallie was comming toward vs, about a mile and more beyond our campe, the Scots were verie busie, waiking here on thore toward them with a banner of saint George that they had, so to traine them to come on land there: but the earle of Marwick some disappointed the policie, for making toward that place where the lord admerall should come on thore, the Englishmen on the water by the sight of his presence, did some discern their friends from their foes.

The lord admerall hereby came to land, and riding backe with the earle into the lord protectors order was taken, that the great ships should remoue from before Lielh, and come to lie before Goukelborough; and the Scottish campe which laie there in field already assembled, to resist the English power that marched thus towards them. The smaller vessels that were vittellers were appointed to lie nere to the armie. The lord admerall hereby, being returned to the water, & the armie marching onward a mile or two, there appeared aloft on a hill, that laie longwise east and west, and on the south side of them, vpon a six hundred of their horsemen pickers, wherof some within a sight shot, strealtie against the Englishmen, shewed themselves vpon the same hill, & more further off.

Toward these, ouer a small bridge that laie ouer a little river there, verie hardlie did ride about a dozen haquebutters on horsebacke, and held them at baie so nise to their noses, that whether it were by the goodnesse of the same haquebutters, or the badnesse of them, the Scots did not onelie not come downe to them, but also verie courteously gaue place, and fled to their fellowes. The armie went on, but so much the slower, because the waie was somewhat narrow, by meanes of the forth on the one side, and certaine marshes on the other. The Scots kept alwaies pale with them, till there were shot off two field peeces twise, wherewith there was a man killed, and the leg of one of their horses stricken off, which caused them to withdraue, so that the Englishmen saw no more of them, till they came to the place where they meant to incampe, for there they shewed themselves againe aloft on the fore remembred hill, standing standing as it were to biete and take muster of the armie; but when the lord Greie made towards them, minding to know their commission, they wisely wert their waie, and would not once abide the reasoning.

Little else was done that daie, but that George ferrers, one of the duke of Summerlets gentlemen, and one of the commissioners of the cariages in the armie, perceiving where certeine Scots were got into a cane under the earth, stopping some of the vents, and setting fire on the other, smothered them to death, as was thought it could be none other, by consequence of the smoke breaking forth at some of the other vents. The English ships also taking their leane from before Lieth, with a scoze of shot or more, and as they came by saluting the Scots in their campe also, with as manie, came and laie according to appointment. The armie having marched this daie about a fine miles, incamped at Salt Preston by the forth. On Fridaie the ninth of September, the English armie lieng in sight & view of the Sco-tish campe, that laie two miles or therabouts from them, had the forth on the north, and the hill last remembered on the south, the west end whereof is called Fandide Brate, on the which standeth a forie castell, and halfe a scoze houses of like worthinesse by it, and had westward before the Englishmen, the Scots li-eng in campe. About a mile from the English campe were the Scots horsemen verie busie, prank-ing vp and downe, & faine would haue bene a counsell with the Englishmens doings; who againe, because the Scots seemed to sit to receiue them, did diligentlie prepare that they might come go to them, and therefore kept within their campe all that daie.

The lord protector and the counsell sitting in consultation, the capteines and officers providing their bards, store of vittels, and furniture of weapons, for furtherance whereof our vessels of munition and vittels were here already come to the shore. The Scots continued their brauerie on the hill, the which the Englishmen not being so well able to beare, made out a band of light horsemen, and a trope of demilances to backe them: the Englishmen and strangers that serued among them, got vp aloft on the hill, and thereby of euen ground with the enimie rode straight toward them with good speed and order, whom at the first the Scots did boldly countenance and abide: but after, when they perceived that our men would needs come forward, they began to picke, and would faine haue bene gone, ver they had told their errand. But the Englishmen hasted so speedilie after, that euen straight they were at their elbowes, and did so frontlie then besseire them, that what in the onset at the first, and after in the chase, which lasted a thre miles twelue to as far as the furthest of their campe on the south side, they had killed of the Scots within a thre houres, about the number of thirtene hundred, and taken the maister of Hume, the lords Humes sonne and heire, two priests and six gentlemen, whereof one by sir Jaques Granado, and all vpon the highest and twelue highest of the hill toward the Scots, within the full sight of their whole campe.

On the English part one Spanishe haquebutter hurt, and taken sir Wase Bulmer knight, Thomas Comer marshall of Berwik, and Robert Crouch, all capteines of severall bands of the English light horsemen, and men of right good courage and appointed service, & at this time distressed by their owne too much forwardnesse, and not by the enimies force.
To conclude, of sixtene hundred horsemen for their aid, and five hundred footmen to lie close in ambush, and to be readie at need, which came that morning out of their campe, there returned not home a hauie seven hundred, and diuerse of those sore hurt, and among other, the lord Hume himselfe, for hast in the flight, had a fall from his horse, and burst the ca-nell bone of his necke, that he was faine to be caried straight to Edenborough, and finallye there departed this life of that hurt. So that it is true which C. O. saith, that in this skirnish manie a good rider was dismounted, their horses with curie saddles and loose bridles running by hill and downe dale, as if they had bene sturke mad, and to conclude (saith he)

—equi lassurus in hosti

Tergo alius summo tellurem vertice pulsans.

Then after this, the lord protector, and the earle of Warwicke, and other of the counsell, with a small gard, mounting by the hill where the slaughter had bene made, about halfe a mile southward from the Scottish campe, toke full view therof, the plot where they laie, so chosen for strength, as in all their coun-trie (some thought) not a better, saue on the south by a great marish, & on the north by the forth, which side they fenced with two field peeces, and certeine haque-butter a croke, lieng under a turffe wall, Eden-borough on the west at their backs, and eastward betwixt the Englishmen and them stronglie defended by the course of a riuer called Esk, running north into the forth, which as it was not verie deepe of water, so were the banks of it so high and steepe, as a small sort of resistants might haue bene able to keepe downe a great number of commers vp.
About a twelue scoze from the forth, ouer the same riuer, is there a stone bridge, which they did keepe also well garded with ordinance.

When the lord protector, and the earle of Warwicke had viewed euerie thing, as they thought expedient, they returned home towards their campe, alongst before the campe of the enimies, within lesse than two slight shots, entring into a lane of thirtie foot broad, fenced on either side with a wall of turffe, an ell of heighth. The Scots did often shot at them in the waie as they passed thus homewards, without hurt, saving the killing of an horse among thre hundred, the rider escaping else harmelesse. And as the dukes grace was passed twelue halfe the waie homewards, a Scottish herald with a cote of his princes armes vpon him (as the manner is) and with him a trumpetter, ouertooke them.

The herald declaring this message to the lord protector, pretended to come from the gouernour, to inquire of prisoners taken, and therewith to proffer honest conditions of peace. And after he had told his tale, then began the trumpetter, and said, how he was sent from the earle of Huntley: App lord my maister (saith he) hath willed me to shew your grace, that because this matter maie be the sooner ended, and with lesse hurt, he will fight with your grace for the whole quarell, twentie to twentie, ten to ten, or else himselfe alone with your grace man to man.
The lord protector hauing kept with him the lord lietenant, had heard them both thoroughlie, and then in answering, spake somewhat with louder voice, than they had done their messages. Wherevpon they that were the riders by, thinking that his grace would haue it no secret, were somewhat the bolder to come nearer, the words whereof were vttered so expedientlie with honour, and so honourable with expedition, that the standers by were moued to doubt whether they might rather note in them the promptnesse of a singular prudence, or the boldnesse of a noble courage: and they were thus.

Your gouernour maie know, that the speciall cause of our coming hither was not to fight, but for the thing that should be the locale, both of vs and you. For God we take to record, we mind no more swer.

realme of England, and therefore our quarell being so good, we trust God will prosper vs the better. But as for peace, he hath refused such conditions at our hands, as we will neuer proffer againe: and therefore let him looke for none, till this waie we make it: and thou trumpet, saie to thy maister, he saimeth to lacke wit so to make this chalenge to me, being of such estate, by the sufferance of God, as to haue so weightie a charge of so pretious a ietwell, the gouernance of a kings person, & then the protection of all his realims, whereby in this case I haue no power of my selfe, which if I had, as I am true gentleman, it should be the first bargain I would make: but there be a great sort amongst vs his equals, to whom he might haue made this chalenge without refusal.

The earle of Warwikes request and message to the earle of Huntley.

Then quoth the lord lieutenant to them both, He sheweth his small wit to make this chalenge to my lords grace, and he so meane, but if his grace will giue me leaue, I shall receiue it: and trumpet bring me word thy maister will so do, and thou shalt haue of me an hundred crownes. Saie (quoth my lords grace) the earle of Huntley is not meet in estate with you, my lord: but herald saie to the gouernor, and him also, that we haue bene a good season in this countrie, and are here now but with a smaller companie, and they a great number, and if they will meet vs in field, they shall be satisfied with fighting inough: and herald bring me word if they will so do, and by my honour I will giue the a thousand crownes. He haue a proud sort among you, but I trust to see your pride abated shortly, and of the erle Huntleys too: I wis he is a glorious young gentleman.

The order of war touching heralds violated.

This said, the earle of Warwike continued his request, that he might receiue this chalenge: but the lord protector would in no wise grant it. These messengers had their answers, and therewith leave to depart. The Scots in midst of this message, doing contrarie to the order of warre, which as it granteth safetie to heralds and trumpetters, to passe betwixt armie and armie: so during the time of any such message, as this was, hostile on both parts ought to cease, but it skilled not. On the morow after, they had their guns taken from them (as saith maister Patten) and put into their hands that could vse them with more good manner. But now concerning the message of the herald, it was thought that he was sent therewith, not for that it was beleued of them, that it would be accepted; but rather that whilst he was doing his errand, he might suruey the English powder: or else for that upon refusal of the offer, they might vse the victorie (whereof they accounted themselves assured) with more crueltie.

Theaine doubt of the Scots.

If nothing they doubted more, than least the Englishmen would haue bene gone backe, and gotten to the water, before they should haue encountered them, and therefore they had appointed to haue giuen the English armie a canifado in the night before the daie of the battell: but peraduenture, vnderstanding that the Englishmen had warning of their intention, and were provided for them if they had come, they staied and came not at all. But in the morning, they were by verie timelie, and being put in order of battell, they marched straight towards the English campe, against whom then, though they saw the English horsemen readilie to make: yet could not be persuaded, but that it was for a policie to staie them, till the English footmen and carriages might fullie be bestowed a shipboard, and that for the same purpose the English ships were come backe from before Lieth.

Ordinance planted against the enimie.

In the night of this daie, the dukes grace appointed, that earle in the next morning part of the ordinance should be planted in the lane (where men tion before is made) vnder the turre of the wall, next to their campe, and some also to be set vpon the hill nie to Andzelske church afore remembred: and this to the intent we should with our shot cause them either wholie to remoue their campe, or else much to annoie them in that place where they laie. It was not the least of the Englishmens meaning also to win from them certeine of their ordinance, that laie nearest vnto this church. And herewith the same morning, being the tenth of September, and Saturday, somewhat before eight of the clocke, the English armie dislodged, & marched straight toward the church of Andzelske, as well for intent to haue incamped nere the same, as for placing their ordinance, and other considerations afore remembred.

The Scots either for feare of the Englishmens departing, or hope of their spoiling, were out of their campe comming toward them, passed the riuer, gathered in arais, and well nere at this church, per the Englishmen were halfe waie to it, so quite disappointing the Englishmens purpose. Which at the first seemed verie strange in their eies, as altogether beside their expectation, as they that thought they would neuer haue forsaken their strength, to meet them in the field. But after it was knowne that they did not onelie thus purpose to do, but also to haue assailed them in their campe, as they laie if they had not bene stirring the timelier, and hauing caused all their tents to be let flat downe to the ground, per they came out, because none should lie lurking behind them in their campe, and as well the nobles as other, leaving their horses behind them (except such as were appointed to serue on horsebacke) marched on with their souldiours on foot.

They came speedilie forwards on both sides, the one till then no whit aware of the others intent: but the Scots indeed with a rounder pace betwene two hillocks, betwixt the Englishmen and the church, mistred somewhat by in, at whome as they staied, the English galle shot off, & slue the maister of Grefine, with fife and twentie others nere by him, and therewith so skard foure thousand Irish archers, brought by the earle of Argile, that where (as it was said) they should haue bene a wing to the foreward, they could neuer after be made to come forward. Herby on did their armie hastily remoue, & from thence declining southward, toke their direct waie toward Faulside braie. Of this, sir Rafe Blane, lieutenant of all the English horsemen, first of all, or with the first, noting it, quicklie aduertised the lord protector, who thereby did readilie conceiue their meaning, which was to win the hill, and thereby the wind and sunne, the gaine of which thre things (as is thought) whether partie in fight of battell can hap to obtaine, hath his force doubled against his enimie.

In all this enterpasse, they used for haste so little the helpe of horse, that they plucked forth their ordinance by draught of men, which at that present began strilie to shot off towards the English armie, whereby it was perceiued they ment more than a skirmish. Herewith euerie man began to applie him selfe in his charge and dutie which he had to do. And herewith the lord protector, and other of the counsell on horsebacke as they were, fell straight in consultation. The sharpnesse of whose circumspect wisdoms, as it quicklie espied out the enemies intents, so did it among other things promptlie prouide them in remedie, to prevent them (as needfull it was) for the time asked no leisure.

Their deuise was, that the lord Greie of Willton, marshall of the armie, with his band of Bolleners, and with the lord protectors band, and the earle of Warwikes, all to the number of eightene hundred horsemen, on the left hand on the east halfe, and sir Rafe

Kase Wane, with sir Thomas Warcie capteine of the penfioners, and men of armes, and the lord Jfity-waters, with his band of demulances, all to the number of fiftene hundred, to be readie and euen with the lord marshall, on the west halfe. And thus all these together afore to incounter the enemies afront, whereby either to breake their arae, and that waie to stop them of their gate, and force them to fraie, while the fore-ward might wholie haue the hill side, and the battell and rere-ward be placed in grounds next that in order, and best for aduantage. And after this, that the same horsemen should retire vp to the hill side to come downe in order afresh, and inest them on both sides, whilest the foot battells should occupie them in fight afront.

The lord
Scots resist to the top protecto.

Which enterprife, though it seemed right dangerous to the assailers, yet was it not more wiselie devised by the counsell, than valiantlie and willinglie executed of the lord marshall, & the others. For euen there taking their leaues of the counsell, the said lord marshall requiring onelie, that if it went not well with him, the dukes grace would be good to his wife & children, he said he would meet those Scots, and so with their bands the foresaid capteins toke their waie, and made towards the enemy. By this time were the fore-wards on either part aduanced within two sight shots in lumber. The Scots came on so fast, that it was thought of the most part of the Englishmen, they were rather horsemen than footmen. The Englishmen againe were led the more with speed, to shew that they were as willing as the Scots to trie the battell. The master of the ordinance to their great aduantage plucked vp the hill at that instant certeine peeces, and some after planted two or three canons of them welnigh upon the top there, whereby hauing so much the helpe of the hill, he might ouer the Englishmens heads shot niest at the enimie. As the lord protector had so circumspectie taken order for the arae and station of the armye, and for the execution of euerie mans office beside, he being perfectlie appointed in safre armour, accompanied onelie with sir Thomas Chaloner knight, one of the clerkes of the kings priue counsell, got him to the hight of the hill, to carrie by the ordinance, where he might best surueie the whole field, and succour with aid where most he saw need, and also by his presence to be a defense to the thing that stood weakest in place, and also most in daunger, the which how much it stood in stead, anon ye shall heare further.

The Scots
are here vpon
the sudden,

As he was halfe vp the hill, the erle of Warwicke was ware the enemies were all at a sudden state, and stood still a good while, so that it seemed to him that they perceiving now their owne follie in leauing their ground of aduantage, had no will to come anie further forward, but gladlie would haue bin whence they came. The reasons were these. First because at that time, beside the full muster of the English footmen, of whome they thought there had bene none there in field, but all to haue bene either thipt, or a shipping; then they saw plaine that the Englishmen were sure to haue the gaine of the hill, and they the ground of disaduantage out of their hold, and put from their hope: and hereto, for that their herald gaue the lord protector no warning, the which by him (if they had ment to fight it out) who would not haue presumed that for the estimation of their honoz, they would little haue stucke to haue sent; and he againe, and it had bene but for his thousand crotons, would right gladlie haue brought: Well yet how so euer their meaning changed, finally considering belike the state they stood in, that as they had left their strength too soone, so now to be too late to repent, vp-on a change of countenance, they made hastilie forward againe, and (as it seemed) with no lesse stoutnesse of courage, than stronglie in order, whose manner, armour, weapon, and order in fight in those daies and also before (though now somewhat changed as well as amongst other nations) was as insueth.

Harquebutters had they few, and appointed their fight most commonlie alwaies on foot. They used to come to the field well furnished, with sacke and skull, dagger, buckler, and swords, all notable bryde and thin, of exceeding good temper, and vniuersallie so made to slice, as hard it is to deniue the better: hereto euerie man his pike, and a great hercher wapped twisse or thysle about his necke, not for cold but for cutting. In their arae toward the joining with the enemie, they thrust so nie in the fore-ranke, shoulder to shoul-der, together with their pikes in both hands, streight afore them, and their followers in that order so hard at their backs, laeing their pikes ouer their foregoers shoul-ders, that if they do assaile vn-disseuered, no force can well withstand them.

Standing at defense, they thrust shoul-ders like, wise so nie together, the fore-ranks well nie to kneeling scope low before, for their fellows behind, holding their pikes in both hands, and there with in their left their bucklers, the one end of their pike against their right foot, the other against the enemye breast high, their followers crossing their pike points with them before, and thus each with other, so nie as place and space will suffer, through the whole ranks so thicke, that as easilie shall a bare finger pearce through the skin of an angrie hedgehog, as anie in-counter the front of their pikes. Thus prouided, they (I meane the Scots) addressed themselves to incounter inflamed with a heat of furious hatz, but not advised whether the cause were iust or vniust, for the which they were vp in armes: which foolish madnesse the poet pointeth at, and painteth out, saeing:

Arma Scotus poscit, valida contendere vi vult,

Is nec habet pensū sit id equum an profus iniquum.

The lord marshall notwithstanding, whome no danger detracted from doing his enterprife, with the companie and order afore appointed, came full in their faces from the hill side towards them. Wherewith waied it verie hot on both sides, with pittifull cries, horrible roze, and terrible thundering of guns, beside the daie darkened aboue head with smoke of the artillerie, the sight and apperance of the enemye euen at hand before, the danger of death on euerie side else, the bullets, pellets and arrowes flieng each where so thicke, and so uncerteinlie lighting, that no where was there anie suretie of safetie, euerie man stricken with a dreadfull feare, not so much perchance of death, as of hurt, which things though they were but certeine to some, yet doubted of all, affered crueltie at the enemies hands, without hope of mercie, death to die, and danger to fight.

The whole face of the field on both sides vpon this point of joining, both to the eie and to the eare so heauie, so deadlie, lamentable, furious, outragious, terrible, confuse, and so quite against the quiet nature of man, as if to the nobilitie the regard of their honor and fame, to the knights and capteines the estimation of their worship and honestie, and general-lie to them all the naturall motion of bounden du-tie, their owne safetie, hope of victorie, and the fauour of God, that they trusted vpon for the equitie of their quarrell, had not bene a more vehement cause of courage, than the danger of death was cause of feare, the verie horrour of the thing had bene able to haue made anie man to forget both prouesse and policie.
But the lord marshall and the others, with vnfent mind and courage warlike and quicklie continued their course towards them. The enemies were in a

The enimie perceiuing the Englishmen fast to approach, disposed themselves to abide the hunt, and in this order stood still to receiue them. The earle of Angus next to the Englishmen in the Scottish foreward as capteine of the same, with an eight thousand men, and foure or fve peeces of ordinance on his right hand, and a foure hundred horsemen on his left. Behind him westward, the gouernour with ten thousand Inland men (as they call them) the choicest soldiers counted of their countrie. And the earle of Huntlie in the rere-ward, twelnie even with the battell on the left side with eight thousand. The foure thousand Irish archers as a wing to them both, last indeed in order, & first (as they said) that ran awaie. The battell and also the rere-ward were garded likewise with their ordinance according.

Edward
Shelleie.

John Greie.

Edward Shelleie lieutenant vnder the lord Greie of his band of Bullenens, was the first that passed ouer the slough. The lord Greie himselfe next, with the lord John Greie and others in the foremost ranke, and so then after two or thre rankes of their former bands. But badlie yet could they make their race, by reason the furrowes laie trauctie to their course. That notwithstanding, and though also they were nothing likelie well to be able thus affront to come within them to do them hurt, as well because the Scottishmens pikes were as long or longer than their staves, as also for that their horses were all naked without bards, whereof though there were right manie among them, yet not one put on, for as much as at their comming forth in the morning, they looked for nothing lesse than for battell that daie: yet did those worthe gentlemen, the lord Greie of Wiltton, the lord John Greie, and maister Shelleie with the residue, so valiantlie & stronglie giue the charge vpon them, that whether it were by their prowesse or power, the left side of the enimies that his lordship did set vpon (though their order remained vnbroken) was yet compelled to swate a good waie backe, and giue ground largelie, and all the residue of them beside to stand much amazed.

The English
horsemen repelled.

Beside this, as the Englishmen were twelnie at their enimies, they stood verie bzaue and bzaggging, shakng their pike points, & crieng: Come lounds, come here likes, come herelikes; and such like rhytlike they used. But though (saith maister Patten) they meant but small humanitie, yet shewed they thereby much ciuilitie, both of faire plaie, to warne per they stroke, and of formall order, to chide per they fought. The English capteines that were behind, perceiuing at eie, that both by the vneuenesse of the ground, by the sturdie order of the enimie, and for that their fellows were so nie and streight besore them, they were not able to anie aduantage to mainteine this onset, did therefore according to the denise in that point appointed, turne themselves, and made a soft retire vp toward the hill againe. Howbeit, to confesse the truth, some of the number that knew not the preperped policie of the counsell in this case, made of a sober aduised retire, an hastie, rash, and vnaduised flight: howbeit, without capteine or standard, & vpon no cause of need, but of a mere vndiscretion and madnesse. A madnesse indeed, for first the Scots were not able to pursue, because they were fatigued; and then if they could, what hope by flight to farre from home in their enimies land, where was no place of refuge?

The valiant lord Greie, Edward Shelleie, little Preston, Hampton, and Terringham, Bullenens, Katcliffe, the lord Fitzwaters brother, sir John Cleres sonne and heire, Hauleie a gentleman of right commendable prowesse, Digs of Kent, Ellerker a pensioner, Segraue: of the duke of Summersets band, Standleie, Woodhouse, Constie, Hogill, Pozris, Denis, Arthur, and Atkinson, with other in the fore-ranke, not being able in this earnest assault, both to tend to their fight afoze, and to the re-10 tative behind: the Scots againe well considering hereby how weake they remained, caught courage afresh, ran sharplie forward vpon them, and without anie mercie, slue the most part of them that abode furthest in pzeale a fir more of Bullenens, and other than before are named, in all to the number of twentie fir, and most part gentlemen. My lord Greie yet and my lord John Greie, and likewise my lord Edward Seimer (as some grace was) returned 20 again; but neither all in safetie, nor without cut-tent markes they had bin there: for the lord Greie with a pike through the mouth was rased a long from the tip of the tong, and thrust that waie verie 30 dangerouslie more than two inches in the necke; and the other two had their horses vnder them with swords soze wounded. Like as also a little before this onset, sir Thomas Darcie vpon his approach to the enimies, was striken glansing wise on the right 40
side, with a bullet of one of their field peeces, and thereby his bodie bzased with the botwing in of his armour, his sword hilts broken, and the forefinger of his right hand beaten flat. Euen so vpon the parting of this fraie, was sir Arthur Darcie slayt at with 50
swords, and so hurt vpon the wedding finger of his right hand also, as it was counted for the first part of curing to haue it quite cut awaie.

About the same time, certeine of the Scots ran on hastlie to the kings standard of the horsemen 60
(the which sir Andrew Flammoche bare) and lateng fast hold vpon the stasse therof, cried, A king, a king, that if both his strength, his hart, and his horse had not bene good, and here with somewhat aided at this pinch by sir Rafe Coppinger a pensioner, both he had bene slaine, and the standard lost, which the Scots neuertheless held so fast, that they brake and bare awaie the nether end of the stasse to the burrell, and intended so much to the gaine of the standard, that sir Andrew (as hap was) scaped home all safe, and else 70 without hurt. At this businesse also the lord Fitzwaters, both earle of Suller and lord chamberleine to the queenes maiestie, capteine there of a number 80 of demilances was vnhorst, but some mounted againe, scaped yet in great danger, and his horse all belwen. Hereat further were Caluerleie the standard-bearer of the men at armes, and Clement Panton a pensioner, thrust each of them into the leg with 90
pikes, and Don Philip a Spaniard into the knee, diuerse others maimed and hurt, and manie horses soze wounded beside.

By this time had the English foreward accordingly gotten the full vantage of the hilles side, and in respect of their march stood sideling toward the enimie: who neuertheless were not able in all parts to stand full square in arraie: by reason that at the west end of them vpon their right hand, and toward the enimie, there was a square plot inclosed with turfes (as their maner of fencing in those parts, as well as in diuerse other is) one corner whereof did let the square of the same arraie. The battell in good of the English armie in this wise, they shewed themselves in maner to compasse in the Scots battells, that they should no waie escape them: but how little able they were to do it with power and number, you may easilie coniecture.

Those horsemen that were so repelled, and in their comming backe disorderlie brake their arraie from the residue, ran so hussilie through the ranks of the English fore-ward as it stood, that it did both disorder manie, feared manie, and was a great inconvenience to the entinie. The worthie earle of Mar-10 boke, who had the guiding of this fore-ward, right valiantlie had conducted the same to their standing, and there did berie noble incourage and comfort them with such cherefull words, offering to live and die among them, that doubtlesse his presence, demonstrating himselfe in such manlike sort, stood the whole company in great stead. Neither wanted there the chearefull diligence of those capteines, with whome his honor was furnished in that fore-ward likewise to incourage their bands, nor the worthie behavout of other in the battell and rere-ward, everie one according to his calling, shewing such proofe of his du-tie, as the most part certeinlie deserved to have their names registred in the kalender of fame, where no rust of cankered oblivion might fret out the remembrance of their commendable demeanours: and therefore if anie among them should haue shewed anie lacke of courage, their dyspaise had bene the more, sith by others they saw such worthie example giuen, and were to stand upon this resolution, to have harts hardened against all hazards in a iust cause, whereof they hoped almightie God had undertaken the managing and direction, unto whome they had committed the same; as the poet truelie saith:

Iusta Deo commissa Anglorum causa tonanti, Audaces animos fecit impavidosq; pericli.

But sith there were so manie that did well, & ther-foze deserving a longer processe to be made of their high valiances shewed in that dangerous seruice, than this volume may permit, I will proceed to the battell. The Scots were somewhat disordered with their comming out about the slaughter of the Englishmen, the which they did so earnestlie follow, that they toke not one to mercie. The dukes grace placing himselfe (as ye haue heard) on the hill of Faur-side braie, and therewith perceiving the great disorder of the stragling horsemen, that had in the retire broken arraie, hemmed them in from further straieng, whome sir Rafe Wane, and others of the cap-teins sone after with great dexteritie brought into good order and arraie againe, and with all the rest of the strengths of the whole armie, by the policie of the lords, and diligence of everie capteine and officer beside, were so litlie and apilie applied in their feat, that where this repulse giuen by the entinie to the horsemen was doubted of manie, to turne to the whole losse of the field, the same was wrought and advanced according as it was devised, to the great certeinie of gaine and victorie. For first at this slough, where most of the horsemen had stood, sir Peter Spewtas capteine of all the harquebutters a foot did berie valiantlie conduct & place a good number of his men in maner hard at the faces of the entines, whereunto sir Peter Camboa a Spaniard, capteine of two hundred harquebutters, Spaniards, and Italians on horsebacke did readilie bring his men also, who with the hot continuance of their shot in both parts, did so frontlie fraie the entines, that they could not well come further forward: then the archers that marched in arraie on the right hand of the footmen, and next to the entines, pricked them tharpelie with arrows as they stood. Therewith the master of the ordnance, to their great annoiance, did gall them with halle shot and other out of the great ordnance, directlie from the hill top, and certeine other gunners with their peeces a flanke from the rere-ward, most of the artillerie and mistue engines then who-lie thus at once, with great puissance and beheimen-cie occupied about them, herewith the full sight of the Englishmen, all shadowed from them before by the horsemen, and dust raised, whome then they were ware in such order to be so nere upon them, and to this the perfect arraie of the horsemen againe com-ming contragrouse to set on them afterly, miserable men, perceiving themselves then all too late, how much too much they had overshot themselves, began suddenlie to shrink.

Their gouvernour and other the principall capteins that had brought them to the bargaine, toke their horses and fled amaine, which other perceiving did quicklie follow, and with the foremost of that crue their Irishmen, and therewith turned all the whole rout, cast downe their weapons, ran out of their wards, off with their iackes, and with all that euer they might, betoke them to the race that their gover-nour began. The Englishmen at the first had found them (as that could scape so manie eies) and tharplie and quicklie with an vnuerfall outcrie, they fle, they fle, pursued after in chase so egerlie, and with such fiercenesse, that they overtoke manie, and sparred indeed but few, that when they were once turned, it was a wonder to see how sone, and in how sundrie sorts they were scattered. The place they stood on like a wood of staves strewed on the ground, as ru-thes in a chamber, unpasseable (they laie so thicke) for either horse or man. Here at the first had they let fall all their pikes, and after that, everie where scattered swords, bucklers, daggers, iackes, and all things else that was of anie weight, or might be any let to their course: which course among them, three waies speciallie they made, some along the sands by the Irish towards Litch, some straight towards Eddenburgh, whereof part through the park there (in the wallies whereof, though they be round about of sint stone, yet were there manie holes already made) and part of them by the high waie that leadeth along by the abbaye of Holierood house; and the residue and most part of them towards Wakest, which waie by means of the marish our horsemen were worst able to follow.

Sundrie shifts, some sheld, some soze, made they in their running: diuerse of them in their courses, as they were ware they were pursued but of one, would suddenlie start backe, and lath at the legs of the horse, or soine him in the bellie, and sometime did they reach at the rider also, whereby Clement Passon in the arme, and diuerse in other parts of their bodies otherwise in this chase were hurt. Some other laie flat in a furrow as they were dead, thereby past by of the Englishmen untouched, and (as was reported) the earle of Angus confessed he con-ched in that sort till his horse hapt to be brought him.
Other some were found to skate in the river, courting downe his bodie under the root of some willow tree, with scant his nose above water for breath. Some for lightnesse cast awaye shoes and doublets, and ran in their shirts, and some were seene in this race all breathlesse to fall flat downe, and haue run themselves to death.

Before this, at the time of the onset, which the English horsemen gaue, there came eastward five hundred of the Scottish horsemen by along this Faur-side braie, straight upon the English ordnance and carriage. The lord protector (as ye haue heard) most speciallie for doubt hereof, placing himselfe by the same, caused a pece or two to be turned toward them, with a few shots whereof they were sone tarned also and fled to Wakeh. But had they kept on their purpose, they were provided for accordingly. For one parson Heble a chaplain of his graces, and two or three other, by and by discharged four or five of the carts of munition, and therewith bestowed pikes, bills, bowes and arrowes, to as manie as came; so that of carters and other, there were some weaponed about a thousand, whome parson Heble and the other did verie handsonlie dispose in arraie, and made a pretie muster.

the slaughter.

To retorne now after this notable stretching of their footmens weapons, began a pittfull sight of the dead corpses, lieng disperfed abrode, some their legs off, some but hough, and lest lieng halfe dead, some thrust quite through the bodie, others their necks halfe a funder, manie their heads clouen, with other thousand kinds of killing. After that, and further in chase all for the most part killed, either in the head, or in the necke, for the horsemen could not well reach them lower with their swords. And thus with blood and slaughter of the enimie, this chase was continued five miles in length, westward from the place of their standing, which was in the fallow fields of Wndeske, untill Edenburgh parke, and well nigh to the gates of the towne it selfe, and unto Liff, and in breadth nre four miles, from the Forth sands up to ward Wakeh southwards: in all which space, the dead bodie laie as thicke as a man may note cattell grafsing in a full replenished pasture. The river ran all red with blood (a signe of great slaughter) so that in the same chase were slaine to the number of ten thousand men, some saie about foureteene thousand, as I doe find by this report concerning the battell:

The number of Scots slaine.

Millia bis septem sunt morte absumpsa Scotorum, Cetera pars certam querit fugiendo salutem.

To conclude, considering the smalnesse of the Englishmens number, and shortnesse of the time (which was scant five houres, from one till well nigh six) the mortalitie was so great (as it was thought) the like afore time had not bene scene. One great cause whie the Englishmen spared so few of them, was thought to be their tyrannous vow by them made (which the Englishmen certainly heard of) that whensoever they fought and ouercame, they would kill so manie, and spare so few: a sure proofe whereof they plainelie had shewed at the first onset given, where they killed all, and saved not a man that came within their danger. An other respect was, to revenge their great and cruell tyrannie shewed at Banlar hough, where they slue the lord Cuers, whome otherwise they might haue taken prisoner and saved, and cruellie killed as manie else of our men as came into their hands. An other occasion also was their armor among them so little differing, all clad alike in sacks couered with white leather, doublets of the same, or of fustian, and most comithonlie all white hosen, not one with either chaine, bryoch, ring, or garment of silke, unlesse chains of latten drawne foure or five times along the upper stocks, or to vse master Pattens words, the thighs of their hosen and doublet sleeves for cutting.

The apparell of the Scots.

This lacke for difference in apparell was the chiefest cause that so manie of their great men and gentlemen were killed, and so few saved. The outward shew, the resemblance or signe, whereby a stranger might discern a poore man from a gentleman, was not among them to be scene: as for words and godlie profers of great ransoms, were as rife in the mouths of the one as the other. And it came here to passe, that after at the examination and counting of the prisoners, there were found taken about twentie of their common countrie people, to one of their gentlemen, whome no man need to doubt the Englishmen had rather haue spared than the other, if they could haue scene anie difference betwene them in taking. And yet verelie considering the case as it stood, the Englishmen shewed more grace, and toke more to mercie, than the respects before mentioned might seeme to haue required. For beside the earle of Huntlie, who in god armor appointed like a gentleman of anie among them, but could not then escape because he lacked his horse, and layned to be taken by sir Rafe Glane, and beside the lord of Deyster, Hobbie Hambleton capteine of Dunbar, the master of Sanpole, the lord of Wilmings taken by John Bzen, a brother of the earle of Castils, and besides one Pontrell, taken by Cornelius comptroller of the ordnance in the armie, and one Camals an Irish gentleman, and beside manie other Scottish gentlemen more, taken by diuerse others.

The prisoners reckoned in the marshals booke were numbred to aboute fiftene hundred. Touching the slaughter, sure they killed not so manie, as for the time & opportunitie they might, if they had minded crueltie. For the lord protector moved with pitie at the sight of the dead bodies, and rather glad of victorie than desirous of slaughter, some after (by gelle) five of the clocke, fraid the standard of his horsemen at the furthest part of their campe westward, & caused the trimpets to sound a retreat. Whereat also sir Rafe Sadler treasurer (whose great diligence at that time, and readie forwardnesse in the chieft of the fraie before, did worthilie merit no small commendation) caused all the footmen to staie; and then with much trauell & great paine made them to be brought in some order againe: which was a thing not easilie done, by reason they all as then were somewhat busie in applieng their market, the spoile of the Scottish campe, where was found god provision of white bread, ale, otencaks, otemeale, mutton, butter in pots, chese, and in diuerse tents god wine also, and in some tents among them was found some silver plate and chalices, which with god deuotion ye maie be sure were plucked out of their cold clouts, and thrust into their warme bosoms.

The plot of their campe called Edmonston codge, nigh Silberton a place of the lord of Wilmings, halfe a mile beyond Hushelburgh, and four miles on this side Edenburgh, occupied in largenesse with diuerse tents and tenticles, that stood in sundrie places out of square, about a miles compasse, wherein as the Englishmen upon the sound of the retreat somewhat assembled, they all with a loud and entire outcrie and hallowing, in signe of gladnesse and victorie, made an vniuersall noise and shout, the shrillnesse whereof (as after was reported) was heard unto Edenburgh. It was a wonder to see, but (as they saie) make hands make light toke: how some the dead bodies were stripped out of their garments stark naked, even from as farre as the chafe went, unto the place of the onset, whereby the personages of the enimies might by the waie easilie be viewed and considered, the which for the talnesse of their stature, cleannesse of skin, bignesse of bone, with due proportion in all parts was such, as the beholders, if they had not scene it, would not haue believed that there had bene so many of that sort in all their countrie. Among them laie manie priests, and kirkmen, as they call them, of whome it was huted that there was a whole band of three or foure thousand, but it was found afterwards not to be altogether so.

Among other battnets, standards, and pennons, a banner of white sarsenet was found, vnder which it was said these kirkmen came, whereupon was painted a woman with hir haire about hir shoulders, kneeling before a crucifix, on hir right hand a church, after that written in great Romaine letters,

Afflictae sponsae ne obliuiscaris. It was said that this was the abbat of Dunfermlings banner, but whether it was his or the bishop of Dunkels, the gouernours brother, who (as was said) were both in the field, his meaning was, to signifie that the church made intercession to Christ hir husband, not now to forget hir his sponse, being at that time afflicted and persecuted by the Englishmen. But whose denisse soeuer it was, it maie seme, that this church comming thus to battell, full appointed with weapon, and garded with such a sort of deacons to fight, howsoeuer in pain-ting he had set hir out, a man might well thinke, that in condition, he had rather framed hir like a curst queane, that would plucke hir husband by the pate, except he had hir will; than like a meke sponse, that went about humbly by submission and prayer to des-ire hir husbands helpe, for redresse of thyngs amisse. But now to leaue this paelat with his Afflictae spon-sae, and to make an end with this battell. There was upon fawrside braie, a little castell or pile, which was herie buile all the tyme of the battell, as anie of the Englishmen came nigh it, to shot at them, with such artillerie as they had; which was none other than of handgouns and harquebuts, & of them not a dozen neither. A litle hurt they did, but as they saw their fel-lowes in the field thus dyen and beaten abate be-fore their faces, they plucked in their peeces, and cou-ched themselves withur all mute: but by and by the house was set on fire, and they for their god wils burned and smothered withur. Thus (saith master Patten) throughe the fauour of Gods bountie, by the valliance and policie of the lord protektor, by the for-ward indouour of all the nobles and counsell there be-fore, and by the willing diligence of euerie cap-taine, officer, and true subiect else, they most valiant-ly wan the victorie ouer their enemies; of whome such slaughter was made in the field, as ye haue heard, amongst whome (as the prisoners reported) beside the lord Fleming, the lard of Loghestuare, the master of Greim, the master of Arkin, the mas-ter of Wglebie, the master of Auendale, the master of Rouen, and manie other of noble birth amongst them, there were of lards, lards sons, and other gen-tilmen slaine aboue twentie six hundred, & among the prisoners also there were manie gentlemen, spe-ciallie of name these: the earle of Huntlye lord chan-celler of the realme, the lord of Deffer, Hobbie Ham-ilton captaine of Dunbar, the master of San-pole, the lord of Wlimes, and a brother of the earle of Camis. Two thousand by lurking and lying (as they had bene dead) escaped awaie in the night all malmed and hurt. Herewith of weapons and armor more was found than the Englishmen did bough- safe to giue carriage for: & yet were there conueied thence by ship into England, of sacks speciallie and swordes, aboue thirtie thousand.

This night the Englishmen with great gladnesse and thanksgiuing to God (as god cause they had) a-bout seauen of the clocke pitched their campe at Codgebuckling braie, beside Winkerlongh, and a mile beyond the place they camped at before. Now after the battell, among other questions, one was moued who killed the first man that daie in the field, the glorie whereof one Jeronimo an Italian would glablie haue had, a gentleman sure that had serued that daie right valiantlie: howbeit it was after well tried, that Cutbert Spulgrau, a gentleman of the earle of Marthwicks, deserued the praise of killing the first enimie that died that daie, who right hardilie slue a gunner at his pece in the Scots foreward, per-euer they began anie whitt to turne. As for the oddi-narie soldiors, it was a pleasure vnto them to make rehercall of their aduentures pass, and to record that dangers (in maner inenitable) they had escaped, according to the poets report in that case, saying: res est meminisse laboris Præteriti iucunda: grauis effugisse periculum Summa recordari securamente voluptas.

The next daie being sundae the eleuenth of Sep-tember, somewhat before none, the armie remoued, & marching along the forth side toward Lieth, about thre of the clocke in the after none pitched their field, a picke shot on this side that towne on the southeast halfe, somewhat shadowed from Coten-burgh by a hill, but yet the most part of it laie with- in the full sight and shot of the castell there, and in di-stance somewhat aboue a quarter of a mile. The lord marshall, and the most part of the hostmen were bestowed and lodged in the towne of Lieth. The dukes grace, the lord lieutenant, and the rest of the armie in the campe. On tuesdaie the thirtenth of September, the smaller vessels of the English fleet burned Binkorne, and a towne of two standing on the north thore of the Forth against Lieth.

In the after none the dukes grace roved by the forth a six or seuen miles westward, as it runneth into the land, and toke in his waie an Island there called saint Comins ins, which lieth foure miles be- yond Lieth, and a good waie nether the north thore than the south, yet not within a mile of the nearest. It is but halfe a mile about, and had in it an abbey, but the monks were gone: fresh water enough, and store of conies, and is so naturallie strong, that but by one waie it can be entred; the plot whereof the lord protektor considering, did quicklie cast to haue it kept, whereby all traffike of merchandize, all com-modities else comming by the forth into their land, and vnterlie the whole vse of the forth it selfe, with all the hauens vpon it, should quite be taken from them.

The next daie the lord protektor riding backe a-gaine eastward, to view diuerse thyngs and places, toke Waketh in his waie, where a house of Cecoge Dowglas did stand, and comming somewhat nere it, he sent Summer set his herald with a trumpet to know who kept it, and whether the keepers would hold or yeld it to his grace: Answer was made, that there were thre score persons within, whome their maister lieng there saturday at night after the bat-tell, did will that they, the house, and all that was in it, should be at his graces commandement. Where-vpon the chiefe came, and in name of all the rest humbled himselfe to the dukes will. From thence his grace passed to the place where the battell had bene stricken, and so by Spuskilburgh returned backe to the campe.

On thursdaie being the fiftenth of this moneth, the lord Clinton high admerall, taking with him the gallie whereof Richard Broke was captaine, and foure or five other smaller vessels besides, as well ap-pointed with munition and men, roved by the forth a ten miles westward, to an haue towne standing on the south thore called Blacke Hesse, whereat to-ward the water side is a castell of a pretie strength; as nigh whereunto as the depth of the water would suffer, the Scots for safegard had laid the Marie Willoughbie, and the Anthonie of Newcastle, two tall ships, which with extreme iniurie they had stol-len from the Englishmen before time, when no war was betwixt vs: with these laie there also an other large vessell called the Wolfe, and seauen more, wher-of part laden with merchandize. The lord Clinton and his companie with right hardie approach, after a great conflict betwixt the castell and his vessels, by fine force wan from them those thre ships of name, and burnt all the residue before their faces.

The firtenth of September the lord of Wilmston a Scottish gentleman came to the dukes grace from hauing with him an hundred harquebutteres, fiftie pioners, & two rowe barks well furnished with munition, and thre score and ten mariners to remaine there, & keepe that from inuasion of the enimies, against whom the English were so sharplie whetted, that when they came to encounter, they gaue profe

The earle of Bothwell.

In the time whilste the armie laie thus in the campe betwene Lieth and Edenburgh, manie lards and gentlemen came in to the lord protector to requyre his protection, the which his grace to whome he thought good did grant. This daie came the earle of Bothwell to his grace, who hauing bene kept in prison by the gouernour, the night after the battell was set at libertie, and comming thus to the lord protector, was frienblie welcomed and interteined; and hauing this night supped with his grace, he departed.

Lieth burned.

Lieth was set on fire this saturdaye, whereas it was meant, that there should haue bene but one house onelie burnt, belonging to one Barton that had plaid a slipperie part with the lord protector. But the soldiors being set a worke to fire that house, fired all the rest. Sir great thys also that laie in the hauen, which for their age and decaye were not so apt for vse, were likewise set on fire and burnt. On sundaye the eightenth of September, the lord protector (for considerations mouing him to pittie) hauing all this while spared Edenburgh from hurt, did so leaue it, but Lieth and the ships burning, some after seauen of the clocke in the morning, caused the campe to dislodge, and as they were raised and on foot, the castell shot off a peale, with chambers hard-lie and all, of foure and twentie peces. Passing that daie seauen miles, they camped earlie for that night at Craintoun by a place of the lard of Wymmsoun.

dislodged.

Craintoun.

The same morning the lord protector made master Andzew Dupleie knight, brother to the earle of Warwicke, dispatched my lord admerall and him by ships full fraught with men and munition toward the winning of an hold in the east side of Scotland called Broughticrag, which stood in such sort in the mouth of the riuer of Taie, as that being gotten, both Dundee, saint Johns towne, and diuerse other townes standing vpon the same riuer the best of the countrie in those parts, set vpon the Taie, should either become subiect vnto this hold, or else be compelled to forgo the whole vse of the riuer, for hauing anie thing comming in or outward. The lord admerall, and the said sir Andzew sped themselves with such good successe and diligence in that enter-pryse, that on the wednesdaye following, being the one and twentieth of September, after certeine of their shot discharged against that castell, the same was yielded vnto them, the which sir Andzew did then enter, and after kept, as capteine to his high passe and commendation.

lishmen.

Lawder.

But now to the armie. On mondaie the nineteenth of September, they marched ten miles, and incamped a little on this side a market towne called Lawder. Here as they were settled in their lodging, the herald Porrie returned from the Scottish coun-cell, with the lard of Wymmsoun, and Rose their herald, who vpon their sute to the lord protector, obtained that sue of their counsell should haue his graces safe conduct, that at anie time and place within six-tene daies, during his abode in their countrie, or at Berwicke, the same sue might come and commune with sue of the English counsell, touching matters in controuersie betwene them. Rose the herald departed earlie with his safe conduct, the campe raised, and that daie they went seauen miles till as far as Hume castell, where they camped on the west side of a rockie hill that they call Hare crag, standing about a mile westward from the castell.

Here they did so much by the way that they ment indeed to win the castell by force, if otherwise they might not haue it, causing a certeine number of harquebutteres vpon appointment before to beset the castell, and to watch that none should passe in or out, that in the end, the ladie of the house, and other that were within in charge with it, yielded it vp to the lord protector's hands: for the ladie doubting the losse of hir son that was prisoner with the Englishmen, hauing the first daie bene with the lord protector, and got respite till the next daie at none, in the meane time consulted with hir sonne, and other hir friends the keepers of the castell, returned at the time appointed the next daie, being the one and twentith of that moneth, and made sute for a longer respite till eight of the clocke at night, and therewith safe conduct for Andzew Hume hir second son, and John Hume lard of Colban Knokos, a kinsman of hir husbands, capteins of this castell, to come and speake with his grace in the meane while. It was granted hir. Wherevpon these capteins about thre of the clocke came to the lord protector, and after other couenants (with long debating on both parts) agreed vpon, the and these capteins concluded to giue their assent to render the castell, so far forth as the rest of the keepers would therewith be contented, for two or thre within (said they) were also in charge with keeping it as well as they, for knowledge of whose minds the duke sent Summerfet his herald with this ladie to the castell vnto them; who as the herald had made them pise to the articles, would faine haue had letsure for foure and twentie hours longer, to send to their lord to Edenburgh, where he laie hurt (as before you haue heard) and in danger of death, which followed of the fall that he caught at the first daies skirmish before the battell, to know his will and ple-sure in this point of rendering vp the castell: but being wiselie and sharplie called vpon by the herald, they agreed to the couenants afore by their ladie and capteins concluded on: whereof part (as the sequelle the next daie in the morning by ten of the clocke with bag and baggage, as much as they could carie, leauing all munition and vittels behind them in the castell. Howbeit, to be assured of them, the lord protector prouiding ech waie to be readie for them, caused eight peces of ordinance fensed with baskets of earth to be planted on the southside toward the castell within power of batterie, and the harquebutteres to continue their watch and ward.

On thursdaye morning being the two and twentith of September, the lord Greie was appointed to receiue the rending of the castell into his hands, and sir Edward Dupleie now lord Dupleie after to be capteine there. They both departed to it, and at the one sacre, also three falconets of brass, and of iron eight peeces beside. The keeping of this castell the lord Greie betaking unto sir Edward Dupleie ac cordingly returned to the campe. This done, the next daie being fridaie, and the three and twentieth of September, they dislodged, and went that morning to Rockesburgh, incamping in a great fallow field, betwixt Rockesburgh and Kelseie, standing east ward a quarter of a mile off. Here at Rockesburgh they began to build a fort within the compasse of an old ruinous castell, the plot and site whereof standeth naturallie verie strong, upon a hill east and west of an eight score in length, and three score in breadth, drawing to a narrownesse at the east end, the whole ground whereof the old walles did yet inuiron. Be side the height and hardnesse to come to, it is strong lie fenced on either side with the course of two great rivers, Tuet on the north, and Twed on the south, both which joining somewhat nigh together at the west end of it. Tuet by a large compasse about the fields (in which the campe laie) at Kelseie, doth fall into this Twed, which with great depth and swiftnesse runneth from thence eastward into the sea at Ber wikke. Over this betwixt Kelseie and Rockesburgh there hath bene a great stone bridge with arches, the which the Scots in times past haue all to broken, be cause the Englishmen should not that waie come to them.

Some after the lord protector's surueie of the plot, and determination to do as much in deed for ma king it defensible, as thornesse of the time & season of the yere could suffer (which was) that one great trench of twentie foot broad with depth according, and a wall of like depth, breadth, and height, should be made crosse within the castell from the one side wall to the other, and fortye foot from the west end: and that a like trench and wall should likewise be cast a trauesse within, about a coits cast from the east end, and hereto that the castell walles on either side where need was, should be mended with turffe, and made with towps, as well for shooting directlie for ward as for flanking at hand: the worke of which dewile did make that (beside the safegard of these trenches and walles) the keepers should also be much defended from the enemies force by both the end walles of the castell: the pioners were set a worke, and diligentlie applied in the same.

The lord of Hesseforth, and manye other lards and gentlemen of Tuidall and the pers, hauing come and communed with the lord protector, and the coun cell, made an assurance, as it were a truce for that daie, till the next daie at night; and on the next daie, while assurance lasted, these lards and gentlemen be ing the chiefest in the whole pers and Tuidale, came in againe, whome the dukes grace with wisdomme and policie without bloodshed did win then unto the kings obedience, for the which they did willinglie then receiue an oth: whose names in part insue.

lord of Grenehead, the lord of Henthill, the lord of of Paulestaine, the lord of Warmesleie, the lord of James Car of Perkington, George Hoppingle,

William Dymelton of Enmerden, John Crimi slow. Manye more there were beside, but outpas sed by maister Patten, for that they remained in the register with these, as he saith. The duke of Sum merfet tended the furtherance of the worke so much, that he forbare not to laie his owne hand to the spade and shouell, thereby to encourage others: so as there were but few lordes, knights, and gentlemen in the field, but with spade, shouell, or mattocke did therein their parts.

The five and twentieth of September being sun daie, the Scots began to bring vittels to the campe, & were so well intreated and paid for the same, that during the time of the Englishmens abode there, they wanted not of the commodities which their countrie could minister. The eight and twentieth of September a Scottish herald accompanied with cer taine frenchmen, that were perchance more desi rous to marke the armie than to wit of their wel fare, came and declared that within a seauen night after, their commissioners, to whome safe conduct had bene granted, should come and commune with our counsell at Berwikke, whose comming the earle of Marlowe, and sir Rafe Sadler with other the commissioners appointed, did so long while there a bide. But what the Scots ment by breaking promise I cannot saie, howbeit come they did not, & therfore escaped not the iust note of dissimulation, howbeit else they could colour the matter in their owne ex cuse.

The same daie after none, the duke of Summer set adorned with titles of dignitie diuerse lordes, knights, and gentlemen, the names and promotions of whom maister Patten hath set downe out of the he ralds booke, as followeth: Sir Rafe Sadler treasu the duke of Summersets returne.

But now that Rockesburgh was sufficientlie made defensible (the which to see it seemed the duke of Summerfet had bowed before he would thence de part) his grace and the counsell did first determine that my lord Greie should remaine upon the boy ders there as the kings lieutenant, and then toke or fortie horsemen, and a hundred psoners: sir Rafe Bulmer, capteine of Rokeburgh thre hundred soldiers of barquebutters and others, and two hundred psoners. As things were thus concluded, and warning giuen ouer night on this wednesdaie being Michaelmasse euen, on the next morrow being Michaelmasse daie euerie man fell to packing apase and got them homewards, passing ouer the Tweed there with some trouble and danger also, by reason of raine that latelie fell before, & had raised the streame, which being swift of it selfe, and the chanel breuen in the bottome with great stones made the passage cumbersome, so that manie as well horsemen as footmen were in no small perill as they passed thorough, and one or two drowned, and manie carriages ouerthrowne, and in great hazzard of losing.

The duke of Summerset rode freight to Peter-castell, and thence homewards. The earle of Marwick, my lord Greie, and sir Rafe Sadler, with diuerse other rode to Berwick, to abide the coming of the Scottish commissioners. In the meane time of their tarieng there, the earle of Marwick made sir knights; sir Thomas Penill the lord Penills brother, sir Andrew Cobbet, sir Anthonie Strelleie, sir Arthur Panering, sir Richard Werneie, sir John Bertheuille. After that the earle of Marwick had taried for the coming of the Scots the full terme of the appointment, which was untill the fourth of October, and perceiued they came not, the next daie he departed homewards.

Here ye haue to vnderstand also, that in part of the meane time whilst the duke of Summerset was in doing of these exploits in Scotland (as ye haue heard rehearsed) the earle of Lenor, and the lord Wharton warden of the west marches, with an armie of fise thousand men, entred Scotland on that side, and first passing two miles after a bate and a nights defense, they wan the church of Annan, toke seuentie & two psoners keepers of the same, burnt the spoile for lumber of cariage, and caused the church to be blowne by with powder, passing thence a fiftene miles within the land, they wan the castell of Dilke, the which they left furnished with munition and men, and so returned. But of this ye shall find more in the historie of Scotland, by the sufferance of God, where we intreat of the doings there in this yeare.

Thus much haue I collected out of master Pattens booke, or rather exemplified the same, not much digressing from his owne words, except where I haue bin forced to abridge his worke in some places, wishing to haue inserted the whole, if the purpose of this volume would haue so permitted, as well for the full vnderstanding of euerie particular point, by him remembered, as also for his pleasant and apt manner of penning the same. Whilst the lord protector was abode thus in wars against the Scots, the lords of the counsell that remained at home, chieselie by the good and diligent calling on and furtherance of the archbishop of Cantuarburie, and others of the cleargie, toke order for the advancement of religion, causing the bookes of homilies and the paraphrase of Erasmus to be set forth and had in churches.

At the coming backe of the lord protector from his iourneie into Scotland, the citizens of London determined to haue receiued him with great triumph: but he hearing thereof, forbade them in anie wise so to do: for (said he) if anie thing hath bene done to the honour of the realme, it was Gods doing, and therefore willed them to giue him the praise. Neuerthelesse the mayo and aldermen, with certeine of the commoners in their lueries and their hoods, hearing of his approach to the citie, the eight daie of October met him in Finnesburie field, where he toke each of them by the hand, and thanked them for their good wils. The lord mayo did ride with him till they came to the pound in Smithfield, where his grace left them, and rode to his house of Shene that night, and the next daie to the king to Hampton court. The fourth daie of Nouember began a parlement, called and holden at Westminster, which continued till the foure and twentieth of December next following, & was then proroged. In this parlement, all colleges, chanteries, and free chapels were giuen to the king, and the statute of the six articles was repealed, with diuerse others tending to the like end. Moreover, during this parlement visitors being appointed to visit in London, the firstenth of Nouember began to take downe the images in Paules church: and shortly after all the images in euerie church, not onelie through London, but also throughout the whole realme, were pulled downe and desaced.

The lord protector and others of the counsell, considering now in what sort they had got forthold in Scotland, by reason of such peeces as they had taken and fortified within the realme, did deuise for the more suertie of those places, which they had already got, and the better to bying the rest of the countrie vnto reason, to haue some holds also moze within the land, and therefore first they caused a fort to be builded at Lowder, where sir Hugh Willoughbie was appointed capteine with a convenient garrison of soldiers to keepe it. Beside this, it was thought expedient to fortifie the towne of Haddington, whereupon the lord Greie lieutenant of the north parts, with sir Thomas Palmer, and sir Thomas Holcroft, were appointed to go thither with a convenient number of men of warre & psoners to see that towne fenced with trenches, rampiers, and bulwarks, as should seeme to his lordship necessarie and behouefull; who therefore entring into Scotland the eightenth of Aprill, passed forth to Haddington, where he began to fortifie, and there remained to see the worke brought to some perfection. During his abode there, diuerse exploits were both balliantlie attempted and luckilie achieved by his martiall conduct and politike direction, as occasions offered might moue him, which I would gladlie haue set downe at large, if I could haue come to the true vnderstanding thereof; but sith I cannot get the same, in such full manner as I haue wished, that yet which I haue learned by true report (as I take it) I haue thought good to impart to the reader.

The eight and twentieth of Maie, his lordship wan the castell of Pester, after he had beaten it right sore with terrible batterie of canon shot for the time it lasted, and therewith hauing made a reasonable breach for the soldiers to enter, they within yielded with condition to haue their liues saued: which the lord Greie was contented to grant to them all, one onelie excepted, who during the siege uttered blasphemous words of the king, abusing his maiesties name with vile and most opprobrious termes. They all coming forth of the castell in their shirts, humbled themselves to my lord Greie (as became them) and vpon strait examination who should be the raler that was excepted out of the pardon, it was knotowne to be one Hewton a Scot: but he to saue himselfe, put it to one Hamilton, and so these two gentlemen accusing one an other, the truth could not be decided otherwise than by a combat, which they required, and my lord Greie there vnto assented, and pronounced iudgement so to haue it tried: which he did the rather, because all men doe seeme resolute in the triall of truth (as in a verie good cause) by losse of life to gaine an endlesse name; as one saith:

of daie began to shoot off, and discharged that present daie three hundred and fortie shots. But after they perceived that they did little hurt to the fortifications of the towne in that place where this batterie was laid: the next night, the baskets & peeces of artillerie were remoued lower, and not past three score paces from the ditches of the towne, where the next daie two hundred shots were discharged against the rampire. To conclude, they made such breaches in sundrie places for easie entrie into the towne, that it was greatlie marvelled vpon they durst not assaie to give a generall assault.

They lodged so neare within the verie ditches, that there were deuised certeine plummetts of lead, tied with cords to a truncheon of a staffe, like to an handstaffe of a baile; wherewith the soldiers that watched and warded within the towne on the rampire, sene diuerse of the Frenchmen being their lodged within their ditches. Thus notwithstanding that the Frenchmen with their artillerie had broken downe the fortifications, so as the breaches were made verie reasonable and easie for them to enter; yet durst they not presume once to give the assault: for the Englishmen although their powder was spent, and that for want of matches they were constrained to teare their shirts, and vse the same in stead of matches; yet they shewed themselves so valiant in defending the towne thus beaten & made weake on each hand, that there was no hope left to their aduersaries to win it of them by force. Although the French power on the one side, and eight thousand Scots on an other had so inuironed it, that the Englishmen within were giuen to most hard shifts, for want of things necessarie & requisite for their maintenance and defense of that towne.

But yet whilst they remained thus in such distresse and necessitie of things, two hundred Englishmen under the conduct of capteine Windham, Warham Seintleger, and John Car of Marke, found means one night to passe through all the watches on that side where the Scots laie, and entering the towne, and bringing with them great plenty of powder, and other necessities, greatlie relieved them within, & so encouraged them, that they seemed to make small account of their enemies forces. Whereupon within few daies after, the Scots (sine or six hundred light horsemen onelie excepted) brake vp their campe and returned home. After this, my lord Greie remaining at Berwik, ment to make a voyage himselfe in person for the reliefe of them that were thus besieged in Haddington. Now when all things were so farre in a readinesse as the next daie he ment to haue set forward, letters were brought that night from the court, willing him to perforce that seruice by a deputie, and to staie himselfe till the coming of the earle of Shrewesburie, who was appointed with an armie to come verie shortly as generall into those parties.

My lord Greie hereupon appointed in his stead sir Robert Bowes, and sir Thomas Palmer, to go thither, who coming to Dunglas, left there certeine bands of footmen, and with the horsemen being in number thirtene hundred (whereof seuen hundred lances were appointed vnder the charge of sir Thomas Palmer) they rode forward to accomplish their enterpryse: but the French capteins hauing knowledge of their coming, they provided the best they could to repell them, appointing foure ventins or ensignes of lanceknights to keepe a standing watch that night in the trenches, and the like number of French ensignes to watch about their campe. All the other of their bands were commanded to take rest, but yet with their armour on their backs.

Their generall monsieur de Desse himselfe, monsieur de Pailleraie admerall of their fleet, monsieur Dandelot cozenell of the French footmen, Piero Strozzi cozenell of the Italians, the Keinsgraue cozenell of the lanceknights, and all other the noble men and capteins of honour among them were all night long in armour, traueilling by and downe, some on horsebacke, and some on foot, to visit the watches and scouta, set in places and waies by the which they suspected that the Englishmen ment to come. The lord Hume riding abroad to learne what he might of the Englishmens demeanour, earlie in the morning returned to the campe, and certified monsieur de Desse, that they were at hand. Whereupon were the Scottish and French horsemen that kept the scout called in, and monsieur Dandelot with great expedition ranged his battell of footmen in order, and so likewise did the Keinsgraue his Almans.

The Englishmen diuided into two bands came and shewed themselves in the sight of the towne, and charging such Scots and Frenchmen as came forth to encounter them, gaue them the ouerthrow at two seuerall charges: but finallie presuming to farre vpon their good lucke thus chancing to them in the beginning, followed in chase those that fled before them, untill at length they were inclosed and shut vp betwixt the French footmen on the one side, and the Almans on the other. And herewith the Scottish horsemen under the conduct of the lords Humes & Dune, & the French horsemen led by monsieur de Ctauges their generall, being assembled together effronces, after they had bene so repelled, were now ready to come forward againe: and perceiuing their footmen so to haue inuironed the Englishmen, that they were not able to recover themselves, nor to get out of danger, but by disordering their ranks to take them to flight, followed amaine, so that those which escaped the Frenchmens hands were taken by the Scots that pursued them in chase, so that few were saved that were not either slaine or taken. My lord Greie lost threescore and twelue great horses, and an hundred geldings, with all the men vpon them, armed with his lordships owne furniture, onelie foure or five of his men came home, of the which Thomas Cornwallis now growne porter to the quenes maiestie was one, and Robert Car elquier an other then page to my said lord Greie.

The vnadvised rashnesse of sir Thomas Palmer was thought to be the chiefe occasion of this distresse of those horsemen, who after they had done sufficientlie for that time, would needs haue them to giue a new charge, and so were discomfited. After this ouerthrow and chase of our horsemen, the armie that was lenied to passe into Scotland was halsted forward with all speed possible: for although before the coming of the English horsemen, the French, by an aduertisement giuen that they meant to come, had plucked backe their great artillerie, and sent the same vnto Edinburgh, keeping onelie with them six field-pieces, and herewith remoued their campe further off from the towne: yet by foresailing bitels and all other necessarie things from them within, they were giuen to such distresse, that they must of force haue left the towne to the enemies, if some power had not come within a while to remoue the siege that laie thus to annoie them.

When therefore the armie was come to Newcastell, & the earle of Shrewesburie generall lieutenant of the same was there arrived, they passed forward to Berwik, and from thence marched straight towards Haddington. The number of the Englishmen and strangers was reported at the point of fiftene thousand, whereof three thousand were Almans brought

generall of
the armie.
The number of soldours in the same ar mie.

der the conduct of a right worthy and expert chief taine, namede Conrad Hemming, commonlie cal led Costpenie. Beside this armie by land, there was also furnished forth a fleet by sea, under the conduct of the lord Clinton high admerall of England, and other capitaine of great experience in affaires and service by sea. This fleet was appointed to keepe course with the armie by land, that the one might be cuer in sight of the other. Monsieur de Delle aduer tised of the coming forward of this armie, durst not abide their coming; but raised his field, and retired with his armie toward Edinburgh: howbeit they were no sooner dislodged, but that a great troupe of the English horsemen were got within sight of them, and coasted them all the waie as they marched for the space of seven or eight miles, in maner to as farre as Wyndelburgh, where the Frenchmen staid, and encamped in a place chosen forth to their most advantage.

The earle of Shrewsburie, and the lord Greie with the armie coming unto Haddington, were suddenly received of the capitaine and soldours with in: where it might appeare how valiantlie they had defended that towne during the siege, being so desti tute of all things necessarie for their reliefe; and the fortifications so weak, that if the noble prowlle of their worthy generall sir James Willford, and the incomparable manhood of the rest of the capitaine and soldours had not supplied all other wants, it was thought impossible that they should haue defen ded the place so long a time against such forces as had bene there imploied against them. But such was the bravante valiantie of that noble crue and garrison, that even the verie enemies themselves could not but yeld high commendations to the capitaine and soldours for the hardie forwardnesse and manhood, which at all times they had found and tried in them at all points of service, when they came to deale with them. And verilie their same deserveth to be had in memorie for ever, not onelie for their worthy achie vements exploits, done by force of hand, to the beating backe and repelling of the enemies, but also for their patient sustaining of hunger, thirst, continuall wat ching, nakednesse, sickenesse, and all other such ca lamities and miseries, as want of things necessarie for the reliefe and maintenance of mans life is wont to bring, to those that are inclosed in such wise by the enemie. All which extremities they were well content to susteine, so that it might turne to the benefit and renowne of their countrie, in comparison whereof they esteemed all things else verie vile and contemp tible, were the same neuer so good, as the poet saith:

Tantus amor patrie mortalia pectora tangit, Natalisque soli, pro quo bona cetera ferunt.

The noble earle of Shrewsburie could not for beare to see the cares, to understand and perceiue that such worthy soldours should suffer such great di stresse, whose valiant hearts could not be quailed with any afflictions. Thus with mournfull imbray cings intermixed with pittifull regards they met. The earle entering the towne, furnished it with new bands of men, good store of vittels, munition, and all other things convenient, and as then thought requi sist. Thus having refreshed the towne, within two daies after he passed forth towards the enemies, appointing by the aduise of that noble chieftaine the lord Greie, certaine bands of horsemen to keepe themselves close together in ambush, and to send a sot to the French campe, to trie if they might traue the Frenchmen out of their strength. And as then wished, it partlie came to passe: for diuerse of their horsemen issued forth of their campe, and prof fered the skirmish. The Englishmen suffered them selves to be chased, untill they had got their enemies within danger of their ambush, and then whirling a bout, gaue them the charge, inforcing them to make their carcer backe, with more than an easie gallop; so that hauing the Frenchmen thus in chase, they slue and toke diuerse, and among the prisoners were two capitaine, Pierre Longue, and one Lucinet.

The others that escaped, returned with this losse to their campe.

In the meane time, whilst these things were thus in doing, there came to the aid of the Frenchmen fourteen or fifteen thousand Scots, accounting herewith the Irish Scots which came with the earle of Argile. These Scots were scarce lodged, when suddenly the earle of Shrewsburie and the lord Greie came with their armie divided into three battels of footmen, garded with two troops of horsemen, pre sented themselves before the faces of their enemies in the same place, where their anant curours the daie before had shewed themselves to draw forth the Frenchmen. Here the armie thus ranged in arraie of battell, staid about the space of an houre, looking if the enemies durst haue come forth to haue giuen battell: but when they perceived that by no means the Frenchmen meant to forsake their strength, they returned backe to their campe. The English nauie being entered now into the fozth, was not idle: for coming to West Island they set fire on foure ships, which they found there, and after passing by Airth saluted them within the towne with cannon shot, and after intending to burne saint Spinet, were re pelled from thence by the lord of Dune, and after re turned to attend on the armie. The earle of Shrews burie, and my lord Greie hauing executed so much as their commission would beare, and refreshed Ha dington with all things needfull, departed home wards; and coming to Dungalas, began there to build a fortreffe. The English Almans as the armie passed by Dunbar, burned the towne. These Almans also, and certaine bands of Englishmen, as well horsemen as footmen, were left at Dungalas, untill the fozth there begun was in some strength. The earle of Shrewsburie with the rest of the armie came backe into England. My lord Greie remaining on the borders lieutenant of the north parts, after the earle of Shrewsburie was returned home, assen bled all the horsemen then lieng on the borders, and being backed with the Almane footmen, entered a gaine with the same horsemen into Scotland, bur ning and wasting in the countries of Tindall, and Liddesdall, for the space of twentie miles, both house, coigne, haie, and all other things that came within their reach, and after returned without in counter.

The ninth of October being tuesday, monsieur de Delle, with his Frenchmen and Almans, came in the morning long before daie to Haddington, mean ing to haue toome the towne by stealth. And verilie the enterprize was gouerned in such secret maner, that the Frenchmen had killed the English scouts, and were entered the bafe court, yer any alarm was raised: and hauing slaine the watch, some of them ran to a place behind a church, where the Eng lishmen had their vittels and munitions, and some thrust by to the towne gate, inforcing with great vio lence to breake it open, crying with noise and shouts, Victorie, victorie, whereof in deed they accounted themselves then assured. And questionles the Eng lishmen being thus awakened out of their sleep on the sudden, were in some great disorder; so that ma nie of them came running forth without other ar mour or apparell, their shirts excepted; & others ran they wist not well whither, nor where to take heed.
But yet as the Frenchmen were thronged together at the gate to breake it open, a Frenchman (as the it

The Frenchmen repelled.

Writers do report that serued within the towne, but as other saie Iberlo captaine of the Italians, with his match light gaue fier to a double canon, that laie readie bent against the gate, so that the same shooting off, made such a lane among the Frenchmen, that they were glad to giue place, and with such a fearefull crye, that those which were behind, not understanding what losse their fellows before had sustained, byake their arraie and fled amaine.

Parliament.

The Englishmen herewith passed through a priuie posterne into the base court, and comming vpon them with their halberds, and blacke bills, slue of them great plentie, and drove the rest that escaped ouer the wall in such hast, that hapie was he that could tumble ouer first. Monsieur de Wesse yet gathering them together againe, gaue that morning thre sharpe assaults to the towne, but was repelled with great losse, for they caried awaie with them sixtene carts and wagons laden with hurt persons and dead carcasses, besides thre hundred that were found in the base court, which they could not come to, after they were beaten out, to take awaie with them. And thus was monsieur de Wesse constrained to returne, repenting himselfe of that his bold attempted enterprise, hauing lost no small number of his Frenchmen and Almans, being slaine in the place. In this meane time, the kings maiestie summoned his high court of parlement, to be holden vpon prorogation at Westminster the fourth of Nouember, where it continued till the fourteenth of March next ensuing.

Dundee spoiled.

In the meane time, the proceedings for the Scottish wars was not forgotten, wherupon in the deepe of the winter, there were conueied certeine bands of the English lancequenets, and some number of Englishmen, both horsemen and footmen by sea vnto Broughtierag; and passing from thence vnto Dundee, a two miles from thence, entred the towne, and began to fortifie it: but shortly after by the comming of the French armie with monsieur de Wesse, they left it, first spoiling the houses, and after set them on fire at their departure. The Keinsgraue colonell of the Almans, and monsieur de Etanges, being sent by monsieur de Wesse before, entred Dundee, and lodged within it. Within two daies after their comming thither, they toke certeine of their bandes, and going south did view and surueie the new fort, which the Englishmen had begun to make on the hill, a small distance from the castell. But the Englishmen and their Almans issuing south against them, were at their elbowes yer they were halfe well aduised that they were got so neare them, whereby being driuen hastilie to retire, they hardlie escaped out of danger, being so hotlie pursued, that if the Keinsgraue had not shewed his approued ballancie, guided with no lesse policie than manhood, the whole troupe had bene (as was thought) utterlie distressed.

The Keinsgraue constrained to retire.

Sir Thomas Seimer sent to the tower.

Anno Reg. 3.

In Christmasse this yere the castell of Hume was recovered out of the Englishmens hands, through treason of certeine assured Scots, that vsing to bring bittels to the Englishmen that kept it, had marked all the manner of the scouts and watches, with the places of the wall where the clime was most easie. Wherupon in the night season, certeine of the Scots secretlie comming into the ditches, got vp to the height of the wals, and entring the place, slue and toke vpon the sudden all that were within it. The firste of Januarie, sir Thomas Seimer baron of Sudleie, lord admerall, and brother to the duke of Summerfet lord protector, was arrested and sent to the tower, and after by authoritie of parlement he was attainted, and the twentieth of March next ensuing, in the third yere of this kings reigne beheaded at tower hill. Moreover in this parlement, the vse of the masse was cleerlie prohibited, and a booke for the vniformitie of diuine seruice, and right administration of the sacraments, was set forth and established.

As haue heard how the Frenchmen fortified the towne of Dundee, where monsieur de Etanges, with his companie of horsemen lieng in garrison chanced in a skirmish to be taken by the Englishmen that laie in Broughtierag, to the great relieving of them that toke him, and no lesse greefe of the French and Scots. For the tried ballancie that was throughlie knowne to rest in him. Moreover, the Englishmen that kept the towne of Haddington all this while against the enimies, could not come by anie bittels, but onelie by a conuoe of some conuent power to gard the cariages that brought the same from the borders. And as it fortuned at one time when the conuoe came and passed by Dunbar, a skirmish was proffered by the French which laie within that castell in garrison. And as sir James Willford that was there amongst other vpon this occasion (according to his wonted ballancie) directed himselfe verie forward and egre against the enimie, he was inclosed by an ambush, which the Frenchmen had laid on each side the street within the towne, but he could by no means escape out of their hands, that hauing his horse there slaine vnder him, was taken prisoner euen by a Calceigne of the countrie of Balque named Bellique, that wone no small commendation for that his good hap, in taking such a prisoner, whose name for his often approued prowesse was verie famous euen among the enimies, who saw well inough a resolutenesse in the man rather by perillous aduentures to purchase the perpetuallitie of renowne, than by defect of courage or negligent seruice to lose both life and fame. Which perissasion should enter into the hart of euerie seruitor in the field, if they will be counted right balliant indeed, considering that he which in his life time doth performe nothing worthe memorie, is like a plaier entring vpon the stage, but shewing nothing either in spech or in action, as the poet verie fittlie saith:

Ediderit, obscuri homines migrare videntur Hinc, ut qui frustra nil dixerit histrio scena.*

Some haue written that he was taken through default of those that were appointed to follow him, sith he undertooke to charge the enimie, in hope that by them he should haue bene assisted. But suerlie those that had the charge of this conuoe, doubting by aduenturing too far, to put all in hazard, thought it wisdome rather to suffer the losse of one, than to ieopard the whole; not perceiving which waie to remedie the matter at that present. Now after that the generall of Haddington was thus taken prisoner, to the great grieefe vndoubtedlie, not onelie of all the garrison there, but also of all such as tendered the aduancement of the kings maiesties seruice, sir James Crofts was thought a man most meet to supplie the place, and therefore by the lord protector and others of the councell was ordeined generall of that towne of Haddington, and the garrison there, in which rowe he bare himselfe so worthilie, as if he should not be suspected of flatterie, for that he liued yet, and in such credit (as the world knoweth) might moue my selfe matter to saie rather much than sufficientlie inough in his due and right deserved commendation.

The king by the aduise of his councell meaning to prosecute the wars in Scotland, with great forces retained a new power of lancequenets, and other strangers, vnder the conduct of diuers sundrie capitaines: but in the meane time the French king mean-

ning to breake with the king of England, thought to haue stolen the fortreffe of Bullognberg, so that a chosen power of men of warre, to the number of seven thousand, vnder the conduct of monsieur de Chatillon, being sent doctone about that exploit on the daie at night, came forward with their ladders, and all other furniture meet for the purpose, approaching about the houre of midnight nere to the fort, with in the which were not at that time manie aboute three hundred and fiftie soldiers, vnder the gouernement of sir Nicholas Arnalt knight generall of that peece, a capteine of great courage, and no lesse diligence in his charge.

And as it chanced, there were among the Frenchmen three or foure Englishmen, which hauing matched themselves in marriage with women of that countrie, after the peace was concluded betwixt France and England, were discharged out of the king of Englands wages; and remaining with their wiues, got interteinment among the Frenchmen, and were with monsieur de Chatillon, now committing towards this enterprisse. Whereupon one of the same Englishmen named Carter, that had a foretime giuen intelligence to the said sir Nicholas of the Frenchmens doings, so farre as he might learne and vnderstand the same, would gladlie haue aduertised sir Nicholas Arnalt of the Frenchmens purpose at this time: but monsieur de Chatillon kept the matter so secret, that Carter nor any of the other Englishmen had knowledge thereof, till they were now marching forward, so that Carter could not get a waie from them, till they were approached within lesse than a quarter of a mile of Bullognberg, and then slipping aside from among them, came running so fast as he might towards the fort, crying; Wolues, wolues, as loud as his voice would serue, & so gaue the alarm to them within the fort.

One of the soldiers called Morgaine Deaton, that chanced to be there at hand in scout with three or foure other, straight knew him, and brought him to the draw-bridge, where sir Nicholas Arnalt caused him to be drawn by betwixt two pikes, vnto whom he declared how the Frenchmen were at hand, meaning to assaile his fort now vpon the sudden, in hope so to surpise it. Herewith, it needed not to will sir Nicholas to bestirre him, to cause euerie man to make readie, and place themselves as was thought most expedient. And vndoubtedlie the noble courage of that worthy gentleman, furthered much, to cause euerie capteine and soldier vnder him, to put a waie all feare, and to haue a regard to do his dutie, for the receiuing of the enemies; so as they seemed glad of the occasion, whereby they might trye the pise of their accustomed manhood against the enemy, that thus came to steale on them without warning, in purpose to kill euerie man that fell into their hands, if their intention had taken place, making now such hast forward, that before the Englishmen could be well readie with their armour and weapons in their appointed places, the Frenchmen were got to the ditch, and appointing three thousand of their numbers, the most part gentlemen and double payes, with targets, battell ares, and pistols, to haue the first scale, saluted them within vpon their verie approach, with seven hundred harquebuts shot at the first vole.

The Englishmen by order giuen by sir Nicholas, kept themselves close, till the Frenchmen by their scaling ladders, which they brought with them, and had quicklie raised against the walles, began to mount by, and enter vpon them; at which instant, off went the flankers. Those of sir Nicholas Arnalts monts discharged verie well at the first, but at the second vole the morters burst. Albeit there were fix or seauenteen peeces that were planted aloft on the same mont, of the which the one discharged five & twentie shot by the maister, and the other seven and twentie by his maistrie. Sir Nicholas Arnalt here being accompanied with his capteins and soldiers about him, stood at defense so stoutlie as was possible, doing so baliantlie, that their fame deserueth to liue for euer. There were burst vpon the faces of the enemies (ouer and beside the shot that was bestowed among them) to the number of fiftene hundred pikes and blacke bills. The Frenchmen verelie stucke to it to the uttermost, and did what laie in the verie last point of their powers to enter vpon the Englishmen, suppling still the places of their dead and wearie men with fresh succors.

Carter that came to bring word of their coming, with a pike in his hand, stood at the place of the bulworne where they thus gaue the assault, & fought right baliantlie, giuing manie wounds, and receiuing some againe: for he was hurt both in the thigh and arme, who fuerlie of a private soldier (if he were private and ordinarie) seemed verie seruiceable at all assaies, considering into what desperat adventures and hazards he did as it were cast himselfe, esteeming lesse the losse of life and lim, than the reproch and dishonour of his countrie, the glorie & renoume thereof (about all worldlie things which are but temporary) all men are naturallie bound with might & maine both to seeke and saue; as one verie well saith;

Sir Nicholas Arnalt himselfe was hurt with a pike in the nose. Capteine Warren standing on the same bulworne with sir Nicholas, receiued two shots in his corselet, and one of them drove two or three links of his chaine into his necke. Capteine Broughton had there fiftene of his armed men, & verie of them hauing their corselets perished through. The number of the Englishmen that were slaine, was reckoned to be five and twentie, and hurt eight and fiftie. Of Frenchmen there were slaine a great number, beside those that were hurt, and at length through shot, casting downe of stones and timber vpon their heads, scalding water and handblowes they were repelled, retiring out of the trenches shortlie after the breake of the daie, hauing continued the assault from midnight till that time, still renewing their forces, in hope to atchieue their wished preie: but being thus beaten off, they gathered together their dead men, and lading fiftene waggons with their carcasses, they returned backe, without making anie further attempt at that time.

And so by the high balliance of sir Nicholas Arnalt, and the other capteins that serued in that fort vnder him, and chieflie by the assistance of almightie God, the giuer of all victories, the enemies were repelled, to their great dishonour, and the peece referred to the immortall renoume of the defendants. Within a daie or two after, the generall of the Frenchmen sent to know of prisoners taken; but sir Nicholas Arnalt answered the messenger, that he knew of no warre: and therefore if anie had attempted to make a surpise of his peece by stealth, they were serued accordinglie to their malicious meanings. And indeed (said he) we haue taken none of your men, but we haue got some of your braue gillars, armour & weapons. Well (said the messenger) it is not the cowle that maketh the monk, and no more is it the braue armour or weapon that maketh the man of warre: but the fortune of warre is such, sometime to gaine, and sometime to lose. Sir Nicholas receiuing him into the fort, made him good chere, and gaue him fiftie crownes in reward, and so he departed.

But concerning the liberalitie of sir Nicholas, I might here speake further thereof, how bountifullie he he rewarded the souldiers for their great manhood shewed at that time, in defending so sharpe an assault, to their great honour and no lesse confusion of the aduersaries. The daie after the said assault, there came to Bullognberg from Guines, a supplie of three or foure hundred men, vnder the leading of sir William Cobham, now lord Cobham and others. Within a while after, sir Nicholas Arnalt sent forth three hundred footmen, and five and twentie horsemen, conducted by the said sir William Cobham, capteine Hutton of the Old man, & capteine Hore of Bullognberg, with certeine cariages, to go by to a wood not farre off, called the North wood, to fetch sagots and hush, to repaire and mainteine the rampires.

These capteins with their bands being passed forward, about two miles in distance from the fort, met with certeine of their scouts that were sent forth that morning, who told them that they had discovered the tract of a great number of horsemen. Whereupon the Englishmen now being almost come to the wood side, retired with all speed: and here with the French horsemen brake out of the wood, and following them, fell in skirmish with them. The Englishmen casting themselves in a ring, kept them off with their pikes, wherewith they impaled themselves, and hauing their small troupe lined with shot, they also galled the Frenchmen right sore therewith, as they still approached them. Neuerthelesse, those horsemen gaue three maine onsets vpon the Englishmen, with the number of a thousand horse at two of the first onsets, and the third they gaue with all their whole power, being esteemed a sixtene hundred horsemen in all.

The great valiauntie of the Englishmen vnder the conduct of their noble capteins.

But such was the valiant prowesse of the English souldiers, encouraged with the comfortable presence of sir William Cobham, and other their capteins, that conducted them in such order as stood most for their safegard, exhorting them with such effectuall words as serued best to purpose, that the enimie to conclude was repelled with losse of senentie of their great horses that laie dead there in the field, within the space of halfe a mile. There were also foure thousand French footmen that came forward, but could not reach, and so marching about the fort, returned in vaine; after they once perceiued that the Englishmen were safely retired within their fort. The counsell thus perceiuing the French kings purpose, which he had conceiued to worke some notable damage to this realme, as well in support of his friends in Scotland, as in hope to recouer those peeces which the English held at Bullongne, and in those marches, doubted also of some inuasion meant by him to be attempted into this realme, because of such great preparation as he had made, for leuieng of his forces both by sea and land.

The preparation for warre as well in England as France.

The counsell therefore made likewise provision to be ready to resist all such attempts, as anie waie forth might be made, to the annoiunce of the realme. But as things fell out, the same stood in good stead, not against the forren enimie, but against a number of rebellious subiects at home, the which forgetting their dutie and allegiance, did as much as in them laie (what fouer their pretense was) to bring this noble realme and their naturall countrie into destruction. But first, for that it maie appeare, that the duke of Summerfet then protector, and other of the counsell, did not without good ground and cause mainteine the warres against the Scots, I haue thought good to set downe an epistle exhortatorie, as we finde the same in the great chronicle of Richard Grafton, sent from the said protector and counsell vnto the Scots, to moue them to haue consideration of themselves, and of the estate of their countrie, by joining in that friendlie bond and unitie with England, as had bene of the kings part and his fathers continuallie sought, for the benefit of both realmes, the copie of which exhortation here insueth.

Rich. Grafton in fol. 1294.

Edward by the grace of God, duke of Summerfet, earle of Hertford, vicount Beauchampe, lord Scimer, vncle to the kings highnesse of England, gouernor of his most roiall person, and protector of all his realmes, dominions, & subiects, lieutenant generall of all his maiesties armies, both by land and sea, treasurer and earle marshall of England, gouernor of the Iles of Gerneseye and Ierseye, and knight of the most noble order of the garter, with others of the counsell of the said most high and noble prince Edward, by the grace of God of England, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, and in earth vnder Christ the supreme head of the churches of England and Ireland. To the nobilitie and counsellors, gentlemen and commons, and all other the inhabitants of the realme of Scotland, greeting and peace.

Considering with our selues the present state of things, and weighing more deepe-ly the maner and tearmes wherein you and we do stand, it maketh vs to marvel, what euill & fatall chance doth so disceur your hearts, and maketh them so blind and vnmindfull of your profit, and so still conciliate and heape to your selues most extreme mischiefs, the which we whome ye will needs haue your enimies, go about to take awaie from you, and perpetuallie to ease you thereof. And also by all reason & order of necessitie, it should be rather more conuenient for you to seke and require moderate agtments of vs, whome God hath hitherto according to our most iust, true, and godlie meanings and intents, prospered and set forward, with your affliction and miserie, than that we being superiours in the field, maisters of a great part of your realme, should seke vpon you. Yet to the intent that our charitable minds and brotherlie loue should not cease, by all meanes possible to prouoke and call you to your owne commoditie and profit, even as the father to the son, or the elder brother to the younger; and as the louing physician would do to the mistrustfull and ignorant patient: we are content to call and crie vpon you to looke on your estate, to auoid the great calamitie that your countrie is in, to haue vs rather brothers than enimies, and rather countremen than conquerors. And if your gouernors or capteins shall rekeine and keepe from you this our exhortation, as heretofore they haue done our prauat wealth & commoditie, not regarding though you be still in miserie, so they haue profit and gouernance ouer you, and shall still abuse you with feined and forged tales: yet this shall be a witness before God, and all christian people, betwene you and vs, that we professing the gospel of Iesus Christ, according to the doctrine thereof, do not cease to call and prouoke you from the effusion of your owne blood, from the destruction of the realme of Scotland, from perpetuall enimitie and hatred, from the snail destruction of your nation, and from seruitude to forren nations, to libertie, to amitie, to equalitie with vs, to that which your writers haue alwaies wished might once come to passe.

Who that hath read the stories in times past, and dooth marke & note the great battels past fought betwixt England & Scotland, the incursions, robes, & spoiles, which haue bene done on both parties: the realme of Scotland five times wonne by one king of England,

England, the Scottish kings some taken prisoners, some slain in battell, some for verie sorrow and discomfort upon losse, dieng and departing the world: and shall perceive againe, that all nations in the world, that nation onelie beside England, speaketh the same language: and as you and we be annured and joined in one Island, so no people are so like in maners, forme, language, and all conditions as we are: shall not he thinke it a thing verie unmet, unnatural, and unchristian, that there should be betwixt us so mortall war, who in respect of all other nations, be and should be like as two brethren of one Island of great Britaine: And though he were a stranger to both, what should he thinke more meet, than if it were possible one kingdome to be made in rule, which is one in language, and to be divided in rulers, which is all one in countrey?

And for so much as two successors cannot concur and fall into one, by no other manner of meanes than by marriage, whereby one blood, one lineage, one parentage is made of two, and an indefensible right given of both to one, without the destruction and abolishing of either. If God should grant that what soever you would wish, other than that which now not by fortune hath chanced, but by his infinite mercie and most inscrutable providence, as carefull for you he hath given unto you. The which thing that you should also thinke to come of his disposition, and not by blind fortune, how unlike hath it bene, and how suddenlie hath it turned, that the power of God might be shewed: your last king being a prince of much excellencie and young, whom you know after a promise broken contrarie to his honor, & misfortune by Gods iust iudgement following upon it, God either by sorrow or by some meanes otherwise at his inscrutable pleasure, did take awaye from you, had these children, did not almightie God (as it were) to show his will and pleasure to be, that the long continued warre and enmities of both the nations should be taken awaye, and knit in perpetuall love and amitie, take the two men-children of those babes being distant the one from the other, and in diverse places, both as it were at one time, and within the space of four and twentieth houres, leaving but one maidenchild and prince.

When the most wise and victorious prince late our king and maister, king Henrie the eight, in other of his marriages not most fortunate, had by his most lawfull and most vertuous wife, queene Jane, his other two wives before that marriage departed this world, and never surmise no question made of that marriage, since that time to this daie, nor so much as all his life time, name or motion to or of anie other wife, one prince of so high expectation, of so great gifts of God, the right and undoubted heire of the realme of England and his maiestie onlie of male issue left behind him to succeed the imperiall crowne. If nothing else had bene done, what can anie wife or anie christian man that thinketh the world to be governed by Gods providence and not by fortune, thinke otherwise, but that it was Gods pleasure it should be so, that these two realmes should ioine in marriage, and by a goodlie sacrament, make a goodlie perpetuall and most friend-lie unitie & concord, whereby such benefits as of uni-tie and concord commeth, may through his infinite grace come unto these realmes. And if anie man of you or of anie nation doubteth hereof, except you looked for miracles to be done herein, and yet if ye marke all the possibilities of the natures of the two princes, the children already had, the doubtfull chance, least each of them should have a sonne, or both daughters, or not of meet ages, with other circumstances both of the parties of this realme of England, and that of Scotland, which hath not changed in eight hundred yeares, it must needs be reckoned a great marvell and a miracle.

But let it be no miracle, seeing that God doth not now speake in oracles, as amongst the Jewes he did: and present propheties now abates be but either not certaine, or else not plaine: what more cer-teine can be had of Gods will in this case, than the before rehearsed doth bring: But if God himselfe should speake, what could he speake more, than he speaketh in these: Call you them providences or chances, if you be still afflicted and punished: And he not saie: I of mine infinite mercie and love to your nation, had provided a right heire and a prince to the one, and a right heire and prince to the other, to be joined in my holie lawes, and by the lawe of nature and the world to have made an uni-tie, concord and peace, in the which I see of both the realmes you refused it: you loved better dissention than unitie, discord than agreement, warre than peace, hatred than love and charitie. If you do then therefore smart for it, whome can you blame but your owne election?

But because some of those, who make thereon to impediments, cannot but confesse, that there ap-peareth Gods providence herein, and oportunitie and occasion given to unitie of both the realmes, yet may hereafter say, and heretofore have said, that the fault herein is, that we seeke not equalitie, nor the marriage, but a conquest: we would not be friends but the lords. Although our proclamation at the last warres doth inough declare the contra-rie, yet here we protest and declare unto you and all christian people, to be the kings maiesties mind our maisters, by our advise and counsell not to conquer, but to have in amitie; not to win by force, but to conciliate by love; not to spoile and kill, but to save and keepe; not to dissever and divide, but to ioine in marriage, from high to low both the realmes, to make of one Isle one realme, in love, amitie, concord, peace and charitie, which if you refuse, and determine to conquer, who is guiltie of the bloodshed?
Who is the occasion of the warre? Who maketh the battels, the burning of houses, and the devastation which shall follow?

Can it be denied but that we have the great scale of Scotland granted by the parlement of Scotland, for the marriage which should be made, with assurances and pledges, untill the performance? And thus in the time that the late king of most famous memoirie our soueraigne lord king Henrie the eight did reigne, and in the time of the same your gover-nour, who now is the earle of Arrane, who then being a chiefe dowry and laborer therein, for the high and inestimable benefit of that realme, so soon as he was by the late cardinall of saint Andrews and others, with certaine vaine feares and hopes & greedinesse of dignitie perverted, revolted from his first agreement, and put all the realme to the losse of such holds and fortresses as are now taken from you, and to the losse of a foughten field, for the which we are loyie, if otherwise peace might have bin concluded, for his owne privat lucre and retchlesnesse of that noble realme. And what end can you looke for of these manner of proceedings, but such successe as heretofore hath bene experimented & assayed: We offer love, we offer equalitie and amitie, we overcome in warre, and offer peace: we win holds, and offer no conquest: we get in your land, and offer England.

What can be more offered and more proffered, than intercourse of merchandizes, and interchange of marriages, the abolishing of all such our lawes, as prohibitteth the same, or might be impediment to the

We haue offered not onlie to leaue the authoritie name, title, right or challenge of conquerour, but to receiue that which is the thame of men ouercommed, to leaue the name of the nation, and the glorie of anie victorie (if anie we haue had, or should haue of you) and to take the indifferent old name of Britains againe, because nothing should be left on our part to be offered, nothing on your part vnrefused, whereby ye might be inexcusable. And all the world might testifie all other meanes, not being able to do anie thing, after manie other waies and remedies attempted, battell of vs to be taken as an extream refuge, to attaine right and reason among christian men: if anie man may rightfullie make battell for his spouse and wife. The daughter of Scotland was by the great scale of Scotland promised to the sonne & heire of England.

If it be lawfull by Gods lawe to fight in a godd quarrell, and for to make peace, this is to make an end of all warres, and to conclude an eternall and perpetuall peace; which to confirme, we shall fight, and you to breake, is it not easie to discerne who hath the better part: God and the sword hath already, and shall hereafter (if there be no remedie) trie it. Who so willet the marriage to go forward; who so mindeth the peace and tranquillitie of both the realmes; who willet no conquest to be had, but a unitie and loue to go forward, we refuse no man: let him bring his name and his pledge of god seruice in this quarrell, he shall not onlie be receiued to the amitie, but shall haue sufficient defense against the aduersaries, and recompense of his living, if he susteine anie losse. The case of the foresaid marriage still bygd.

What face hath this of conquest: We intend not to disherit your quene, but to make hir heires inheritors also to England. What greater honour can ye seeke vnto your quene, than the marriage offered: What more meeter marriage than this with the kings highnes of England: What more sure defense in the nonage of your quene for the realme of Scotland, than to haue England your patrone and garison: We seeke not to take from you your lawes nor customes; but we seeke to redresse your oppressions, which of diuerse ye do susteine. In the realme of England, diuerse lawes and customes be according to the ancient vsage thereof. And likewise, France, Normandie, and Gascoigne haue sundrie kind of orders. Haue all the realmes and dominions that the emperour now hath, one custome and one sort of lawes: These vaine feares and fantasies of expulsion of your nation, of changing the lawes, of making a conquest, be diuen into your heads, of those, who in deed had rather you were all conquered, spoiled, and slaine, than they would lose anie point of their will, of their desire of rule, of their estimation, which they know in quietnesse would be seene what it were, as it were in a caline water.

The lord protector telleth
the Scots
who they be that put doubtes into their heads, &c.

How in this tumult of disorder, when the realme is tossed by and downe with waues and surges of battell, famine, and other mischieses which the warre bringeth, they thinke they cannot be espied; but loke on them you that haue wit and prudence, and consider the state of your quene and realme, you will not keepe hir sole and unmarried, the which were to you great dishonour. If you married hir within the realme, that cannot ertinguish the title which we haue to the crowne of Scotland. And what dissention, enuie, grudge, and malice that shall breed among you, is easie to perceiue. You will marrie hir out of the realme, our title remaineth, you be subjects to a foreign prince of another countrie, and of another language, and vs ye haue your enemies, euen at your elbow, your succours farre off from you: and be we not in the bowels now of the realme: Haue we not a great part thereof, either in subiection or in amitie and loue: Who shall come into your realme, but he shall be met with, and fought with, if neede be, euen of your owne nation, who be faithfull and true to the realme of England in the waie of this most godlie union by mariage.

And if anie foreign power, prince, or potentate, or whosoener be your aider to nourish still discord, send you an armie also; how shall they oppresse you, fill your houses, waste your grounds, spend and consume your vittells, hold you in subiection, & regard you as slaves, which without them could not liue, & will take your quene to bestow as they lust, & speciallie if their ruler or king (as perchance he may be) in other warres be otherwise occupied, to be a prey to vs, & a true conquest, then it should be too late to saie: We will haue a marriage and no conquest. We will with peace & amitie, we are wearie of battell and miserie. The stubborne ouercommed must suffer the victors pleasure, and pertinacitie will make the victorie more insolent, whereof you your selfe haue giuen the cause, if they send monie and capteines, but no souldiers. First if they be capteines, who ruleth and whosoeth obeie: Who shall haue the honoy of the enterpryse, and if it be well atchined: But whether it be well atchined or no, which number is that which shall be slaine: Whose blood shall be shed: Their monie peradventure shall be consumed, & their commandements obeyed. But whose bodies shall smart for it: Whose lands shall be wasted: Whose houses burned: What realme made desolate: Remember what it is to haue a foreign power within you, a strong power of your enemies vpon you, you (as it were) the campe & plaine betwixt them to fight on, & to be troden vpon, both of the victor, and of the ouercommed. And imagine you be before your eyes your wiues & daughters in danger of wantonnesse & insolencie of the souldiers, the proud looks of the capteines & souldiers, whom you call to helpe you, the contempt you shall bring your nation in, then take heed least indeed that follow which you feare, that is, that you shall be by them conquered, that ye shall be by them put from your holds, lands, taxes & offices, that your laws by them shall be altered, that your nation shall be by them destroyed. Consider in this realme, did not the Britons call in the Saxons for helpe, & by them were put out: Where be the Brits, once a great nation betwixt you and vs: How did the nation of France put out the Galles out of all France: How got the Turk first all Grecia, & now of late all Hungarie, but being called in for to aid & helpe: And did not the Goths by like meanes get all Italie, and the Lombards one part thereof now called Lombardie: What loke you for more: See the souldiers, & haueing their weapons in their hands, and knowing that you cannot liue without them, what will not they command you to do: What will they not inuade vpon you: What will they not thinke they may do: And what will they thinke that you dare do: This foreign helpe is your confusion, that succour is your detriment, the victorie so had is your scrattube: What is then to be thought of losse taken with them: The strangers and foreign souldiers shall oppresse you with in, our power and strength without; and of your owne nation, so manie as loue quietnesse, godlines, and wealth of your realme, shall helpe also to scourge and afflict you. Is it not better to compose and acquite all this calamitie and trouble by marriage, to end all forrols and battells by such and so honorable a peace: Hath not the emperour Spaine & Burgundie by title of marriage: How holde the French king Britaine now latelie annexed to that crowne, but but by title of marriage? How haue all the great princes of the world happie and with quiet made of two kingdoms one, of diuerse lordships one, of nations alwaies at warre with themselves, or else in doubtfull peace, one well governed kingdom, rule, and dominion, but by that gospell, most quiet, and most amiable composition of marriage? Two meanes there be of making one rule, wherto title is pretended, and perfect agreement betwixt two nations, either by force or superiortie, which is conquest; or by equalitie and loue, which is by parentage & ma-riage: you hate the one, that is, conquest; and by refusing the other, you enforce vpon you hatred & malice.

You will not haue peace, you will not haue ali-ance, you will not haue concord; and conquest commeth vpon you whether you will or no. And yet if all things were considered, we feare it will appere that it were better for you to be conquered of vs, than succoured of strangers, lesse losse to your goods, lesse hurt to your lands, lesse dishonour to your realme; this nation which is one in tongue, one in countrie and birth, hauing so little diuersitie to occupie the whole, than other powers come in to you, neither like in language, nor yet like in behauior, who should rule ouer you, and take you to be but their slaues. But we eldons and finally declare and protest vnto you, that although for the better furtherance of this god-lie purpose of uniting the realmes, and for the sure defense of them which fauour the marriage, we are compelled for the time to keepe holds, and to make fortifications in your realme: yet the kings maiesties mind and determinat pleasure is, with our ad-uise and counsell to be as before is declared, that where fauour may be shewed, not to be rigor, if by conditions you will receiue this amitie offered, not to follow conquest: for we desire loue, unitie, concord, peace and equalitie. Let neither your gou-ernors nor your hirkemen, nor those, who so often haue falsified their faith and promise, and by treache-rie and falshood be accustomed to prozege the time, sed you forth with faire words, and bring you into the snare from whence they cannot deliuer you. They will peraduenture prouide for themselves with pensions in some other realme, and set soldiors strangers in your holds to keepe you in subiection, vnder the pretense to defend them against vs. But who promiseth pensions for you? How are you defended when they are fled away? Who conquereth you when the strange captiues haue your holds, when your land is wasted, and the realme destroyed, and the more part kept from you? Who will let by the marriage of the queene to bue a title with the war of England; to marrie the name, an other mightie king holding the land? If we two being made one by amitie, be most able to defend vs against all nations, and hauing the sea for wall, the mutuell loue for garrison, & God for defense, should make so noble and well agreeing monarchie, that neither in peace we may be ashamed, nor in war afraid of anie worldlie or foiren power: why should not you be as desirous of the same, and haue as much cause to reioisse at it as we? If this honor of so noble a monarchie do not moue you to take and accept amitie, let the griefe and the danger of the aforenamed losses feare you to attempt that thing which shall displease God, increase warre, danger your realme, destroy your land, vndo your children, wast your grounds, desolate your countreies, and bring all Scotland either to famine & miserie, or to subiection and seruitude of an other nation. We require but your promised queene, your offered agreement of unitie, the iointing of both the nations, which God of his infinite clemencie and tender loue that he hath declared to beare to both the nations, hath offer-red vnto vs both, and in manner called vs both vnto it, whose calling and prouocation we haue, and will follow to the best of our powers, and in his name, and with his aid, admonition, exhortation, requests, and ambassages, not being able to do it, and to find stabilitie in promises, we shall not willing, but constrained pursue the battell, chastise the wicked & malicious by the angrie angels of God, fire and sword.

Wherefore we require and exhort you all, who haue loue to the countrie, pittie of that realme, a true hart to your queene and miserie, regard of your honors and promises made by the great scale of Scotland, and who fauour the peace, loue, unitie, and concord, and that most profitable marriage to enter and come to vs, and declaring your true and god-lie harts therunto, to aid vs in this most godlie purpose and enterprisse. To be witness of our doings we refuse no man, temporall nor spirituall, lord ne lady, gentleman nor other, who will aid this our purpose, and minish the occasion of slaughter and destruction, to whom we shall keepe the promises heretofore declared, and further for reward and recompense made according to the desert.

And for a more sure proue and plainer token of the good mind and will which we beare vnto you, that which neuer yet was granted to Scotland in anie league, truce, or peace betwixt England and Scotland, because ye shall haue proue of the beginning of loue and amitie of both the realmes: the kings highnes considering the multitude of them which are come to his maiesties deuotion, and of them that be well-willers and aiders of this godlie enterprisse, hath by our aduise and counsell granted, and by these presents doth grant, that from henceforth all manner of merchants and other Scottishmen, who will enter their names with one of the wardens of the marches, there prouesse to take part with vs in this before named godly purpose, to his owne commoditie, & to serue all such as be of the same agreement, may lawfullie and without anie trouble and vexation enter into anie port, crake, or haven of England, and there vse their traffike of merchandize, bule and sell, bring in the commodities of Scotland, and take and carrie forth the commodities of England, as liberallie and as frelie, and with the same and none other custome or payments therefore, than Englishmen and the kings subiects do at this present: min-ding further vpon the successe hereof to gratifie so the furtherers of this most godlie enterprisse and vnion, that all the world may be witness of the great zeale and loue which his highnes doth beare toward you and your nation. And all this the kings high-nesse, by our aduise and counsell, hath willed to be declared vnto you; and giuen in commandement vnto vs, and all his lieutenants, wardens, rulers, and other head officers, ministers, and subiects, to see executed and done, according to the true purport, effect, and meaning thereof. Fare you well.

Although this admonition and wholesome exhortation might haue moued the Scots to haue regarded their owne state, yet it little auailed, as by the sequel it appeared. For hauing both great promises made by the French, and now considering therewith the hurle barlies and tumults that sprong vp in England, they continued in their obstinat purposes, not to yeeld vnto such reasonable motions as had bene offered, if they would haue shewed themselves conformable thereto, and not haue so stubborne denied to submit themselves to that which of right they were bound vnto. So that herein they shewed themselves verie peruerse and willfull, reiecting not one-lie the god aduise that the duke gaue them, but also not so much as once thinking what might insue to ness rebound to them by admitting the offer: naie, they were of opinion and beleefe, that if so haue a battie might befall England, it would be an occasion of great ruth and wretchednesse to Scotland: as one of late hath affirmed in his poetickall supposal:

—shae praeda Britannia Cederet, omnia misera Scotia miserabile regnum, Genti infelici nihil est nisi flere reliquum.

But now to let the Scots alone for a time, we will returne to the rebellion which followed in this yeare, to the whole disappointing of the plot laid by the councell, for the present subduing of the Scots, as it was verie like that it should haue so come to passe, if none other let had come. So it was, that the kings maiestie, by the aduise of his uncle the lord protector, and other of the councell, thought good to let forth a proclamation against inclosures, and taking in of fields and commons that were accustomed to lie open, for the behoofe of the inhabitants dwelling nere to the same, who had greivously complained of gentlemen and others for taking from them the vse of those fields and commons, and had inclosed them into parks and severall pastures for their priuat commodities and pleasures, to the great hinderance and vndoing of manie a poore man.

The meaning of the forecited proclamation.

This proclamation tending to the benefit and reliefe of the poore, appointed that such as had inclosed those commons, should upon a paine by a date assigned late them open againe. But how well souer the letters forth of this proclamation meant, thinking thereby peradventure to appease the grudge of the people that found themselves greiued with such inclosures; yet verelie it turned not to the wished effect, but rather ministered occasion of a foule and dangerous disorder. For whereas there were few that obeyed the commandement, the vnruly people presuming vpon their proclamation, thinking they should be borne out by them that had set it forth rashly without order, toke vpon them to redresse the matter: and assembling themselves in vnlawfull wise, chose to them capitaine and leaders, brake open the inclosures, cast downe ditches, killed by the deare which they found in parkes, spoiled and made hauocke, after the manner of an open rebellion. First they began to plaie these parts in Summersetshire, Buckinghamshire, Northamptonshire, Kent, Essex, and Lincolnshire.

Commotions in Summersetshire, and other places.

Rebellion in Devonshire. John Fox in Acts & Monuments.

The names of the capitaine of the rebels.

In Summersetshire they brake by certeine parks of sir William Herbert, and the lord Starcon: but sir William Herbert assembling a power together by the kings commission, due and executed manie of those rebellious people. In other places also, by the good diligence and policie vied by the councell, the rebels were appeased and quieted. But shortly after, the commons of Devonshire and Cornwall rose by waie of rebellion, demanding not onelie to haue inclosures laied open, and parkes disparted: but also thorough the instigation and pricking forward of certeine poppish priests, ceased not by all sinister and subtil meanes, first vnder Gods name & the kings, and vnder the colour of religion, to perswade the people to assemble in routs, to chose capitaine to guide them, and finally to burst out into open rebellion. Their chiefe capitaine were these, Humfrie Arundell esquier, gouernour of the Mount, James Kologan, John Kologan, John Paine, Thomas Underhill, John Soleman, and William Segar. Moreouer, of priests which were principall stirrers, and some of them chiefe gouernors of the camps, and after executed, there were to the number of eight, whose names we find to be as follow: Robert Bocham, John Thompson, Roger Barret, John Wolcocke, William Alfa, James Bourton, John Barrow, Richard Benet, besides a multitude of other priests which joined with them.

The whole companies of these rebels amounted little lesse than to the number of ten thousand stout and ballant personages, able indeed (if their cause had bene good and favoured of the Lord and giuer of victories) to haue wrought great feats. But being as they were) ranke and malicious traitors, the almighty God confounded their deuises, and brought them to their deserued confusion. A strange case, that those mischacious and wicked traitors could not be warned by the evil successe of their blackly attempted outrage, in the yeare last past; at what time certeine leuitious persons in Cornwall fell vpon one of the kings commissioners named master Bobie, sent thither with others for the reformation of matters in religion, in like manner as other were sent at the same time into other shires of the realme, for the which murder a priest being apprehended, arraigned, and condemned, was by a one into Smithfield, and there hanged and quartered the seauenth daie of Iulie, in the said last yeare before mentioned, to wit, 1548. Other of his complices and associates were executed and put to death in diuerse other parts of the realme.

But now touching these other that rose in this present summer. At the first they were in great hope that the other disordered persons, which stirred in other parts of the realme, would haue joined with them, by force to haue disappointed and vndone that which the prince by law and act of parlement, in reformation of religion, had ordeined and established. But afterwards perceiuing how in most places such mischacious mutinies and diuelly attempts, as the commons had begun, partly by force and partly by policie were appeased, or that their cause being but onelie about plucking downe of inclosures, and enlarging of commons, was distained from theirs: so that either they would not, or could not ioin with them in aid of their religious quarrell: they began somewhat to doubt of their wicked begun enterprise. Notwithstanding now, sith they had gone so farre in the matter, they thought there was no thinking backe: and therefore determining to proceed, they fell to new deuises, as first before all things to bring into their hands all such places of force, wealth, and defense, as might in anie respect serue for their aid and furtherance. Here vpon the second of Iulie, they came before the citie of Exeter, incamping about the same in great numbers, and used all waies and meanes they could deuise how to win it by force, sometimes assaulting it right sharple, sometimes firing the gates, otherwhyles undermining the wals, and at other times (as occasions serued) procuring skirmishes.

Finally, nothing was left vndone which the enimie could imagine to serue his purpose for the winning of that citie. And albeit there wanted not lads stomachs among the citizens to withstand this outward force of the enimie: yet in procelle of time, such scarcitie of bread and vittels increased, that the people wared wearie & loth to abide such extreme of famine. Notobest the magistrats (though it greiued them to see the multitude of the citizens in such distress) yet hauing a speciall regard of their dutie toward the prince, and loue to the common wealth, left no waies vnbrought to quiet the people, & saie them in their dutifull obedience to resist the enimies: so that comforting the people with faire promises, and relieuing their necessities verie liberallie, so farre as their power might extend, did in such sort vse the matter, that euerie of them within resolved with one generall consent to abide the end, in hope of some speedie reliefe. And in the meane while, when their corne and meale was consumed, the gouernors of the citie caused brian and meale to be moulde by in cloth, for otherwise it would not sticke together.

Also they caused some excursions to be made out of the citie, to take and fetch into the citie such cattell as were found pasturing abroad nere to the walls, which being brought in, were distributed among the poore. To conclude, into such extremitie were the miserable citizens brought, that albeit mans nature can scarcely abide to feed vpon anie vnaccustomed food; yet these filie men were glad to eat horse flesh, and to hold themselves well content therewith. Whi-lest the siege thus remained before Excester, the rebels spoiled and robbed the countrie abroad, and lai-eng their traitorous heads together, they consulted vpon certein articles to be sent vp to the king. But herein such diuersitie of heads and wits was among them, that for euerie kind of bzaine there was one manner of article: so that neither appeared anie consent in their diuersitie, nor yet anie consfancie in their agreement. Some seemed more tollerable, others altogether vnreasonable, some would haue no iustices, some no state of gentlemen. The priests ener harped vpon one string, to ring the bishop of Borne into England againe, and to hallo to home cardinall Pole their countirman. After much a do, at length a few articles were agreed vpon, to be directed vnto the king, with the names of certein of their heads set therevnto, the copie whereof here in-such.

The articles of the commons of Deuonshire and Cornewall, sent to the king, with answers afterward following vnto the same.

- Ist, forsomuch as man, except he be borne of water, and the holie-ghost, can not enter into the kingdome of God, and forsomuch as the gates of heauen be not open without this blessed sacrament of baptism; therefore we will that our curats shall minister this sacrament at all times of need, as well on the weake daies, as on the holie daies.
- 2 Item, we will haue our children confirmed of the bishop, whensoever we shall within the diocesse resort vnto him.
- 3 Item, forsomuch as we constantlie beleue, that after the priest hath spoken the words of consecration being at masse, there celebrating and conse-crating the same, there is verie realitie the bodie and blond of our sauour Iesus Christ God and man, and that no substance of bread and wine remaineth after, but the verie selfe same bodie that was borne of the virgin Marie, and was giuen vpon the crosse for our redemption: therefore we will haue masse celebrated as it hath bene in times past, without anie man communicating with the priests, forsomuch as manie rudelie presuming vnworthilie to receiue the same, put no difference betwene the Lords bodie & other kind of meat; some saing that it is bread before and after, some saing that it is profitable to no man except he receiue it: with manie other abused termes.
- 4 Item, we will haue in our churches reserua-
tion.
- 5 Item, we will haue holie bread and holie water in the remembrance of Christs precious bodie and blond.
- 6 Item, we will that our priests shall sing or saie with an audible voice, Gods seruice in the quier of the parish churches, and not Gods seruice to be set forth like a Chistmasse plate.
- 7 Item, forsomuch as priests be men dedicated to God for ministring and celebrating the blessed sacraments, and preaching of Gods word, we will that they shall liue chaste without marriage, as saint Paule did, being the elect and chosen vessel of God, saing vnto all honest priests; Be you followers of me.

8 Item, we will that the six articles, which our so-ueraigne lord king Henrie the eight set forth in his latter daies, shall be vied and so taken as they were at that time.

9 Item, we praise God saue king Edward, for we be his both bodie and gods.

For the pacifying of these rebels, were appointed by the king and his counsell, sir John Russell knight lord priue seale, the lord Greie of Wilton, sir William Herbert after earle of Penbrooke, sir John Paulet, sir Hugh Paulet, sir Thomas Speake, and others, with a conuenient power of men of warre both on horsebacke and foot. Amongst others, there were certein strangers that came with my lord Greie, as capteine Germane an Hennotwer, with a band of horsemen, most part Albanosies and Italians. Also capteine Paule Baptiste Spinola an Italian boine of a noble house in Genoa, with a band of Italian footmen. But now the lord priue seale that was ordeined by the king and his counsell, generall of that armie, vpon his first approaching towards them, sent vnto them the kings maiesties proclamation: the effect whereof was, that all such persons as were vnlawfullie assembled, and did not within thre daies next after the proclaiming thereof, yield and submit themselves to the lord priue seale (the kings lieutenant) they should from thenceforth be deemed, accepted, and taken for rebels against his roiall person, and his impertall crowne and dignitie.

And further, the kings maiestie, for a more ter-roure to the rebels, and the incouragement of such other his louing subiects, as should helpe and aid to apprehend anie of the said rebels, he by his said proclamation granted and gaue all the offices, fees, goods and possessions, which the said rebels had at and before their apprehension. This proclamation notwithstanding, the rebels continued in their wicked deuises & traitorous purposes, hastening to the hazards of their owne deaths & bindings, as the poet saith of the foolish fish swimming to the hidden hook: Occultum visus decurrere piscis ad hamum.

Wherevpon yet once againe the kings maiestie, for the auoiding of the shedding of christian blood, sent vnto them a most gentle and louing message in writing, thereby to reduce them againe to their dutiful obedience: but all would not serue nor auail to moue their obstinate minds to leaue off their desperate and diuelish enterpryse. The message was as followeth.

Hor. epist. lib. 2.

borne Englishmen, so suddenlie to become enemies to your owne native countrie of our subjects, to make you traitors, or vnder pretense to relieue your selues, to destroie your selues, your wiues, children, lands, possessions, and all other commodities of this your life. This we saie, that we trust, that although ye be ignorantlie seduced, ye will not be vpon knowledge, obstinate.

And though some amongst you (as euer there is some cockle amongst good corne) forget God, neglect their prince, esteeme not the state of the realme, but as carelesse & desperat men delite in sedition, tumults & wars: yet neuerthelesse the greater part of you will heare the voice of vs your naturall prince, and will by wisdom and counsell be warned, and cease your evils in the beginning, whose ends will be euen by God almighties order your owne destruction. Wherefore as to you our subjects by ignorance seduced, we speake and be content to vse our princelie authoritie like a father to his children, to admonish you of your faults, not to punish them; to put you in remembrance of your duties, not to auenge your forgetfulness. First, your disorder to rise in multitudes, to assemble your selues against our other louing subjects, to arraie your selues to the war, who amongst you all can answer for the same to almighty God, charging you to obeie vs in all things? How can anie English god hart answer vs, our lawes, and the rest of our verie louing and faithfull subjects, who in deed by their obedience make our honour, estate, and degre?

Disorder in subjects.

Abusing of the kings name.

We vse our name in your writings, and abuse the same against our selfe. What iniurie herein do you vs, to call those which loue vs, to your euill purposes, by the authoritie of our name? God hath made vs your king by his ordinance and prouidence, by our blood and inheritance, by lawfull succession, and our coronation: but not to this end, as you vse our name. We are your most naturall soueraigne lord & king, Edward the first, to rule you, to preserve you, to saue you from all your outward enemies, to see our lawes well ministred, euerie man to haue his owne, to suppress disordered people, to correct traitors, theues, pirates, robbers, & such like, yea to keepe our realms from other princes, from the malice of the Scots, of Frenchmen, of the bishop of Rome. Thus god subjects, our name is written, thus it is honored and obeyed, this maiestie it hath by Gods ordinance, not by mans. So that of this your offense we cannot write to much. And yet doubt not but this is enough from a prince to all reasonable people, from a roiall king to all kindhearted & louing subjects, fro the puissant k. of England, to euerie naturall Englishman.

False causes.

Your pretense, which you saie, moueth you to do thus, and wherewith you seeke to excuse this disorder, we assure you is either false, or so vaine, that we doubt not, that after that ye shall hereby vnderstand the truth thereof, ye will all with one voice acknowledge your selues ignorantlie led, and by error seduced. And if there be anie one that will not, then assure you the same be ranke traitors, enemies of our crowne, seditious people, heretikes, papists, or such as care not what cause they haue to prouoke an insurrection, so they may do it, nor in deed can war so rich with their owne labors & with peace, as they can do with spoiles, with wars, with robberies and such like, yea with the spoile of your owne gods, with the lining of your labors, the sweat of your bodies, the food of your owne households, wiues and children: such they be, as for a time vse pleasant persuasions to you, and in the end will cut your throates for your owne gods.

Baptisme.

You be borne in hand, that your children, though necessitie chance, shall not be christened but vpon the holie daies: how false this is, learne you of vs. Our booke which we haue set forth by free consent of our whole parlement in the English tongue teacheth you the contrarie, euen in the first lease, yea the first side of the first lease of that part which intreateth of baptism. Good subjects (for to other we speake not) looke & be not deceived. They which haue put this false opinion into your eares, they meane not the christening of children, but the destruction of you our christened subjects. Be this knowne vnto you, that our honor is so much, that we may not be found faultie of one tote or two: yea, if by our lawes you may not christen your children when ye be disposed vpon necessitie, euerie daie or houre in the weeke, then might you be offended: but seeing you may do it, how can you beleue them that teach you the contrarie? What thinke you they meane in the rest, which moue you to breake your obedience against vs, your king & soueraigne, vpon these so false tales & persuasions in so euident a matter? Wherefore all you which will acknowledge vs your soueraigne lord, and which will heare the voice of vs your king, may easilie perceiue how you be deceived, and how subtilie traitors and papists, with their falsehood seeke to atchieue and bring their purpose to passe with your helpe. Euerie traitor will be glad to dissemble his treason, and seeke it secretly: euerie papist his poperie, and nourish it inwardlie; and in the end make you our subjects partakers of treason and poperie, which in the beginning was pretended to be a commonweale and holiness.

And how are you seduced by them, which put in your heads the blessed sacrament of Christs bodie, should not differ from other common bread? If our lawes, proclamations, and statutes be all to the contrarie, whie shall anie priuat man persuade you against them? We do our selfe in our owne hart, our counsell in all their profession, our lawes and statutes in all purposes, our god subjects in all our doings most highlie esteeme that sacrament, and be the communion thereof to our most comfort. We make so much difference thereof from other common bread, that we thinke no profit of other bread, but to mainteine our bodies: but this blessed bread we take to be the verie food of our soules to euermoring life. How thinke you, god subjects, shall not we being your prince, your lord, your king by Gods appointment, with truth more preuaile, than certeine euill persons with open falsehood? Shall anie seditious person persuade you that the sacrament is despised, which is by our lawes, by our selfe, by our counsell, and by all our god subjects esteemed, used, participated, and daily receiued? If euer ye were seduced, if euer deceived, if euer traitors were beleued, if euer papists poisoned god subjects, it is now. It is not the christening of children, nor the reuerence of the sacrament, nor the health of your soules that they shot at, god subjects: it is sedition, it is high treason, it is your destruction they seeke. How craftie, how pitiouslie, how cunninglie so euer they do it, with one rule iudge ye the end, which of force must come of your purposes.

Almighty God forbiddeth vpon paine of euermoring damnation, disobedience to vs your king, and in his place we rule in earth. If we should be slow, would God erre? If your offense be towards God, thinke you it is pardoned without repentance? Is Gods iudgement mutable? Your paine is damnation, your iudge is incorruptible, your fault is most euident. Likewise are ye euill informed in diuerse other articles, as for confirmation of your children, for the masse, for the maner of your service of mattins and euen song. Whatsoeuer is therein ordered, hath bene long debated, and consulted by manie learned bishops, doctors, and other men of great learning learning in this realme concluded, in nothing so much labour and time spent of late time, nothing so faulie ended. As for service in the English tongue hath manifested reasons for it, and yet perchance seemeth to you a new service, and yet in deed is none other but the old. The selfe same words in English which were in Latin, saving a few things taken out, so fond that it had bene a shame to have heard them in English, as all they can iudge which list to report the truth.

The difference is, that we ment godlie, that you our subiects should understand in English, being our naturall countrie tongue, that which was heretofore spoken in Latine, then serving onelie them which understand Latine, & now for all you that be borne English. How can this with reason offend anie reasonable man, that he should understand that anie other faith, and so to consent with the speaker? If the service in the church were good in Latine, it remaineth good in English: for nothing is altered, but to speake with knowledge, that before was spoken with ignorance: and to let you understand what is said for you, to the intent you maie further it with your owne devotion, an alteration to the better, except knowledge be worse than ignorance. So that whosoever hath moued you to mislike this order, can giue you no reason, nor answer yours, if ye understand it.

Therefore you our subiects, remember we speake to you, being ordeined your prince and king by almighty God, if anie wise we could aduance Gods honour more than we do, we would do it, and see that ye become subiects to Gods ordinance. Obieie vs your prince, and learne of them which haue authoritie to teach you, which haue power to rule you, and will execute our iustice, if we be prouoked. Learne not of them whose fruits be nothing but wilfulnesse, disobedience, obstinacie, & destruction of the realme. For the masse, we assure you, no small studie & travail hath bene spent by all the learned clergie therein, and to auoid all contention thereof, it is brought euen to the verie use as Christ left it, as the apostles used it, as holie fathers deliuered it: indeed somewhat altered from that which the popes of Rome for their lucre brought to it. And although you maie heare the contrarie of some popish and euil men, yet our maiestie, which for our honoz maie not be blemished nor stained, assureth you, that they deceiue you, abuse you, and blow these opinions into your heads for to furnish their owne purposes.

And so likewise iudge you of confirmation of children, and let them answer you this one question. Thinke they that a child christened is damned, because he dieth before bishopping? Sparke good subiects, what inconuenience hereof commeth. Our doctrine therefore is founded vpon true learning, and theirs vpon shamelesse errors. To conclude, beside our gentle manner of information to you, whatsoever is contained in our booke, either for baptism, sacrament, masse, confirmation and service in the church, is by parlement established, by the whole clergie agreed, yea by the bishops of the realme deuised, & further by Gods word confirmed. And how dare you trust, yea how dare you giue eare without trembling, to anie singular person to disallow a parlement; a subiect to perswade against our maiestie, or anie man of his single arrogancie against the determination of the bishops, and all the clergie, anie intended argument against the word of God?

But now yea our subiects, we resort to a greater matter of your unkindnesse, a great vnnaturalnesse, and such an euill, that if we thought it had not bene begun of ignorance, and continued by perswasion of certeine traitors amongst you, which we thinke few in number, but in their doings busie, we could not be perswaded but to ble our sword and do iustice: and as we be ordeined of God for to redresse your errors by auengement. But loue and zeale yet our cometh our iust anger, but how long that will be, God knoweth, in whose hand our heart is; and rather for your owne causes, being our christened subiects, we would ye were perswaded than vanquished, taught than ouerthrowne, quietlie pacified than rigorously persecuted. We require to haue the statute of six articles reuined. And know you what ye require? We know ye what ease ye haue with the losse of them: They were lawes made, but quicklie repented; to bloudie they were to be borne of our people, yet at the first in deed made of some necessitie. Wh subiects how are ye trapped by euil persons? We of pitie, because they were bloudie, toke them awaie, and you now of ignorance will aske them againe. You know full well that they helped vs to extend right, and gaue vs cause to draw our sword verte often.

And since our mercie moued vs to write our lawes with milke and equitie, how are ye blinded to aske them in bloud? But leauing this manner of reasoning, and resorting to the truth of our authoritie, we let you wit, the same hath bene aduulled by parlement with great reioice of our subiects, and not now to be called in question. And dareth anie of you with the name of a subiect, stand against an act of parlement, a law of the realme? What is our power if lawes should be thus neglected? What is your suertie if lawes be not kept? Assure you most suertie, that we of no earthly thing vnder the heauen make such reputation as we do of this one, to haue our lawes obied, & this cause of God to be throughlie mainteined, from the which we will neuer remoue a heares brydth, nor giue place to anie creature liuing; but therein will spend our whole roiall person, our crowne, treasure, realme, and all our state, whereof we assure you of our high honoz. For herein resteth our honoz, herein do all kings knowledge vs a king. And shall anie one of you dare breathe or thinke against our kingdome and crowne?

In the end of this your request (as we be giuen to understand) ye would haue them stand in force till our full age. To this we thinke, that if ye knew what ye spake, ye would not haue vttered the motion, nor neuer giuen breath to such a thought. For that thinke you of our kingdome? We we of lesse authoritie for our age? We we not your king now as we shall be? Shall ye be subiects hereafter, and now are ye not? Haue we not the right we shall haue? If ye would suspend and hang our doings in doubt vntill our full age, ye must first know, as a king we haue no difference of yeares, but as a naturall man and creature of God we haue youth, and by his suffrance shall haue age. We are your rightfull king, your liege lord, the soueraine prince of England, not by our age, but by Gods ordinance; not onelie when we shall be one and twentie yeares of age, but when we were of ten yeers. We possesse our crowne not by yeares, but by the blood and descent from our father king Henrie the eight. If it be considered, they which moue this matter, if they durst vtter themselves, would denie our kingdome.

But our good subiects know their prince, and will increase, not diminish his honoz, enlarge his power, not abate it, knowledg his kingdome, not deferre it to certeine yeares. All is one, to speake against our crowne, and to denie our kingdome, as to require that our lawes maie be broken vnto one and twentie yeares. We we not your crowned, anointed, and established king? Wherein be we of lesse maiestie, of lesse authoritie, or lesse state, than our progenitors kings of this realme, except your unkindnesse, your vnnaturalnesse will diminish our estimation?

The authoritie of a parlement.

We haue hitherto since the death of our father, by the good aduise and counsell of our deare and intire, lie beloued uncle the duke of Summerſet, and gouernor and protector, kept our eſtate, maintained our realme, preſerued our honour, defended our people from all enimies. We haue hitherto bene feared and dread of our enimies, yea of princes, kings, and nations. Yea herein we be nothing inferiour to anie our progenitors, which grace we acknowledge to be giuen vs from God, and how else, but by good obedience, good counsell of our magiſtrates, and by the authoritie of our kingdome?

England hitherto hath gained honour during our reigne: it hath twine of the enimie, and not loſt. It hath bene marvelled that ſue of ſo yong yeares haue reigned ſo noble, ſo roſallie, ſo quiettic. And how chanceth that you our louing ſubiects of that our countie of Cornewall and Deuonſhire, will giue occaſion to ſlander this our realme of England, to giue courage to the enimie, to note our realme of the cuill of rebellion, to make it a preſte to our old en-mies, to diminiſh our honour which God hath giuen, our father left, our good uncle and counsell preferred vnto vs: What greater euill could ye commit, than euen now that our foreyn enimie in Scotland, and vpon the ſea ſecketh to inuade vs, to do our realme diſhonour, than to ariſe in this maner againſt our law, to prouoke our wrath, to aſke our vengeance, and to giue vs an occaſion to ſpend that force t<sup>o</sup>on you, which we meant to beſtow vpon our enimies, to begin to ſlaie you with that ſword that we deſp<sup>re</sup> forſh againſt Scots, and other enimies, to make a con-queſt of our owne people, which otherwiſe ſhould haue bene of the whole realme of Scotland:

Thus farre we haue descended from our high maiestie, for loue to consider you in your simple ignorance, and haue bene content to send you an instruction like a father, who of iustice might haue sent you your directions like a king to rebels. And now we let you know, that as you see our mercie abundan-tie, so if ye prouoke vs further, we sweare to you by the liuing God, ye shall feele the power of the same.
God in our sword, which how mightie it is, no subiect knoweth; how puissant it is, no priuat man can indge; how mortal, no Englishman dare thinke.
But swerlie, sterlie, as your lord and prince, your on-lie king and maiesty, we saie to you, repent your felices, and take our mercie without delaie: o; else we will forthwith extend our princelie power, and execute our sharpe sword against you, as against infiels and Turkes, and rather aduenture our obse-routall person, state, and power, than the same should not be executed.

And if you will proue the example of our mercie, learne of certeine which lattie did arise, as they perceiving pretended some griefes, and yet acknowledging their offenses, haue not onelie most humble their pardon: but feele also by our order, to whome onelie all publike order aperteyneth, present rebelle of their griefes. In the end, we admonish you of your duties to God, whome ye shall answer in the daie of the Lord, & of your duties toward vs, whom ye shall answer by our order, and take our mercie whilst God to inclineth vs, least when ye shall be constrained to aske, we shall be too much hardened in heart to grant it you. And where ye shall heare name of mercie, mercie, and life; ye shall then heare of iustice, iniustice, and death. Written the eight of Julie, in the third yeare of our reigne.

Although the rebels received this princelie message, & wholesome admonition from the kings maiestie, yet would they not refozrne themselves, as dutifull subjects ought to haue done, but stood still in their twicked begun rebellion, offering to trie it at the weapons point. There wanted not priests and other busie bodies among them, such as by all waies and meanes possible sought to kindle the coles of malice and hatred betwixt the king and his subjects; which as the manner is among all the like twicked disposed people, continued to raise and strewe abroad false forged tales, and feined rumors, giuing it out, that the people should be constrained to paie a rateable taxke for their sheepe and cattell, and an excise for euerie thing that they should eate or drinke. These and such other slanderous bzutes were spread abroad by those children of Beliall, whereby the cankered minds of the rebels might the more be hardened and made stiffe from plieing vnto anie reasonable persuasion, that might be made to moue them to returne vnto their dutifull obedience, as by the lawes both of God and man they were bounden; and so it came to passe, for the rebellious rout were growne to an obstinacie, seeming so far from admitting persuasions to submision, that they became resolute in their pestilent actions; willfullie following the worst, which they knew full well would redound to their detriment; and auoiding the best, which they doubted not might turne to their advantage, agreeable in sense and meaning vnto that of the poet:

Qua nocere sequar, fugiam qua profore credam.

Hereupon when no hope was left to procure them by any quiet meanes to laide downe armes, the lord prinie scale, and the lord Greie, with their forces, although not comparable with the rebels in number, about the latter end of Iulie set vpon them, and by great manhood put them from their ground, notwithstanding they fought verie stoutlie, & gaue it not ouer for a litle: and although they were thus diuencto giue place at this first onfet, yet they got together againe, and aboad a new charge, defending their ground, & doing what they could to beat backe and repell those that came to aduaile them. But ne-uertheless though the power of the almightie God fauouring the rightfull cause, the rebels were discom-fed, and followed in chase with great slaughter for the space of two miles. This was about the beginning of August.

Their chief captaynes, to wit, Humfrey Arundell, Whindland, Holmes, and Burie, were taken and brought by to London. There were taken also others of their captaynes, as Thomas Underhill, John Solesman, William Segar, Templon, and Barret, which two last were priests; also Boier and Henrie Lee, two maiors, all the which were executed in one place or other, as they had well deserved. The said Boier being maior of Bodmin in Coznelwall, (as Grafon reports) had bene a bulke fellow among the rebels, to set them forward in mischief; howbeit some that loved him sought to excuse him, as if he had bene forced hereto against his will by the rebels, who would haue killed him, and burnt his house, if he had not consented to them. But howeuer it was, sir Anthonie Kingston that was pryncesse marshall in the kings armie vnder the lord pryncesse scale, wroote his letter vnto the said maior, signifying to him, that he and other with him would come and dine with him such a date. The maior seeming to be glad thereof, made the best purueuance he could to receiue them, and at the time appointed, sir Anthonie Kingston came with his companie, and were right hartilie welcomed of the maior. The maior rose they sat downe to dinner, calling the maior aside, he told him that there must be execution done in that towne, and therefore willed him that a paire of gallows might be framed and set by with speed, so that they might be ready by that time that they should make an end of dinner.

Sir Antho-
Kingston prouolt marshall.

The maior with all diligence caused the same to be done: so that when dinner was ended, sir Anthonie calling the maior to him, and asking whether the gallies were set up accordinglie as he had willed, the maior answered that they were readie. Wherewith sir Anthonie taking the maior by the hand, desired him to bring him to the place where they stood, and comming thither and beholding them, he said to the maior: Thinke you maister maior that they be strong enough? Hea sir, quoth he, that they are. Well then said sir Anthonie, get you euen by vnto them, for they are provided for you. The maior greatlie as-bashed herewith, said: I trust you meane no such thing to me. Sir said he, there is no remedie, ye haue bene a busse rebell, and therefore this is appointed for your reward: and so without respect of state, there was the maior hanged.

The maior of Kington hanged

At the same time, & neere the same place dwelled a miller that had bene a great doer in that rebellion, for whom also sir Anthonie Kingston sought: but the miller being thereof warned, called a good tall fellow that he had to his seruant, and said vnto him: I haue businesse to go from home, if anie therefore come to aske for me, saie thou art the owner of the mill and the man for whom they shall so aske, and that thou hast kept this mill for the space of three yeares, but in no wise name me. The seruant promised his maister so to do. And shortly after came sir Anthonie Kingston to the millers house, and calling for the miller, the seruant came forth, and answered that he was the miller. How long, quoth sir Anthonie, hast thou kept this mill? He answered three yeares. Well then said he, come on, thou must go with me, and caused his men to late hands on him, and to bring him to the next tree, saing to him: Thou hast bene a busse knaue, and therefore here shalt thou hang. Then cried the fellow out, and said that he was not the miller, but the millers man. Well then, said sir Anthonie, thou art a false knave to be in two tales, therefore said he, hang him by: and so incontinentlie hanged he was in deed. After he was dead, one that was present, told sir Anthonie; Surelie sir this was but the millers man. What then said he, could he euer haue done his maister better service than to hang for him?

Many other were executed by order of the marshall law, & a great part of the countie abandoned to the spoile of the souldiers, who were not shouthfull to gleane what they could find for the time their libertie lasted. Thus far the report of this rebellious boile, whereupon it first kindled, by what meanes the same sparkled and became a flame, and what deuises were used to extinguish & quench it. Wherein we see how prone the people are to rise by routs upon occasions of discontentments; how hastie and bradie to undertake dangerous enterprises, how willfull and obstinate to persist in their pernicious proceedings, how cold-hearted and hopelesse when they see the course of their plots of perilous policie either interrupted, undermined, or ouerthrowne; and finallie, what a reprochfull reward redoundeth both to the ringleaders in rebellions, as also what falleth to the shares of all such as shake hands and become confederats to the furthering and strengthening of riots, mutinies, insurrections, commotions, and hurleburles. Whereby the state is disquieted, (that more is) the prince drawne into a conceipt of suspecting his subjects loialties; besides a twicked president to posterities, without feare of shame, remorse of conscience, regard to allegiance, or foresight of afterclaps, to attempt the like. Now it resteth, that for the further truth and knowledge hereof, we adde a new report (new I meane, in respect of the publication, having not heretofore bene printed) though old enough, and sufficientlie warranted by the reporter, who upon his owne notice hath deliuered no lesse in writing, than himselfe upon verie good and infallible grounds obserued, and hath left testified in the discourse following; wherein there is not one

The description of the citie of Exces-ter, and of the sundrie assaults giuen to the same: collected and gathered by Iohn Howell (alias Hooker) gentleman and chamberleine of the same.

Excester or Excester is a famous and an ancient citie, being the metropole and Emporium of the west parts of England, situated and lieng in the prouince sometime called Dumnonia, that is to saie, the countie of Dallies: for whereas are manie hilles (as that countie is full of hilles and mounteins) there are manie Dallies. But ne-ruptlie it is named Deuonia, or Deuonshire, and not Daneshire of the Danes, as some would haue it.
Of the first foundation thereof, by reason of the sundrie inuasions of foren nations, who with their hostilities and cruell warres did burne and destroye the same, there remaineth no certeine memorie, neither among the records of the said citie, ne yet in anie one other writer.

Dumnonia, the countie of Dallies.Deuonia, Deuonshire.

But most certeine it is, that it was first builded and founded by the Britons or Butes. For the names which they gaue and used, are yet at this present had in remembrance, as well among the chronographers of this land, as also among the Comish people, who were sometimes one with this prouince; but now in a countie of themselves, and next bordering to this, and in the same diocesse. And they are the remanent of the blood of Brutus. For when Cae- wallader king of this land, by reason of a great famine and pestilence was driven to forsake the same, & to flie into little Britaine named Armorica, which is now vnder the dition of the French king: diuers & the most part of his people fled, some into Wales, and some into Comtwall, where euer since they and after them their posteritie haue remained and continued.

Corinia,
Baleus lib. 1.
Centuriarum.
Lelandus in Genealogia.

The old chonographers, searchers, and writers of antiquities doe find, that this citie was called Co- rinia, and thereof the cathedrall church of the same was (as Bale saith) named Ecclesia Corinensis: which name, if it were first giuen by Corinus (as Leland writeth) who after the arriual of Brutus into this land, was made the first duke of this whole west countie of Deuon and Comtwall, which were both comprised vnder the name of Corinia, and whereof this citie euer hath bene and is the metropole, and alwaies parcell sometime of the kingdom, then of the duchie, and after of the earledome, and now againe of the duchie of Comtwall: then out of doubt this citie is of no lesse antiquitie than the said names do import. It was also called Augusta. Of this name there were diuerse cities, so named by the Romans; but this onelie was named Augusta Britannorum, and so called (as some thinke) by the Romans at the conclusion of the peace made at the siege of this citie be-twene king Arutragus and Tespasian coronell of the Romane armie vnder Claudius Augustus. The Britons in their tong or language doe call this citie by sundrie names: the first and eldest in remembrance is call Denhulgoile, that is to saie, the properous perons chie fe towne in the wood, as doth appere by Geffreie of Monmouth, and Ponticus Viruonius. It was also called Pennehaltecaire, that is, the chiefe citie or towne upon the hill; as doth appere in a trauerse betwene the bishop, deane, and chapiter of this citie of the one partie; and the maior, bailiffe, and communalte of the other partie, concerning their liberties. But the names which the Cornish people do at these presents remember & retein, are special-lie thre, Pennecaire, Caire ruth, Caireiske. Pennecaire signifieth, and is to saie, the chafe citie. Caire-ruth signifieth the red or reddish citie, so called and taking the name of the ground and soile whereupon it is situated, which is a red earth. Caireiske is the citie of Iske, being so called of the riuer, which the Britons name Iske, and doth fast by the same. And of this name Houeden in his chronicle maketh mention, saing thus: Anno Domini 877 exercitus Dana-rum ab Wareham nocte quadam, sedere disrupto, ad Exan-cestre diuerterunt, quod Britannie dicitur Caireiske.

Ptolomeus the famous astronomer, who was about the yere of our Lord 162, doth being king of this land, nameth this citie Isca; and the riuer Iscaca. And Bale the searcher of antiquities following the same opinion, doth also name the citie Isca, and the inhabitants therein Iskans. But under correction be it spoken, a man maie well thinke that Ptolomeus being in Alexandria, and so farre distant from this land, was misinformed, or the print mistaken. For it is most likelie that the riuer should be named Isca according to the British speech, wherein it was called Isca; and which name by transposing of the two middle letters, doth at this present re-maine being now named Isca or Exa. But whatsoeuer the censures and opinions of Ptolomeus and of Bale, who wrote onelie upon report, be herein, it is certeine, that the names which the Brites or Bri-tons gaue, were of longest continuance. And this citie was called by their denominations, by the space of fiftene hundred yeres, untill the coming of the Saxons, the Dics, and the Scots into this realme, which was about the yere of our Lord foure hundred and fiftie. For they, where, and whensoever they preuailed in any place, did for the most part alter and change the names of all places & townes, accounting it a great renoume, as also a perpetuall memoiall of their chivalrie, to giue new names, either of their owne deuises, or of their owne native countries; for so is it written of them: Picti, Scoti, An-gli, Dani, & Normanni in hac insula rerum potuit, cuncta immutarunt, pro trophæis habentes, loca à se deuictis noua impone-re nomina. The Saxons therefore as of all other cities & townes (few excepted) so of this also they changed and altered the old names and called it Sponketon; and by which name it was so called by the space of thre hundred and od yeres, and untill the time of king Athelstane: for he about the yere of our Lord nine hundred thirtie and two, being much grieved and vniquieted with the rebellion of the Cornish people, because they refused and denied to acknowledge him for their lawfull king, did bend his force, & conduct his armie against them. And hauing subdued and preuailed ouer them, he returned to this citie: and while he rested here, he repaired the same; and the walles which before were but mightie ditches of earth, and the banks set with great poles of timber now destroyed, he builded all of square stone, as it is recorded: Hanc urbem primis Athelstanus in potestatem Anglorum fugatis Britonibus reduclam, turribus muni-uit, & muræ quadratis lapidibus tandem ciuit. & And then he altered and changed the former names, and called it after the name of the riuer Esseterra or Exeterra, that is to saie, Exeter. For so is it written,

Est Exonia uetus Deuonie comitatibus, sedo præcelsa ad acciden- tem versus posita: abluuntur flumine Exi, à quo nomen habet.

Others name it of the riuer siting by it, which they saie is named Excestria, & thus they write: Clarissima urbium est Excestria, quæ ab anni Excestro qui eandem præterfuit est sic nuncupata. I find it also written in an old chronicle, that it is named Exancestria or Exancestrie: which shuld seme to be so called by the Saxons. For the most part of the cities, townes, & forts, which they builded or reedified, did end in cestre; as Clocestre, 10 Lecestre, Pancestres, Winchestre, Dicestre, Wol-cestre, Colcestre, Cicestre, Ilecestre, Wicestre, & this citie of Excestre with others. For Caire in British & Cestre in Saronish are one thing, & do signifie in English a fort, towre, or castell. This citie (as is before said) being walled about with stone by king A-thelstane is not altogether foure square, but decli-neth somewhat toward a roundelle, and contin-eth in circuit or compasse sixtenc hundred whole pa-ses, after siue foot to a pace; which accounting after the Italian maner one thousand pases to a mile, it is a mile and halfe about, & somewhat more. The situation of this citie is verie pleasant and delicate, being set vpon a little hill among manie hilles. For the whole countrie round about is mounteinous and full of hilles. It is pendent towards the south and west parts, after and in such sort, that be the streets neuer so foule or filthie, yet with a shoure of raine they are cleansed and made sweet. And albeit hilles are commonlie drie, yet nature is so beneficiall to this litle hill, that it is in euerie quarter full of water springs: & by that meanes the whole citie is throughe-lie furnished with welles and stirps; the great god benefit and commoditie whereof hath well appeared in sundrie times of necessitie, and especiallie in the time of the late commotion, which was in the yere of our Lord 1549. For albeit the enimie, by breaking and spoiling of the pipes or canales, whereby water was conueied to the founteins of the citie, from cer-teine springs distant not a mile from the same, did abridge them of that water: yet most comfortablelie they did inioy without impeachment the welles and stirps within the walles, which abundantlie flowed with waters to the satisficing of all people therein.

There are also within this citie certeine founteins or conduits, whereunto, throughe certeine canales or pipes of lead, the waters from certeine springs, rising in the fields not far from the citie, are brought and conueied. And these waters are of most prize, because by the carriage thereof they are purified, and made lighter than are the other waters springing within the citie: and by that means more meet for dressing of meats. Of these conduits two are speciall, the one of them standeth and is within the cemiterie or churchyard of the cathedrall church of the said citie, and is called saint Peters conduit: the other being of great antiquitie standeth in the middle of the citie, at the meeting of foure principall streets of the same, and thereof somtimes it toke his name, being called the conduit at Quatrefois or Carfor; but now the great conduit.

At the higher end of this citie is a berie old and ancient castell, named Rugemont, that is to saie the red hill, taking that name of the red soile or earth whereupon it is situated. The site or situation of it is eminent and aboue both the citie and countrie adioining: for they do all lie as it were vnder the lee thereof. It hath a goodlie and pleasant prospect towards the seas: for betwene that and it is no hill at all. It is stronglie ditched round about, and was first builded (as some thinke) by Iulius Cesar: but rather and in truth by the Romans after him when they had their recourse to it for their defense, refuge, and abode, manie yeares. The same was somtimes the palace of such kings, as vnto whome the kinge

At the lower end and part of this citie, without the walls, floweth a goodlie and a pleasant river, which the Britons called Itk; Ptolomens by misinformacion named it Isaca: but the other old writers named it Esse, Exe, Exa, or Excessum: and these names be retained at these presents. It hath his head or spring in a certeine moze or desert distant from the citie nere about foure and twentie miles, called Ermoze. It floweth into the maine seas about eight miles from the citie, at a place named Ermoze, and by the waie it is increased with sundrie rivers, brooks & lakes, the chiefe of which are Crædie and Collome. It is well stored and is plentifull of samon, trout, peale, dace, pike, and other like freshwater fishes: which albeit they be verie good and delicate, and especially the samon and pike: yet they are the lesse esteemed, because the seas being so nere do furnish the citie & countrie verie abundantlie with sundrie kinds of sea fishes most delicate.

The maine seas are not distant from the citie above eight miles, out of which cometh an arme serving for the port of the same: which (as doth appeare by certeine old and ancient records) did sometimes flow up to the verie walls of the citie, where boats and vessels were wont to be laden and unladen of all kind of wares and merchandizes, at a proper place appointed for the same: which at these presents keepeth his old and ancient name, and is called the watergate. The decaye thereof hapned about the reare of our Lord 1312, by one Hugh Courtneie the third of that name, and earle of Deuon: who being offended and incensed against this citie, his wrathfull humor could not be satisfied, untill by some means he did impair and annoie the state of the commonwealth of the same. And seeing that among other commodities, the use of the haven and watercourse to the citie to be one of the chiefest, he was never quiet untill he had destroyed the same: wherefore minding to performe what he had conceived, he did in the yeare of our Lord 1313, the fifth yeare of king Edward the second, enterpryse & begin his pretended deuile and mischief.

And first whereas the lady Isabella de Fortibus, countesse of Armerle and of Deuon, his ancestrie had builded certeine works upon the river of Exe (the proprietie and seignorie whereof did appertene to the citie) the one of the west side of the river of Exe in Erminster parish, and the other of the east side of the same river in the parish of Topesham; leaving betwene the said two works a certeine aperture or open space of thirtie foot, thorough which all boats and vessels without let or hinderance might haue and had their vsuall passage and repassage, to and from the citie unto the seas: the said earle to abridge and destroye this great benefit and commoditie, did leaue and build a newe waere in the said aperture or open come, stopping, filling, and quiering the same, with great trees, timber, and stones, in such sort, that no vessel nor vessels could passe or repasse.

After him Edward Courtneie earle of Deuon, and nephew to the said Hugh, did not onelie maintain and continue the doings of his ancestre, by his daileie reparing and defending the same: but also to worke an utter destruction for ever, of anie passage or repassage to be had thenceforth to and from the said citie; under pretence to build and make certeine mills, did erect two other waeres, the one at saint James ouerthwart the whole river, and the other at Lampresford: by means whereof not onelie the citie did susteine the whole losse of the haven, but the whole countrie also was surrounded about it, and in process of time altogether, and as it is at these presents covered with salt waters. For which grieues and injuries upon complaints made thereof, diuerse sundrie writs and commissions of inquirie were awarded and granted by the king; and the said earles by sundrie inquisitions and verdicts found gilty. And yet notwithstanding, such was their power and authority, and such was the iniquitie of those daies, as no iustice could take place, nor law haue his due course against them.

Furthermoze also the foresaid Hugh, to increoch the gaine and commoditie of the lading & unloading of merchandizes within the port & river to himselfe, did build a keie and a crane in the river at his towne of Topesham, distant from the citie about thre miles; and by power did enforce and compell all manner of merchants arriving within that port to unlade & lade all their wares and merchandizes brought within that port (to be laden and unladen) there onelie. And from thence, euer since, all wares and merchandizes haue bene caried and recaried to and from the citie by horse, cart, and waie, though to the gaine of the earle and his tenants, yet to the great trouble and hinderance of the citie and merchants of the same. Neuertheless, the port hath euer moze and yet doth keepe his old and ancient name, being called the port of the citie of Exceller: and alwaies hath bene and presentlie is paid a tribute unto the citie, by the name of the towne custome, for all kind of wares and merchandizes, discharged within that port or river, or the members thereof.

And although the watercourse thus being destroyed can hardly be restored to his old piffinate and naturall estate; for that thorough long continuance the old course can not be discerned: yet notwithstanding after manie attempts and with great expences, a watercourse and passage begun in the yeare 1564, is recovered, and by certeine laces, boats, and vessels of fiftene or sixtene tons are conueied and brought up to the citie, and there discharged at the old and ancient place, called the watergate: & where is builded a verie faire large keie or wharfe, as also an engine called a crane fit for the purpose. Within the citie were somtimes but few parish churches, untill the time of Innocentius the third: who when in the yeare 1198 he had established the doctrine of transubstantiation, and had made it an article of the symbole, as appeareth in the decretals, Titulo de summa trinitate, canone Firmiter: then his next successor Honorius the third, in the yeare 1218 did not onelie confirme the same, but also by decree did establish reseruacion, candlelight, and praier for the dead, as doth appeare, Decret. tit. de celebratione missarum, canone Sane cum, & Sane cum creatura: by which meanes the number of sacrificing & massing priests did not onelie increase, but churches also and chapels began in all places and euerie where to be builded and erected.

And among others in this citie in the yeare 1222 and the first yeare of king Henrie the third, the parish churches were limited, and increased to the number of nineteene churches within the citie and suburbs, and were called by the name of the christianitie euen to this daie. Euerie of which in times past was a sufficient and competent living to mainteine a massing sacrificer; for such and so great was the blind deuotion of the people then in that Romish religion: but the same now being abolished, and the gospel preached, the livelihoods are so small, as not sufficient for the most part to mainteine a pore clerke or scholar, & by reason thereof, the most part of them do lie void and vacant, without incumbent.

Besides these partly churches, there was also a monasterie, sometimes of monks of saint Benets order, but since a cathedrall church, being of a verie faire and sumptuous building of freestone and with beautifull pillars of grate marble. It standeth and is situated in the east part of the citie; and (as some re- port) was first founded and built by king Ethel- dred, the third sonne to king Ethelwolphus. Some thinke that king Edgar did it. True it is that euerie of them builded a house for religious persons within this citie, of which the one was spoiled and burned by the Danes, and the other in procelle of time was vnted to the monasterie, which is now the cathedrall church. But the cathedrall church it selfe was founded & builded by king Athelstane, the sonne to king Edward the elder: for so is it recozded in the historie of the same church, the words whereof are these: Athel- stannus subingatus Cornugualensibus, reuersus est ad ciuitatem, qua antiquitus Monkton vocabatur, nunc autem Exeter: ac ibi sedens, anno Dom. 932, non tam lacerata eiusdem ciuitatis moenia reparabat, quin & mansum quoddam dedit ad fundandum monasterium pro monachis, Deo & sancto Petro famulantibus.

This king besides his great charges and expenses in building of this church, which at the first was but small, and that part which is now called the Ladie chapell, he placed therein monkes of S. Benets order, prouided liuelihoods for them, and appointed a ruler or gouernour ouer them, and who was called by the name of an abbat, towards whose diet and liuelihood he gaue spozkeshull and Tresuroz beere: and which at these presents do remaine to the said church and are annexed to the dignitie of the treasurer-shipp of the same. The church being thus begun, kings, princes, & noble men were from time to time gladlie and willinglie verie liberall contributoz to the abolishing and finishing of the same. For about foure score years after king Athelstane, king Kanoght who was also named Canutus or Canutus, at the earnest sute of one of his dukes named Athelred, did confirme and grant to Athelwood then abbat of the said church, and to his successors manie and sundrie priuileges and liberties, vnder his letters patents, dated the second yeare of his reigne, Anno Domini, 1019.

After him about thirtie yeares, king Edward the confessor remoued the monkes into Westminster, and made this church a cathedrall church, and remoued the bishops see which was then at Crediton into this citie, making Leofricus bishop thereof, and whom he and his wife quene Edith did put in possession of the same, as appeareth by his letters patents dated the eight yeare of his reigne, Anno Dom. 1050, whobett the monke of Wurie, Polydorus, and others do affirme and write, that this should be done about the twelue yeare of William the conqueror, for thus they do write: Habitum est Londini sub Lanfranco, antistitum & sacerdotum comitum, in quo decretum est, quod aliquot sedes episcopales, que in oppidulis & pagis antea fuerant, in urbibus & locis celeberrimis collocarentur, unde factum est ut Bathonia, Lincolnia, Sarisburia, Exonia, Cestrina, & Cicestra urbes, huiusmodi nouis episcoporum domicilijs sunt nobilitate.

But the reuerence of these writers referred, this cannot be true concerning this church, because the words of the charter thereof do witnesse the contrarie, and declare expresselie, how that king Edward and quene Edith his wife did put Leofricus the first bishop in possession, the one by the one hand and the other by the other hand, leading him betwene them vp to the high altar, and there put his hands vpon the same: And yet it may be true, that at the foresaid councell, this remouing and placing of this bishop might be ratified and confirmed. Likewise William the conqueror, in the third yeare of his reigne 1069, did not onelie confirme the former charter, but also at the instance and request of William Warewest, then his chapleine, but afterwards bishop of the same see, did giue vnto it the seigniories of Plimpton, Hampton, and S. Stephens in Excester, which the said William Warewest being afterwards bishop did distribute, giuing Plimpton to the religious canons, whome he placed there: Hampton was annexed to the deanerie, but S. Stephens was reserved alwaies to the bishop, and to his successors, whereby they are barons, and so lords in the parliament house.

It was also enlarged from time to time with great possessions, reuenues, buildings, riches, priuileges, and sundrie other commodities, by kings, princes, prelates, bishops, and sundrie others. And this one thing is to be noted, that albeit there were about foure hundred yeares distant from the first foundation and building thereof, vnto the ending and finishing of the same; yet it is so vniuerselie and decentlie compact and builded in one mould, as though it had bene done at one instant. The bishop is distinct from the chanons both in house and reuenue: his liuelihoods being no part nor parcell of that which apperteineth to the deane and chapter. It was sometimes of great reuenues and large possessions, but the more part thereof hath bene consumed and exhausted by a wastfull bishop. The bishop and chanons haue verie faire houses, which are situated about the church & cimiterie, and are inclosed euerie night by shutting fast of certeine gates, by which occasion it is called a close, A claudendo: and which gates are to be shut euerie night (except at certeine times) and to be opened euerie morning at certeine hours appointed, as it appeareth by a composition made for the same betwene the communalitie of Excester, and the bishop and deane of the same. In the middle of the cimiterie or churchyard is a verie faire fontaine or conduit of water conueyed by certeine pipes of lead from out of the same fields, as is the cities conduit. And albeit the springs of both waters are in the same field, and not farre distant: yet this doth excell the other. Out of this well or fontaine waters are conueyed to sundrie of the chanons houses, as also of late vnto the bishops house, and yet it serueth besides the whole close and citie. The citie it selfe is verie populous, and in some times cheslie inhabited with clothiers & clothworkers of broad clothes, seruing much for the Spaniards and south countries; and which in those daies were of such goodnesse & substance, that the names of them do remaine in those countries: but now it is cheslie inhabited with merchants, herie-clothiers, and all sorts of artificers, among whom the merchants are the chiefe & welthiest.

The gouernement of this citie was sometimes by foure bailiffes, which before the conquest were called portgreues, that is, the chiefe lords or rulers of the towne: for porta is taken for a towne, and greue in Saronie is Dominus or maior: but after the conquest they were after the French tongue named Præfules, that is to saie Præfetti or rulers, and now shewards. Not long after the conquest there was ordered and constituted a senate of six and thirtie persons, but of later yeares by king Henrie the seventh of foure & twentieth persons, out of which number yearelie there was and is chosen one to be the chiefe gouernour for the yeare following; and is called by the name of a maior, whome the barons called Speregreue, that is, Mayor dominus, or the chiefe ruler. This maior associated with the foure prouosts bailliffes, hath the hearing, decerning, and determining in all ciuill causes betwene partie and par-tie, and for which they keepe wachelle upon euerie mondaye a court in the Guildhall of the said citie: but the bailliffes retaining their old and ancient custome, do keepe the like courts, and in the like causes distincall from the mayo: by themselves, at all time and times (the mondayes and festiuall daies excepted) as it shall please them to assigne, and with their court is called by the name of the priuost court.

Thus the mayo: and bailliffes both iudicall and se-nerall haue iurisdiction to decerne and determine in ciuill matters. But if the matters do touch and concerne the prince, the crowne, the common peace, and criminall matters, or the publike state of the ci-tie and common-wealth of the same, then the same are decided by the iudges and iudices, or by the mayo: and common counsell, or by the mayo: himselfe, or by some other officer or officers, according to the nature and qualite of the cause and offense. But because it requireth a large and speciall course, to describe the gouernment of this citie and common-wealth of the same, the charge of euery officer, the diuision of officers, their severall iurisdiccions, and a number of other things incident vnto their charges: there is a particular booke imprinted, and at large the same is set out, in such order as is requisite, and appertaining to the gouernment: whereby euery man may know his office and charge, and what to him doth appertene. And let it suffice, that partie through good gouernement, and partie of a good inclination, the people of this citie haue bene alwaies dutifull and obedient to the king and the lawes: and haue in great awe and reuerence their gouernours and magistrats for the time being. And this one thing is not so strange as worthy to be noted, that euen from the beginning, from time to time they haue bene carefull for their common-wealth, and diligent for the preservation of the same. And as in times of peace and quietnesse the same hath bene well governed: so in times troublesome and un-quiet, it hath bene most valiantlie defended against the inuasions and assaults of the enemies, as by sundrye histories it may appeare: whereof for example these few may serue.

First Aruragus king of this land, then named Britaine, minding to staie the land in his ancient estate, freedom and libertie, did withold and denie to paie vnto the Romans the tribute which they did requeire and demand: wherefore Claudius the emperour sent Vespasian then duke of the Roman armie, into this realme with a great host, either to recouer the tribute, or to subdue the land. This Vespasian is he, who in the foure and twentieth yeare after this his iourneie, did destroye Jerusalem. Wherefore this duke landing in Dorsetshire, then named Totonesum litum, came to this citie, laid siege vnto it, and gaue continuall assaults therevnto, for eight daies continuallie together. Aruragus the king, being then in the east parts of the land, and hearing of this, with a great armie and powere marcheth towards this citie to remoue the siege, and incounters with the enimie.
The Romanes after long fight, and not able to preuaile, is contented to come to parle, and in the end a composition was concluded, as if doth appeare, and is set downe and written by sundrie historiographers. The rhymic of the cathedrall church of the said citie hath these words: Anno Domini 49, Vespasianus cum Romano exercitu ciuitatem hanc vocatam Exeter, octo diebus obsedit, sed minime preualuit, Arurago rege ciuibus auxilium prestante.

Geffreie of Monmouth hath these words: Vespasianus a Claudio missus est, vt Aruragum vel pacificaret, vel romane subiectioni restitueret. Cum igitur in portu in Rutapi applicare voluisset Vespasianus, obuiauit ei Aruragus, atque prohibuit ne portum ingrederetur. Retraxit itaque se Vespasianus a portu illo, retortisque velis in litore Totoneso applicauit. Nactus deinde tellurem Caier Penbuloite, que nunc Exonia vocatur obseditur; eandem adiuit, cumque octo diebus eandem obsideret, superuenit Aruragus cum exercitu suo, praeliumque commisit: die illa, valde laceratus fuit vtro-rumque exercitus, sed neuter est victoria potitus, nunc autem facto, mediante Genissa regina, concordie effecti sunt. Mathieu of Westminster writeth: Aruragus Britannorum rex in tantam prolapsum est superbia, quod Romana potestate voluit diutius subiectionem parere. Vespasianus igitur a Claudio missus cum in Rutapi portu applicare incepisset, Arura-gus illi obuia prohibuit ne ingrederetur. At Vespasianus retoris velis in Totoneso litore applicauit, et ciuitatem qua Britannice Caier Penbuloite, nunc autem Exonia appellatur obsedit: elapsis inde septem diebus Aruragus superuenit, praeliumque commisit, et vtriusque exercitus valde lacerato, mediante Genissa Claudij filia, duces amici facti sunt.

In the historie intituled, Noua historia de gestis Anglorum a Britonibus vsque ad Henricum sextum, is written the like in effect: Vespasianus a Claudio missus est vt Aruragum pacificaret, vel Romana ditioni restitueret, cui obuians Aruragus, prohibuit ne terram suam ingrederetur, timens Vespasianus armorum cohortem, retraxit sese, retortisque velis in Totoneso litore est applicatus, atque urbem Exonia obsedit, post septem dies superuenit Aruragus, pre-lium committitur, laceratiorque vtriusque exercitus, sed neuter potitur victoria, demum mediante Genissa regina, reconciliati sunt. It was also in manie troubles and great perplexities, in the vncertaine and troublesome states of this realme, when sometimes the Romans, sometimes the Picts, sometimes the Scots, sometimes the Saxons, and sometimes the Danes made their incursions and warres within this land, by reason whereof the records and memorials in those daies for the most part were lost and confu-med.

Nova historia.

And yet Matthew of Westminster writeth that it was besieged by Penda king of Mercia, in the yeare of our Lord 632, in the time of Cadwallin one of the last kings of the Britons. The historie is this, Edwin the Saxon king of the Northumbers, being wars against Cadwallin: Cadwallin, did in prouaile and had such conquests ouer him, that Cadwallo was driven to forsake his realme of Wales, and to flee into Ireland, where he being, was bene carefull and pensifull how to recouer his countrie againe. Wherefore he repareth his armie and gathereth a new force, and gaue sundrie attempts to at-chue to his purpose: but all was in vaine, for he could neuer set foot on land in his countrie.
Edwin was alwaies at hand and in a readinesse to uop and resist the same, for this Edwin had about him in his seruice a man named Pellitus, who was a magician and verie skilfull in necromancie, and who by his art and science did foreteth and declare vnto Edwin what things were a doing and attempted against him.

Cadwallin hauing continuallie euill successe, was in utter despaire and distrust to prouaile against Edwin, and therefore as one giuing ouer all, saileth ouer the seas into Armorica now called little Brit-taine, vnto Salomon the king thereof, and vnto him doth disclose his miserable estate and fortune, as also greatlie complaineth of Pellitus and of his forces.
When these two kings had thoroughlie consulted and debated the matter, it was at length concluded and thought best, that some one man being bold and swift should be sent ouer to the court of king Edwin, to giue the aduenture to kill Pellitus. Whereupon the matter being discovered to Salomon ne-

Wilenus killed
Pollitus.

Pollitus being the kings almoner, and hauing the charge to distribute the said almesse, commeth forth and setteth the poze folke in order. Wilenus being there and amongst them, watcheth his time to worke his purpose, and thrusting himselfe in the middle of the presse of the people, suddenly with his pointado or weapon which for the purpose he had prepared, thrusteth Pollitus into the bodie, & gaue him a deadly wound whereof he died, and forthwith (the thing in such a thrust not perceived) thrusteth himselfe awaie privatlie, and through woods, hills, thickets, and dales out of the common waie, commeth to this citie of Excester, & declareth vnto the citizens (who were then Wiltens) what he had done: whereof they were verie glad and iollull, and in good hope that their king Cadwalllo should yet againe returne; and therefore vpon good aduise doo prepare and make ready both themselves and the citie, as well for the resisting of the enimie, as for the receiuing, succouring and aiding of their king.

King Wenda
besiegeth Excester.

King Wenda aduertised of this murder, and vnderstanding the whole course of the matter and practice, taketh in grieffe the iniurie thus done to his neighbor, and countriman king Edwin. And therefore to reuenge the same mustreth his subjects and gathereth a great armie; and vnderstanding that Wilenus was come to this citie marcheth towards the same, and in the end laieth his siege round about it, minding the bitter subuersion thereof. But the citizens manfullie withstanding his force, did defend and keepe both themselves and their citie, untill that king Cadwalllo, who before was aduertised both of the fact of Wilenus and of this preparation of Wenda, did with his force and armie come to the citie, who did not onelie rescue the same; but also toining the battell with his enimie gaue him the ouerthrow, and so deliuered his countrie, and recouered himselfe and his kingdom.

Polyd. lib. 5

It was also in greater troubles in the time of king Alured or Alfred the fourth sonne to king Ethelwulfus. For Polydorus and others do write, that in the fift yeare of the said kings reigne, the Danes concluded a peace with the said king, and gaue hostages for the true keeping thereof. And yet notwithstanding most perfidiously and falselie contrarie to the same, they assembled themselves, and vpon a sudden marched to this citie, and perforce entered and toke the same: Daci etenim qui religionem & fidem pro suo commodo postponendam ducunt, Londino se mouent, & maximis itineribus Exoniam proficiscuntur, urbem per vim capiunt. But long they intoid not the same, for after that winter passed, the king to be reuenged marcheth with a great power to this citie, which the Danes vnderstanding and thinking themselves too weake to withstand the k. as also bitterlie distrusting the citizens, thrust themselves awaie, of which some fled vnto Dartmouth and there toke shipping, and who for the most part were drowned in a tempest at the seas. Some fled to Chipenham or (as some saie) to Bistol, but the king followed and pursued these so sharplie, that he neuer left nor gaue ouer, untill he had overcome and slaine the captains Hubbert and Hungar.

likewise in the nineteenth yeare of the reigne of the said king, the Danes contrarie to their faith, pledges, and promises, did againe come to this citie, and laie siege to the same: Danorum exercitus anno 877. ab Wicheam nocte quadam seelere disrupto, ad Exoniam, quod Britannie dicitur. Caeterisq. diuertunt, at audito regis aduentu ad puppes fugerunt, in mari praedantes manebant.

It was also besieged by the said Danes in the nineteenth yeare of king Egbert, in the yeare of our Lord 1001. For the Danes, which were in Normandie, being aduertised of the good lucke, successe, and great spoiles which their companions and countrymen in England had, and their feith set on edge therewith, suddenly prepared shipping, and came ouer the coasts and landed in Deuon, and forthwith marched and toke their course towards the citie of Excester, thinking to haue found the citizens sleeping & so haue taken them suddenly and vnawares; sed ciuitas inuiciter resistens eos reseruit. The people & commons of Deuon, Cornwall, Summerfet & Dorset, aduertised hereof, assembled themselves, minding to rescue the citie, as also to encounter & aduerture the field with the Danes, met with them at a place nere the citie called Pinncho, and toined battell with them, betwene whome the fight was cruel and the slaughter great. And thus doth Houeden testifie, whose words be these: Memoratus paganorum exercitus de Normannia in Angliam reuersus, ostium fluminis Exe ingreditur, & mox ad extinguendam urbem Exoniam stre egreditur, sed dum murum illum destruere moliretur, ac ciuitas urbem viriliter defendentibus repellitur, unde nimis exasperatus more solito villas succendendo, agros depopulando, hominesque cadendo per Domnoniam vagatur, quare Domnonienses in unum congregati, in loco qui dicitur Pincho certamen cum eis inueniunt.

King Sweno being in Denmarke, and aduertised hereof, as also giuen to vnderstand how king Egbert alias Ethelred or Egbert had caused all the Danes in the realme to be suddenly slaine in one night, being much grieued therewith, did prepare and provide a great armie for the reuenge thereof. And in the yeare of our Lord 1002, he landed in sundrie and diuerse parts of this realme, vsing great hostilitie, and making great spoiles, and brought the whole land to an vnspokeable miserie and distresse; but at length, receiuing a tribute for a peace, he returned home into his owne countrie. Howbeit the citizens of Excester hearing of this crueltie vsed in the east parts, made themselves strong: and doubting of so mightie an enimie, did make themselves readie, and prepared the citie to withstand him, if he should haue attempted anie force or hostilitie against them.

But the Dane being gone and returned home, and knowing nothing of this preparation, one Hugh then earle of Deuon (as princes lacke no fauours) sent his letters into Denmarke to king Sweno, certifieng him both of the state and wealth of this citie, as also of the great preparation which had bene made to withstand him, persuading him not to suffer such an iniurie. And as coles will be some kindled: euen so the Dane vpon this aduertisement was in a great heat, and forthwith arreareth his armie, and repareth all things in readinesse to crosse the seas aneto to worke his will against this citie. And accordingly then time serued, in the yeare following, being the yeare of our Lord 1003, he toke the seas and landed vpon the coasts of Deuon and Cornwall, and marched forthwith to this citie, and laie his siege against the same in the beginning of the moneth of August, and continued the same untill the halends of September: during which time were sundrie sharpe, fierce, and cruell assaults giuen by the Dane, and as valiantlie resisted by the citizens. But in continuance of time, when they saw them- selves selues battie more and more to be weakened, bittels to falle, the fire round about them, their walles beaten downe, themselves slaughtered and murdered, and the enimie to increafe and be strong, and in all these distresses, their king Edward being fled into Normandie, to haue no care of them, na to prepare anye rescue, aid, or helpe for them: it was not to be marvelled, if in so heauie a distress they were amazed and astonished. And yet considering with themselves that Sweno was a Dane, a cruell enemie, a bloudie murderer, an vsurping tyrant, hauing no other title to the crowne of England, but the sword, did with one consent agree and conclude, neuer to yeld nor giue ouer whilist anye were left liuing able to withstand the same, wishing rather to die manfully for their common wealth, than to liue in reproch and infamie; and by death to reape an immortal fame, than by life to become ignominious & infamous, and in the end also to be the miserable slaues of a cruell and vsurping tyrant.

When therefore after manie assaults, all of the most part of the ablest men were spent and consumed, and none or few left alieue to withstand so mightie and so manie enimies: the Dane on the seuen and twentieth daie of August, with force entered the citie, And after that he had serued and satisfied his bloudie appetits, in defolowing the women, murdering the children, and making haucke of all the people, he spoiled the citie, burned the houses, rased the walles, bet downe the temples, and left nothing to be done which might by fire, sword, and spoiles be consumed: and this is so witnessed by sundrie writers, Reinolph of Chelster writeth thus: Daci cum suo rege Sweno Excestriam venerunt, & urbem funditus destruxerunt, nullare in columi relicta, que aut ferro aut igni vastari poterat: & omnia spolia cineribus tantum relictis secum deportauerunt. Huntington hath these words: Daci in ea exarserunt sicut ignis quem velis aliquis sanguine extinguere: aduolantes igitur quasi multitudo locustarum, quidam Excestriam venerunt, & urbem funditus destruxerunt: & omnia spolia cineribus tantum relictis secum deportauerunt.

Houeden thus saith: Rex Danorum Sweni peritium & prodicionem Normannici comitis, quem Emma Domina prefecerat, ciuitatem Exon infregit, spoliavit, & murum ab orientali usq; ad occidentalem portum destruxit, & cum ingenti preda naues repetijt. It was also besieged by William the Conquerour in the first yeare of his reigne Anno 1068, for when he first entered this land, and by dint of sword sought the conquest thereof; the citizens of this citie, and the noble and gentlemen of all the countrie about, entered into one common league, conclusion and promise, to ioine together and to withstand the enimie to the uttermost. And this confederacie being confirmed by a publike oth, preparation on all parts was made accordinglie, for the accomplishing of the same. But the conquerour hauing preuailed, and subdued in a manner the whole land, was aduertised that this citie stood vpon their gard, and would not yeld nor submit themselves vnto him. Whereupon he sent his armie from London and besieged the same: and perceiving the siege to continue, marched and came himselfe vnto the same, but rather came no further than Salisbury. In the meane time the citizens were aduertised how the whole realme had yelded, and seeing also how their confederats did battie shrinke awaie from them, and by that meanes they to grow weaker & weaker, and therefore the lesse able to withstand so great a force, and to keepe out so puissant an armie as was round about them; and considering also, that small mercie or fauor should they find if the citie by force were taken; did by way of intreatie offer submission, and desire peace, which in the end they obtained: and so passing a grieuous sike, they and the citie were restored.

But yet in token of his conquest, the king altered and changed the gates of the castell, and took an oth of all the citizens to be his liege and true subiects.

Houeden in his historie maketh mention, that Githa king Harolds mother should be within this citie, during the time that this siege and assault lasted: and perceiving the bent of the people to submit and yeld themselves, secretlie conuied herself awaie. For these be his words: Hyeme minuent, & rex Wilhelmus de Normannia in Angliam redijt, & Anglis importabile tributum imposuit: deinde in Dunmoniam hostiliter profectus est ad ciuitatem Excestriam, quam ciues & nonnulli Anglici ministri contra illum retinebant: & obsedit, & infregit. Githa vero comitissa, mater scilicet Haroldi regis Anglorum, & soror Swani regis Danorum, cum multis de ciuitate fugiens, euasit & Flandriam petijt, ciues autem dextris acceptis regi se dederunt. Also in the second yeare of king Stephan Anno 1137, the lords and peeres of the realme, remembering the oth which they had before made to king Henrie the first, to whom they swore to be true to Spawd the kings onelie daughter and heire, and to his heires, and yet contrarie to the same had sworn themselves to king Stephan, began to repent themselves, & consulted how to restore Spawd the emperesse, and to expell Stephan. Wherefore they assembled themselves in armie, & diuided themselves into sundrie cities, towne and castles.

Among whom one Balotwin Ribeuers then erle of Denon, with force entered and took this citie. But the king so Harpelle followed and pursued him, that he drave him from hence into the Ile of Wight, which was then his lordship. But the king when he had receiued the citie into his faith, marched with his armie to the said Ile, & took the same, as also the earle himselfe, whom he sought to tharlished. But Spawd the emperesse afterwards remembering this citie for such their seruice as the well liked, did enlarge the liberties of this citie, for whom peacelie euer after was an anniuersarie kept at the charges of the citie.

It was also in great troubles in the eleuenth pere of king Richard the second, Anno 1387. For a controuersie being fallen betwene the king & his two vnckles, the dukes of Yorke & Gloucester, none were then so highlie in the kings fauour, as were Robert Here marques of Dublin, and Michael de la Pole earle of Suffolke, & others of their faction. So these the king gaue in commandement, to collect and muster an armie, as it were for his defense, against his said vnckles: which when they had partlie done, whether it were because they mistrusted their owne parts, or whether they doubted of the sequelle of their doings, they left their iourneie towards London, as it was first appointed, and came towards this citie. The two dukes who stood vpon their owne gard and defense, hauing aduertisement hereof, followed and persuaded them with all haste and speed: and hauing ouertaken them at this citie, they ioined the fight with the marques and the earle. But they trusting more to their feet than to their hands, secretlie gaue the slip and fled awaie, making no staie before they came to Scotland; and from thence into Flanders, where they died.

It was moreover in troubles in the tenth pere of king Edward the fourth Anno 1469, when the states of this king, and of king Henrie the first were doubtfull, and the whole realme diuided: some following king Henrie, and some king Edward. In time of which troubles the duchesse of Clarence, the lord Dineham, the lord Fitzwaren, and the baron of Carew, who followed and took part with king Henrie, came to this citie, being accompanied and supplied with a thousand fightingmen. The duchesse was great with child, and lodged in the bishops palace, but

Sir Hugh Courtneie taketh siege to the citie.

The maior is required to deliver the keies of the citie, and refuseth so to do.

The maior and citizens do forsake the citie.

The siege raised, and the citie delivered.

The duke of Clarence and the Earle of Warwicke come from Edgecourt field to this citie, and from hence to Dartmouth.

the lords were in other houses within the close among the chanons, and here staid themselves. But sir Hugh Courtneie knight, who then favoured and was on the part of king Edward, hearing of this assemble, raiseth an armie of his friends and allies, approacheth therewith unto this citie, besiegeth it, breaketh the bridges, and stoppeth all the waies leading to the same, and by which means no vittels could be brought to the markets: and being thus incamped about this citie, sendeth to the maior, requiring him either to open the gates and to give him entrie, or to deliver unto him the gentlemen that were therein. On the other side, the gentlemen which were within, they either mistrusting the maior and citizens, or not willing to stand to his courtserie, and be under his gouernement, required the keies of the citie gates to be delivered unto their custodie, and that all things to be done by their order and appointment.

In these doubts and perplexities consulting what were best to be done, they did at length resolve & conclude neither to yeld to the requests of them who were without, nor yet to satisfie the demands of them which were within the citie: but pacifieng both parties with such good words, and in such good order as they might, did reserve to themselves the keeping and safe custodie of the citie, being the chamber of the king, & parcell of the revenues of the crowne, to the onlie use of the king and crowne, as to them in dutie and allegiance did appertene. And therefore forthwith they rampired by the citie gates, fortified the walles, appointed souldiers, and did set all things in such good order as in that case was requisite; leauing nothing vndone which might be for the preservation of the state & commonwealth of the citie.

But yet for want of forescaffing, in procelle of time the provision within the citie waied short, and vittels to be scant; whereof it was doubted there would insue some famine, which the common people neither could nor would indure, if some remedie were not in due time had and provided. The magistrats did their best indeuor euerie waie, as well by diligence in following, as by counselling, in perswading euerie man to continue firme and true to the publike state, and their owne private commonweale. And albeit the common people were impatient to abide troubles, and loth to indure the present state of want and famine; yet they had that respect to their owne trust, faith, and safetie, as euerie man yelded himselfe contented to abide and indure the time of their deliuerance: and by the good will of God it followed, and the same took god effect.

For about twelue daies after this sturre begun, by waie of intreatie and mediation of certaine chanons of the cathedrall church of this citie, the siege was remoued and raised; whereupon verie shortly after did insue the field of Edgecourt, where the duke of Clarence and the earle of Warwicke being put to the worst, did flee vnto this citie, and made their entrie into the same the third daie of Aprill, 1470, and laie in the bishops palace for a few daies, vntill they had caused to be provided ships at Dartmouth for their passage over into Calis.

The king being aduertised which waie his enemies were gone, followed and pursued them with an armie of fortie thousand men, and came to this citie the fourteenth of Aprill 1470, hauing with him in his companie sundrie & diuerse great lords and estates, as namelie the bishop of Ely lord tresoror of England, the duke of Norfolk earle marshall of England, the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Arundell, the earle of Wiltshire son to the duke of Buckingham, the earle of Shrewsburie, the earle Rivers, the lord Hastings, the lord Greie of Codner, the lord Audleigh, the lord Saie, the lord

Sturton, the lord Dacres, the lord Spountoie, the lord Stanleie, the lord Ferris, & the baron of Dudley, with a number of knights and gentlemen. But they all came too late; for the duke and the earle were both departed and gon to the seas before their comming.

Wherefore the king, after that he had rested and reposed himselfe here three daies, he departed and returned to London. It was also in great troubles, being besieged in the twelue yeare of king Henrie the seventh: by one Berkin Warbecke, 1470, who in the beginning of the moneth of September came to this citie, and incamped about it with his whole armie with ordinance battered the walls, fired the gates, undermined it, and with mightie ladders scaled them, and left nothing vndone which might be to compasse their attempt: thinking and supposing that small would be the resistance against them. But such was the noble courage and valiant stomach of the citizens, that they manfully resisted and defended those forces, and indured the same to the uttermost, vntill that the king being aduertised thereof, did send the lord Edward Courtneie, earle of Denon, and the lord William his sonne, with sundrie others well appointed, who came and rescued the citie: but in certeine conflicts the said earle and others were hurt; notwithstanding the enimie had the repulse, and was dynen to raise his campe and to depart.

Finallie & last of all, it was besieged in the third yeare of king Edward the sixt, 1549, by the commons of Deuon and Cornewall: the historie whereof, for so much as hitherto it hath not bene fullie and at large set forth by anie man, & wher at I John Hooker the writer herof was present, and testis oculatus of things then done, I will somewhat at large discourse & set downe the whole course & maner of the same. It is apparant and most certeine, that this rebellion first was raised at a place in Deuon named Sampford Courtneie, which lieth westwards from the citie about sixtene miles; vpon mondaie in the Whitson wake being the tenth daie of June 1549. The cause thereof (as by the sequelle it did appeare) was onelie concerning religion; which then by act of parliament was reformed, and to be put in execution on Whitsondaie the ninth of June. The which daie being now come, and the statute made for the same to be put in execution throughout the whole realme: it was accordinglie with all obedience receiued in euerie place, and the common people well inough contented therewith euerie where; sauing in this west countrie, and especiallie at the said Sampford Courtneie.

For albeit at the daie appointed by statute, they had heard and were present at the diuine seruice said, and had according to the new reformed order, and could not in anie respect, find fault, or faultlie reprehend the same: yet (as old bottels which would not receiue new wine) would rather wallow in the old dreggs and puddels of old superstition, than to be fed and refreshed with the wholesome and heauenlie manna. Wherefore they confederated themselves, bitterlie to renounce, reiect, and cast off the same, not onelie to the great offense of God, whome they ought in all truth and veritie to reuerence and honor; and to the great displeasure of the king, whome in all dutifullnesse they ought to haue obeyed: but also to the raising of open rebellion, the cause of the spoile of the whole countrie, and the vndowing of themselves, their wiues, and children; as in sequelle and in the end it fell out and came to passe.

And here dooth appeare what great detriments did come and insue to the church of God, and what great troubles trouble to the publike and commonweale: when as learned preachers do want to teach and instruct the people; and well persuaded magistrats to gouerne the common state. For these people lacking the one, & not stored with the other, were left to themselves, and to their owne dispositions: and thereby partlie of ignorance, but moze of a froward and a rebellious disposition, they do now bitterlie condemne to accept, and do openlie resist to receiue the reformed religion, now put, and to be put in by and execution. For upon the said mondaie, the priest being come to the parish church of Sampford, & preparing himselfe to saie the service according to the booke & reformed order set forth, & as he had done the daie before: some of the parishioners, namerlie one William Corderhill a tailor, and one Segar a laborer, and others who had consulted and determined before of the matter, went to the priest, and demanded what he ment to do, and what service he would saie: Who answered that according to the lawes set forth, he would saie the same service as he had done the daie before. Then they said, that he should not so do, saing further, that they would keepe the old and ancient religion, as their forefathers before them had done; and as king Henric the eight by his last will and testament had taken order, that no alteration of religion should be made, vntill king Edward his sonne were come vnto his full age. And therefore, for so much as he was now but a child, and could do nothing, they also would not haue any change.

In the end, all the parishioners joining and taking parts together, were all of the same mind, willing and charging the priest that he should vse and saie the like service as in times past he was wont to do: who in the end, whether it were with his will, or against his will, he relied to their minds, and yielded to their wills: and forthwith rauisheth himselfe in his old popish attire, and faith masse, and all such seruices as in times past accustomed. These newes, as a cloud caried with a violent wind, and as a thunder clap sounding at one instant through the whole countrie, are caried and noised euen in a moment through out the whole countrie: and the common people so well allowed and liked thereof, that they clapped their hands for ioie, and agreed in one mind, to haue the same in euerie of their seuerall parishes.

The iustices of peace dwelling not far from Sampford, being aduertised how disorderlie, & contrary to the lawes, things had bene done in the church of Sampford; and how that the common people were clustered and assembled together, to continue and to mainteine their lewd & disordered behaviour: such of them, namerlie, sir Iugh Wolard knight, Anthonic Barue, Alexander Wood, and Martie Slader esquiers came & met at Sampford, minding to haue had conference with the chiefe plaiers in this enterlude, as well for the redresse of the disorder already committed, as also to persuaue and pacifie the rest of the people. But they partlie vnderstanding before hand of the iustices coming, were so addicted and wholly bent to their follies, that they fullie resolved themselves, willfullie to mainteine what naughtilie they had begun. And therefore, when the iustices were come to the place, and requested to talke with them, they refused it; vntill the said gentlemen would leaue all their men behind, and go with them into a certeine fewell close not far off; and so they would be contented to conferre with them.

The gentlemen, albeit they and their men were the greater number, and sufficient to haue repressed the small companie of the commoners then & there assembled: yet whether it were because they thought in such a case to vse all the best & quietest waie for the pacifying of them; or whether some of them being like affected as they were, did not like the alteration, as it was greatlie suspected: they yielded, and according to the motion made, they left their men in the towne, & went into the foresaid close, & there hauing had conference a pretty while together, did in the end depart without anie thing done at all. Whereof as there appeared some weakenesse in the said iustices which were so wholy liured, as they would not, or durst not to represse the rages of the people (which they might haue done) so therof also ensued such a scab as passed their cure, and such a fire as they were not able to quench. For the commons hauing now their willes, were set vpon a pin, that the game was theirs, and that they had wone the garland before they had runne the race; nothing forsaiking what might ensue, nor yet accounting what folke it is to triumph before the victorie. Wherefore they assemble & confederat themselves throughout the whole shire in great troops and companies, and do associat and flocke vnto them the Cornish people, minding to ioine together, and foolishlie to mainteine what rashlie they had begun.

The king and counsell then occupied in the weightie causes concerning the state of Scotland, being aduertised of this towards rebellion, & respecting the speedie redresse thereof, sent forthwith for sir Peter Carew knight, who then was in Lincolnshire, and for sir Calwen Carew, who was then attendant at the court: and to them commandement was giuen, that forthwith, and with all speed they should hasten and depart into Deuon, and there to vse, by the aduise of the iustices, all the best meanes and waies that they might for the appeasing of this rebellion, quieting of the people, and pacifying of the countrie; and to cause euerie man quietlie to returne to his home, and to refer the causes of their griefs and complaints (if they had anie) vnto the king and counsell: and if they then refused so to do, they to vse such other good meanes and waies as might be for the suppressing of them. And the counsell being daillie moze and moze aduertised, that these begun rebellions did moze and moze increase; and doubting of the sequels thereof, by reason that in other places of the realme the like tumults were begun, though not for the like causes; do direct and giue an order to the lord Russell, then lord priuie seale, and after earle of Bedford, that he also should follow and dispatch himselfe into Deuon; and he had a commission to deale in such order as he might best do for the pacifying of the said tumults and byzozes.

The foresaid two knights, hauing receiued their commission vnder the kings hand, came in post into the countrie, and making their repaire to this citie, do forthwith send for sir Peters Courtneie then shiriffe and the iustices of the peace of the countrie; and vnderstanding, that a great companie of the commons were assembled at Crediton, which is a towne distant about seauen miles from Excester, and that among them were the Sampford men: & who were the chiefe of them toke counsell & aduise what was best to be done, and what waie meetest to be taken. In the end it was concluded, that the said sir Peter and sir Calwen with others should ride to Crediton, & there to haue conference and speeches with the said commons, and to vse all the good waies and meanes they might to pacifie & appeale them, they then supposing, and being persuaued, that by good speeches and gentie conferences they should haue bene able to haue compassed and persuaued the said commons. But the people being by some secret intelligence aduertised of the coming of the gentlemen towards them, and they fullie resolved not to yeld one iote from their determinations, but to mainteine their cause taken in hand, do arme and make themselves strong, with such armors and furnitures as they had; they intrench the high waies, and make a mightie rampire at the towne end, and fortifie the same, as also the barns next adjoining to the said rampires with men and munition, hauing peried the wallies of the barns with lopes and holes for their shot.

The foresaid gentlemen knowing nothing hereof, rode on their iourneie, and being come almost to the towne, they were aduertised how the waies were stopped and rampired, and that they could not ride into the towne. Whereupon they alighted from their horses, and after a little conference had, they agreed to go into the towne on foot, nothing thinking lesse that they should be stopped or denied to go in on foot. But when they came to the rampires they found the contrarie: for they not onelie were denied to come nere the rampire, but vtterlie were refused to be talked withall: no offers of persuasions nor motions of conference at all could be allowed. For the sun being in cancer, & the midsummer mone at full, their minds were imbued in such follies, and their heads caried with such vanities, that as the man of Athens they would heare no man speake but themselves, and thought nothing well said but what came out of their owne mouths.

The gentlemen upon such checks, taking the matter in euill part, to be so irreuerentlie and discourteoullie intreated, with one consent do agree to make waie ouer the rampire. But in the aduenture thereof they were so galled both by them which kept the rampires, and speciallie by such as were within the barnes, that they were faine to retire and giue place, with the losse of some, and the hurt of manie. In which distresse, a certeine seruiceman named For, and reteining to sir Hugh Pollard, suddenly set one of the barnes on fire: whereupon not onelie such as were therein, but all they also which were in the rampires fled and ran awaie. And then the gentlemen hauing recouered the rampire went into the towne; but there they found none except a few pore and old people, the residue trusting better to their heeles than to their armes were fled to a further place: and then they returned againe to Excester without anie thing done.

The noise of this fire and burning was in post hast, and as it were in a moment carried and blazed abroad throughout the whole countrie; and the common people upon false reports, and of a gnat making an elephant, noised and spread it abroad, that the gentlemen were altogether bent to ouer-run, spoile, and destroy them. And in this rage, as it were a swarme of wasps they cluster themselves in great troops and multitudes, some in one place, and some in an other, fortifying and intrenching themselves as though the enimie were readie to invade and assaile them. And among other places one was at a village belonging to the lord Russell named St. Marie Clift distant from Excester about two miles, where the commons of the countrie thereabout had begun to fortifie the towne for their defense & safetie.

The cause and pretense of their doings herein, was not onelie the burning of the barnes at Crediton aforesaid, which all the commons generallie did vse for a cloke of this their rising and rebellion: but this one thing also increased their disposition. It happened that a certeine gentleman named Walter Raleigh dwelling not far from thence, as he was upon a hie holie daie riding from his house to Excester, overtooke an old woman going to the parish church of saint Marie Clift, who had a paire of beads in hir hands, and asked hir what she did with those beads? And entring into further speeches with hir concerning religion, which was reformed, & as then by order of law to be put in execution, he did persuade with hir that she should as a good christian woman and an obedient subject yeld the rebnto; saying further, that there was a punishment by law appointed against hir, and all such as would not obte and follo the same, and which would be put in execution upon them.

This woman nothing liking, nor well digesting this matter, went forth to the parish church, where all the parishioners were then at the seruice: and being impatient, and in an agonie with the speeches before passed betwene hir and the gentleman, beginning to vphraid in the open church verie hard and vnseemlie speeches concerning religion, saying that she was threatened by the gentleman, that except she would leaue hir beads, and giue ouer holie bread and holie water, the gentlemen would burne them out of their houses and spoile them, with manie other speeches verie false and untrue, and whereof no talke at all had passed betwene the gentleman and hir. Notwithstanding she had not so soon spoken, but that she was beleued: and in all hast like a fox of wasps they sling out of the church, and get them to the towne which is not far from thence, and there began to intrench and fortifie the towne, sending abroad into the countrie round about, the news aforesaid, and of their doings in hand, flocking, and procuring as manie as they could to come and to ioine with them.

And they fearing or mistrusting, least the gentlemen which were then at Excester, would come upon them, they first fortified the bidge, which lieth at the end of the towne towards the citie, and laid great trees ouerthwart the same, as also planted certeine peeces of ordnance upon the same, which they had procured and fetched from Topham a towne not far from thence. But before they came into the towne, they overtooke the gentleman maister Raleigh aforesaid, and were in such a choler, and so fell in ragies with him, that if he had not stifed himselfe into the chappell there, and had bene rescued by certeine mariners of Emouth which came with him, he had bene in great danger of his life, and like to haue bene murdered. And albeit he escaped for this time, yet it was not long before he fell into their hands, and by them imprisoned and kept in prison in the towne and church of saint Sidwelles, without the east gate of the citie of Excester, during the whole time of the commotion, being manie times threatened to be executed to death. But to the matter.

These the doings of the commons being aduertised to sir Peter Carew, who then was in Excester, assembly all the iustices & the gentlemen, & confereth with them what were best to be done; and in the end, concluded & agreed that he, sir Saluen Carew, sir Thomas Denis, sir Hugh Pollard, and sundrie others should ride to Clift, and there to vse all the best meanes they might, for the pacifying and quieting of them. And accordingly in the next morning being sundaie they all rode thither: and being come almost to the bidge, they perceived the same to be rampired, & no waie to be open for them to passe into the towne. Whereupon sir Peter Carew alighted from his horse, and mistrusting nothing, was going on foot toward the bidge. But such was the ranco and malice conceived against him, partlie for religion, and partlie for the burning of the barns at Crediton, which was laid altogether to his fault, that the gunner whose name was John Hamon an alien and a smith, and dwelling then at Woodburie, not far from Clift, by the procurement and abetting of lings in so weightie a cause : wherein they all ought rather to haue vsed all meanes to haue suppressed their outrages , than to haue mainteined their follicies : and therefore as there was a blame in them, so was there a plaine rebellion in the other.

The first and chiefest cap-teins of the rebellion.

The gentlemen perceiuing they could not passe into the towne, doe send in a messenger vnto the towne, aduertising them that they were come to talke friendlie with them, as also to satisfie them if they had anie cause of grieffe, or were by anie bodie misused. They at this message and motion staggered a while and cast manie doubts : but in the end they sent word that they were contented, that if sir Thomas Dennis, sir Hugh Bolland, and Thomas Pard esquier, would come into the towne to them and leaue their men behind them, as also would take order, and giue their safs and promise that no hurt should be done or offered to be done vnto them, whyles they were thus in conference together : that then vpon these conditions they would be contented to talke with them. Vpon which promise made and assured vnto them, the foresaid these gentlemen went into the towne about ten of the clocke in the forenoone, and there taried and spent the most part of the daie in much talke and to no purpose : as in the end it fell out.

The other knights and gentlemen, which in the meane while tarried without, and waited a long time even untill the date did draw toward night, began to mislike of the matter, some speaking one thing and some an other: yea and some of them in plaine speeches said they would ride ouer the water and issue into the towne. But the friends and seruingmen of the two knights, respecting the promise made before their entrie into the towne, but especially their masters safetie, which by breach of promise might be put in perill, did bitterlie mislike and were grieved with those speeches, and therefore began a litle quarrelling among themselves, but forthwith pacified and quieted. And yet some one or two of the companie rode to the waters side, & with their haues searched the depth thereof: for at that bygde the water at enerie tide (for by reason that the seas are so neare) swelleth by and reboundeth. Which thing when they in the towne did see, forthwith cried out alarm, and made much ado; and some of them began and grew into such rages, that the gentlemen within the towne began to distrust their safetie.

peretained to the conference and talke heretofore ended, and they came aboate; who as soon as they were come to sir Peter Carew, they were demanded what they had done, and how they had sped: who answered; Well enough: & giuing no other answer they rode all together to Excester, deferring the discussorie of their doings untill their coming thither.
The same night they supped all together, & after supper ended, and all the serving men aduised out of that roome, sir Peter Carew demanded of them what they had done, and what agreement they had made: who answered that the commons had promised, and were contented to keepe themselves in god & quiet order, and to proceed no farther in their attempts: so that the king and the counsell would not alter the religion, but suffer it to remaine and stae in the same state as king Henrie the eight left it: & untill the king himselfe came to his full age. Sir Peter Carew and all the residue nothing liking this answer, being farre from their expectation, were for the time in a great dumpe or studie; but in the end misdeeds and discomendments both the matter and the man-as in their good advices and counsels, faining such secretlie kept themselves close in certaine houses then unknowne. Sir Peter Carew berie earlie in the next morning toke his horse, and the high waies being then not stopped he escaped and rode on to George Henton, a place of sir Hugh Paulets in Somersetshire: where was the lord Russell, being then newlie come from London, and unto him he gave to understand, how all things had passed: the swiftly dispatched and sent him awaie to the king and counsell to advertise them of the same. The king at the first hearing of the matter, was verie much grieved, & in great perplexitie in two respects the one because at this instant the like tumult and rebellions (though for an other cause) were now raised and begun in other places; the other was because he was forced to leave and give over the appointed attempt for the conquest of Scotland, and to imploy now those soldiers and strangers, whom he had reserved for that service, for the quenching of this fire kindled at home.

pennerthele minding to followe the first, and to appeale the last, he sent berie courteous letters, gratioꝝ proclamations, and manie mercifull offers vnto all the commons of these parties, to haue pacified and satisfiſſed them, if they had had so much grace so to haue accepted it. The commons being now entered in their follies, and hauing diuſen the gentlemen to the sight, do openlie shew themselves traitors & rebels: and therefore assembling themselves do appoint out capitaine to direct & order both themselves, and all their proceedings; and as the common piouer be is, like lips like lettuce, as is their cause, so are the rulers; the one being not so bold and euill, as they wicked or twice. The capitaine then are these: Underhill a tailor, Gaunther a thomabater, Seagor a labourer, and Ashcredge a fishpiuer, with sundrie other such like, the twost men and the refuse of all others, thought most meet in this seruice. non and Cornwell were contented, not onely to be associats of this rebellion: but also to carrie the crosse before this procession, and to be captains and guiders of this wicked enterpryse, as namelie in Devon Sir Thomas Pomeroie knight, John Burle and one Coffin gentlemen: & in Cornwell Humfrie Arundell and Mirneclade esquiers, & Holmes a peoman, with sundrie others, who for the most part were in the end executed and put to death: and their facts to the immortall of their perpetuall infamie recorded in chronicles.

The principall & chiefe captains in Devon being fullie resolved by their owne power and authoritie to mainteine & continue the religion, according to the Romish church, & utterlie to impugn the reformation therof, established by act of parlement: & to support the authoritie of the idoll of Rome (whome they neuer saw) in contempt of their true and lawfull king, whome they knew and ought to obeie: these I safe sent their messengers unto the maior of this cite, whose name was John Blackaller, to moue and pte him to ioine with them, they thinking that they hauing by these meanes the libertie to haue free accesse to and from the cite, and the helpe of the citizens, should not want monie or armoz, or any thing else to serue their turne: the maior forthwith aduertised unto his brethren this motion. And albeit some and the chiefe of them did like & were well affected to the Romish religion: yet respecting their dutie to God, their obedience to the king, their fidelitie to their countrie, and safetie of themselves, gaue their full resolute and direct answer, that they would not ioine nor deale with them at all.

This answer was nothing liked, and therefore sent they their second messenger, requiring and commanding them to mainteine the old catholike religion with them, and to do as they did, or else they would besiege them, and perforce compell them therunto. The maior and his brethren returned their former answer, adding moreover that they in their domings were twicked & bad men; & they did & would repute them for enemies and rebels against God, their king, and countrie: and so renounced them. The one side therefore as they prepare to besiege the cite, and to worke all the extremities they can, by force to take that which by words they can not obtaine: so on the other side the maior and his brethren upon good aduise, garded and watched the cite with sufficient men, armed both by day and by night. The rebels (according to their determination) releng themselves upon a vaine hope, thinking that notwithstanding the answer before made: yet because the most part of the citizens were of their opinions, and of the like affections in religion, would not resist them: as also that they had many friends within the cite, more ready to ioine with them, than to follow the maior, if they might haue the choise what to do: they came being in number about two thousand persons, to the cite, upon the second of Iulie 1549, first making proclamation that if the cite would not yield, and ioine with them, they would enter with force and take the spoile of it, & so then they upon the deniall compassed the same round about, and gained unto them at the first all the suburbs.

And hereof they conceived such a vaine hope to haue their full desire upon the cite, that notonely the number in hope did dailye more & more increase, but also manye of them brought their iuines, horses, and paniers; perswading themselves, and promising them, by such a date and upon such a date to enter into the cite, and then to measure beluets and silks by the bow, and to lade their horses home with plate, monie, and other great riches. The maior and his brethren forecasting the perils which might in such a case issue, do provide all things necessarie and meet therewith to defend themselves, and to annoie the enimie. The cite therefore is bewed for armoz, men are mustered, soldiers are retained, captains in euerie ward appointed, warders for the daie and watchmen for the night assigned, great peces of ordnance laid in euerie gate, and placed in all convenient places of the wals; mounts in sundrie places erected, as well for lateng of ordnance, as for saving of the soldiers & watchmen from the enimies shot: and nothing was left undone, which in any respect that present state and necessitie required.

The rebels likewise intrench the high wales, plash downe trees, breake downe bydges, haue watches and wards in euerie place: so that no man could passe to or from the cite without their sufferance. The markets are stopped, vittells are kept from it, and all dealings and intercourses shut and cut off: and hauing (as they bygged) penned and shut up the towncsmen in a cope or mew, they plant their ordnance against euerie gate, and in all other such places as best to serue their turne, and to hurt them within: they burnt the gates, they brake up the pipes and conduits, aswell for the taking awaie of the water comming to the cite, as also to haue the led to serue for their shot and pellets. But for the burning of the gates, there followed rather a benefit than a hurt therof: for forthwith there were made certaine rampiers within the gate, which were farre stronger and of more defense than the gates, as also there were fiers continually kept euerie night betwene the rampiers and the gates: and as for water, the cite so standeth upon a little hill, that it is full of springes in euerie quarter within the same, and by that means full and plentifull of euerie good and sweet waters. Also they in sundrie places did undermine the wals, minding thereby with gunpowder and with other matters fit for her to haue blowne up the wals, and so to haue entered in that waie: but herein they were also prevented by this means and in this manner.

The cite it selfe (as is before said) is set upon a little hill, and lieth verie sleeping towards two of the gates. And at one of these named the west gate, the said rebels had undermined on the one side, and filled the place with certaine barrels of powder, pitch, and other stufte, meet and apt to receiue fier, and had appointed the night when the same should be set on fier, and so to haue blowne the wals up. At the same time there was a certaine tinner in the cite, whose dwelling was at Weingemonth, named John Belcombe, who depended much upon the goodwill and friendship of master William Hurk one of the aldermen of the cite, and he understanding of such an undermining to be in working, aduertised the same to master Hurk, and maketh him priuie how he would prevent the same, which was done in this manner. For whereas he by a noise under the ground did suspect the undermining to be in working, he took a pan of water, & did put the same on the ground, & by shaking of the water in the pan, he by removing the pan from place to place, came at length to the verie place, whereas the miners were working, and forthwith he countermined against the same, and brought so nere unto it, untill that he might and did see & looke into it. That done, he caused all the wals and turrets in the cite towards euerie street, having a fall that waie to be drawne at one time, and euerie man to fill therewith a great tub of water. At his foredoze, which being done, he caused them all at one instant to be cast out and emptied, which water running in great abundance towards the said west gate, was conuerted into the place countermined, & so entered and drowned the place, which before was mined:

mined: at which time also by the goodnesse of God, there fell a great shewe, as the like for the time had not bene seen manie years before, and which at that instant greatly serued this turne.

The rebels perceiuing themselves disappointed of their purpose, gaue over to deale any further in those attempts: howbeit otherwise they left nothing undone which might be to annoie the citizens. For sometimes they made alarms, as though they with all might and maine would haue giuen the scale: and indeed they had prouided ladders for the same purpose. Sometimes they by policies would make to come to the gates to burne them, and herein they used this stratagem. They prouided carts laden with old haie, & vntying the wheles before them would come to the gate without danger, and so set fier in the gate. But notwithstanding they escaped not scotfree, for both at the west gate and at the south gate, their commings being perceived, the great port peeces were charged with great bags of stint, stones and halleshot: and as they were approaching vnto the gates, the gates were secretly opened, and the said port peeces discharged, and so they were spoiled diuerse of them, & by that means they had small pleasure to follow those deuises: as also the citizens to prevent the same, did from thensforth keepe the gates open. Likewise they would keepe themselves close in sundrie houses, in the suburbs nere the wals, and would so watch the garrets, that if anye within the citie would looke out at the garrets, was in the danger of their shot, and some thereby were killed, and manie hurt. Upon which occasion the citizens set some part of the suburbs on fier, and some part which was next to the wals they beat and brake downe, and so drane the rebels out of those holes. Besides this, they had in sundrie places their great ordinance, so set and placed, that in certeine streets and places none could go but in perill and danger of their shot, which their deuises were checked, by making of certeine mounts to shadowe the streets from the same. Diuerse other deuises they practised to the continuall annoiance of the citie, which though they were greuous and dangerous, yet not to be compared vnto the perils which were within the walles among themselves, and whereof had insured the confusion of the whole citie, had not the Lord God of his goodnesse kept and preferred the same. For the serpent of diuision, and the fier of malice, was entered into the citie, manie being inuentioned with the one, but more scandalized with the other.

In the citie there were two sorts of people, the one and the greater number were of the old stamp, and of the Romish religion. The other being of the lesser number were of a contrarie mind and disposition, for they wholie relied themselves to the reformed religion, and to the kings proceedings, and inuentioned themselves to obey and follow the same. The first were so addicted to their owne fantasies, and their bottels were so farre seasoned with the old wines, that they cannot abide to heare of anye other religion, than as they were first nuyed in. Wherefore to keepe and obserue that, was their onlie enduor, and in respect whereof they regarded not king nor Rellar, passed not for him nor friendship, regarded not countrie nor commonwealth, but were wholie of the opinion of the rebels, and would haue no reformation in religion, and how so euer all other things sared, that must needs remaine as in times past had bene used.

The magistrates and chiefe men of the citie, albeit they were not as yet fullie resolved and satisfied in religion, yet they not respected that, but cheselie their dutifullnes to the king and commonwealth, nothing like the rebellion, nor beate with the same, but they do all things to defend the citie and themselves against their rebellious attempts, and likewise do their best indouour to keepe their owne citizens in peace and quietnesse. Whereupon the fauourers of the old Romish religion, being inwardlie greeued, that they could not haue their will, nor obteine to haue the gates to be opened, that those god and religious men (as they termed them) might come in, they used priuat conferences with them, sometimes by secret conferences ouer the wals, sometimes by priuat letters priuillie conueied to and fro, by messengers lurking and attending for the same, sometimes by open speeches in times of truce, and manie times by bills and letters bound fast about armoies, and so shot to and fro: and by these and other such like means they discovered ech one to the other their purposes and wicked deuises and practises: all which tended to this effect, to betraie the citie, and to set by the religion.

Howbeit, these things were not so secretlie done, but the same were knowne, & manifest arguments and proofes thereof did appeare. And among sundrie some one of them being one of god credit and countenance, and of the number of the common council, whose name was John Wolcot a merchant, was so farre enchanted herein, that vpon a certeine daie he being (as his course came about) a capteine for the daie, and to ward one of the gates: that daie, presuming that partlie by reason of his charge that daie, and partlie for that he was one of the common council, he might do moze than in deed disappointed to him, he vpon his first comming to the west gate in the morning met with certeine of his confederats, and after conference had with them, went suddenlie out at the wicket of the gate (which gate as then was not rampired) and carrying the keyes with him, went vnto the rebels, and had a long conference with them. But it took small effect, for he promised (as it after appeared) moze than he could performe, which turned to his great discredit: both for that he himselfe verie hardlie escaped their hands who were bent to haue kept and reteined him, as they did the two others, who went out with him: as also when he came in, was both checked and blamed for his doings.

At an other time the maior vpon an occasion assembled all the commoners vnto the Guildhall, & merie man being in his armor, and the papists being then the greater number, some one of them named

Richard Tailor a clothier, thinking by making of a tumult as an vproze they should be too hard for the others, and so attaine to their purposes, hauing his bowe bent, did uscke his arrow, minding to haue striken the man to whom he leuelled the shot: but gaing his hand, and misting his marke, he stroke his owne and best friend John Peter the kings costumer, a gentleman of god countenance and credit, who had died thereof, had not the arrow lighted vpon one of his ribs bones: a great murthering was like to haue ben a tumult, but the matter knowne it was appeased. Also at an other time there was a practise made with the souldiers, who had the charge and custody of the castell, that they should receiue in at the posterne of the said castell, a certeine number of the rebels; whereto the said souldiers through corrupcion had giuen their consent. The daie and time were appointed for the same: but whether the same by secret aduertisement were discovered, or whether the matter were mistrusted, or whether it pleased God to moue the hearts of certeine men to take the view of the castell, & of the maner of the souldiers wages there: it is most certeine that by the repaire & refoit of certeine men, vnder the colour to walke and see the trecherie, it was espied, and the practises discouered, red, and their whole deuises preuented. Like wise manie staires, and often there were traces made, and sundrie parles and conferences had with the rebels, which were procured to the onlie end that they might compass their deuises. And this was a common practise with them, that when soeuer the parles was appointed, there should be hostages or pledges put in on both parties: and they as men upon whom the greatest twight of the matter did depend, would require to haue the best and most chosen citizens, to be hostages with them, in stead and for the safetie of those which they would send to the parles for them, who for the most part were the refuse, the scumme, and the rascals of the whole countrie, and yet such they were in this case, as who ruled the roose and bore the whole or chiefest stouate; and the worse the man, the greater his authoritie among them, which was good enough for so wicked a matter taken in hand, according as the common adage is: Dignum patella operculum, like lips like lettice.

The chiefest rulers & captains among the commons were the worst men.

Great practise bled to procure the citizens to ioint with the rebels.

The faithfull and flat determination of the citizens to refuse the co-termining with the rebels.

The last and perilous practise of the rebels.

A pestilent practise.

But during the time of these truces and parles, there being then a time and scope of libertie to talke and conferre with them euerie man at his pleasure, there wanted no deuises under colour of frendlie conferences, to deuise how to compass their intents: holobett it pleased the eternall God, so to carrie and rule the hearts of the magistrats, that albeit being wyled in the Romish religion they were affected therewith, yet they so much respected their dutie to their prince, and the safetie to their commonwealth, that they openly professed they would neuer yield the citie so long as they liued, and were able to keepe and defend the same.

For the maior himselfe maister William Hurst, maister John Buller, maister John Wiltall, maister William Bertram, & others of the ancientest of the citie, were by sundrie means, waies, deuises, and reasons, perswaded to conioine themselves in this rebellion with the commons. They all with one mind and one voice gaue a flat answer that in the citie they had bene brought up, there they had gotten their liuings, there they had sworne their fidelitie and allegiance to their king and prince, there they had faithfully hitherto serued him, and there would be continue so long as they could to the uttermost of their powers; all which their promises & anowyses (the Lord be praised) they performed.

But to the matter, sundrie other trecheries & deuises were practised, which particularlie to recte were verie tedious & to no purpose. The last but the most perilous practise was this. When these malecontents saw themselves to be preuented in all their deuises, which before they had but secretlie and private practised, then they conioining themselves together, did openly shew and declare the misdoings, being perswaded that because they were the greater number, and that also the most part of the poore people were wearie, and for want of hitteles would not indure to be pinned in any longer, that therefore manie would ioint against a few, and that the game would go on their side.

And so on a sundrie being but two daies before the deliuerie of the citie, about eight of the clocke in the forenoon, a compaign of them in euerie quarter of the citie, hauing their consorts in a readines to followe & serue with them (if need so required) got into the streets, walking with their weapons about their girdles, as to fight with their enemies, and cry out, "Come out those heretikes and trespasse bohemans, where be they? By Gods wrongs a bloud we will not be pinned in to serue their turne. We will go out and haue in our neighbors, they be honest, good, and goodlie men. Their pretense and meaning being then, that if any of the contrarie side had come out, they would haue quarrelled with them, and haue taken occasion to set upon him and to raise a new tumult.

But by the providence and goodnesse of God it so fell out, that some being in their houses, and some at their parish churches, the maior and magistrats were first aduertised herof, before the others heard any thing of the matter: and they according to their wisdoms pacified the matter, and sent John Vincent, John Sharke, and others, the bretherdenns of this clocke vnto their houses. The other in the south gate street and at the south gate, there was a little stir, which being soon stopped, there ensued no hurt therof, other than a broken pate or two: for as it fell out, the wardens of that gate at that time were against them and of the greater compaign. These and manie other like practises were daily and continually vnto the one side, which in the end came to no effect, because the Lord kept the citie.

The others on the other side being also together bent to honor God, obeye the king, and to serue in their commonwealth, were fullie resolu'd to keepe and defend the citie, whose cause being iust and good, was sufficient of it selfe to keepe them in that mind: and yet their courage was the more, for that they saw the god bent of the maior and magistrats; who, holobett they were affected otherwise in religion, yet they were wholly bent and determined to keepe and defend the citie: and therefore they seeing the industrie, carefulnesse, seruice and painefullnesse, of these men, did favour, encourage, and countenance them, and to saie the truth by the industrie and god seruice of them, the citie was cheefly kept and preserved.

For there was no seruice to be done without, nor exploit to be aduentured without upon the enimie (as manie times there were sallies given) but these were the chiefest and commonlie the onelie doers: for which cause the contrarie side marvelously malign'd at them, and sought by all means how to impeach and indanger them. Which thing being daily perceived more and more by sundrie arguments, and as wise men seeking how to prevent the same, did manie and sundrie times confer among themselves herein, and in the end made a covenant and a faithfull promise among themselves (being then about the number of one hundred persons) that they would stand firmelie and faithfullie to the defense and keeping of the citie to their uttermost powers.

And if it so fell out, that the rebel and enimie should haue access and entrie into the citie, that then they should all meet at the lord Rasseles (now the earle of Bedfordes) house, and there to issue out at the po-sterne of the garden, and to giue the aduenture to passe and to escape a waie, as also if they were besieged that then they should stand together to their defense: And for this purpose they had then named some one man to be their capitaine for this enterprise. And in the meane time, to do all things extraordinary for the preservation of the citie, & by a particular covenant among themselves, did take order, that during the whole besieging of the citie and their aboad therein, a certaine number by course and besides the ordinarie set watch, should watch, stand, and walke about continually both by daie and night, by which means no sleight nor treacherie could be practised, but that they should haue an inkeling and vnderstanding thereof, and which indeed stood and came to such effect that it was the chiefest (if not the onelie) cause of the preservation of the citie for that time: for there was no seruice, no diligence, no care, nor any thing wanting or left vnborne, which by these men was not done.

among these men, whereof had ensued a great detriment to the common state, and an overthrow to themselves, had it not in due time bene presented. There were two gentlemen within this citie, and both of this companie, the one was borne of a honorable house and parentage, named John Courtneie a younger sonne to sir William Courtneie of Dorchester knight, and a man of verie good knowledge and experience in service. The other also was a man of verie good service, practise, and experience, his name was Barnard Duffeld, & servant to the lord Russell, and keeper of his house in Excester. Both of these were verie forward and carefull in this present service against the rebels. But there fell an emulation betwaine them, which albeit it be verie commendable in good things, & he passeth withie who can best excell therein: yet when the same shall tend to a division of a publike state, the dissolution of a commonwealth, the breach of common societie, or the maintenance of any euill, it is bitterlie to be shunned and lamented.

It happened upon an occasion offered, that certeine of this companie upon a time issued out at the foresaid posterne and made a sallie upon the enimies, and had such good successe, that some of them they slew, some they tooke prisoners, as also spoiled them of their goods, and brought a waie with them some of their ordnance, namely basses and slings: holobett they all escaped not scottfree, for some of them were taken, some also were hurt, as namely John Drake, who the yeare before was the receiver of the citie was shot through the cheeke with an arrowe, which he brought into the citie with him, and one John Simons a coke was so hurt that he died thereof.

But among them all one John Goldsmith being of that companie and servant to Richard Helierd of the same goldsmith, and a Fleming borne, had the best successe: for in the same skirmish he was taken prisoner by one of the rebels, who offered in taking of him with his bill to haue slaine him. With that this John Goldsmith fell downe & yielded himselfe, hauing then in his hand his peece or handgun charged, & suddenlie the other not mistrusting no; marking the same, he discharged into his verie bellie and so slew him, toke the spoile of him, and brought the same into the citie with him.

This skirmish though it were not clere gaines to this companie, yet it so encouraged them, that from time to time they consulted, and in the end determined to make a fresh sallie and to giue a new aduantage: whereupon there fell and grew a disagreement betwaine the two foresaid John Courtneie & Barnard Duffeld, the one affirming that the same was not to be permitted in anye sort or citie, which stood upon defense or garr, without a verie speciall order of the generall or chiefe capitaine, or some urgent necessitie, especiallie in that present distresse and extremitie, wherein the citie as then did stand. But Barnard Duffeld being verie loth to lose anye part of his credit, or to desist from that he with others had determined, could by no meanes be persuaded to the contrarie, but plainelie affirmeth that what he had determined should be performed.

Whereupon the foresaid John Courtneie resorteth to the maiors, aduertiseth vnto him the matter, & dealeth so fullie and with such persuasions with him, that the maiors assemble his brether, and sendeth for the foresaid Duffeld: who being come, the matter was at full debated and discoursed, and in the end concluded that it was verie hurtfull and dangerous to that present state, that anye such issuing out should be granted or permitted: and therefore prayed the said Duffeld to staie his determination, and to be contented. But he being impatient, & thinking his credit to be stained, if he should be debarred or denied to do that which he had faithfullie promised, did bitterlie refuse to yield to this the maiors request, as also by continuing of talkes, fell out in foule and disorderd speeches. Whereupon to auoid a further inconvenience, he was commanded to ward. The daughter of this Duffeld, whose name was Francis, hearing that hir father was in ward, and taking in greafe that so great an iniurie (as she termed it) should be done to hir father, came more hastily than aduisedlie vnto the maiors, somewhat late in the evening, & required to haue hir father out of the ward. Which thing being denied vnto hir, shee waied so warme, that not onelie she vsed verie vnseemelie tearmes and speeches vnto the maiors, but also contrarye to the modestie and shamefastnes required in a woman, speciallie yong and unmarried, ran most violentlie vpon him, and strake him in the face. This was taken in so euill a part, and fearing that it had bene a set match of some further inconveniences, the common bell was forthwith rung out: and also a rumour spread that the maiors was beaten, or killed.

The whole commons immediatlie in great troops, & the most part in armoz, ran to the Guildhall, where the maiors was, who though he was safe, yet were they so greued with this iniurie, that they would in all hast haue run to the lord Russells house, where he was then gone, and haue fetched hir out: but the maiors forercalling what inconveniences might insue, and respecting the necessitie of the present state, was not onlie contented patientlie to wape by these iniuries, but also earnestlie requested the commoners to do the like: who being so pacified, he went home, and they conducted him into his owne doores. The chorons of the cathedrall church which at that time were resident in their houses within the close there, namely archdeacon Dollard, treasurer Southyon, chancellor Luson, and master Holwell, with others of the said church, who ioined with the maiors and citizens in this service for the safeguard of the citie, and did keepe both watches and wards, and their men readie at all times to serue in euerie alarm and skirmish: they at the hearing of this disorderd part were verie much greued therewith, and they likewise forthwith assembled all their men, and being well armed and appointed, they went to the maiors, who was then gone home to his house, and then and there verie friendlye did comfort him, and offered to stand by him and to assist him in all the best service they were able to do for his defense, and safetie of the citie.

The said archdeacon offered, that in proper person he would herein stand in his behalfe against all persons whatsoeuer, that would attempt or offer to do him anye wrong. And in the end, after sundrie friendlye and good speeches, they departed to their homes. And the said archdeacon, euerie daie after, would either come or send to the maiors. This maiors, being a merchant, and onelie exercised in that trade, had small reach in matters of policie or marshall affaires: he was maiors of the citie thre times, and in euerie yeare there grew some troubles in the citie, but he had such a speciall care & regard to his charge and government, that he would neuer attempt nor do anye thing therein, but by the aduise and counsell of wise, graue, and expert men: and God so blessed him that he prospered and had good successe in all his doings.

Besides these and sundrie other former perils, the which the citie manie and oftentimes stood in, and by the goodnes and prouidence of God still ouercome, there befell and happened a third one, which exceeded all the rest, and whereof the greatest danger and perill was feared: and this was famine, or penurie, which which of all other turmoils and perils is most dangerous, & no other plague to be compared to it. For no force is feared, no lawes observed, no magistrate obeyed, nor common societie esteemed, where famine ruleth. For as the poet saith: Nescit plebs ieiunia timere. The store of bittels within the citie, for want of provision in due time, and by reason of the restraint of the markets, upon a sudden was verie slender and small, and the same in verie short time spent and consumed. And albeit there were good store of drie fish, rise, pynes, rafins, and wine, at verie reasonable prices, yet bread which as the prophet saith, Confirmat cor hominis, Strengtheneth mans hart, that wanted: neither was anie to be had. And in this extremitie the bakers and householders were driven to seeke by their old store of pusses and bean, wherewith they in times past were wont to make houselbread, and to feed their swine and poultrie, and this they moulded by in clothes, for otherwise it would not hold together, and so did bake it by, and the people well contented therewith. For (as Plutarch writeth) Fames reddit omnia dulcia, nihilq; contemnit esuriens: Hunger maketh all things sweet, and the hungrie belliceth shunneth nothing.

But when this also was spent, and nothing now left, and the common people being not acquainted with so hard a diet as famine prescribeth, were verie impatient to endure the continuall barking of their hungrie bellies, and therefore they were verie faine & asie to be persuaded, or rather of themselves contented to yield unto the ennemie, to be fed for a time with the stolen fat of his flesh pot, than to abide for a short time a little penurie in hope of a delivrie, and then to be filled with saturitie and plentie. But the magistrats and graue senators, who in all other causes had shewed themselves wise, careful and discreet; and who having received sundrie injuries, did yet without rigour, revenge or malice, wasp the same by, respecting rather the common state than their owne privat cause; so in this matter also being of a great importance do verie wiselie & politikelie deale with the said people: who the poorer they were, the better they were considered, and the more carefultie provided for. First, there was a generall collection set and rated throughout the whole citie for their reliefe, and thereby they were liberaltie euerie weeke considered: which thing being some increase to their stocke and store, was the better to their content. When all such bittels as were to be had within the citie, they either had it free, or for a verie small price.

Besides this, manie times when anie cattell came nere unto the walles of the citie, some shift was made to haue them, or by skirmiting & issuing out for them, or by some other means. And this also what so euer it was, was altogether divided among them. And as for the prisoners fast fettered in the gaols, they had also their portions, as farre as it would stretch: notwithstanding in the end, for want they were fed with houselclee, which they liked and were well contented withall. For as the proverbe is, Hunger findeth no faults but all things are sweet. Besides, if anie wrong were offered or iniurie done to anie of them, it was forthwith upon complaint redressed: but if anie of them did disorder themselves, it was borne withall, and they in all gentle and courteous meanes intreated: as also from time to time persuaded with good words patientlie to abide and be contented: not mistrusting but that God shortly would send a delivrance.

And thus, and by these means, in hope almost against hope, they continued dutifull and obedient, from the second daie of Iulie 1549, untill the first daie of August then following, the same being five whole weekes, upon which daie they were deliv-red by the coming and entrie into the citie of the lord Russell: and which daie in memorie for euer to endure is kept for a high and holie feast amongst the citizens yearelie upon the first daie of August. Immediatlie upon which delivrance of the citie, the first care that euerie man had, was to thift and to make provision for bittels, wherof some hungrie bellies were so greedie, that overcharging their empty stomachs to hastilie, they died therewith.

Thus having declared something of the state of the citie, and of the doings therein during the time of this rebellion, though much more might be therein said, let us now returne to the lord priuie scale, who after the departure of sir Peter Carew to the court, removed from George Henneron, and came to Honiton, minding from thence to haue passed into Excester, if waie had bene open. But being advertised that the citie was besieged, and that all the waies leading thitherwards were stopped, he remained still in Honiton. Sir Peter Carew in the meane time, according to the former order betwene them taken, was ridden to London, and being before the king, declared the whole matter at large. Whiche the king, not liking the dissolutie of his people, promised to seeke a speedie remedie: and so commanded him to the counsell for the same: and being before them, and having at full discoursed the state of the matter, the duke of Summerset being much grieved with the matter, would haue rejected the whole on sir Peter, charging him that by reason he had caused the houses to be burned at Crediton, it was the onelie cause of the commotion. But thereunto he answered the necessity of that service, as also declared that he had done nothing but by a good warrant, and therewith shewed forth the kings letters under his hand and priuie signet.

The lord Rich then lord chancelor replied and said, that the kings letters were no sufficient warrant, unless he had his commission under the hode seale; and therefore if he had right, he should by the lawes be hanged for his doings. But to this sir Peter answered so stoutlie, and charged the duke so depelle, that in the end he was willed to returne into the countrie, being promised that sufficient helpe both of men & monie should be with speed sent downe into the countrie. And to this effect he had both the kings and the counsels letters unto the lord priuie scale, and so toke his iourne backe againe into the countrie, and deliuered his letters to the said lord Russell, who in hope of the supplie promised, staied and remained sometimes at Wobonesotre, but most commonlie at Honiton, still looking for that supplie and furniture that was promised. But having long looked for the same in vaine, he was daillie more and more forsaken of such of the common people, as who at the first serued and offered their service unto him. And having but a verie small gard about him, he lived in more feare than he was feared: for the rebels daillie increased, and his companie decreased and shrank awaie, and he not altogether assured of them which remained.

Wherefore distrusting himselfe, & by a false rumor being advertised that the citie was taken, & in the possession of the rebels; as also how that there was a new stirre or rebellion begun about Sarisburie; he toke aduise and counsell of the gentlemen and such as were with him what were best to be done. The gentlemen of Dorsetshire were of the mind, and gaue him aduise, that it were best for him to returne into Dorsetshire, and there to remaine for a time; because it was a place of a more safetie, untill such time as he were better provided. And accordingly the next daie following he toke his iourne, & rode backe againe with the said Dorsetshire gentlemen.

Sir Peter Carew then being at Hoozofoton, and advertised hereof, took his horse and came against the said lord Russell, & met him upon Blacke doone, where was a long conference betwene them both: and in the end he so persuaded the lord, and with such pitiful reasons he carried him, that leaving his former determination, he dooly returne againe into Honiton; & there he continued thenceforth, saving one night spent at Oterie saint Marie, where as it fell out he was in more feare than perill. At his being in Honiton, and dailie waiting and looking for the promised helpe and supplie which came not; he was in an agonie, & of a heauie chere: not onelie for the want of the men & monie which he had long in vaine looked for, but also because he had spent all that he had brought with him, and could not tell how otherwise to helpe and provide to supplie his present need: but as it fell out all happened for the best.

For it chanced that there were then three merchants of the citie, following and attending upon him; Thomas Westwood not long before maior of the citie, John Bodlie, and John Periam, men of great wealth. These men vnderstanding of the heauinesse and grieve of his lordship, make their resort vnto him, and promise to helpe and relieue his agonie and want: and forthwith did procure vpon their credit from the merchants of Wiltshir, Linne, Abington, and elsewhere, such a masse of monie, as which when he had receiued, his grieve was eased. For forthwith he so provided and furnished himselfe with such necessities, and with a greater number of men; that he was now in the better safetie, as also the better able to incounter with the enimie: and it was not long after, but that he had a further supplie from the king, euen to his content. And being now somewhat reassured, newes was brought vnto him, that the rebels vnderstanding of his distressed state, were comming, and marching toward Honiton to assaile him; and were come as far as Fenington bridge, which is about three miles. Whereupon, he took aduise with sir Peter Carew, sir Galwen Carew & others what were best to be done. And in the end, after manie speeches, it was concluded that they should march towards them, and giue the onset vpon them, & accordingly, without further delaies or much talke, it was done out of hand. For vpon the next morning being a holie daie, they set forth, and came to the bridge aforesaid, where the rebels were indeed: some at the bridge, but the greatest company in a medow beneath the bridge: who, as soon as they perceived the lord Russell and the gentlemen with all their troope to be come, they make themselves readie to the fight. But the river & the bridge being betwene them, the lord Russell beth all the policies that he can, how to reconer the bridge; which by bold aduenturing he did in the end: but with the hurt of sundrie of his companie, amongst whome sir Galwen Carew was one, being hurt with an arrow in the arme.

And hauing recovered the bridge, and the river, all the rebels (such as were escaped) were gathered together in a medow nere adjoining in the lower side of the bridge, vpon whome they so fiercely followed, and gaue the onset; that though not without good loss of blowes and bloodshed, they in the end gaue the enimie the ouerthrow, and had the upper hand. And thinking that the victorie was cleare with them, and that the enimie was cleane gone, the soldiers and seruicemen gaue themselves all to the spoile; and being in the middle of their game, and they nothing thinking less than of any more enemies to be comming towards, euen suddenly march towards a newe crue of Cornishmen, to the number of two hundred, or two hundred and forty persons, under the conduct of one Robert Smith of saint Germans in Cornewall gentleman; and who taking these spoilers napping, manie of them paid dearlie for their waies. The lord Russell forthwith setteth all his companie in god arate, as the others did the like, and gaue the onset vpon them: betwene whome the fight for the time was verie sharpe and cruell. For the Cornishmen were verie lustie and fresh, and fullie bent to fight out the matter: nevertheless in the end they were ouerthrowne, and their capteine, whose combe was cut, thelwith a faire paire of heeles and fled awoie. In these two fights, there were reported to be slaine about three hundred rebels, which were verie tall men, lustie, and of great courage; and who in a god cause might haue done better seruice.

The lord Russells companie followed the chase nere three miles, & he himselfe then throughlie minded and bent to haue passed through to the citie. But one Joll his sole, who was then in hast come from Honiton, and where he had heard, as also by the waie as he came did heare bells ringing in sundrie parish churches, and supposing the same to be alarum, came with a soule mouth to my lord, and cried that all the countrie behind him were vp, and comming vpon him. Which his report (considering the cruell fights past) was credited, and thought that a newe companie was in preparing to follow the former quarrels. Whereupon they all retired and returned againe to Honiton; and from thence his lordship sent his comfortable letters secretlie by a boy appointed and accustomed for the same, vnto the maior of his successe, as also aduertising him of his determination that he would be shortly with him for the deliuerance of the citie. Which letters (the citie being then but in a doubtfull and dismayed estate) came in verie good season; and yet in the end scarcelie credited by some men, because his comming was not so speedie as was looked for.

Within verie short time after this ouerthrowe was giuen, the lord Greie of Wiltshir with a crue of horsemen, and one Spinola an Italian with three hundred shot, came to my lord; who being aduertised of the ouerthrow of the enimie, and that there were slaine about three hundred persons of them, they were in a great chafe, and much bewailed their euill lucke, that they had not come sooner to haue bene partakers of that seruice. My lord being now of a verie good comfort & courage, aswell for the good successe which he had ouer the enimie, & that his long looked supplie was come, sendeth his other letters to the maior, comforting him, as also as before comming him to be with him verie shortly; willing him that he should now take but a little patience for a little time. And accordingly about six daies after, on saturday the third of August, in god order he set forth out of Honiton, and marched towards Excester, his companie being about a thousand of god fightingmen; and leauing the direct high waie, draweth ouer the downs towards Woodburie, and there lodged and pitched his campe that night, at a windmill appertaining to one Gregorie Cartie gentleman. Which when the rebels of saint Marie, which heard of, forthwith, with all their force and power came forth, and marched on wards, untill they came to the foresaid mill where they offer the fight: and notwithstanding they were of verie stout matches, & also verie ballantlie did stand to their heels, yet in the end they were ouerthrowne, and the most part of them slaine.

Where after the victorie thus gotten, the lord Russell then the preacher, and attending vpon my lord in this iourne made a sermon, and caused a generall thanksgiving to be made vnto God: but before before all was ended, there began a new alarm; and forthwith euerie man to horse & to harnesse againe. The rebels which remained in the towne of saint Marie Clift, hearing of the euill successe befallen to their neighbours, and they doubting that their turne would be next to receiue the like; do spread abroad the newes, and request to be aided and assisted. Whereupon, forthwith in great tropes reioyced vnto them a number of their companions out of euerie quarter, to the number (as it was said) of sir thousand men: and in all hast, they make themselves and all things in a readinesse to abide the brunt. Upon the next morning being sundaie, my lord minding to follow on his course, commandeth the trumpet to sound, & euerie man to make ready to march forwards. And about nine of the clocke in the same morning, they come to Clift; where the armie is diuided into thre parts, and in thre severall places do appoint to make entrie into the towne. For in so manie places they had fortified the towne, and made great rampires for their defense.

These rampires were after some bickering recovered, and sir William Francis of Summer-setshire was named to be the first that gaue the aduenture, & made the entrie. The commons being driuen from the said rampires, ran all into the towne; and there ioine themselves together to abide the pulse. And as the kings armie was in good order marching into the towne, one of the chiefe captains of these rebels, named sir Thomas Pomeroie knight, kept himselfe in a furze close, and perceiuing the armie to be past him, and hauing then with him a trumpeter, and a drumme, commanded the trumpet to be sounded, and the drumme to be stricken vp. At which sound, the lord priuie seale, and his companie were amazed, supposing verelie that there had bene an ambush behind them to haue intrapped and inclosed them. Whereupon, they forthwith retire backe in all the hast they may: which when they in the towne perceiued, they follow after, and neuer staid vntill they came to the wagons then being in the high waie; & which now by fleeing and retiring of the armie, are the foremost and next to the towne. And these being laden with munition, armour, and treasure, they take and bring into the towne, where they rife as much as they could, sauing the peeces of the ordinance, which with the shot and powder they bestowed in places conuenient, and employed the same against my lord and his companie.

The armie hauing recovered the hill, did there pause a while, and finding themselves to be deceived, march backe againe towards the towne: but before they came thither, it was aduertised vnto my lord, that the towne and euerie house therein was fortified and full of men; and that it was not possible for ante to passe that waie without great perill and danger, except the towne were set on fire. Whereupon order was giuen, that as they passed and entered into the towne, notwithstanding it was my lords owne, they should set the houses on fire. Sir William Francis being in the foreward was foremost, and leaning the waie which he took before, took the first and other waies which waie was both deepe and narrow. The enemies being vpon the banks vpon euerie side of the waie, with their stones to beat him, that they stroke his headpece fast to his head and thereof he died. The armie being come into the towne, they set fire on euerie house as they passed by. But the rebelles containing themselves in the middle of the towne, do stand at their defense, where the fight was very fierce and cruell; and bloody was that daie: for some were slaine with the sword, some burned in the houses, some flying for themselves were taken prisoners, and manie thinking to escape ouer the water were drowned: so that there were dead that daie one with an other about a thousand men.

The towne thus being recovered, and the order shew giuen, the lord Greie desireth to passe ouer the riuer, and to be in the open field, which is a great heath named Clift heath: & this he could not do, but that he must passe ouer either the water or the bridge, both which were somewhat dangerous, for the water was somewhat mirie and muddie, as also at that time verie deepe, by reason of the flowing of the seas, which causeth the same at euerie tide to swell. Howbeit one John Pardo a gentleman, and who had dwelled thereabouts, knowing the said water, gaue the first aduenture ouer, and found waie nere vnto a mill about the bridge; and after him others do followe. But this was not for all the rest of the armie, who must needs passe ouer the bridge, which as then they could not do, by reason that the same was so ouerlaid with great trees and timber, as also there stood the gunner with his peece readie charged. Whereupon proclamation was made, that whosoener would aduenture and make waie ouer the bridge, should haue foure hundred crownes for his labo: When one forthwith moze respecting the gaine, than foreseeing the perill, gaue the aduenture: but the gunner rewarded him, for he discharged his peece vpon him, and slue him. And then before he could againe charge his peece, one of the companie, who before was passed ouer the water, came and entred the bridge at the further end, and comming behind him slue him; who forthwith calleth companie vnto him, and causeth aside all the trees and timber, and maketh the bridge cleere, and so the whole armie passeth ouer the bridge into the heath.

The lord Greie as soone as he was passed ouer the water, he rode forthwith to the top of the hill, which is in the middle of the heath; and from thence did make a view of all the countrie about him: and looking backe towards Woodburie, he saw and espied vpon Woodburie hill a great companie assembled; & marching forward, & suspecting that they were a new supplie appointed to follow and come vpon them, and aduertised the lord Russell therof. Whereupon it was concluded, that the prisoners whom they had before taken at the windmill and in the towne, who were a great number, and which if they were newlie set vpon, might be a detriment and a perill vnto them, should be all killed: which forthwith was done, euerie man making a dispatch of his prisoners; and then the night approaching, there they incamped themselves for that night.

The rebelles, which were and laie about Greesfer, were aduertised out of hand of this the euill successe of their neighbours; wherefore they with as manie as they could get, in all hast came to Clift heath: and in the lower side thereof next to the high waie, do intrench and fortifie a place fast by a hedge, and so crettie there, in the night, do place their ordinance, & make themselves in readinesse to abide the brunt: and as soone as the daie light serued, discharge and shot off their peeces vnto the armie incamped about the top of the hill. The lords and captains to end the quarrell, do determine to giue the onset vpon them; and according to the nature of warres, do politelie diuide themselves into thre parts, and euerie one hath his place assigned and order appointed vnto him.

The lord Russell, hauing no waie open before him, causeth his pioneers to make waie ouer the hedges & inclosed grounds, and by that means doth at length recover vpon the herie backe of the enemies: and they were so intrapped on euerie side, that they could not by any means escape, but must yield or fight. The one they would not, and in the other they prevail-led not. For notwithstanding valiantly and stoutly they stood to their tackle, and would not give over as long as life and limb lasted: yet in the end they were all overthrowen, and few or none left alive.

Great was the slaughter, and cruel was the fight; and such was the valor and stoutness of these men, that the lord Greie reported himselfe, that he neuer in all the wars that he had been in did know the like.

This fight being done, and all things set in good order, the whole armie marched vnto Topsham, which was about a mile off, and laie in that towne all that night, and carried with them in a hostler the bodie of corps of sir William Francis, and from thence carried it to Excester, where it was buried in marshall manner verie honorable in the bodie of the cathedral church of saint Peters. When the rebels who laie about the citie heard how their neighbors had sped, and from time to time had the worse side, and were still overthrowen: then as men despairing to prevail, secretly gaue over the siege and ran apace euerie man his waie. The gentlemen, which were kept prisoners in the churches and in other places about the citie, being now at libertie, came straight to the walles about midnight, & gaue knowledge thereof to the watch; and they forthwith did the like vnto the maior. The ioie and comfort ther-of was so great, and the desire of fresh vittells so much pressed, that manie not abiding till the daie, light gat and shifted themselves out of the gates, but more for vittells than for spoile, and yet they were glad of both: howbeit some did not long enioie the same, for manie being more greedy of meat than measurable in feeding, did so ouercharge themselves in surfeiting, that they died thereof.

The next morrow being tuesday and the first of August, the lord priue scale thinking it long before he came to the citie, commanded the trumpets verie early to sound, and euerie man to make readie and to prepare alwaie. And accordinglie all things being done, he marcheth towards Excester, and about eight of the clocke being tuesday the first of August 1549 he came to the same, to the great ioy & comfort of the long captiuaed citizens, who were no more glad of their deliuerie, than was his lordship and all good subjects full of his victorie. But at his com-ming he entred not into the citie: for being aduertised from the maior that the citie was altogether vnfurnished of vittells, order was taken that no stranger, nor one nor other should enter into the citie, but lie in the campe for a time. When his lordship pitched his tents without the wals in St. Johns fields, next to Southing haie, & upon the cities wals next to the posserne of his house was the kings standard of the red dragon set vp. As soon as he was entred into his tent, the maior & all his brethren in most seemlie & decent order went vnto him, who most louinglie embraced them, most thankfullie accepted them, and most highlie commended them for their traubatic, and seruice, which vpon his fidelitie and honor he did promise should be well considered by the kings maiestie, and which in the end was performed. For the king being aduertised thereof, he did not onelie thankfullie accept and highlie commend their seruices, but also rewarded and considered the same, both by confirmation of their charters, enlarging of their liberties, and augmenting of their revenues, in giuing vnto them the maior of Gloucestre, which as was said was sometimes their ancient inheritance, but by power of the earles of Deuon by force taken, and by wrong and iniurie kept from them.

Immediatlie after his comming, sir William Herbert then master of the kings horses, and after earle of Denbroke, came with a thousand Welsh-men: who though they came too late to the fraile; yet some inough to the plaie. For the whole countrie was then put to the spoile, and euerie soldier sought for his best profit: a iust plague of the Lord vpon rebels and dissotall persons. But the citie being as yet altogether destitute of vittells, and the Welshmen at their first comming seeing the same, they did by their speciall industries & travels fraught & furnish the same within two daies with coine, cattels, and vittells, verie plentifullie, to the great reliefe and comfort of the people therein, & to the benefit of themselues. The lord priue scale remained and continued in this citie about twelue daies before he removed: setting all things in good order, rewarding the good & punishing the euill. To sir Peter Carew he gaue all Wineslades land, to sir Calwen Carew Hum-frie Arundels lands, to William Gibbes esquier Berries lands, and to manie others which had done god seruices he gaue prisoners, both bodie, goods, and lands.

On the other side he commanded forches and gal-lowes to be set vp in sundrie places, as well within the citie as also in the countrie; and did command and cause manie to be executed and put to death, & speciallie such as were noted to be chiefe and busie doers & ringleaders in this rebellion. Among them all there was no one so exalted as was Welsh the vicar of saint Thomas nere the Erbridge at Exce-ster, who was preferred and presented to that benefice by the lord Russell patron thereof. This man had manie god things in him, he was of no great stature, but well set and mightilie compact: he was a verie good wrestler, shot well both in the long bow as also in the crossebow, he handled his handgun and peece verie well, he was a verie good woodman and a hardie, and such a one as would not giue his head for the polling nor his beard for the washing, he was a companion in any exercises of activitie, & of a courteous and gentle behauiour, he descended of a good honest parentage, being bozne at Pennerin in Cornewall; and yet in this rebellion an archcaptaine and a principall doer. He was charged with three principall crimes. The first was, that he did not onelie persuade the people to the contemning of the reformed religion, according to the kings procedings, and to keepe and obserue the Romish and popish religion: but also did erect, keepe, and vse the same in his parish church. Secondarily, he was a capitaine and a principall dealer in the cause of the rebellion, which was chieflie directed by him, his order, & aduise. Thirde, he caused one Kingwell a tinner of Chagford, and seruant to master John Charels of Lauestake to be hanged, because secretly he had conueied letters betwene my lord and his master, and was earnest in the reformed religion, which was then termed the kings proceedings, & an enimie to the popish state. And being a sharpe inueter against the one, and an earnest maintainer of the other, it procured vnto him great hatred and malice: when the rebellion was begun he sought by all the meanes he could how to escape alwaie: but he was so nar-rowlie watched, that he could neuer haue any opor-tunitie so to do.

They used all the deuises they could to recouer him to their opinions, sometimes with faire words, sometimes with threats, and sometimes with imprisonments: but still he inuied against them, calling them rebels and traitors both against God and the king, and foreprophesied vnto them that destruction and confusion would be the end & reward of their doings. Thus when they could not reclame him to their disposition, then by the order and iudge-ment of this vicar Welsh, he was fetched out of the prison,

prison, and forthwith brought forth before Calphas and Pilat, and condemned to be hanged: which was executed upon him forthwith, and he brought to an elme tree in Crilond, without the west gate of the citie, before the house of one Nicholas Caeue, and there hanged. The like crueltie or rather tyrannie was done at Sampford Courteneie, where then a certeine frankelin a gentleman, named William Hektons, who comming to Sampford to haue some communication with them for the staie of their rebellion, and for the pacifying of them in their due obedience, was at the townes end taken prisoner, & carried to the churchhouse, where he so earnestlie reproued them for their rebellion, & so sharplie threatened them an euill successe: that they all fell in a rage with him, and not onlie with euill words reuiled him: but also as he was going out of the churchhouse & going downe the staires, one of them named Githbridge with a bill strake him in the necke, and immediatlie notwithstanding his pitifull requests and lamentations, a number of the rest fell upon him, slue him, and cut him into small peeces: and though they counted him for an heretike, yet they buried him in the church-yard there, but contrarie to the common manner, laicng his bodie north and south.

These things being called to remembrance and objected against this vicar, although some men in respect of his vertues and good gifts did pitie and lament his case, and would haue gladlie bene sutors for his pardon: yet the greatnesse of his lewdnesse and follies considered, they left him unto his deserts: & so was by order of the marshall law condemned to death. And yet this one thing by the waie I must speake in his commendation. There was among the rebels a stranger and an alien, who was a verie skilfull gunner, & could handle his peece verie well, and did much harme vnto the citie, & among others slue one Smith standing at a doore in nozthgate street with a great shot from saint Dauids hill. This fellow toke vpon him, that he would set the whole citie on fire, and it should be cleane burned within foure houres, do they what they could. This his offer was so well liked, that the date and time was appointed when this should be done.

The vicar hearing thereof, assembleth vnto him as manie men as he could make and haue, & came to this companie when this fire should be kindled, and was so hot and earnest against their attempts, that he would in no wise suffer so lewd an act and wicked a thing to be done. For (saith he) do you what you can by policie, force, or dint of sword to take the citie, I will iointe with you, and do my best: but to burne a citie which shall be hurtfull to all men and good to no man, I will neuer consent thereunto, but will here stand with all my power against you. And so stout he was in this matter, that he stopped them from their further enterprising of so wicked a fact. But to the matter. The execution of this man was committed to Barnard Duffeld, who being nothing slacke to follow his commission, caused a paire of gallowes to be made, and to be set vp vpon the top of the tower of the said vicars parish church of S. Thomas: and all things being readie and the stage perfected for this tragedie, the vicar was brought to the place, and by a rope about his middell dymme vp to the top of the tower: and there in chains hanged in his popish apparell, and had a holie water bucket and sprinkle, a sacring bell, a paire of beads, & such other like popish trash hanged about him, and there he with the same about him remained a long time. He made a verie small or no confession, but verie patientlie toke his death, he had bene a good member in his common-wealth, had not the words ouer-groونه the good coine, and his soule vices ouercom-med his vertues.

The lord priue seale remaining still in Excester was continuallie occupied in setting things in order, he was verie seuerer and sharpe against such offenders as were chiefe and principall ringleaders of this rebellion: but to the common sort who were led and carried, and who did humble themselves, he was pitifull and mercifull, and did daillie pardon infinite numbers. And his lordship thinking verelie that all things were now quieted, & the rebels pacified, suddenlie newes were brought vnto him that there assembled at Sampford Courtneie, both Devonshire men and Cornishmen, and who were fullie bent to mainteine their quarrell and abide the battell. These newes so troubled and tickled my lord, that all businesse set apart, he commaunded forthwith the trumpet to be sounded, and the drumme to be stricken vp, and all his armie to be forthwith mustered: which was then the greater, by reason of the Welshmen and gentlemen of the countrie and of the commoners, who vpon submission had obtained pardon, and increased to the number of eight or ten thousand men, and forthwith he marcheth towards Sampford Courtneie, where sir William Herbert requested to haue the foze-ward for that daie, which was granted him.

And being come thither, albeit the great companie of so manie good souldiers and well appointed might haue disnated them, being nothing nor in order, nor in companie, nor in experience, to be compared vnto the others: yet they were at a point they would not yeld to no persuasions, nor did, but most manfullie did abide the fight: and neuer gaue ouer, untill that both in the towne and in the field they were all for the most taken or slaine. At which time one ap. Owen a Welsh gentleman, more boldlie than aduisedlie giuing the aduenture to enter the rampier at the townes end, was there slaine by the rebels, and after carried backe to Cron, where after the manner of wars he was honorable buried in the bodie of saint Peters church, scio of the kings side besides him then slaine: and so of a traitorous beginning they made a shamefull ending. Fewer the lesse manie escaped and they fled towards Summerfetshire: after whom was sent sir Peter Carew, and sir Hugh Paulet then knight marshall: with a great companie attending vpon them, and followed them as far as to King Weston in the countie of Summerfet: where they ouertooke them and ouerthrew them, and also toke one Coffin a gentleman their captaine prisoner and brought him vnto Excester.

The lord Russell himselfe minding to make all things sure, taketh his torneie, and marcheth into Cornewall: and following his former course, causeth execution to be done vpon a great manie, and especially vpon the chiefe belwedders and ringleaders: but the chiefe and principall captaine he kept as prisoner, and brought them with him to Excester. And when this lord had set all things in god order, he returned to Excester, & remained there for a time: but after departed towards London, where he was received with great ioy and thanks: and being come before the king, he forgot not to commend vnto his maiestie the god seruice of this citie in this rebellion, which (as is before said) was liberallie rewarded and considered. After his departure, and according to his order and appointment, the chiefe captaine and principall heads of this rebellion, whom he left in prison in the kings goale at Excester, were carried to London and commaunded to the tower, and in their due time were afterwards executed to death, namelie Humfreie Arundell esquier, Willielme esquier, John Berrie and Coffin gentlemen, and Holmes yeoman: which Coffin and Holmes were seruants to to Sir John Arundell knight. Of the number of them who were slain, there is no certaintie knowne, but manie more be found lacke then number: holobeyt it was accounted by such as continued in the whole service of this commotion to be about foure thousand men. But what number was of the contrarie side dispatched, nothing is reported, albeit it be well knowne that they escaped not scotfree, and especiallie the Burgonians, who were abhorred of the one partie, and nothing fauoured of the other. Thus much concerning the description of the cite, and of the sundrie inuasions and assaults against the same, and especiallie of the last rebellion or commotion in the yeare of our Lord 1549, wherein much more might be spoken, but this may suffice for this matter. And for as much as the cathedrall church of this cite, called by the name of St. Peters, is a parcell of the cite, and compassed within the wals of the same, though in respect of certaine priuileges distinct from the iurisdiction thereof; I thought it good to subiect hereunto the description of the said church; and of the antiquitie of the same.

The antiquitie, foundation, and building of the cathedrall church of saint Peters in Excester.

After that corrupt religion and superstition was crept and receiued into the church, and the people became deuout therein, then began the erecting of religious houses and monasteries in euerie countie. And as this was vniuersall throughout all chrestendome vnder the gouernement of the Romane bishop: so also was it generallie done throughout all England, in which generallie this cite was of a particularitie; for in this cite from time to time as opportunitie serued sundrie religious houses and monasteries were erected and builded, of which there were thre within the cite, circuit, and place now called the clofe of St. Peters, and which in time accrued and were vniued into one. The first was a house for women called moniales or nuns, which is now the deanes house or halendar haie. The other was a house of monks, supposed to be builded by king Ethelred, the third sonne to king Ethelwolp, and these two were vniued by bishop Leofricus vnto the cathedrall church. The third was a house for monks of the order of St. Benet, which was builded and founded by king Athelstane, about the yeare of our Lord 932: and this is that part of the cathedrall church now called the ladie chappell. For the said king, hauing diuened out of this cite the Wiltens then dwelling therein, and minding to make a full conquest both of them and of this their countie which they then inhabited, did so fiercelie follow and pursue them euen into Cornewall, that in the end he conquered them, and had the victorie. After which he returned to this cite, and here staing and sojourning for a time, did reedifie the cite, encompassed it with a stone wall, and founded the cathedrall church, which he then appointed for a monasterie for monks of St. Benets order. For so is it written: Hanc urbem rex Athelstani primus in potestatem Anglorum, effugatis Britonibus redactam turribus munivit, et muro ex quadratis lapidibus cinxit, ac antiquitus vocatam Munketon nunc Excester vocari voluit: ac ibi sedens mansum quoddam dedit ad fundandum monasterium pro monachis Deo et sancto Petro famulantibus. Besides the charges which he was at the building of the said church, he gaue also lands and reuenues vnto them sufficient for maintenance and liuelihoods, whereof Hoxkehull and Treaslaros were are parcell, and which now are appendant and appertaining to the treaslaros of the cathedrall church.

After the time of king Athelstane, the Danes with great hostilitie and crueltie hauing ouerrun this whole land, they also came to this cite, and in spoiling the same, did also ransacke and spoile the said church, whose continuall inuasions the monks being not able to indure, fled and forsoke their house and home, and sought places of better safetie. By which means this monasterie for sundrie yeares was left desituted, vntill the time of king Edgar; who on a time made a progresse into these west parts, to visit his father in law Mdogarus then earle of Deuon, and founder of the abbey of Taunfoke, whose daughter he had married. And being come to this cite, did here rest and staie himselfe, where then he saw the distressed state of the said church, & pitying the same, caused search and inquirie to be made of the monks which were scattered and yet left: and when he had gotten them together, he restored them vnto their house and liuelihoods, and appointed Sidemannus who was afterwards bishop of this diocese to be abbat of the same. And from thensforth they continued together (though sometimes in troubles) vntill that king Swanus or Sweno the Dane, with a mightie and a huge armie came to this cite, besieged, toke, spoiled, and destroyed it with sword and fier. Whombe it not long after it was restored againe by king Canutus or Canutus, who being aduertised of the great cruelties which his father Sweno had done to the said monasterie, did at the request of Athelredus one of his dukes, make restitution vnto Athelwoldus then abbat of all their lands, liuings and priuileges: as doth appeare by his charter dated in the yeare of our Lord 1019.

After this, about thirtie yeares, king Edward the Confessor came to this cite, and he by the abuse and at the motion of Leofricus bishop of Crediton, and who sometimes was lord chancelor of England vnder the said king, and one of his priue counsell, partlie for the better safetie of the bishop and his successors, who lieng and hauing their houses in the countie, were subiect to manie and sundrie perils, and partlie to prouide a more conuenient place for the monks, did remove the bishops see from Crediton, and removed the monks vnto Welfminster: and he the king in his owne person, together with quene Edith his wife, did install the said Leofricus in possession of this his new church and see. The bishop thus removed from the old, and placed in the new see and church, both endow the same with all those lands and liuelihoods which he had of the gift of the said king, and which before did appertene to his former church, and to reduce and make his sanctuarie to his mind, polleth downe the two monasteries nere adioining, the one being of monks and the other of nuns, and addeth and vnieth them vnto his owne church, and hauing brought all things to effect according to his mind, deuifeth and maketh lawes, orders, and ordinances for the good gouernment of his church and cleargie.

After the death of Leofricus, all his successors for the most part procure the augmentation and increase of this their new erected see and church, some in liuelihoods, some in liberties and priuileges, some in buildings, and some in one thing, and some in another. William Warewest the third bishop of this church, who had sometimes bene chapleine to the Conqueror, and to his two sonnes William and Henrie, was in such fauor and good liking with the Conqueror, that at his request he gaue vnto him and to this church, Wilmpton, Bampton, and St. Stephens, in Excester, which gift his said sonnes being kings of England did ratifie and confirme. And then this said bishop, hauing the ordering and distributing thereof, giueth Plimpton to the regular monkes there, for whom he had founded and builded a monasterie, and wherein he himselfe shortly after leauing and yeeling vp his bishoprike, became and was a monke. Brampton was referued to the church, and which afterwards was annexed to the deanerie. And St. Stephens with the fee to the same appertaining, he referued to himselfe and to his successors, & where by they are barons and lords of the parlement. This bishop in the yeare of our Lord 1112, first began to enlarge his cathedrall, and laid the foundation of that part, which is now the choro: quier: for before that time it was no bigger than that, which since and now is called the ladic chapell. After him William Bzwer the bishop made and established in the yeare of our Lord 1235, a deane and a chapter of foure and twentie prebendaries: and for the deane (whome he appointed, and whose name was Serlo) and for his successors, he gave and impropriated Brampton and Coliton Kableigh, and for the prebendaries he purchased lands, allotting and assigning to euery of them Pro pane & sale the like portion of foure pounds.

Peter Duinel the bishop finding the chancell of his church to be fullie builded and ended, beginneth to found and build the lower part of the bodie of his church, in the yeare of our Lord 1284, from the chancell of his church vnto the west end of the said church. This man first appointed a chanter and a subdeane to be in his church. To the one of them he impropriated Waineton and Chudleie, and to the other the personage of Gloscheaile in Cornewall. After him John Grandisson, in the yeare of our Lord 1340, did increase the length of the bodie of the church from the fust westwards, as also vaulted the rofe of the whole church, and did fullie end and finishe the same. And albeit from the time of king Athelstane the first founder in the yeare of our Lord 932, vntill the date of the death of this bishop Grandisson, which was in the yeare 1369, there were about 437 yeares distant, and in the meane time this church was continued in building by sundrie persons: yet it is so decentlie and vniformelie compacted, as though it had bene builded at one verie time and instant.

The successor of this Grandisson, who was named Thomas Wentingham, finished and ended the north tower of the church. After this, about the yeare of our Lord 1400, and in the time of bishop Stoford, the cloister was added to the church, and builded at the most part of the charges of the deane and chapter. And not long after Edmund Lacle bishop began to build the chapter house, which being not ended in his time, his next successor George Penill, in the yeare of our Lord 1456, did fullie end and absolue the same: and which is a verie faire, beautifull, and a sumptuous worke. And thus much concerning the antiquitie, foundation, and building of this cathedrall church. Thus far John Hooker.

About the same time that this rebellion (whereof all the foresaid discourse tendeth) began in the west, the like disordered hurles were attempted in Dorsetshire, and Buckinghamshire: but they were speedilie appeased by the lord Greie of Wilton, who coming downe that waie to soine with the lord priuie seale, chased the rebels to their houses, of whome two hundred were taken, and a dozen of the ringleaders to him deliuered, wherof certeine afterwards were executed. Whereouer, in diuerse other parts of the realme, namelie in the south and east parts, did the people (as before ye haue heard) assemble themselves in rebellions maner, committing manie foule disorders: but yet by god policie and wholesome persuasions they were appeased, except in Dorsetshire, where after there was a rumour spied, that the commons in Kent had throwne downe the ditches and hedges, wherewith certeine pasture grounds were inclosed, and had laid the same open. Diuerse seditious persons and buisie fellows began to complaine that the like had not bene done in Dorsetshire, and ceased not to practise how to raise the people to an open rebellion; meaning not onelie to laie open parkes and inclosures, but to attempt other reformations, as they termed them; to the great danger of ouerthrowing the whole state of the common-wealth.

They chiefelie declared a spitefull rancor: and hated conceived against gentlemen, whome they maliciouslie accused of inordinat couetousnesse, pride, rapine, extortion, and oppression, practised against their tenants and other, for the which they accounted them worthy of all punishment. Whereupon diuerse of them, namelie the inhabitants of Atilborough, and other of their neighbors, conceiuing no small displeasure, for that one Greene of Wilbie had taken in a parcell of the common pasture, as was supposed, belonging to the towne of Atilborough, and abiding to the common pasture of Warham, riotouslie assembled together, and there downe certeine new ditches made by the said Greene, to inclose in the said parcell of commons.

This was done before Midsummer, and so it rested till the first of Iulie, at which time there should be a publike plate kept at Wilmondham, a towne distant from Dorsetshire six miles, which plate had bene accustomed yearelie to be kept in that towne, continuing for the space of one night and one daie at the least. Whereupon the wicked contriueres of this unhappy rebellion, toke occasion by the assembling of such numbers of people as resorted thither to see that plaie, to enter further into their wicked enterprise: and vpon conference had, they immediatlie assembled at Dorsetshire a mile from Wilmondham, & there they cast downe certeine ditches of maister Hubbords on the tuesdaye, and that night they repaired to Wilmondham againe, where they practised the like feats. But as yet they toke no mans goods by violence.

Whereupon one John Flowerdew of Hetherlet gentleman, finding himselfe grieved with the casting downe of some ditches, came vnto some of the rebels, and gaue to them for tie pence to cast downe the fences of an inclosure belonging to Robert Ket, a tanner of Wilmondham, which pasture lieth nere to the faire Maunge at Wilmondham also: which they did. And that night consulting together, the next morning they toke their iourneie to Hetherlet, by the procurement of the said Robert Ket, in reuenge of the displeasure which he had conceived against the said Flowerdew, and set them in hand to plucke vp and cast downe hedges and ditches, wherewith certeine pasture grounds belonging to the said Flowerdew were inclosed.

Here was somewhat adu. For maister Flowerdew did what he could to haue caused them to desist from that attempt, in somuch that manie sharpe words passed betwixt Ket and the said maister Flowerdew. But Ket being a man hardie and forward to anie desperate attempt that should be taken in hand, was straight entred into such estimation with the commons thus assembled together in rebellious wise, that his will was accomplished: and so those hedges and ditches belonging to the pasture grounds of maister Flowerdew were throwne downe and made plaine. Whereupon was Ket chosen to be their capteine and ringleader, who being resolved to set all on fir and seuen, willed them to be of god comfort, and to follow him in defense of their common libertie, being readie in the common-wealths cause to hazard both both life and goods.

Here with they passed the water betwixt Crin-gelford and Eton, and coming to Botolphorpe, cast downe certeine hedgges and ditches in that place, and their number being now greatlie increased, they in-camped there that night. Here sir Edmund Wain-dam knight, being high shiriffe of Suffolke and Suffolke, came and proclaimed them rebels, commanding them to depart in the kings maiesties name. With which proclamation they were greatlie offended, and attempted to haue got him into their hands: but he being well hoisted, valiantlie brake through them that had compassed him in: howbeit he escaped from them and got into Norwich, being not past a mile off. The same night there came a great number of letow people vnto them, as well out of the citie of Norwich as out of the countrie, with weapon, armour, and artillerie.

The daie before that Ket came to this place, a great number of the meaner sort of the citizens of Norwich had thowne downe a quickset hedge, and filled by the ditches, wherewith the foresaid commons were on the one side inclosed, to keepe in the cattell of the citizens that had the same going before their common neatherd: and so that sente which by god and prouident aduise of their foresathers, had bene raised and made for the common profit of the whole citie, was thus by a sort of letow persons defaced and cast downe at that present. And scarce had they thowne downe the ditch in the hyer end of this parish, but that a companie of euill disposed persons stale out of the citie, and got them to Kets campe: The maior of the citie named Thomas God aduersed hereof, doubting what might follow of this mischievous begun rebellion, thought good to trie if he might persuaue the rebels to giue ouer their traitorous enterprises: and therefore taking certeine of the aldermen with him, he went to Kets campe, bringing that perswasions he couold to reduce them vnto their doutfull obedience, & to depart home to their houses.
But his trauell was in vaine, and therefore returned backe to the citie without hope to doe anie good with that brutall rout.

After whose departure, they considering in what danger they stood to be surprisid, if they should scatter abroad in such sort as till then they had done, seeking to wast and spoile the countrie about them, without keeping together in anie warlike order, thought it stood most with their suertie to draw into one place, and to fortifie the same for their further strength. Upon this resolution they determined to go with all speed vnto Spousehold, a place as they toke it meet for their purpose, and therefore sent to the maior of Norwich, requesting him of licence to passe through the citie, because it was their nereest waie, promising not to offer anie iniurie or violence to anie person, but quietlie to march through the citie vnto their place appointed. But the maior did not on-lie denie them passage, but also with sharpe and bitter speech reproving their rebellious doings, told them what should follow thereof, if they gaue not ouer in time from further proceeding in such wicked attempts.

The next daie being thursdaie, sir Roger Woodhouse with seuen or eight of his houshold seruants, came to them, bringing with him two carts laden with beere, and one cart laden with other vittels: for a recompense whereof he was stripped out of his ap-parell, had his horses taken from him, and whatsoeuer else he had, the rebels accounting the same a good price, he himselfe was cruellie tugged and cast into a dish of one Spares of nether Arleham by Welle Donbridge: where the same daie the rebels, being disappointed of their purpose to passe through Norwich, found meanes to passe, and coming to mai-ger Corbets house of Sprowston, intended to haue burnt the same house. But yet being persuaued to spare it from fire, they spoiled his goods, defaced a douchouse of his, which had bene a chappell, and afterwards got them to Spousehold, and coming to St.

Leonards hill, on which the erle of Surrie had built a statelie house called mount Surrie, they inkennelled themselves there on the same hill, and in the woods adioining that lie on the west and the south side of the same hill, as the commons or pasture called Spousehold heath lieth on the east side, which conteined foure or five miles in length, & thre or foure in bredth.

They put sir Roger Woodhouse, and other prisoners whom they had caught, in Arctward within the foresaid house of mount Surrie, on the which they seized, and spoiled whatsoeuer they found within it. In the meane time, the maior of Norwich taking aduise with his brethren the aldermen, what was best to doe in this case: whether presentlie to issue forth, and distresse the rebels now in the beginning, least time might giue them meane to increase their power: or rather to staie till they had aduertised the councell of the whole matter. In the end they agreed that this last aduise was most surest, and so they dispatched a post with all speed to the court. Beside this great campe (as they termed it) at Spousehold, there was a lesser at Kissing chafe neare to Lin: but the rebels there, by the good diligence and circumspect po-licie of the iustices and gentlemen of those parts, were speedilie repelled, and driuen from thence.
Norwich standing afterwards they assembled together at Watton, & there remained about a fortnight, stopping also the passage at Whetford and Brandon ferrie, within nine miles of the said Watton: and at length came and ioined themselves with these other at Spousehold, by appointment of their generall captaine (as they toke him) the foresaid Robert Ket.

Whereafter, there came flocking from Suffolke and other parts, a great multitude of letow disposed persons, raised by firing of beacons, and ringing of bells. Also a number of rascals & naughty letow persons stale out of the citie of Norwich, and went to campe. And thus being got together in great multitudes, they added one wickednesse to another, as having no feare of themselves after their downefall, nor holding them content with the committing of one villanous trespassse and horrible transgression, according vnto the poets words to the like purpose:
Quisquam hominum est, quem tu contentum videris uno Flagitio?

Now to cloke their malicious purpose with a counterfeit shew of holinesse, they caused one Coniers vicar of saint Martins in Norwich to saie seruice morning and euening, to praise to God for prosperous speed in that their vngoodlie enterpryse. Whereafter they went about to ioine to their cause diuers honest men, and right commendable for religion, doctrine, vertue, and innocencie of life, amongst whom were Robert Watton a preacher, Thomas God maior of Norwich, and Thomas Alderich of Spangræne hall.
These thre, although sore against their willes, were constrained to be present with them in all matters of counsell, and to take vpon them (as associates with captaine Ket) the administration and order of euerie thing: which happened well for manie. For when ether Ket himselfe, or anie other of the captains, though setting on of the outrageous multitude, pur-posed anie mischæse (as often it came to passe) in one place or other, through their graue aduise, and approued industrie, their furie was sundrie times raised and calmed. Although Ket bent to all vngratiousnes, would

imprisoned.

Then followed in order a long list of names, for the number of the gouernors was great, as they that beside the chiefe captians had chosen out of euery hundred two, and there were six and twentie hundredes. By vertue of such commissions, manie that were of god worship and credit in the countrie, whom the rebels in their rage had condemned, were fetched from their houses, and other places where they might be found, and being brought to the campe, were committed to prison. Also the ditches and hedges, wherewith the commons abode in the countrie, were inclosed, were throlone downe, & manie were warned and called forth from sundrie parts, to come and take part with them in these tumultuous uprores. And all these things were done, the maior, maister Aldrich not onlie holding their peace and twinkling thereat, but also sometime after a manner giuing their consent to the same, for to haue resisted them had bene but follie, and the waie to haue put themselves in danger of destruction, and their countrie too.

of the rebels.

The honest citizens of Dorwich in this meane while remained in great perplexitie, hearing nothing from the king nor his counsell. They therefore being vncertaine what to do, abode in the citie, till they might vnderstand what order it should please the king to take for the quieting of these troubles. The cause why the counsell was thus slacke in prouiding remedie against the Dorseth rebels, was: for that they were busie in quieting the troubles in the inner part of the realme about London, and other places (as before ye haue heard) by meanes whereof the power of these Dorseth rebels still increased, so that there were assembled togither into their campe, to the number of sixtene thousand vngracious vnchristis, who by the aduise of their captians fortified themselves, and made prouision of artillerie, powder and other abillments, which they fetched out of ships, gentlemen houses, and other places where any was to be found, and withall spoiled the countrie of all the cattell, riches and coine, on which they might laie hands.

Rebels and theues can not kepe together without iustification of iustice.

But because manie (as in such case is euer seene) did prouide for themselves, and hid that which they got, laung it vp for their owne store, and brought it not forth to further the common cause, yet and the other gouernors (for so would they be called) thought to prouide a remedie, and by common consent it was decreed, that a place should be appointed, where iudgements might be exercised, as in a iudiciall hall.

Whereupon they found out a great old oke, where the said Act, and the other gouernors or deputies might sit and place themselves, to heare and determine such quareling matters as came in question. Afore whom sometime would assemble a great number of the rebels, and exhibit complaints of such disorders, as now and then were practised among them; and there they would take order for the redressing of such wrongs and iniuries as were appointed, so that such greedy vagabounds as were ready to spoile more than seemed to stand with the pleasure of the said gouernors, and farther than their commissions would beare, were committed to prison. This oke they named the tree of reformation.

The tree of reformation.

The maior, maister Aldrich and others, whom they had receiued into the number of their gouernors, would oftentimes go vp into this tree, and make diuerse pithie orations to persuade the outrageous multitude to giue ouer their riotous rapines and spoilings. There were also certaine diuines which did vse all waies possible to withhold them from their wicked attempts, and to reduce them to peace and quietnesse, although this was not done without danger of their liues. Neuertheless, these in the due time used to preach in the churches, and in the night to watch with armour vpon their backs, leaning nothing vndone that might seme to apertene vnto the due of godlie and vertuous diuines, or faithfull and obedient subjects. Among these was doctor Mathew Parker, afterward archbishop of Cantuarie, whose wisdom, faithfulness, and integritie was most apparant.

Doctor Parker.

He coming on a daie into the campe with his brother Thomas Parker, that was after maior of Dorwich, found them before the tree at common prayer, the foreremembred Coniers vicar of saint Martin in Dorwich saying the Letanie. Whereupon doctor Parker thinking the time to serue for his purpose, went vp into the tree, where he made a sermon, diuiding it into thre feuerall parts. In the first he exhorted them to vse with moderation those vittels which they had prouided & brought into their campe, and not riotouslie nor launthlie to wast and consume them. In the second he aduised them in no wise to take reuenge of priuat displeasures, and not to chaine or keepe in irons those persons whom they held in ward, nor to take anie mans life from him. Lastly, he wished that they should haue regard to themselves, & leaue off their rash begun enterprise, giuing eare to such heralds or other messengers as came from the king, and to shew such honour vnto his maiestie now in his yong and tender yeares, as they might inioy him hereafter being grown vp in vertue, to their great ioy, comfort, and gladnesse. As he was handling this matter, with manie good and effectuall reasons, hauing the auditozie attentive to his words, one lewd fellow among the rest cried out and said: How long shall we suffer this biterling doctor, who being waied by gentlemen, is come hither with his tong, which is sold and tied to serue their appetite? But for all his prating words, let vs bide them, and bring them vnder the orders of our law.

When began the multitude to stir and make a noise, threatening the preacher, some of them saying: It were well, that for his faire told tale we should bring him downe with a mischiefe, with arrowes and lanclings. This speech brought doctor Parker in no small feare, and the more, for that he heard a noise and clattering of weapons vnder him, so that he looked for present death among them. But herein he was decciued: for there was not a man that stood next him within the compasse of the tree, would him anie harme. And immediatlie the foreremembred vicar of

S. Martins that executed the office of the minister, began with helpe of some singingmen that were present, the canticle Te Deum, wherewith the unruly multitude seemed partlie to quiet themselves. Which occasion doctor Parker perceiving to serue his turne, thought not longer to tarie amongst them; but quietly got him downe from the tree, and with his brother made hast towards the citie. But before he came to Dockthorp gate, there were of the rebels that came to him, and began to question with him about his licence, whereby he was authorized to preach; but he perceiving that there was no reason to be conceived of them, kept his waies, and left his brother to argue the matter with them.

Yet the next daie he entering into saint Clements church, took occasion to expound somewhat out of one of the lessons that was read that daie, concerning these wicked backbiters; manie of the rebels continuing about him; but not interrupting him a whit, hearing the end of his exhortation, although they feared greatlie therewith offended. But as he came out of the church, they followed him, and told him that (as they understood) he had three or foure able geldings to serue the king; and therefore charged him that after dinner they might be ready for them to occupie. But doctor Parker made them no great answer; but calling to him his horsekeeper, commanded him to plucke off the shoes from some of his geldings, and to pare their hounes unto the quicke; and that he should anoint the other with neruall, as if they had bene lamed with trauell. The rebels perceiving this, when they saw the same geldings had forth as it had bene to pasture, made no further businesse. Whereupon doctor Parker shoulde after, feining as if he went abroad to walke two miles off from the citie, at Crinklesford bridge found his horses ready as he had appointed, with his servants, and mounting vp, took his iourneie towards Cambridge, with as much speed as was possible, escaping thither out of all danger, although by the waie they met with and saw diuerse of the rebels plaieng their parts in their wonted outrageous manner. Thus did doctor Parker escape the hands of the wicked rebels, who despising his whole some admonitions, did afterwards by Gods iust iudgement proue his words to be most true.

But in the meane time proceeding from one mischief to another, after they had practised to spoile the gentlemen of the countrie of their goods, they began to attach their bodie, and by force to bring them in to their campe: so that such as escaped their hands, were glad to flee, and hide themselves in woods and caves, where they might best keepe themselves out of their aduersaries reach and intended dangers. But to speake of all the horrible praisses by these ungracious people exercised, it would be too long a proceesse. That shifs they found to cloake their doings, and that euen vnder the kings authoritie, if it is wonderfull. For whereas there were certaine commissions directed vnto diuerse gentlemen in the countrie, to take order for the appeasing of these tumults; they getting the same into their hands, took vpon them the authoritie committed to the gentlemen, vnto whome the same commissions were sent; and taking off the scales from the other, fastened the same vnto their counterfeit writings. To conclude, they grew to such vnumerable disorder, that they would not in manie things obey neither their generall capteine, nor anie of their gouernors, but ran headlong into all kind of mischief, & made such spoile of vittels which they brought out of the countrie adjoining vnto their campe, that within few daies they consumed (beside a great number of beies, twentie thousand muttons, also swans, geese, hens, capons, ducks, & other fowles so manie as they might laie hands vpon. And furthermore, they spared not to breake into parks, and kill what dere they could. Such haucke they made of all that came in their waie, and such number of sheepe speciallie they brought into their campe, that a good fat weather was sold for a groat. The woods, groues, and trees that were destroyed I passe ouer, and make no mention thereof. Herewith, what crueltie was shewed by them in fettering and manacing such gentlemen as they caught, and committed to prison for some mistaking they had conceived of them, it was a miserable case to behold. Some there were whom they brought forth; as it had bene to iudgement before the tree of redemption, there to be tried afore the gouernors, as if they had bene guiltie of some heinous and greuous crime. And when it was asked of the commons, what should be done with those prisoners, they would crie with one voice, hang them, hang them. And when they were asked why they gave so sharpe iudgement of those whom they neuer knew, they would roundlie answer, that other cried the same crie; and therefore they ment to giue their assent with other; although they could pae no reason, but that they were gentlemen, & therefore not woorthie to liue.

Whilest the rebels thus raged abroad in the countrie at Hengham eleuen miles from Norwich, sir Edmund Breuet knight, with a small companie of his owne mentall seruants, set vpon the night watch of the rebels that were placed there, & brake through, ouerthrowing diuerse of them; and hauing some of his owne men also vnhorsed by the rebels, and in danger to be heluen in peeces among them, yet he recovered them, & escaped their hands through great manhood. After which good nights seruice, as they would haue it esteemed, they repaired to their great capteine Ket, to shew their hurts received, & to complaine of their griefes. It was talked among them, that they would go to sir Edmund Breuet's house called Buckenham castell, to assault it, and to fetch him out of it by force. But it was doubted of some, least it were too strong for them; and other feared sharpe stripes, if they should attempt that exploit, being at the least twelue miles from their maine campe: and so that enterpise went not forward, the most part thinking it best to sleepe in whole skins.

There was at London the same time a citizen of Norwich, one Leonard Southerton fled from thence for feare of his life, whome the counsell sent for, to come to speake with them: and being asked what he knew touching the state of the rebels, he declared to them from point to point the manner of all their outrageous proceedings; but yet that as he understood, there were manie among them that would laie aside their armour, if they might be assured of the kings pardon: and therefore if it would please the king to set forth a proclamation, that all such as would depart from the campe and be quiet, should haue their pardon for all that was past, he doubted not but that those routs should be dispersed. His aduise was allowed, and thereupon was an herald sent with all speed in companie with the said Southerton vnto Norwich; & comming into the campe the last of Iulie, and standing before the tree of redemption, apparelled in his cote of armes, pronounced there before all the multitude, with loud voice, a free pardon to all that would depart to their homes, and laing aside their armour, giue ouer their traitorous begun enterpise.

After he had made an end of his proclamation, in maner all the multitude cried, God saue the king. And manie of them falling downe vpon their knees, could could not forbear with feares gushing from their eyes, but commend the kings great and unspeakable mercie thus freely offered unto them, which undoubtedly they had at that time all of them received, if the wicked speech of some of the rascall sort, and namelie the traitorous persuasions of that wicked caittife Iket himselfe, had not staied them from their dutifull inclinations. But after that Iket had with lowd voice before declared, that kings & princes were accustomed to grant pardons to such as are offenders, and not to others; he trusted that he needed not anie pardon, sith he had done nothing but that belonged to the dutie of a true subiect: and here with he besought them not to forsake him, but to remember his promise, sith he was readie to spend his life in the quarell. The herald hereupon called him traitor, and commanded John Detibone the swordbearer of Northwich to attach him for treason. Then began a great hurle burle among the multitude, so that the herald, perceiving they began to shrink from their former purpose of receiving the kings pardon, departed from them with these words: All ye that be the kings friends, come awaie with me. The mayo: & maister Alberich, with a great number of other gentlemen & honest peomen that were readie to obey the kings commandement, followed him.

The citizens favouring the rebels.

The mayo: being thus returned to the citie, caused the gates to be shut, and such gentlemen as had been committed to prison within the castell, or other places in the citie, he caused to be set at libertie, & with their aduise toke order how the rebelles might be kept out. But as he was busie about such matters, certeine of the citizens that favoured the rebelles had received a great multitude of them into the citie, which did put the citizens in such feare, that it was thought the most suretie for the gentlemen that had bene now released out of prison, to be shut up againe, least the rebelles finding them abroad, should haue murdered them. Yet after this, when the rebels were departed out of the citie againe, the mayo: & aldermen fell in hand to rampire by the gates, to plant ordinance, and to make all necessarie provision that for them was possible.

At length they fell to shooting off their artillerie as well from the citie as from the campe, doing their best to annoie each other. But when the rebelles saw that they did little hurt to the citie with their great ordinance lieng upon the hill, they removed the same downe to the foot of the same hill, and from thence began to beat the walles. Notwithstanding, shortly after they made sute for a truce to indure for a time, that they might passe to and fro through the citie, to fetch in vittells, whereof some want began to pinch them in the campe. The mayo: and aldermen flatlie denied their request, protesting that they would not permit anie traitors to haue passage through their citie.

The rebels soze kindled in wrath with this answer, and deniall of their sute, came running downe from the hill, and assaulking the gates, were beaten off with shot of arrowes and other weapons. And yet such rage appeared among the rebels, that the boies and yong lads shewed themselves so desperat in gathering up the arrowes, that when they saw and felt the same sticking in some part of their bodies, they would plucke them forth, and deliuered them to their bow-men, that they might bestow the same againe at the citizens. In all this boile (a thing noteworthy) the seditious sort minding nothing more than the compassing of their purpose, had as little faie of themselves in this their outrage, as a bull at the sight of a cow, or a stoned horse at the view of a mare; according unto the old saying of the poet:

Fortis equus vise semper adhaerit equa.*

In the meane time, whilst they were thus busie upon one side of the citie, an alarm rose at the defendants backs, crying that the rebels were entered the citie on the contrarie side: and so euerie man thinking awaie, and running thither to repell the enimie there, that part was left void of defendants where the first assault began. Whereof the rebels being aduised, rushed into the river that runneth before bishops gate, got to the gates, and breaking them open, entered without anie great resistance. For all the citizens were withdrone to their houses and other places, where they hoped best to hide themselves from the furie of their enimies.

The rebels having thus entered the citie by force, conquered all the guns and artillerie, with other furniture of warre out of the citie into their campe. The herald that was yet abiding in the citie, to see if the rebels would before the daie prefixed for their pardons, being not yet expired, giue ouer their enterprise, came with the mayo: into the market place, and in the hearing of a great multitude of people that were come thither and stood about him, he clamoured for commandement in the kings name, that they should laie armes aside, and get them home to their houses: which so manie as did, he pronounced a generall pardon, and to the rest extreme punishment by death.

The rebels that stood by and heard him, when he had once made an end of his proclamation, bade him get him thence with a mischief: for it was not his faire offers, nor his sweet flattering words that should beguile them, sith they made no account of such manner of mercie, that vnder a colour of pardon, should cut off all their safetie and hope of preservation. The herald perceiving how obstinate they were bent, and set on all mischief, and that it was impossible to bring them from their outrageous treason, either through feare of punishment or hope of pardon, departed without hauing brought that to passe for which he was sent. Immediately after his departure, the rebels sought for Leonard Southerton, purposing to haue apprehended him, and committed him to prison, for accompanying the herald thitherwards. But he hauing knowledge of their meaning, hid himselfe from them.

After this, there were by Ikets commandement apprehended diuerse persons, as the mayo: Robert Watton, William Rogers, John Homerston, William Brampton, and manie others, which were brought out of the citie, and committed to prison in mount Surrie. Iket perceiving well that he must either now obtaine a bloodie victorie by force against his countrie, or else to take such an end as his ungracious attempts did well deserue, got together so manie wicked persons as he might procure to come unto him from each side, with great rewards and faire promises: so that it was a strange matter to consider that a multitude of bntchiffs and rascals came to him upon the sudden.

The citizens of Northwich were soze displeased, that their mayo: (being an honest man, and one greatly beloved among them) should be imprisoned, and so remaine in danger of life among the rebels: for they threatened him soze, & telling at his name, would saie one to another; Let vs all come together to morrow, for we shall see a * cods hed sold in the campe for a penny. Whereupon the citizens fearing least through the malice and rage of the rebels, their mayo: might chance to be made awaie among them, procured maister Thomas Alberich (whose authoritie was great among them) to be a meane for his deliuerance: who comming to Iket with sharpe and bitter words words reprov'd him for his cruell dealing, by imprisoning so honest a man as the maior was, and withall commanded him to release him: which either for shame, or rather through feare of a guiltie conscience that pricked him, he caused incontinentlie to be done: who thereupon might now and then go and come at his pleasure to and fro the citie. But because he could not still remaine in the citie, but was constrained to continue for the most part in the campe, he appointed Augustine Steward to be his deputie, who with the assistance of Henrie Bacon, and John Atkinson thiriffes, governed the citie right orderlie, and kept the most part of the citizens in due obedience.

The counsell advertised now upon the heralds returne, that there was no waie to reduce these Poztholke rebels unto quiet otherwise than by force, appointed the marquisse of Pozthampton with fif-tane hundred horsemen to go downe vnto Poztholke to subdue those stubborne traitors that so vndutifullie refused the kings mercifull pardon, & helie offered by his officer at armes, and others. There went with the lord marquisse diuerse honorable and worshipfull personages, as the lord Sheffield, the lord Wentworth, sir Anthoine Drennie, sir Henrie Parker, sir Richard Southwell, sir Rafe Sadler, sir John Clere, sir Rafe Kowlet, sir Richard Lee, sir John Gates, sir Thomas Dalsen, sir Henrie Bedingfield, sir John Sullard, sir William Malgraue, sir John Cuts, sir Thomas Cornewallis knights, together with a great manie of other knights, es-quiers and gentlemen, and a small band of Italians, vnder the leading of a capteine named Spalatesta.

The lord marquisse being approached within a mile of Poztholke, sent sir Gilbert Dethicke knight, now Carter, then Pozrie, king at armes, vnto the citie, to summon them within to yeld it into his hands, or vpon refusal to proclame warre against them. Hereupon Augustine Steward the maiors deputie sent to the maior that was in the campe with him, advertising him what message he had receiued from the marquisse. The maior sent word againe, that nothing was more gracious vnto him, than to see into what miserie the citie and countrie about were brought by the rage of these commotions; and declaring in what case he stood, being kept by force among the rebels, whereas otherwise he would (according to his dutie) haue come to his hono. But as for the citie, he had committed the gouernance vnto Augustine Steward, who should be readie to surrender it into his lordships hands: and that if he would giue him leaue, he would come himselfe to his hono, submitting all things wholie to his lordships order and disposition.

This message being brought backe by the said Pozrie, Augustine Steward the maiors deputie with the thiriffes, and a great number of the citizens, came to the lord marquesses campe, and deliuered by the sword to his lordship, declaring how the maior himselfe would gladlie haue come, if he could haue got from the rebels: and that although a great roul of the lewd citizens were partakers with the rebelles, yet a number of the substantiall & honest citizens would neuer consent to their wicked doings, but were readie to receiue his lordship into their citie. The lord marquisse giuing good words to the citizens, and willing them to be of good comfort, sith he trusted to appease these troubles verie shortly, deliuered the sword vnto sir Richard Southwell, who bore it before the lord marquisse as he passed forth towards the citie, entring the same by saint Ste-phans gate. And incontinentlie was proclamation made that they should all resort into the market place, where they consulted together how they might best defend the citie against the enimies, and to re-presse their furie. Whereupon was order giuen for the placing of watch and ward about the gates and the walls, as might seme expedient. The lord marquisse supped that night and lodged in the maiors deputies house; but his lordship as well as other kept their armour on their backs all that night, for doubt of some sudden assault to be made against the citie by the rebels. Here it chanced that the strangers, either by appointment, or otherwise, went forth, and offered himselfe to the rebels vpon Pagdalen hill.

The strangers offer himselfe to the rebels.

The rebels came forth with their horsemen: but it seemed that they were better practised to fetch in booties, than to make their manage or careere, which being percelused of their fellows that were footmen, they put forth their archers before their horsemen, and such numbers herewith came swarming forth of their campe, meaning to compasse in those strangers, that they perceiuing the maner and purpose of the enimies, cast themselves in a ring, and retired backe into the citie againe. But they left one of their compantie behind them, a gentleman that was an It-talian, who more valiantlie than warlike ventured to farre among the enimies, and through euill hap being ouerthrowne beside his horse, he was inuironed about with a great multitude of those rebels, that tooke him prisoner, and like vile wretches spoiling him of his armour and apparell, hanged him ouer the walls of mount Surrie. Which ad well shewed what courtesie might be looked for at such cruell traitors hands, that would thus vnmmercifullie put such a gentleman and worthe souldior to death: for whose ransome, if they would haue demanded it, they might haue had no small portion of monie to haue satisfied their greedy minds. But it seemed that their bestlie crueltie had bereft them the remembrance of all honest consideration and dutifull humanitie.

An Italian
hanged by the rebels.

The marquisse of Pozthampton causing (as before ye haue heard) diligent watch to be kept vpon the walles, and at the gates, appointed the same to be visited right often, that through negligence no mi-hap should follow. Moreover, besides the watch at the gates and walles, the residue of the souldiors making a mightie huge fire in the market place, so as all the streets were full of light, they remained there all that night in their armour, readie vpon anie occasion to resist the enimies if they should make anie attempt. Sir Edward Warner marshall of the field gaue the watch word, sir Thomas Dalsen, sir John Clere, sir William Malgraue, sir Thomas Cornwallis, and sir Henrie Bedingfield were appointed to the defense of other parts of the citie. And now when euerie thing was thought to be safelie provided for, and that the lord marquisse and other were laid to take their rest, the rebels about the middest of the night began to shot off their great artille-rie towards the citie, so thicke as was possible: but the bullets passed ouer their heads that were lodged in the citie, without doing anie great hurt at all.

Sir Edward
Warner.

The lord marquisse, by reason of the often alarms that were giuen, whilst the enimies thus ceased not to rage with continuall shot of ordnance, was called vp by the marshall sir Edward Warner; and comming into the market place, accompanied with the nobles and gentlemen of the armie, fell in counsell with them, how to foresee that the citie in such danger might be safelie defended against the enimies with such small power as he had there with him. It was therefore determined, that all the gates which were on the contrarie part of the towne from the rebels campe, and likewise the ruinous places of the walles should be rampired vp, that if the enimies should chance to giue an assault to the citie,

citie, they might more easilie be repelled.

But as these things were in doing, and almost brought to end, in a manner all the whole multitude of the rebelles came out of their cabins, running downe in most furious maner to the citie, and with great shouts and yelling cries went about to set fire on the gates, to cline over the walles, to passe the river, and to enter the citie at such places where the walles were thorough age decayed and ruinous. The soldiors that were there with the lord marquisse, did shew their uttermost indeuor to beat backe the enimies. This fight in most cruell wise continued for the space of thre houres without ceasing, the rebels forcing themselves to the uttermost of their powers to enter perforce vpon them, and they within the citie shewed no lesse courage to repell them backe. The hardie manhood of diuerse knights, and other men of worship was here right apparant. It was strange to see the desperat boldnesse of the rebelles, that when they were thrust through the bodies or thighs, and some of them bough-sinewed, would yet seeke reuenge in striking at their aduersaries, when their hands were scarce able to hold by their weapon; thinking themselves somewhat satisfied if the humors of their enuie and deadlie spite might be fed but with a drop of their aduersaries blood; with such a malignant spirit (tending wholie to vengeance) these desperat rebels were possessed, according to the poets speech in the like sense and meaning:

The desperatnesse of rebelles.

Inuicta, sat. 13.

The rebels beaten backe.

But such was the valiancie of the gentlemen and soldiors, which were there with the lord marquisse, that in the end the enimies which were already entered the citie, were beaten out againe, and driuen backe to their accustomed kennell holes with losse of thre hundred of their numbers. They within the citie hauing thus repelled the enimies, & accounting themselves in more safetie than before, for the rest of the night that yet remained, which was not much, they gaue themselves to refresh their wearied bodies with some sleepe. The next daie, the lord marquisse was informed by some of the citizens, that there were no small number in Bees campe that would gladlie come from him, if they might be sure of their pardon; and that at Pockethorpe gate there were foure or five thousand, that wished for nothing more than for pardon: and that if the same were offered them, there were no doubt (as they belieued) but that they would submit themselves to the kings mercie.

The marquisse was glad to vnderstand so much, & instantlie dispatched Porreie king at armes, with a trumpetter, to assure them on the kings behalfe, that they should be pardoned for all offenses past, and that had bene committed in time of this rebellion, if they would lay armes aside. Porreie and the trumpet comming to the gate, found not a man there: but the trumpetter sounding his trumpet, there came running downe from the hill a great multitude of their people, & amongst other as chiefe, one Flotman, whom Porreie commanded to staie. Wherevpon the said Flotman asked him what was the matter, and wherefore he had called them together by sound of trumpet: To thy waies (said he) & tell thy companie from my lord marquisse of Northampton, the kings maiesties lieutenant, that he commandeth them to cease from committing anie further outrage: and if they will (saith he) obey his commandement, all that is past, shall be forgotten & pardoned.

Flotman.

Pardon offered to the rebels.

Flotman hauing heard Porreies declaration, as he was an outrageous and buisie fellow, presumptuously made answer, that he cared not a pins point for my lord marquisse, and withall, like a rebellious traitor, railed vpon his lordship, and maintained, that he and the rest of the rebels were earnest defenders of the kings roiall maiestie, and that they had taken weapon in hand not against the king, but in his defense, as in time it should appeare, as they that fought nothing but to mainteine his maiesties roiall estate, the libertie of their countrie, and the safetie of their commonwealth, &c. To conclude, he vterlie refused the kings pardon, and told Porreie certeinlie, that they would either restore the common-wealth from decaye, into the which it was fallen, being oppressed thorough the couetousnesse and tyrannie of the gentlemen; either else would they like men die in the quarrell.

Scarcelie had he made an end of his tale, when suddenlie a fearefull alarm was raised thorough out the citie: for whilst Flotman was thus in talke with the king of armes at Pockethorpe gate, the rebels in great rage entering the citie by the hospitall, went about to bying all things to destruction: but being incountered nere to the bishops palace, by the lord marquisse his men, there ensued a bloudie conflict betwixt them, which continued long with great fiercenesse and eger reuenge on both parts. There died about seuen score of the rebels, and of the soldiors that secured against them some number, beside a great multitude that were hurt and wounded on both parts. But the pittifull slaughter of the lord Sheffield, who hauing more regard to his honor than safetie of life, desirous to shew some proofe of his noble valiancie, entering amongst the enimies, as he fought right hardlie, though not so warlike as had bene expedient, fell into a ditch as he was about to turne his horse: & herewith being compassed about with a number of those horrible traitors, was slaine amongst them; although he both declared what he was, and offered largelie to the vilans, if they would haue saued his life. But the more noble he shewed himselfe to be, the more were they kindled in outrageous furie against him. And as he pulled off his head peece, that it might appeare what he was, a butcherlie knaue named Fulks, who by occupation was both a carpenter & a butcher, slat him in the head with a club, and so most wretchedlie killed him. A lamentable case, that so noble a young gentleman, inuend with so manie commendable qualities, as were to be wished in a man of his calling, should thus miserablie end his daies by the hands of so vile a vilan.

Diuerse other gentlemen and worshipfull soldiors came to the like end among those outrageous rebels, and amongst other, Robert Woluaston, that was appointed to keepe the doore of Christs church, was killed by the same Fulks, who took him for sir Edmund Laneuet, against whom the rebels bare great malice, for that he sought to annoie them so farre as by anie means he might, as partlie ye haue heard. But the slaughter of that noble man the lord Sheffield, so discouraged the residue of the soldiors that were come with the lord marquisse. And on the other part, the rebels were advanced thereby, in greater hope to preuaile against them, and therevpon pressed forward with such hardinesse, that they caused the lord marquisse and his people to giue place, and to forsake the citie, enerie man making the best thift he could to saue himselfe. But yet diuerse gentlemen of good account and worship remaining behind, as sir Thomas Cornewallis, and others, whom the rebels afterwards kept in strict durance, untill the daie came of their overthrow by the kings power, vnder the conduction of the earle of Warwicke.

The lord marquisse and the residue that escaped, made the best thift they could to get out of danger; and at length, he and the most part of them that were went forth with him, came to London. The rebels

Other hid their goods in welles, priuies, and other such secret places out of the waie.

The rebels entering into the houses of such as were knowne to be wealthie men, spoiled and bare awaie all that might be found of anie value. But to speake of all the cruell parts which they plaied, it would be tedious to expresse the same, their doings were so wicked and outragious. There was shooting, holing, and wounding among them, wounding, and crying out of women and childzen. To be short, the state of the citie at that present was most mis erable. The maiors deputie kept himselfe close in his house, and might behold all this mischief and de struction of the citie, but durst not come abroad, nor go about to staie them: at length, a great multitude of the rebels that were come downe fro their campe, entering by saint Augustines gate, came straight to his house, and stroue to breake open the doores: but when they could not easilie bring their purpose to passe that waie forth, they began to fire the house.
Whereupon for feare to be burned within his owne lodging, he set open the doores, and in came those un manerlic ghests, toke him, plucked his gowne be hind his backe, called him traitor, and threatened to kill him, if he would not tell them where the lord marquisse of Northampton had hidden himselfe.

And when he had told them that undoubtedly he and all his companie were gone, they were in a great rage, and with terrible noise and rambling they sought euerie corner of the house for him, and taking what they found, they departed. But yet ma nie of them afterwards partlie pacified for a peece of monie, and other things which they reuelled of the malor, and partlie reproued for the wrongfull robber ies by some that were in credit among them, they brought againe such packs and fardels as they had trussed vp together, and threw them into the thops of those houses, out of the which they had taken the same before: but yet there were diuers of the citizens that were spoiled of all that they had by those rebels, that entered their houses under a colour to seeke for the marquisse of Northampton's men. Namelie, the houses of those citizens that were fled, were spoiled and ransacked most miserable, for they reputed and called them traitors and enemies to their king and countrie, that thus had forsaken their houses and dwellinges in time of such necessitie: yet manie of the citizens bringing forth bread, here, and other vi tels vnto the rebels to refresh them with, somewhat calmed their furious rage, and so escaped their vio lent hands, although no small number were so slesed (as before ye haue heard) that they haue liued the worst for it all the daies of their life since that time.

But now the rebels having thus got possession of the citie, & chased awaie the kings people, they toke order to haue the gates kept hardlie with watch and ward of the citizens themselves, thertuning them with most shameful death, if they omitted the same.

These brutish persons were so farre swept into all kind of beastlie outrage, that when it rained, they would kennell by themselves in the churches, abusing the place appointed for the seruice and worshipping of the almightie God, in most prophane and wicked manner, and neither prayer nor yet threats of men or women that abused them to modestie could take place. The kings maiestie aduertised therefore, that there was no waie to tame their diuelish and traito rous outrage, but by force: with the aduise of his councell caused a power to be put in a readinesse, as well of his owne subiects as of strangers, namelie lancequenets, which were come to serue his maiestie against the Scots.

But now it was thought expedient to vse their seruice against these rebels, whose power and despe rate boldnesse was so farre increased, that without a maine armie, guided by some generall of great ex perience, and noble conduct, it would be hard and right dangerous to subdue them: wherein violence and force was to be used, sith they had shewed them selves in an extremitie of stubborneesse, like buls that by basting are to be tamed, or like disneched stallions which with bit & bridle must be managed, as one saith:

Asper equis duris contrahitur ora lupatis.

Whereupon that noble cheeke and valiant erle of Marlowe, lately before appointed to haue gone against the Scots and Frenchmen into Scotland, was called backe, and commanded to take vpon him the conduction of this armie against the poore folke rebels: for such was the opinion then concei ued of that honorable erle, for the high manhood, valiant prowesse, and great experience in all war like enterpises, sufficientlie tried, and knowne to rest in him, that either they might be vanquished and ouercome by him, or by none other.

Captaine Ket and his rebellious armie, having some aduertisement by rumors spred, of this prepa ration and coming of an armie against them; they were not slacke to make themselves strong and rea die to abide all the hazard that fortune of warre might bring. The erle of Marlowe then, after that his men and provisions were readie, did set for ward, and came vnto Cambridge, where the lord marquisse of Northampton and other met his lord ship. Here also diuerse citizens of Norwich came to him, and falling downe vpon their knees before him, besought him to be good lord vnto them; and withall declared their miserable state, great greafe and sor row, which they had conceiued for the wretched de struction of their countrie: beseeching him to haue pittie vpon them. And if in such extremitie of things as had happened vnto their citie, they had through feare or ignorance committed anie thing contrarie to their dutifull allegiance, that it might please his honor to pardon them their offenses in such behalf, sith if anie thing were amisse on their parts, the same came to passe fore against their wills, and to their ex treame greafe and sorrow.

The erle of Marlowe told them, that he knew indeed in what danger they had bene among those brutish ribalds; and as for anie offense which they had committed, he knew not: for in leauing their citie sith matters were growne to such extre mitie, they were to be borne with, but in one thing they had ouershot themselves: for that in the begin ning they had not sought to repress those tumults, sith if they had put themselves in defense of their countrie, to resist the rebels at the first, such mischiefs as were now growne, might easilie haue bene auoi ded. But neuertheless, vpon this their humble sub mission, he granted them all the kings mercifull par don, and commanding them to prouide themselves of of armour and weapon, appointed them to march forth with the armie, wearing certeine laces or ribbons about their necks for a difference, that they might be knowne from others. There were in this armie under the earle of Warwicke diuerse men of honor and great worship, as lords, knights, esquires, and gentlemen in great numbers. First the lord marquisse of Northampton, and sundrie of them that had bene with him before, desirous to be reuenged of his late repulse, the lords Willoughbie, Powes and Wale, Ambrose Dupleie, sonne to the said earle, and at this present worthilie adorned with the title (which his father then bare) of earle of Warwicke, and his brother lord Robert Dupleie now erle of Leicester; also Henrie Willoughbie esquire, sir Thomas Cresham, sir Parinaduke constable, William Deuereux sonne to the lord Ferrers of Chartleie, sir Edmund Bneuet, sir Thomas Palmer, sir Andrew Flammoche, and diuerse other knights, esquires, and gentlemen: all which plaid their parts as time and occasion was ministered vnto them to giue trall of their manhood.

The earle of Warwicke, and such as were come with him to Cambridge, marched directlie from thence towards Northwich, and came vnto Willmouham the two and twentieth of August, where and by the waie the most part of all the gentlemen of Northfolke that were at libertie, came vnto him. The next daie betimes he shewed himselfe vpon the plaine, betwixt the citie of Northwich and Cinton wood, and lodged that night at Intwood, an house belonging to sir Thomas Cresham knight, a two miles distant from Northwich. Here they rested that daie and night following, not once putting off their armour, but remaining still in a readinesse, if the enimies should haue made anie sudden inuasion against them. The earle of Warwicke in the meane time sent the afore remembred king of armes Porreie, to summon the citie, either to open the gates that he might quietlie enter; or else to loke for warre at his handes that would then assaie to win it by force, and such reward as rebels (that willfullie withstand their soueraigne) ought to receiue.

Northwich

what answer was made to the herald by the citizens of Northwich,
whom he assigned there vnto.

When he understood that the herald was come to the gates, he appointed the maiors deputie Augustine Steward, and Robert Rug, two of the chiefe citizens, to go to him and to know his errand. They passing forth at a posterne, and hearing his message, made answer, that they were the miserablest men that were then living, as they themselves beleued, sith that hauing suffered such calamities as they could not but tremble at in calling to remembrance, they could not now haue libertie to declare the loiall dutie which they bare & ought to beate to the kings highnesse: so that they accompted themselves most vnfaynfull, sith their hap was to liue in that season, in which they must either seapard losse of life, or the estimation of their good name, although they trusted the kings maiestie would be gracious lord vnto them. sith they had giuen no consent vnto such wicked rebellion as was thus raised against his highnesse, but with losse of goods and perill of life so farre as in them laie, had done what they could to keepe the citizens in good order and dutifull obedience.

One thing more they would humbly desire of my lord of Warwicke, that whereas there was no small number of Kets armie in the citie without armour or weapon, and as it should seeme irksome and wearie of that which had bene already done, it might please him once againe to vouchsafe to offer them the kings pardon, and if he should thus do, they had great hope that the rebels would gladly accept it, and so the matter might be pacified without more bloudshed. Porreie returned to the earle of Warwicke, and declared what answer he had receiued. The earle desirous of nothing more than to haue the matter thus taken up, as well for other considerations, as for feare least the gentlemen remaining prisoners with the rebels, should be unmercifullie murdered by their keepers, if they came to the bittermost triall of battell, he resolved to proue if it would thus come to passe. And hereupon was Porreie with a trumpet sent to offer them a generall pardon, who being entered the citie, met about fortie of the rebels on horsebacke, riding two and two together verie pleasant and merrie, and so passing from S. Stephens gate vnto Willmouham gate, the trumpetter sounded his trumpet, and with that, a great multitude of the rebels came thronging downe together from the hill: to whom the hoisemen speedilie riding, commanded that they should diuide themselves, and stand in order vpon either side the waie. And as Porreie and the trumpetter, with two of the chiefe citizens entred betwixt them, they were receiued with great noise and clamour, for euery of them putting off their hats or caps, cried; God saue king Edward, God saue king Edward.

Porreie and the two citizens, highlie commending them herein, requested them to keepe their place and order wherein they stood for a while: and then Porreie passing forth about two hundred and fiftie paces, came to the top of the hill, and putting on his coate armour, staied a while (for Ket was not yet come) and at length began to declare vnto them in what manner diuers times since first they had taken armes in hand, the kings maiestie by sundrie persons, as well heralds as other, had sought to reduce them from their vnlawfull and rebellious tumults, vnto their former dutie and obedience; and yet neuerthelesse, they had shewed themselves wilfull and stubborne, in refusing his mercifull pardon freely offered vnto them, and despised the messengers which his grace had sent vnto them to pronounce the same. He willed them therefore to call themselves now at length to remembrance, and to behold the state of the common-wealth, which they so often to no purpose had still in their mouths, and neuerthelesse by them miserable defaced, & brought in danger of bitter ruine and decay.

And herewith discourting at large of the horrible, wicked, and heinous murders, riots, burnings, and other crimes by them committed, he willed them to consider into what sea of mischances they had throwne themselves, and what punishment they ought to loke for as due to them for the same; sith as well the wrath of God as the kings armie was hanging ouer their heads, and readie at hand, which they were not able to resist. For his grace had resolved no longer to suffer so great and presumptuous mischance as this, to be fostered in the middle of his realme: and therefore had appointed the right honourable earle of Warwicke, a man of noble fame and approved balliance, to be his generall lieutenant of that his roiall armie, to persecute them with fire and sword; and not to leaue off, till he had utterly disperfed and scattered that wicked and abominable assemblie. And yet such was the exceeding greatnesse of the kings bountifull merrie and clemencie, that he that was by him appointed to be a reuenger of their heinous treasons committed against his maiestie, if they continued in their obstinate wilfulness, should be also the interpreter and minister of his gracious and free pardon, to so manie as would accept it. Which wille they now imbraced, the said earle had made a solemne vow, that they should neuer haue it offered to them againe; but that he would persecute them till he had purged

Yanie that heard him, hauing due confideration of their miserable estate, were touched with some remorse of conscience, fearing at length to taste the reuenge of such horrible crimes as they had been partakers of with others in committing the same.
But the moze part finding themselves highlie offended with his words, began to iangle (as they had done before unto other that had bene sent to offer them pardon) that he was not the kings herald, but some one made out by the gentlemen in such a gate coate, patched together of belements and church-stufte, being sent onelie to deceiue them, in offering them pardon, which would proue nought else but halters; and therefore it were well done, to thrust an arrow into him, or to hang him by. Although other seemed dutifullie to reuerence him, and diuerse that had serued in Scotland and at Bullongne, re-membryng that they had sene him there and knew him, told and perswaded their fellowes, that he was the kings heraid inded. Wherebpon they became moze mild, and offered him no further iniurie: but yet they could not be perswaded that this pardon tended to anie other end, but to bring them to destruction; and that in stead of pardon, there was prepared for them nought else but a barrell full of halters.

Such lewd speech was amongst them, fauouring altogether of malicious mistrust, and most willfull treason. Forreie neuer thelesse departing from thence, accompanied with het, came to another place, where he made the like proclamation: for the multitude was such that he could not be heard of them all in one place. Here, before he had made an end of his tale, there was a vile boie (as some write) that turned vp his bare taile to him, with words as unkinde as his gesture was filthie: with which spitefull reproch thus shewed towards the kings maiesties officer at armes, one (which in com-panie of some other that were come ouer the water to view things) being greatlie offended, with an harquebuse shot stroke that vngracious lad through the bodie a little aboue the reins.

Which when some of the rebels had sene, a dozzen of their horsemen came galloping out of the wood, crieng; We are betrayed friends, we are be-traied, if you loke not about you: do you not see how our fellowes are slaine with guns before our faces: What may we hope if we disarme our selues, that are thus vsed being armed? This herald goeth about nothing else, but to bring vs within danger of some ambush, that the gentlemen may kill and beate vs all downe at their pleasure. Wherebpon they all thanke auaie, and fled, as they had bene out of their wits: yet did their great capitaine Robert het accompanie Forreie, meaning (as hath bene said) to haue gone to the earle of Warwicke himselfe, to haue talked with him: but as he was almost at the foot of the hill, there came running after him a great multitude of the rebels, crieng to him, and asking him whether he went; We are readie (said they) to take such part as you do, be it neuer so bad: and if he would go anie further, they would (as they said) suerlie follow him.

Forreie then perceiving such numbers of people following them, desired het to staie them: who returning backe to them, they were incontinentlie appeased, and so they all returned with him backe to their campe. When the earle of Warwicke vn-derstood that they were thus altogether set on mis-chiefe, and neither with praier, proffer of pardon, threatening of punishment, nor other meanes they could be reduced to quietnesse, he determined to proceed against them by force. And wherebpon bringing his armie unto saint Stephens gate, which the rebels stopped vp, with the letting downe of the postculice, he commanded those that had charge of the ar-tillerie, to plant the same against the gate, and with batterie to breake it open.

As these things were in hand, he understood by Augustine Steward the maiors deputie, that there was an other gate on the contrarie side of the citie, called the Wasen gate, which the rebels had rammed up, but yet not so, but that it might be easilie broken open. Wherewith were the pioniers called, and commanded to breake open that gate also: which being done, the soldiers entered by the same into the citie, and due diuerse of those rebels that stood readie to defend and resist their entrie. In the meane time had the gunners also broken in sunder with their shot the postculice, and nere hand the one halfe of the other gate, by the which the marques of Northampton, and capitaine Durrie, alias Poignard, (that being sent from London met my lord of Warwicke by the waie) entered with their bands, and droue backe the rebels with slaughter, that were readie there to resist them.

Whereouer, the maiors deputie caused the waie gate to be set open: at the which the earle of Warwicke himselfe entring with all his armie, and finding in manner no resistance, came to the market place. Here were taken a threescore of the rebels, the which according to the order of martiall lawes were incontinentlie executed, according to the qualitie of their offense, confessing (no doubt) in conscience, that their punishment was proportioned to their trespasses, and that in dieng the death (were the same neuer so extreme & dreadfull) they had but their desert; and therefore might well saie with the poet:

Supplicia scelerum paenas expendimus omnes.
Shortly after, the carriages belonging to the armie were brought into the citie by the same gate, and passing through the citie, by negligence & want of order giuen to them that attended on the same cariage, they kept on forward till they were got out at Bishops gate towards Household. Whereof the rebels being aduised, they came downe, & setting upon the carters, and other that attended on the carriages, put them to flight, and droue auaie the carts laden with artillerie, powder, and other munition, bringing the same into their campe, & greatlie reioysing thereof, because they had no great store of such things among them: but yet capitaine Durrie with his band comming in good time to the rescue, recovered some of the carts from the enimies, not without some slaughter on either side. Whereouer, the enimies as yet being not fullie driuen out of the citie, placed themselves in crosse streets, & were readie to assaile the soldiers as they saw their aduantage, part of them standing at S. Michaels, part at S. Ste-phans, and part at S. Peters, and some of them also stood in Timmers street.

Where they assailing such as bradsheddie were entered within their danger, they due diuerse, and among other thre or foure gentlemen, before they could be succoured from anie part. The earle of Warwicke aduertised hereof, passed forth with all his forces to remoue the enimie, and comming to S. Andrew in Johns street, was receiued with a sharpe shorme of arrowes: but capitaine Durrie his harquebusers galled them so with their shot, that they were glad to giue place, and so fled auaie. There were slaine a hundred and thirtie, and diuerse of them shynking aside into churchyards and other places vnder the walles, were taken and executed. All the rest got them vp to their campe at Household, and so the citie was rid of them for that time. Then dis-the earle of Warwicke take order for the safe keeping of the citie, appointing watch and ward to be kept on the walles, and in euerie street. Also that all the gates should be rammed vp, except one or two that stood towards the enemies, at the which were planted certaine peeces of the great artillerie.

Alexander
Newill.

But the rebels vnderstanding that the earle of Warwicke wanted powder and other things appertaining to the vse of the great ordinance, and withall perceiuing that the Welshmen which were appointed to the gard of the said great peeces of artillerie were no great number, and therefore not able to resist anie great force that should come against them, they came downe the hill vpon the sudden as it were wholie together in most outrageous maner. And withall one Pyles that was a verie perfect gunner, and maruellous skillfull in the feat of shooting of great artillerie, and at that time remaining among the rebels, shot off a peece; and due one of the kings principall gunners, that was attending vpon those peeces of artillerie, which stood thus before the gate. Whom when the rebels perceiued thus to be slaine, they made forward with more courage, and gaue such a desperate onset vpon them that garded the said artillerie, that their small number, being not able to withstand their aduersaries great and huge multitude pressing in such furious rage vpon them, that they were constrained to flee backe, and to leaue the artillerie for a preie vnto the enemies, who seizing vpon the same, conueied them awaie with certaine carts laden with all manner of munition for wars vp to their campe: a matter (as was thought) of no small importance, sith the enemies thereby were furnished now with such things, whereof before they stood most in need, and now hauing store thereof, they spared not liberallie to bestow it against the citie, beating downe not onlie the highest top of Bishops gate, but also a great part of the wals on that side.

The rebels
take certaine peeces of ar-tillerie from the earle of

Captaine
Dzuric.

And here trulie the good seruice of captaine Dzuric is not to be forgotten, who now as earlie being readie to reuenge this iniurie, following vpon the enemies, put them to flight, and recouered much of that which they had taken from the earls souldiers. The earle of Warwicke after this cut off the entries at the gates, and rampired them vp, placed at the bridges and turnings of the waies and streets diuers bands of souldiers to keepe the passages, brake downe the White friers bridge, and at Bishops gate he appointed the lord Willoughbie with a great number of souldiers to defend that part, & in this sort he made provision to defend the citie from the rebels, if they should attempt to make anie surpise vpon the sudden.

The next daie yet they passing ouer the riuer, set fire on certaine houses at Connessforth, burning the more part of all the houses of two parishes: and so great was the rage of the fire, that catching hold vpon an house wherein the merchants of Norwich vse to laie vp such wares and merchandize as they conueie to their citie from Permouth, the same house with great store of wheat and other riches was miserably consumed and defaced. Thus whilest euerie thing seemed to chance and fall out in fauour of the rebels, there were some in the earle of Warwicks armie, that despairing of the whole successe of their iourneie, came to the earle of Warwicke, and began to perswade with him, that sith the citie was large, and their companies small (for indeed the whole appointed numbers as yet were not come, neither of strangers nor Englishmen) it was impossible to defend it against such an huge multitude as were assembled together in Kets campe, and therefore besought him to regard his owne safetie, to leaue the citie, and not to hazard all vpon such an vncertaine maine chance.

The earle of Warwicke as he was of a noble and invincible courage, baliant, hardie, and not able to abide anie spot of reproch, whereby to lose the least peece of honour that might be, made this answer: Whie (saith he) and do your harts faile you so sone? Are you so mad withall, to thinke that so long as anie life resteth in me, that I will consent to such dishonour? Should I leaue the citie, heaping vp to my selfe and likewise to you such shame and reppose as woorthilie might be reputed an infamie to vs for ever? I will rather suffer whatsoeuer either fire or sword can worke against me. These words being vttered with such a courage as was maruellous to consider, he drew out his sword. Which other of the honorable and woorthipfull that were then present likewise did, whome he commanded that each one should kisse others sword, according to an ancient custome used amongst men of war in time of great danger: and herewith they made a solemne vow, binding it with a solemne oth, that they should not depart from thence, till they had either vanquished the enemies, or lost their liues in manfull fight for defence of the kings honour.

Whilest these things were in doing, the rebels brake into the citie on that side, where was no suspicion of their entring at all; but being come almost to the bridges, they were incountered by the souldiers, beaten backe, and chased out by the same waie they came. The next daie being the six and twentieth of August, there came to the earle 1400 lancequenets. The rebels notwithstanding that such reinforcement of the earles power might haue somewhat discouraged them, yet trusting altogether to certaine baine prophesies, which they had among them, and set out in verses by such wilfards as were there with them in the campe, they had conceiued such a baine hope of prosperous successe in their businesse, that they little esteemed anie power that might come against them.

Among other of those same verses, these were two: The countrie gnuifes, Hob, Dick, and Hick, with clubs and clowted shoon, Shall fill vp Dufsin dale with blood of slaughtered bodies soone.

Vpon hope therefore of this and other baine prophesies, the rebels through the diuels procurement, that had nourished and pricked them forward all this while in their wicked proceedings, determined to remoue thither, to the end that they might with more speed make an end of the matter, before they should be dztuen to disperse themselves by famine. For the earle of Warwicke had taken order to haue the passages stopped, in such wise as no vittels could easilie be conueied to their campe, the want whereof began already to pinch them. Here vpon setting fire on their cabins, which they had raised and built here and there of timber and bushes (the smoke whereof covered all the grounds about them) they came downe with their ensignes into the dallee called Duffin dale, where with all speed that might be they intrenched themselves about, and raising a rampire of a good height, set stakes also round about them, to keepe off the horsemen.

The earle of Warwicke perceiuing their doings, the next daie being the seuen and twentieth of August with all his horsemen, and the Almans with certaine Dzuries band, issued forth of the citie, marching straight towards the enemies. Yet before he approached in sight of them, he sent sir Edmund Keneut & sir Thomas Palmer knights, with others, to vnderstand of them, whether now at length they would submit themselves, & receiue the kings pardon; which if they would do, he offered to grant it frelie to all the whole multitude, one or two of them onlie excepted:

red: but they with generall voices refusing it, the earle fell in hand to encourage his people vnto the battell, and hauing appointed as well the horsemen as footmen in what order they should giue the charge, they passed forward in approaching the enimies. The rebels beholding them thus to come forward, put themselves in order of battell, in such manner, that all the gentlemen which had bene taken prisoners, and were kept in irons for starting awaie, were placed in the fore ranke of their battell, coupled two and two together, to the end they might be killed by their owne friends that came to seeke their deliuerance: but yet as God would haue it, the most part of them were saued. Spies the master gunner among the rebels, lending a peece of ordinance, shot it off, and stroke him that caried the kings standard in the thigh, and the horse through the shoulder.

The earle of Warwicke and others for grieved therewith, caused a whole bolie of artillerie to be shot off at the rebels: and herewith capteine Durie with his owne band, & the Almans & lanceknights, whether ye list to call them, on foot, getting nere to the enimies, hailed them with their barquebut shot so sharplie, and thrust forward vpon them with their pikes so stronglie, that they brake them in sunder. The gentlemen, who (as we haue said) were placed in the fore ranke, found meanes (as god hath was) to shrinke aside, and escaped the danger for the more part, although some indeed were slaine by the Almans, and other that knew not what they were. The light horsemen of the kings part herewith gaue in amongst them so roundlie, that the rebels not able to abide their valiant charge, were easilie put to flight, and with the foremost their grand capteine Robert Ket galloped awaie so fast as his horse would beare him. The horsemen following in chase, slue them downe on heapes, euer still as they ouertake them; so that the chase continuing for the space of thre or foure miles, there were slaine to the number of thre thousand five hundred at the least: besides a great multitude that were wounded as they fled here and there ech waie forth, as seemed best to serue their turne for their most speedie escape out of danger. Yet one part of them that had not bene assailed at the first onset, seeing such slaughter made of their fellows, kept their ground by their ordinance, and shanke not: determining as men desperatlie bent, not to die vnreuenged, but to fight it out to the last man.

They were so inclosed with their carts, carriages, trenches (which they had cast) and stakes pitched in the ground to keepe off the force of horsemen, that it would haue bene somewhat dangerous to haue assailed them within their strength. But sure they were that now they could not escape, seeing no small part of their whole numbers were cut off and distressed, and they inuironed on ech side, without hope of succour or relae of bittels, which in the end must needs haue forced them to come forth of their inclosure to their vndoubted ouerthrow and destruction. The earle of Warwicke yet pittens their case, and loth that the king should lose so manie stout mens bodies as were there amongst them, which might do his maiestie and their countrie good seruice, if they could be reclaimed from this their desperat follie vnto due obedience, sent Porreie vnto them, offering them pardon of life if they would throw downe their weapons and yeld: if not, he threatened that there should not a man of them escape the deserved punishment. Their answer was, that if they might be assured to haue their liues saued, they could be contented to yeld: but they could haue no trust that promise should be kept with them. For notwithstanding all such faire offers of pardon, they took it that there was nothing meant but a subtil practise, to bring them into the hands of their aduersaries the gentlemen, that had prepared a barrail of ropes and halters, with which they purposed to trusse them by: and therefore they would rather die like men, than to be strangled at the wils and pleasures of their moztall enimies.

The earle of Warwicke right soie to see such desperat minds among them, sent to the citie, and caused the most part of the footmen which he had left there to defend the same, to come forth now in battell arrate, that they might helpe to distresse those wilfull rebels that thus obstinatelie refused the kings pardon. And hauing brought as well them as the Almans and the horsemen in order of battell againe, and readie now to set vpon the rebels, he exsences sent vnto them to know that if he should come himselfe and giue his word, that they should haue their pardon, whether they would receiue it or not. Herevnto they answered, that they had such confidence in his word, that if he would so do, they would giue credit thereto, and submit themselves to the kings mercie. Incontinentlie herevpon he went vnto them, and commanded Porreie to read the kings pardon freely granted to all that would yeld. Which being read, euerie man threw downe his weapon, and with one whole and enter voice cried, God saue king Edward, God saue king Edward. And thus thorough the prudent policie, and fauourable mercie of the earle of Warwicke, a great number of those offenders were preserued from the gates of death, into the which they were readie to enter.

Thus were the Porretolke rebels subdued by the high prowesse, wisdome, and policie of the valiant earle of Warwicke, and other the nobles, gentlemen, & faithfull subiects there in the kings armie: but not without losse of diuers personages of great worth, beside other of the meaner sort, nameilie master Henrie Willoughbie esquier, a man so well beloued in his countrie for his liberalitie in housekeeping, great courtesie, byright dealing, assured steadfastnes in friendship, & modest staednes in behauiour, that the countries where his livings laie lament the losse of so worthie a gentleman euen to this daie. There died also master Lucie esquier, master Forster esquier, and master Throckmorton of Northamptonshire, gentlemen of no small credit and worth in their countries. The battell being thus ended, all the spoile gotten in the field was giuen to the soldiers, who sold the most part thereof openlie in the market place of Porwich. The next daie the earle of Warwicke was aduertised that Ket, being crept into a barne, was taken by two seruants of one master Riches of Swanington, and brought to the house of the same Riches. Herevpon were twentie horsemen sent thither to fetch him, who brought him to Porwich. The same daie examinations were taken of them that were the principall beginners and setters forth of this unhappie rebellion, and diuerse being found gillie were hanged, and nine of the chiefe procurers of all the mischief (Robert Ket and his brother William onelie excepted) were hanged vpon the oke of reformation, spies the number & two of their prophets being thre of that number.

Some others of them were bestone, hanged, and quartered, & their heads and quarters set vp in publicke places for a terro: to others. But yet the earle of Warwicke spared manie, where some would gladlie haue perswaded him, that there might haue bene a great number more executed. But his lordship perceiving them importunate in that uncharitable sute, told them (as it were in fauour of life of those illie wretches, whose miserable case he seemed to pittie) that measure must be vsed in all things, & in punishing of men by death (saith he) we ought alwaies to beware that we passe not the same. I know well that such wicked doings deserue no small reuenge, and that the offenders are worthy to be most sharplie chastised. But how farre yet shall we go: Shall we not at length thew some mercie? Is there no place for pardon? What shall we then do? Shall we hold the plough our selues; plaine the carters and labour the ground with our owne hands. These and such like words tastig altogether of mercie and compassion in that noble earle, did quench the cruell desire of reuenge in them that were altogether kindled in wrath and wished nothing more than to see the whole multitude executed: but now moued with the earles wise and mercifull answer to their rigorous sute, they became more mild and mercifull towards the miserable creatures.

This also is not to be forgotten, that when information was giuen against some of the rebels, for that they had bene busie fellows, & great doers in time of those vpproes, so as it was thought of some, that it stood with god reason to haue them punished by death, when the earle of Warwike vnderstood by credible report of Pooreie king at armes, that vpon the offer of the kings pardon, they were the first that theyr downe their weapons, and submitted themselves to the kings mercie, the earle would not in a meane while consent that they should die, but protested frankelie that he would keepe promise with them, and that he would be as good to them as his word: and so they had their liues saued. The same daie was order giuen by the earle that the bodies of them that were slaine in the field should be buried. On the morrow being the nine and twentieth of August, the earle of Warwike, with the nobles and gentlemen of the armie, and others in great numbers, both men and women, went to saint Peters church, and there gaue praises and thanks to God for the victorie obtained. And this done, he with all the armie departed out of the citie, and returned homewards with high commendation of citizens & others, that acknowledged the said earle to be the defender of their liues, and recoverer of their wiues, children, houses, and livings.

It was afterwards ordeined, that vpon the same daie in the which the rebels were thus subdued, the citizens yearelie should repaire to their churches, and there to heare sermice, and to haue a sermon abroad, to the which they should come together, to giue thanks to God for their deliuerance as that daie, and this is obserued till these our times. Robert Ket and his brother William Ket were brought vp to London, where they were committed to the tower, and shortly after arraigned of their treason and found guiltie, were brought to the tower againe, where they continued till the nine and twentieth of Nouember, on which daie they were deliuered to sir Edmund Windham high shiriffe of Norfolk and Suffolke, to be conueied downe into Norfolk, where Robert Ket was hanged in chains vpon the top of Norwich castell: and William Ket his brother on the top of Windmondham Steple, in which towne they had both dwelled, and conspired with others to go forward with their wicked rebellion.

This William Ket (as was thought) had bene sure of his pardon, if he had not plained the traitorous hypocrite: for vpon his submission at the first to my lord marquisse of Northampton, at his comming downe to suppress this rebellion, he was sent to his brother to persuaade him and the rest to yeld, and receiue the kings pardon: but he (like a dissembling wretch, although he promised to my lord to doe what he could in that behalfe) vpon his comming to his brother into the rebels campe, beholding the great multitude that were there about him, he did not one, lie not dissuade him and them from their traitorous rebellion, but encouraged them to persist and continue in their doings, declaring what a small number of souldiers the marquisse brought with him, nothing able to resist such a puissance as was there assembled. So that if it had not bene through the wicked persuation of him, and some others at that time, not onelie Robert Ket himselfe, but also all the multitude beside, would haue submitted themselves, and received the kings pardon, to the preservation of manie a good mans life that after died in the quarrell.

But now to retorne somewhat backe to the doings in Scotland. In the meane while that such huris were in hand here in England, ye shall vnderstand that in the beginning of this summer, the king by aduise of his counsell sent forth a nauie by sea towards Scotland, the which arrting in the Forth, and comming before Leith, saluted the towne with cannon shot, & remaining there ten or twelue daies, took in the meane time the Ile of Jusketh, leaving therein foure ensignes of Englishmen, and one of Italians, with certeine pioners to fortifie the place. But the Frenchmen (as in the Scottish historie ye shall find more at large) after the departure of the English nauie, recovered that Ile againe out of the Englishmens possession (after they had kept it sixe daies) with the slaughter of capteine Cotton their generall, capteine Applebie, & one Jasper that was capteine of the Italians, beside others. After the recovering of this Ile, monsieur de Desse returned into France, leauing his charge to monsieur de Thermes latelie before there arrived: who after the departure of the said Desse, with a campe volant did what he could to stop the Englishmen within Vadington from vittels. But notwithstanding the earle of Rutland being lieutenant of the north, did not onelie vittell it, but put the French armie in danger of an ouerthrow, as it was thought must needs haue followed, if they had not with more speed than is vsed in a common march kept alwaie, after they perceiued the English armie so neare at their elbowed.

Moreover, beside these inordinate vpproes and insurrections aboue mentioned, about the latter end of the said moneth of Iulie, in the same yeare, which was 1549, an other like sturre or commotion began at Semer in the north:iding of Yorkshire, and continued in the easpring of the same, and there ended. The principall doers and raiuers by whereof, was one William Dmbler of Castlederton peoman, and Thomas Dale parish cleark of Semer, with one Stæuenfon of Semer, neighbour to Dale and nephew to Dmbler, which Stæuenfon was a meane or messenger betwene the said Dmbler and Dale, being before not acquainted together, and dwelling seuen miles one from the other: who at last by the trauell of the said Stæuenfon, and their owne euill dispositions, inclined to vngratiousnesse and mischiefe, knowing before one the others mind by secret conference, were brought to talke together on saint James daie, Anno 1549.

The causes mouing them to raise this rebellion, were these. First & principally their traitorous hartis grudging at the kings most goodlie proceedings, in aduancing and reforming the true honour of God and his religion. An other cause also was, for trusting to a blind and fantasticall prophesie, wherewith they were seduced, thinking the same prophesie should shortly come to passe, by hearing the rebellions of Norfolk, of Denonshire, and other places. The reason of which prophesie and purpose together of the traitors was, that there should no king reigne in England, the noblemen and gentlemen to be destroyed, and the realme to be ruled by foure gouernours, nours,

nours, to be elected and appointed by the commons, holding a parlement in commotion, to begin at the south and north seas of England, supposing that this rebellion in the north, and the other of the Denow- shire men in the west, meeting (as they intended) at one place, to be the meane how to compass this their traitorous diuinely deuise. And therfore laicng their studies together, how to find out more companie to ioine with them in that detestable purpose, and to set forward the sturre, this deuise they framed: to sturre in two places, the one distant seven miles from the other, and at the first rush to kill and deströie such gentlemen and men of substance about them, as were fauourers of the kings proceedings, or which would resist them.

But first of all for the more speedie raising of men, they deuised to burne beacons, & thereby to bying the people together, as though it were to defend the sea- coasts: and hauing the ignorant people assembled, then to put out their poison, such as they thought were picked with powertie, and were unwillig to laboz, and therfore the more readie to follow the spoile of rich mens goods, blowing into their hears that Gods seruice was laid aside, and new inuentions neither god nor godlie put in place, and so feeding them with faire promises, to reduce into the church againe their old ignorance and idolatrie, thought by that means someth to allure them to rage and run with them in this commotion. And furthermore, to the intent they would giue the more terroz to the gentlemen at the first rising, least they should be resisted, they deuised that some should be murdered in churches, some in their houses, some in seruing the king in commissi- on, and other as they might be caught, and to picke quarrels at them by alteration of seruice on the holie daies: and thus was the platföyme cast of their de- uise, according as afterwarde by their confession at their examinations was testified, and remaineth in true reco: d.

Thus they being together agreed, Dmbler and Dale, with others, by their secret appointment, to la- bourd the matter in the parish of Seimer, Win- tringham, and the townes about, that they were in- fected with the poison of this confederacie, in such sort that it was easie to vnderstand wherunto they would incline, if a commotion were begun, the accomplish- ment wherof did shortly follow. For although by the words of one drunken fellow of that conspiracie named Caluero, at the alehouse in Wintringham, some suspicion of that rebellion began to be melted before by the lord president and gentlemen of those parties, and so prevented in that place where the re- bels thought to begin: yet they gaue not ouer so, but drew to another place at Seimer by the seacoast, and there by night rode to the beacon at Straxton, and set it on fire, and so gathering together a rude rout of rascals out of the townes neare about, being on a sturre, Dmbler, Thomas Dale, Barton, and Robert Dale, hasted forthwith with the rebels to maister Whites house to take him: who notwithstanding be- ing on horsebacke, minding to haue escaped their hands, Dale, Dmbler, and the rest of the rebels took him, and Clopton his wiues brother, one Sauage a merchant of York, and one Werrie seruant to sir Walter Mildmaie. Which foure without cause or quarrell, sauing to fulfill their rebellious prophesie in some part, and to giue a terroz to other gentlemen, they cruelly murdered, after they had caried them one mile from Seimer towards the Wold, and there after they had stripped them of their clothes & purples, left them naked behind them in the plaine fields for crows to feed on: untill Whites wiue and Sauages wiue, then at Seimer, caused them to be buried.

Long it were and tedious to recite what remell these rebels kept in their raging madnesse, who ran- ging about the countrie from towne to towne, to im- large their vngenerous and rebellious band, taking those with force which were not willing to go, & lea- uing in no towne where they came aint man above the age of sixteen peares, so increased this number, that in short time they had gathered three thousand to fauour their wicked attempts, and had like to haue gathered more, had not the Lords godnesse through prudent circumspection of some interrupted the course of their furious beginning. For first came the kings gracions and free pardon, discharging & par- doning all them and the rest of the rebels, of all trea- sons, murders, felonies, & other offences done to his maiestie before the one & twentieth of August, 1549. Which pardon although Dmbler contemptuouly reading, persisted still in his wilfull obstinacie, dis- suaded also the rest from the humble accepting of the kings so louing & liberall pardon: yet notwithstanding with some it did good, who of likelihood submitted themselves, assuredly belicuing if they persevered in their enterprisse, there was no way with them but one, namelie deserued death, wherewith there was no dispensing after the contempt of the princes par- don and refusal of his mercie: so that in this hea- uie case they might verie well complaine and saie:

To make short, it was not long after this, but Dmbler as he was riding from towne to towne, twelue miles from Hummanbie, to charge all the constables and inhabitants where he came, in the kings name to resort to Hummanbie: by the waie he was espied, and by the circumspect diligence of John Wozd the younger, James Allabete, Rafe Twinge, and Thomas Constable gentlemen, he was had in chafe, and at last by them apprehended, and brought in the night in sure custodie vnto the ci- tie of York, to answer vnto his demerits. After whome within short time, Thomas Dale, Henrie Barton, the first chieftains and ringleaders of the former commotion, with John Dale, Robert Wright, William Becocke, Weatherell, and Edmund Buttrie, busie stirrers in this sedition, as they trauelled from place to place, to draw people to their faction, were likewise apprehended, commi- ted to ward, lawfullie conuicted, and lastlie execu- ted at York the one and twentieth of September, in the yere of our Lord 1549. Ex actis iudicii publici a regi- stro exceptis & notatis.

Whilist these wicked commotions and tumults through the rage of the vndiscreet commons were thus raised in sundrie parts of the realme, to the great hinderance of the common-wealth, losse and danger of euerie god and true subiect, sundrie whol- some and godlie exhortations were published, to ad- uertise them of their dutie, and to laie before them their heinous offenses, with the sequele of the mis- chiefs that necessarilie followed thereof, the which if they should consider together, with the punishment that hanged ouer their heads, they might easilie be brought to repent their lewd begun enterprisses, and submit themselves to the kings mercie. Among o- ther of those admonitions, one was penned and set forth by sir John Cheke, which I haue thought good here to insert, as a necessarie discourse for euerie god English subiect. Wherem, to a trader of fudge- ment and capacitie, such learning and wisdom, with a true lofall subiects heart bewaileth it selfe to haue bene settled in that gentleman: as the verie reading of this treatise is able to turne a rebellious mind to mekenesse: if reason be not altogether led awoie captiue by lust.

¶ The hurt of fedition how greuous it is to a common-wealth, set out by sir Iohn Cheeke knight, in the year 1549.

The true subiect to the rebell.

Along so manie and notable benefits, wherewith God hath already and plentifully indued vs, there is nothing more beneficiall, than that we haue by his grace kept vs quiet from rebellion at this time. For we see such miseries hang ouer the whole state of the common-wealth, through the great misorder of your sedition, that it maketh vs much to reioice, that we haue bene neither partners of your doings, nor con-spirers of your counsels. For euen as the Lacede-monians for the auoiding of drunkennesse did cause their sons to behold their seruants when they were drunke, that by beholding their beastlinesse, they might auoid the like vice: euen so hath God like a mercifull father staied vs from your wickednesse, that by beholding the filth of your fault, we might flee for offense abhorre you like rebels, whome else by nature we loue like Englishmen. And so for our selues, we haue great cause to thanke God, by whose religion and holie word daile taught vs, we learne not onely to feare him truely, but also to o-beie our king faithfullie, and to serue in our owne uocation like subiects honestlie. And as for you, we haue surelie iust cause to lament you as brethren, and yet iust cause to rise against you as enemies, and most iust cause to ouerthrow you as rebels.

For what hurt could be done either to vs priuatlie, or to the whole common-wealth generallie, that is now with mischief so brought in by you, that euen as we see now the flame of your rage, so shall we necessarilie be consumed hereafter with the miserie of the same. Wherefore consider your selues with some light of vnderstanding, and marke this grie-uous and horrible fault, which ye haue thus vilelie committed, how heinous it must needs appeare to you, if ye will reasonable consider that which for my duties sake, and my whole countries cause, I will at this present declare vnto you. Ye which be bound by Gods word not to obeie for feare like men-pleasers, but for conscience sake like christians, haue contrarie to Gods holie will, whose offense is enerlasting death, and contrarie to the godlie order of qui-etnesse, set out to vs in the kings maiesties lawes, the breach whereof is not vnknowne to you, taken in hand vncalled of God, vsent by men, vnfit by reason, to cast awaie your bounden duties of obedience, and to put on you against the magistrats, Gods office committed to the magistrats, for the reformation of your pretended injuries. In the which doing ye haue first faulted grieuousslie against God, next offended vnnaturallie our soueraigne lord, thirdlie troubled miserablie the whole commonwealth, vndone cruellie manie an honest man, and brought in an vtter miserie both to vs the kings subiects, and to your selues being false rebels. And yet ye pretend that partlie for Gods cause, and partlie for the common-wealths sake, ye do arise, when as your selues cannot denie; but ye that seeke in word Gods cause, do breake in deed Gods commandements; and ye that seeke the common-wealth, haue destroyed the common-wealth: and so ye marre that ye would make, & breake that ye would amend, because ye neither seeke anie thing rightlie, nor would amend anie thing orderlie.

Ye that faulteth, faulteth against Gods ordinance, who hath forbidden all faults, and therefore ought againe to be punished by Gods ordinance, who is the reformer of faults. For he saith, I caue the punishment to me, and I will reuenge them. But the magistrate is the ordinance of God, appointed by him with the sword of punishment to looke straight-lie to all euill doers. And therefore that that is done by the magistrate, is done by the ordinance of God, whome the scripture oftentimes doth call God, because he hath the execution of Gods office. How then do you take in hand to reforme? Be ye kings: By what authoritie? By what occasion? Be ye the kings officers: By what commission? Be ye called of God: By what tokens declare ye that? Gods word teacheth vs, that no man should take in hand anie office, but he that is called of God like Aaron.

What Moses I praise you called you? What Gods minister had you rise?

Ye rise for religion. What religion taught you that? If ye were offered persecution for religion, ye ought to flie: so Christ teacheth you, and yet you intend to fight. If ye would stand in the truth, ye ought to suffer like martyrs, and you would stee like tyrants. Thus for religion you keepe no religion, and neither will follow the counsell of Christ, nor the constancie of martyrs. Why rise ye for religion? Haue ye anie thing contrarie to Gods booke? Poa, haue ye not all things agreeable to Gods word? But the new is different from the old, and therefore ye will haue the old. If ye measure the old by truth, ye haue the oldest; if ye measure the old by fanse, then it is hard: because mens fanfies change, to giue that is old. Ye will haue the old still. Will ye haue anie older than that as Christ left, & his apostles taught, & the first church after Christ did vse? Ye will haue that the canons do establish. Why that is a great deale younger than that ye haue, of later time, and newlie invented. Yet that is it that ye desire. Why then ye desire not the oldest. And do you preferre the bishops of Rome afore Christ, mens inventions afore Gods law, the newe sort of worship before the older? Ye seeke no religion, ye be deceiued, ye seeke traditions. They that teach you, blind you, that so instruct you, deceiue you. If ye seeke what the old doctors saie, yet loke what Christ the oldest of all saith. For he saith, Before Abraham was made I am. If ye seeke the truest way, he is the verie truth; if ye seeke the readiest waie, he is the verie waie; if ye seeke euerlasting life, he is the verie life. What religion would ye haue other now, than his religion?

You would haue the bibles in againe. It is no maruell, your blind guides would leade you blind still. Why, be ye howlets and backs, that ye cannot looke on the light? Christ saith to euerie one, Search ye the scriptures, for they beare witnesse of Christ. You saie, Pull in the scriptures, for we will haue no knowledge of Christ. The apostles of Christ will vs to be so readie, that we maie be able to giue euerie man an account of our faith. We will vs not once to read the scriptures, for feare of knowing of our faith. Saint Paul praieeth that euerie man may increase in knowledge: ye desire that our knowledge might decaie againe. A true religion ye seeke belike, and worthe to be sought for. For without the sword indeed nothing can helpe it, neither Christ, nor truth, nor age can mainteine it. But why should ye not like that which Gods word establisheth, the primitive church hath authorised, the greatest learned men of this realme haue drawn, the whole consent of the parlement hath confirmed, the kings maiestie hath set forth? Is it not truely set out? Can ye deuise anie truer than Christes apostles vse? Ye thinke it is not learnedlie done. Were ye commons take vpon you more learning, than the chosen bishops and clearks of this realme haue? Think ye folle in it? Ye were wont to iudge your parlement wisest, & now will ye suddenlie excell them in wis-dome?

done: & can ye thinke it lacketh authoritie, which the king, the parlement, the learned, the wise haue iustlie approued? Learne, learne, to knowe this one point of religion, that God will be worshipped as he hath prescribed, and not as we haue deuised; and that his will is whole in his scriptures, which be full of Gods spirit, and profitable to teach the truth, to reprove lies, to amend faults, to bring one by in righteousnesse, that he that is a Gods man may be perfect & ready to all good woorkes. What can be more required to serue God withall? And thus much for religion, rebells.

The other rable of Norfolk rebelles, ye pretend a common-wealth. How amend ye it? By killing of gentlemen, by spoiling of gentlemen, by imprisonment of gentlemen? A marvellous fained common-wealth. Whie should ye thus hate them? For their riches or for their rule? Rule they neuer took so much in hand as ye do now. They neuer resisted the king, neuer withstood his counsell, be faithful at this daie when ye be faithlesse, not onelie, to the king, whose subiects ye be, but also to your lordes whose tenants ye be. Is this your true duecie, in some of homage, in most of fealtie, in all of allegiance; to leave your duties, go backe from your promises, fall from your faith, and contrarie to law and trust to make unlawfull assemblies, vngodlie companies, wicked and detestable camps, to disobeie your betters, and to obeie your fanners, to change your obedience from a king to a ket, to submit your selues to traitors, and breake your faith to your true king and lordes? They rule but by law, if otherwise, the law, the counsell, the king taketh alwaie their rule. Ye haue orderlie sought no redresse, but ye haue in time found it. In countries some must rule, some must obeie, euerie man maie not beare like stroke: for euerie man is not like wise. And they that haue sense most, and be best able to beare it, and of iust dealing beside, be most fit to rule. It is an other matter to vnderstand a mans owne greife, and to knowe the common-wealths fore; and therefore not they that knowe their owne case, as euerie man doth, but they that vnderstand the common-wealths state, ought to haue in countries the preferment of ruling. If ye felt the paine that is ioined with gouernance, as ye see and like the honor, ye would not hurt others to rule them, but rather take great paine to be ruled of them. If ye had rule of the kings maiestie committed vnto you, it were well done ye had ruled the gentlemen: but now ye haue it not, and cannot beare their rule, it is to thinke the kings maiestie forlish and vniust, that hath giuen certeine rule to them. And seeing by the scripture, ye ought not to speake euill of anie magistrate of the people, why do ye not onelie speake euill of them whose the kings maiestie hath put in office, but also iudge euill of the king himselfe, and thus seditiouslie in field stand with your swordes drawn against him?

If riches offend you, because ye wish the like, then thinke that to be no common-wealth, but enuie to the common-wealth. Enuie it is to appaie an other mans estate, without the amendment of your owne. And to haue no gentlemen, because ye be none your selues, is to bring downe an estate, and to mend none. Would ye haue all alike rich? That is the ouerthrow of labour, and utter decay of woorkes in this realme. For who will labour more, if when he hath gotten more, the idle shall by lust without right take what him lust from him, vnder pretense of equalitie with him. This is the bringing in of idleness, which destroiethe the common-wealth; and not the amendment of labour, that mainteineth the common-wealth. If there should be such equalitie, then ye take alwaie all hope from yours to come to anie better estate than you now leaue their. And as manie incane mens children do come honestlie by, and are great succour to all their stocke: so shoulde none be hereafter holpen by you, but because ye seke equalitie, whereby all can not be rich. Ye would that (belike) whereby euerie man shoulde be poore; and thinke beside that riches and inheritance be Gods prouidence, and giuen to whom of his wisdom he thinketh good: to the honest for the increase of their godlinesse, to the wicked for the heaping by of their damnation, to the simple for a recompense of other lackes, to the wise for the greater setting out of Gods godnesse. Whie will your wisdom now stop Gods wisdom, and prouide by your lawes, that God shall not enrich them, whom he hath by prouidence appointed as him liketh? God hath made the poore, & hath made them to be poore that he might shew his might, and let them aloft when he liketh for such cause as to him seemeth, & plucke downe the rich to this state of pouertie by his power, as he disposeth to order them. Whie do not we then bring poore beare it wiselie, rather than by lust seke riches vnwiselie, and shew our selues content with Gods ordinance, which we must either willingly obeie, and then we be wise, or else we must vnprofitable strue withall, and then we be mad?

But what meane ye by this equalitie in the common-wealth? If one be wiser than an other, will ye banish him, because ye intend an equalitie of all things? If one be stronger than another, will ye slay him, because ye seke an equalitie of all things? If one be well fauourder than an other, will ye punish him, because ye loke for an equalitie of all things? If one haue better utterance than another, will ye pull out his tonge to saue your equalitie? And if one be richer than an other, will ye spoile him to mainteine an equalitie? If one be elder than an other, will ye kill him for this equalities sake? How iniurious are ye to God himselfe, who intendeth to bestow his gifts as he himselfe liketh: and ye seke by wicked insurrections to make him giue them commonlie alike to all men as your vaine fantasie liketh? Whie would ye haue an equalitie in riches & in other gifts of God? There is no meane sought. Either by ambition ye seke lordlinesse much vnfit for you; or by couetousnesse ye be vnfitable, a thing likelie inough in ye; or else by folie ye be not content with your estate, a fantasie to be plucked out of you.

But if we being wearie of pouertie would seke to enrich our selues, we should go a farre other waie to worke than this, and so shoulde we rightlie come to our desire. Doth not S. Peter teach vs afore God a right waie to honour, to riches, to all necessarie and profitable things for vs? He saith, Humble your selues that God might exalt you, and cast all your care on him, for he careth for you. He teacheth the waie to all good things at Gods hand, is to be humble, and you exalt your selues. Ye seke things after such a sort, as if the seruant shoulde anger his master, when he sekerh to haue a good turne of him. Ye would haue riches (I thinke) at Gods hand who giueth all riches, and yet ye take the waie cleane contrarie to riches. Knowe ye not that he that exalteth himselfe, God will throw him downe? How can ye get it then by thus setting out your selues? Ye shuld submit ye by humilitie one to another, and ye set by your selues by arrogancie above the magistrates. See herein how much ye offend God. Remember ye not that if ye come nigh to God, he will come nigh vnto you? If then ye go from God, he will go from you. Doth not the psalme saie, He is holie with the holie, and with the wicked man he is forward? Euen as he is ordered of men, he will order them them againe. If ye would follow his will, and obeye his commandments, ye should eat the fruits of the earth, saith the prophet; if not, the sword shall devour you. He might have eaten the fruits of this seasonable year, if ye had not by disobedience rebelled against God. Now not onely ye can not eat that which your selues did first sowe by labour, and now destroy by sedition; but also if the kings maiesties sword came not against you, as iust policie requireth, yet the iust vengeance of God would light among you, as his word promiseth, and your cruell wickednesse deserueth.

The act of rebellion aggravated, & pronounced most wicked and horrible.

For whatsoeuer the causes be that haue moued your wilful affectiōs herin, as they be vniuersall causes, & increase your faults much, the thing it selfe, the rising I meane, must needs be wicked and horrible before God, and the usurping of authoritie, and taking in hand of rule, which is the sitting in Gods seat of iustice, and a proud climbing vp into Gods high throne, must needs be not onely cursed noislie by him, but also hath bene often punished afore of him. And that which is done to Gods officer, God accounteth it done to him. For they despise not the minister, as he saith himselfe, but they despise him: and that presumption of chalenging Gods seat, doth shew you to haue bin Lucifers, and sheweth vs that God will punish you like Lucifers. Wherefore rightlie looke, as ye duly haue deserued, either for great vengeance for your abhominable transgression, or else earnestlie repent, with vnfeined minds, your wicked doings; and either with example of death be content to dehort other, or else by faithfullnesse of obedience declare how great a seruice it is to God, to obeye your magistrats faithfullie, and to serue in subiectiōn trulie.

An exhortation to rebels.

Disobedience to the prince is a most abominable sinne, and that we are bound by dutie to obey.

Well, if ye had not thus grievously offended God, whome ye ought to worship, what can ye reasonably thinke it, to be no fault against the king, when ye ought to reuerence? Ye be bound by Gods word to obeye your king, and is it no breach of dutie to withstand your king? If the seruant be bound to obeye his maister in the familie, is not the subiect bound to serue the king in his realme? The child is bound to the priuat father, and be we not all bound to the common-wealths father? If we ought to be subiect to the king for Gods cause, ought we not then I praye you to be faithfullie subiect to the king? If we ought dutifullie to shew all obedience to heathen kings, shall we not willingly and trulie be subiect to christian kings? If one ought to submit himselfe by humilitie to another, ought we not all by dutie to be subiect to our king? If the members of our naturall bodie all follow the head, shall not the members of the politick bodie all obeye the king? If goddly manners be content to giue place the lower to the higher, shall not religion teach vs alwaies to giue place to the highest? If true subiects will die gladlie in the kings seruice, should not all subiects thinke it dutie to obeye the king with iust seruice. But you haue not onely disobeyed like ill subiects, but also taken stoutlie rule vpon you like wicked magistrats.

A notable and rhetorical clause, and to the purpose.

Ye haue bene called to obedience by counsell of priuat men, by the aduise of the kings maiesties counsell, by the kings maiesties free pardon. But what counsell taketh place, where surdinesse is law and churlish answers be counted wisdom? Who can perswade where treason is aboue reason, and might ruleth right, and it is had for lawfull whatsoeuer is lustfull, and commotioners are better than commissioners, and common law is named common-wealth? Haue ye not broken his lawes, disobeyed his counsell, rebelled against him? And what is the common-wealth worth, when the law which is indifferent for all men, shall be wilfullie and spitefullie broken of head-strong men, that seeke against lawes to order lawes; that those may take place, not what content of wise men hath appointed, but what the lust of rebels hath determined? What vniuersallnesse is in ill seruants, wickednes in vnnaturall children, surdinesse in vnrulie subiects, crueltie in fierce enemies, wilddnes in beastlie minds, pride in disdainfull hearts; that sheweth now in you, which haue fled from house to house, to incamped robberies, and are better contented to suffer famine, cold, trauell, to glut your lusts, than to liue in quietnesse to saue the common-wealth, and thinke more libertie in wilfulness, than wisdom in dutifullnesse, and so run headlong not to the mischief of other, but to the destruction of your selues, and vnder by folle that ye intend by mischief, neither seeing how to remedie that ye iudge faultie, nor willing to saue your selues from miserie: which stiffnessse cannot do, but honestie of obedience must frame.

If authoritie would serue vnder a king, the council haue greatest authoritie; if wisdom and grantie might take place, they be of most experience; if knowledge of the common-wealth could helpe, they must by daile conference of matters vnderstand it best: yet neither the authoritie that the kings maiestie hath giuen them, nor the grantie which you know to be in them, nor the knowledge which with great trauell they haue gotten, can moue you either to keepe you in the dutie ye ought to do, or to avoid the great disorder wherein ye be. For where disobedience is thought stoutnesse, and fullnesse is counted manhood, and stomaching is courage, and prating is iudged wisdom, and the clauiest is most meet to rule; how can other iust authoritie be obeyed, or sad counsell be followed, or goddly knowledge of matters be heard, or commandments of counsellors be considered? And how is the king obeyed, whose wildest be withstanding, the disobedientest obeyed, the high in authoritie not weied, the vnskillfullest made chiefe captains, to the noblest most hurt intended, the braggistest braller to be most safe? And euen as the viler parts of the bodie would contend in knowledge & gouernement with the fine wits: so do the lower parts of the common-wealth enterpryse as high a matter, to striue against their dutie of obedience to the council.

But what talke I of disobedience so quietlie? Haue not such mad rages run in your heads, that forsaaking and burrowing the quietnesse of the common peace, ye haue heinoussie and traitorouslie incamped your selues in field, and there like a bile in a bodie, naie like a sinke in a towne, haue gathered together all the nasty vagabonds and idle loiterers to beate armour against him, whome all godlie and good subiects will liue and die withall. If it be a fault when two fight together, and the kings peace broken, and punishment to be sought therefore; can it be but an outrageous and a detestable mischief, when so many rebels in number, malicious in mind, mischievous in enterpryse, fight not among themselves, but against all the kings true and obedient subiects; and seeke to proue whether rebellion may beat downe honestie, and wickednesse may overcome truth or no? If it be treason to speake heinoussie of the kings maiestie, who is not hurt thereby, and the infamie returneth to the speaker againe; what kind of outrageous & horrible treason is it, to assemble in campe an armie against him, and so not onely intend an overthrow to him, and also to his common-wealth; but also to cast him into an infamie, through all outward and strange nations, and perswade them that he is hated of his people, whome he can not rule; and that they be no better than vilans, which will not with goddly orders be ruled.

That death can be deuised cruell enough for those rebels, who with trouble seeke death, and can not quench the thirst of their rebellion, but with the blood of true subiects; and hate the kings mercifull pardon, when they miserable haue transgressed, and in such an outrage of mischief will not by stubborneacknowledge themselves to haue faulted, but intend to bzoile the common-wealth with the flame of their treason, and as much as lieth in them not one, to annoie themselves, but to destroe all others: He that is discontented with things that happen, and because he cannot beare the miserie of them, renteth his beare, and teareth his skin, & mangleth his face, which easeth not his sorow, but increaseth his mis-erie; maie he not be iustlie called mad and fantasticall, and wozthie whose wisdom should be suspected? And what shall we saie of them, who being in the common-wealth, feeling a soe greuous vnto them, and easie to haue bene amended, sought not the remedie, but haue increased the greife, and like frantike beasts raging against their head, doe teare and deface as much as lieth in them his whole autho-ritie in gouernement, and violentlie take to themselves that rule vpon them, which he by policie hath granted vnto other?

And who weieing well the beauntie of the fault, maie not iustlie saie and hold them to be worse herein than any kind of brute beasts? For we see that the sheepe will obieie the shepheard, and the neat be ruled by the neatheard, and the hourse will know his keeper, and the dog will be in awe of his maister, and euerie one of them feed there, and of that, as his keeper and ruler doth appoint him, & goeth from thence, and that, as he is forbidden by his ruler. And yet we haue not heard of, that anie heard of companie of these haue risen against their heardman or gouer-nour, but be alwaies contented not onelie to obieie them, but also to suffer them to take profit of them.
And we see furthermore, that all heards, & all fozts, be more egre in fiercenesse against all kind of strangers, than they be against their owne rulers, & will easier offend him who hath not hurt them, than touch their ruler who seeketh profit on them.

But ye that ought to be gouerned by your magistrates, as the heards by the heardman, and ought to be like sheepe to your king, who ought to be like a shepheard vnto you, euen in the time when your profit was sought, and better redresse was intended, than your vplires and vniquietnesse could obtaine, haue beyond the crueltie of all beasts foliue risen against your ruler, and sheued your selues wozthie to be ordered like beasts, who in kind of obedience will fall from the state of men. A dog stropeth when he is beaten of his maister, not for lacke of stomach, but for naturall obedience: you being not striken of your head but fauoured, not kept downe but succoured and remedied by law, haue violentlie against law not onclie barked like beasts, but also bitten like helhounds. What? Is the mischief of sedition either not knowne vnto you, or not feared? Haue not examples aforesometimes told the end of rebels, and the wickednesse of rebellion it selfe? But as for old cramples, let them passe for a while, as things well to be considered. But at this present one thing more to be weied.

Loke vpon your selues, after ye haue wickedlie stept into this horrible kind of treason, doe ye not see how manie bottomlesse whirlpools of mischief ye be gulst withall, and what losse some kinds of rebellion ye be faine to waide through? Ye haue sent out in the kings name, against the kings will, precepts of all kinds, & without commandement commanded his subiects, and vniustlie haue ruled where ye list to command, thinking your owne fancies the kings commandements, and rebels lusts in things to be right gouernement of things, not looking what should follow by reason, but what your selues follow by affection. And is it not a dangerous and a cruell kind of treason, to giue out precepts to the kings people? There can be no iust execution of lawes, reformation of faults, giuing out of commandements, but from the king. For in the king onelie is the right herof, & the authoritie of him deriued by his appointment to his ministers. Ye haue no authoritie of the king, but taking it of your selues, what thinke ye your selues to be? Ministers ye be none, except ye be the diuels ministers, for he is the author of sedition.

The kings maiestie intendeth to mainteine peace, and to oppresse warre; ye stirre by vppozes of people, hurliburles of vagabonds, routs of robbers, Is this anie part of the kings ministerie? If a vagabond would doe what he list, and call himselfe your seruant, and execute such offices of trust, whether ye would or no, as ye haue committed vnto another mans credit, what would euerie one of you saie or doe herein? Would ye suffer it? Ye wander out of houses, ye make euerie daie new matters as it pleaseth you, ye take in hand the execution of those things, God by his word forbidding the same; which God hath put the magistrates in trust withall. What can ye saie to this? Is it sufferable thinke ye? If ye told a pious message in another mans name, can it be but a falselie I praie you? And to tell a feined message to the common-wealth, and that from the king, can it be honest thinke ye? To command is more than to speake: what is it then to command so traitorous a lie? This then which is in word a deceitfull lie, and in deed a traitorous fact, noisome to the common-wealth, vnhonourable to the king, mischie-fous in you, how can ye otherwise iudge of it, but to be an vheard of and notable disobedience to the king: and therefore by notable example to be punished, and not with gentlenesse of pardon to be forgiuen? Ye haue robbed euerie honest house, and spoled them vniustlie, and pitioullie wronged poore men being no offenders, to their bitter vndoiing; and yet ye thinke ye haue not broken the kings lawes. The kings maiesties law and his commandement is, that euerie man should safelie keepe his owne, and use it reasonable to an honest gaine of his liuing: ye violentlie take and carie awaie from men without cause, all things whereby they should mainteine, not onelie themselves, but also their familie, & leaue them so naked, that they shall feele the smart of your curst enterprisse, longer than your owne vnnaturall & vngodlie stomachs would well vouchsafe. By iustice ye should neither hurt nor wrong man, and your pretended cause of this monstrous stur is to increase mens wealth. And yet how manie, and saie truth, haue ye decayed and vndone, by spoiling and taking awaie their goods? How should honest men liue quietlie in the common-wealth at anie time, if their goods, either gotten by their owne laboz, or left to them by their friends, shall vnlawfullie and vno-derlie, to the feeding of a sort of rebels, be spoiled and wasted, and vtterlie scattered abroad? The thing that ye take is not your right, it is an other mans owne.
The maner of taking against his will is vnlawfull, & against the order of euerie godd common-wealth.
The cause why ye take it is mischievous and horrible, to fat your sedition. Ye that take it be wicked traitors, and common enemies of all good order.

If he that desireth an other mans goods or cattell, doe fault: what doth he (thinke you) whose desire taking followeth, and is led to and fro by lust, as his wicked fantasie void of reason doth guide him? He that vseth not his owne well and charitablie, hath much to answer for: and shall they be thought not unjust, who not onelie take a waite other mens, but also misfe and waite the same vngodlie? They that take things p'stullie a waite, and steale secretly and couertlie other mens goods, be by law iudged woth this death: and shall they that without shame spoile things openlie, and be not affeard by impudencie to p'fesse their spoile, be thought either honest creatures to God, or faithfull subjects to their king, or naturall men to their countrie? If nothing had moued you but the example of mischefe, and the soule p'actise of other moued by the same, ye should yet haue abstained from so licentious and vilanous a shew of robbery, considering how manie honeste there be, that being loth their wickednesse should be blazed abroad, yet be found out by p'ouidence, and hanged for desert. What shall we then thinke of late of you? Shall we call you pickers, or bid theues; nate more than theues, date theues, heard stealers, thire spoli-ers, and vtter destructioners of all kinds of families, both among the poore and also among the rich. Let vs yet further see. Be there no mo things wherein ye haue broken the kings laws, and so vilelie disobeyed him, flat contrarie to your bounden dutie and alle- giance?

Ye haue not onelie spoiled the kings true subjects of their goods, but also ye haue imprisoned their bodies, which should be at libertie vnder the king, and restrained them of their seruice, which by dutie they owe the king, and appaired both strength and health, wherewith they liue and serue the king. Is there a nie honest thing more desired than libertie? Ye haue shamefullie spoiled them thereof. Is there anie thing more dutifull than to serue their lord and master? But as that was desired of the one part, so was it hindered and stopped on your part. For nei- ther can the king be serued, nor families kept, nor the common-wealth looked vnto, where freedom of libertie is stopped, and diligence of seruice is hindered; and the helpe of strength and health abated. Spens bodies ought to be free from all mens bondage and crueltie, and onelie in this realme be sub- iect in publike punishment to our publike gouer- nour, and neither be touched of headlesse capteins, nor holden of brainlesse rebels. For the gouerne- ment of so pretious a thing ought to belong vnto the most noble ruler, and not iustlie to be in euerie mans pouer, which is iustlie euerie lining mans treasure. For what goods be so deare to euerie man, as his owne bodie is, which is the true vessell of the mind, to be measureable kept of euerie man for all exercises & seruices of the mind? If ye may not of your owne authoritie meddle with mens goods, much lesse you may of your owne authoritie take order with mens bodies.

For what be goods in comparison of health, liber- tie, and strength, which be all settled and fastened in the bodie? They that strike other, do greatlie offend, and be iustlie punishable; and shall they that cruel- lie and wrongfullie torment mens bodies with irons and imprisonments, be thought not of others but of the miselues honest, and plaine, and true dealing men? What shall we say by them, who in a p'ua- uat businesse will let a man to go his tournele in the kings high waite? Do they not thinke ye plaine wrong? Then in a common cause not onelie to hin- der them, but also to deale crueltie with them, and shut them from doing their seruice to the king, and their dutie to the common-wealth, is it not both dis- obedience, crueltie, and mischefe thinke ye? What an hinderance is it, to haue a good garment hurt, anie setwell appaired, or anie esteemed thing to be de- caied? And seeing no earthlie thing a man hath is more pretious than his body, to cause it to be cruellely tormented with irons, feeble with cold, weakened with ordering: can it be thought anie other thing but wrong to the sufferer, crueltie in the doer, & great disobedience and transgression to the king? How then be ye able to defend it? But seeing ye so vnpri- tiffullie bere men, cast the m in prison, lade the m with irons, pine them with famine, contrarie to the rule of nature, contrarie to the kings maiesties lawes, contrarie to Gods holie ordinances, hauing no mat- ter but pretended and fained gloses, ye be not onelie disobedient to the king like rebels, but withstanding the law of nature like beasts, and so wothie to die like dogs, except the kings maiestie, without respect of your deserting, do mercifullie grant you of his godnesse that which you cannot escape by in- dice.

Yet ye being not content with this, as small things enterprize great matters, and as though ye could not satisfie your selues, if ye should leaue anie mischefe vndone, haue sought blood with crueltie, and haue laine of the kings true subjects manie, thinking their murder to be your defense, when as ye haue increased the fault of your vile rebellion, with the horroz of bloodshed, and so haue burdened mischefe with mischefe, whilste it come to an im- portable weight of mischefe. What could we do more, in the horriblest kind of faults, vnto the great- est transgressioners and offendors of God and men, than to looke strittlie on them by death, and so to rid them out of the common-wealth by seuerer pu- nishment, whome ye thought vntowthie to liue a- mong men for their doings? And those who haue not offended the king, but defended his realme, and by obedience of seruice sought to punish the disobedient, and for safegard of euerie man put themselves vnder dutie of law, those haue ye miserable and cru- ellie laine, and bathed you in their blood, whose do- ings ye should haue followed, & not to haue appaired the common-wealth, both by destruction of god- men, and also by increase of rebels. And how can that common-wealth by anie meanes indure, wher- in euerie man without authoritie, may unpun- shed slea whome he list, and that in such case as those who be laine shew themselves most noble of cou- rage, and most readie to serue the king and the com- mon-wealth, and those as do slea be most vilanous and traitorous rebels that anie common-wealth did euer susteine?

For a citie and a prouince be not the faire how- ses, and the strong walles, nor the defense of anie engine, but the lining bodies of men, being able in number and strength to mainteine themselves by god order of iustice, & to serue for all necessarie & behouable vses in the common-wealth. And when as mans bodie being a part of the whole common- wealth, is wrongfullie touched anie way, and specul- allie by death, then suffereth the common-wealth great iniurie, and that alwaies so much the more, how honeste and nobler he is, who is iniuriously murdered. How was the lord Sheffeld handled a- mong you, a noble gentleman, and of good seruice, both fit for counsell in peace, and for conduct in war, considering either the granitie of his wisdom, or the authoritie of his person, or his seruice to the com- mon-wealth, or the hope that all men had in him, or the need that England had of such, or among manie notable god, his singular excellencie, or the fauor that all men bare toward him, being loued of euerie man, and hated of no man?

Considered ye who should by dutie be the kings subjects, either how ye should not haue offended the k. or after offense haue required the kings pardon, or not to haue refused his godnesse offered, or at length, to haue pelved to his mercie, or not to haue laine those who came for his seruice, or to haue spared those

Who then that would willinglie defend ye, can say anie thing for ye, which haue so diuerslie faulted, so traitorously offended, not onlie against priuat men seuerallie, but also generallie against whole colonies, and that after such a sort, as outward enemies full of deadlie feud could not more cruellie invade them? And thus the kings maiestie dishonored, his counsell dishonored, the gods of the poze spoiled, the houses of the wealthie sacked, honest mens bodies imprisoned, woorthie mens personages slaine, cities besieged and threatened, and all kind of things disordered, can ye without teares and repentance heare spoken of, which without honestie and godlinesse ye practised, and not find in your hearts now to returne to dutie, which by witchcraft of sedition were drownded in disorder? Have ye not in disorder first greivouslie offended God, next traitorously risen against your king, and so neither woorthie euerlasting life, as long as ye so remaine, nor yet ciuill life being in such a breach of common quietnesse? If euerie one of these cannot by themselves plucke you backe from this your lewd and outrageous enterprises, yet let them altogether stir ye; or at least be a fearful example to others, to beware by your vnmearurable follie, how they do so far prouoke God, or offend man: and find by your missempir to be themselves better ordered, and learne still to obeie, because they would not repent, and so to liue with honestie, that they would neither willinglie offend Gods law, nor disobey mans.

But and ye were so much bleared, that you did thinke impossible things, and your reason gaue ye against all reason, that ye neither displeased God herein, nor offended the king, yet be ye so blind, that ye vnderstand not your owne case, nor your neighbors miserie, nor the ruine of the whole commonwealth, which doth evidentlie followe your so foule and detestable sedition? Do ye not see how for the maintenance of these vngodlie rablements, not on-lie cities and villages, but also shires and countries be utterly destroyed? Is not their corne wasted, their cattell fethed awaie, their houses rised, their goods spoiled, and all to feed your byriling without reason, and to mainteine this tumult of rebellion invented of the diuell, continued by you, and to be o-uerthrowen by the power of Gods mightie hand? And whie should not so hurtfull wasting and harrid-ing of countries be iustlie punished with great seueritie, seeing robbing of houses, and taking of purses, do by law deserue the extremitie of death? How manie suffer iniurie when one hundred of a shire is spoiled? And what iniurie thinke ye is done; when not onlie whole shires be destroyed, but also euerie quarter of the realme touched? Have ye not brought vpon vs all pouertie, weaknesse, and hatred with in the realme, & discouragement, shame, and damage without the realme? If ye miserable intended not on-lie to bndow other, but also to destroye your selues, and to ouerthrowe the whole realme, could ye haue taken a readier waie to your owne ruine than this is?

conueniences byed by rebellion.

The losse of haruest.
Warms be poze mens storehouses.

And first if ye be anie thing reasonable, list by your reason, and weigh by wisdom, if not all things, yet your owne cases, and learne in the beginning of matters to foresee the end, and iudge aduisedlie yer ye enter into anie thing basillie. See ye not this yeare the losse of haruest? And thinke ye can growe to wealth that yere when ye lose your thrist and profit? Warmes be poze mens storehouses, wherein lieth a great part of euerie mans owne liuing, his wines and childrens liuing, wherewith men mainteine their families, paie their rents: and therefore be alwaies thought most rich when they haue best crops. And now when there is neither plentie of haie, nor sufficient of straw, nor corne enough, and that through the great disorder of your lewd rebellion, can ye thinke ye do well, when ye bndow your selues, and iudge it a common-welth when the commons is destroyed, and seeke your hap by unhappinesse, and esteeme your owne losse to be your owne forwardnes, and by this iudgement shew your selues, how little ye vnder-stand other mens matters, when ye can scarcelie consider the weightiest of your owne? Hath not the haie this yeare, as it rose from the ground, so rooted to the ground againe: and where it was twont by mens seasonable laboz to be taken in due time, and then serue for the maintenance of horse and cattell wherwith we liue, now by your disordered mischiefe hath bene by mens idlenesse and vndutifulnesse let alone vntouched, and so neither serueth the poze to make monie of, nor anie cattell to liue with. The corne was sowne with labour, and the ground tilled for it with labour, and looked to be brought home againe with labour: and for lacke of honest labozers it is lost on the ground; the owners being loiterers, and seeking other mens, haue lost their owne, and hoping for mounteins, lacked their present thrist, neither ob-teining that they sought, nor seeking that they ought.

And how shall men liue when the maintenance of their prouision is lacking? For labouring and their old store is wasted by wilfulness of sedition, and so neither spare the old nor saue the new. How can men be fed then or beasts liue, when as such wastfull negligence is miserablie vbled? And mispending the time of their profit, in shamefull disorder of inobedience, they care not greatlie what becommeth of their owne, because they intend to liue by other mens: Haie is gone, corne is wasted, straw is spoiled, what reckoning of haruest can ye make, either for the aid of others, or for the releafe of your selues? And thus haue ye brought in one kind of miserie, which if ye saw before, as ye be like to see after, although ye had hated the common-welth, yet for loue of your selues ye would haue avoided the great enemie thereof, into the which ye willfullie now haue cast your selues.

An other no lesse is, that such plentie of vittels as was abundantlie in euerie quarter for the releafe of vs all, is now wastfullie and vnyustfullie spent, in mainteining you vnlatfull rebels, and so with disorder all is consumed, which with god husbandrie might long haue indured. For, so much as would haue serued a whole yeare at home with diligence and skilfull heed of husbandrie, that is willfullie wasted in a moneth in the campe, through the raueni-ng spoile of vllanie. For what is vnordered plentie, but a wastfull spoile, wherof the inconuenience is so great, as ye be woorthie to seele, and bringeth in more hardnes of liuing, greater dearth of all things, & occasioneth manie causes of diseases? The price of things must needs increase much, when the number of things wareth lesse, and by scarcitie be inhabited, & compelleth men to abate their liberalitie in house, both to their owne, and also to strangers. And where the rich wanteth, what can the poze find, who in a common scarcitie liueth most scarcelie, and seareth quickliest the sharpnesse of staruing, when enerie man for lacke is hungerbitten. Which if ye had well remembred before, as ye now maie after perceiue, ye would not I thinke so stiffe-neckedlie haue resisted and indangered your selues in the sosome of famine, wherof ye most likeliest must haue the greatest part, which most subboynlie resisted, to your owne shame

Shame and confusion.

Experience teacheth vs, that after a great dearth cometh a great death; for that when men in great want of meat eat much ill meat, they fill their bodies with ill humors, and cast them from their state of health, into a subiection of sicknesse: because the good blood in the bodie is not able to keepe his temper, for the multitude of the ill humors that corrupteth the same. And so grow great & deable plagues, and destroye great numbers of all sorts, sparing no kind that they light on, neither respecting the poore with mercie, nor the rich with fauour. Can ye therefore thinke herein, when ye see decarie of vittels, the rich pinch, the poore famish, the following of diseases, the greatnesse of death, the mourning of widowes, the pittifullnesse of the fatherlesse, and all this miserie to come thorough your vnnatural mistheauour, that ye haue not dangerouse hurt the commons of your countrie with a dolefull and vncurable wounde: These things being once felt in the common-wealth, as they must needs be, euery man seeth by and by what followeth: euen a great diminishment of the strength of the realme, when the due number that the realme doth mainteine is made lesse, and thereby we be made rather a preie for our enemies, than a safetie for our selues.

And how can there be but a great decarie of people at the length, when some be ouerthrowne in warre, some suffer for punishment, some pine for famine, some die with the campes diet, some be consumed with sicknesse: For although ye thinke your selues able to match with a few vnprepared gentlemen, and put them from their houses, that ye might gaine the spoile: do ye iudge the refoze your selues strong inough, not onelie to withstand a kings power, but also to ouerthrow it? Is it possible that ye should haue so mad a frensie in your head, that ye should thinke the number ye see so strong, that all ye see not should not be able to preuaile to the contrarie: What reason could ye thinke, that if ye bode the hot byunt of battell, but ye must needs feele the smart, speciallie the kings power comming against you: which if ye feare not, belike ye know not the force thereof? And so much the greater number is lost in the realme, that both the ouercommer and the ouercommen be parties, although vnlike, of one realme: and what losse is not onelie of either side, but of both, that doth plainlie rebound to the whole.

Then where so great and so horrible a fault is committed, as woefe can not be mentioned of from the beginning, and bringeth in withall such penurie, such weaknes, such disorder in the common-wealth, as no mischiefe besides could do the like: can aie man thinke with iust reason, that all shall escape unpunished that shall escape the sword, and not manie for ferour and examples sake should be looked vnto, who haue bene either great doers in such a disordered bilantie, or great counsellors to such an outrageous mischiefe: seeing the onelie remedie of redressing wilfull faults is a iust and seuer punishment of such, whose naughtie deeds god men ought to abhorre for duties sake, and ill men maie dread for like punishments sake, and a free licence to do mischiefe unpunished is so dangerous, that the sufferance of one is the occasion of the fall of a great number, and vmanish pitie to one is a deceitfull crueltie to the whole, inticing them to their owne destruction by sufferance, which would haue auoided the danger by fore punishment.

And in such a barrennesse of vittels, as must needs come after so rauening a spoile, it must needs be, that some (though few) shall be so nipt with egermesse of famine, that they shall not recover againe themselves out of so fretting a danger. So in a generall weaknesse, where all shall be feebled, some must needs die, and so diminish the number, and abate such strength as the realme defended it selfe withall before. Which occasion of neuer so few, comming of so great a cause, if ye should make iust amends for, not of recompense which ye could not, but of punishment which ye ought; how manie, how diuerse and how cruell deaths ought euery one of ye often suffer: How manie came to the camps from long labour to sudden ease, and from meane fare to streng of vittels; and so fell in a maner vnwares to such a contrarie change, that nature hit selfe abiding neuer great and sudden changes, can not beare it without some grounds entered of diseases to come, which vncircumspect men shall sooner feele than thinke of, and then will scarcelie iudge the cause, when they shall be vexed with the effect.

It is little maruell that idlenesse and meat of other mans charge will some feed by a fat like men; but it is great maruell if idlenesse and other mens meat do not abate the same by sicknesse againe, and speciallie comming from the one, and going to the other: contrarie in those who violentlie seeke to turne in a moment the whole realme to the contrarie. For while their mind changeth from obedience to vnrulinesse, and turneth it selfe from honestie to wildnesse, and their bodies go from labour to idlenesse, from small fare to spoile of vittels, and from beds in the night to cabins, and from sweet houses to stinking camps, it must needs be by changing of affections which alter the bodie, and by vning of rest that filleth the bodie, and by glutting of meats which weakeneth the bodie, & with cold in the nights which accreteth the bodie, and with corrupt aire which infecteth the bodie, that there followe some grievous tempest not onelie of contagious sicknesse, but also of present death to the bodie.

The greatest plucke of all is, that behemencie of plague, which naturallie followeth the dunt of hunger, which when it entereth once among men, what darts of pangs, what throlues of paines, what shoules of death doth it cast out? How manie fall, not assuied with the sicknesse, but fretted with the paine: How beateth it downe not onelie small tolowes, but also great countries? This when ye see light first on your beasts which lacke fodder, and after fall on men whose bodies gape for it, and see the scarcenelle of men to be by this your soule enterprisse, and not onelie other men touched with plagues, but also your owne house strong with death, and the plague also raised of your rising, to fire your selues: can ye thinke you to be anie other but mankillers of other, and murderers of your selues, and the principals of the ouerthrow of so great a number, as shall either by sword or punishment, famine, or some plague or pestilence be consumed and waisted out of the common-wealth?

And seeing he that decareth the number of cottages or plowes in a towne, seemeth to be an enemy to the common-wealth: shall we not count him, not onelie an enemy, but also a murderer of his countrie, who by harebained vnrulinesse causeth vtter ruine and pestilent destruction of so manie thousand men? Grant this follie then and oversight to be such as woorthilie ye maie count it, and I shall go further in declaring of other great inconueniences, which your dangerous and furious misbehaviour hath hurtfullie brought in; seeing diuerse honest and true dealing men, whose lining is by their owne prouision, hath come so before hand by time, that they haue bene able well to line honestlie in their houses, & paie beside the rents of their farmes trulie, and now haue by your crueltie and abhorred insurrections lost their goods, their cattell, their har-rest, which they had gotten before, and wherewith they intended to live hereafter, & now be brought to this extremitie, that they be neither able to live, as they were wont at home before; nor to paie their accustomed rent at their due time. Whereby they be brought into trouble and unquietnesse, not onlie missing what they have lost by you, but also in danger of losing their holds at their lords hands, except by pitie they shew more mercie, than the right of the law will grant by iustice.

The fruits of honest mens travels long in gathering, quickliche spoiled by rebellion.

And that a griefe is it to an honest man, to labour trulie in yowth, and to gaine painefullie by labour, wherewith to live honestlie in age, and to have this, gotten in long time, to be suddenlie caught awaie by the violence of sedition, which name he ought to abhorre by it selfe, although no miserie of losse followed to him thereby. But what greater griefe ought seditious rebels to have themselves, who if they be not stricken with punishment, yet ought to pine in conscience, and melt awaie with the griefe of their owne faults, when they see innocents and men of true service hindered and burdened with the hurt of their rebellion, & who in a good commonwealth should for honesties sake prosper, they by these rebels onlie meanes be cast so behind the hand, as they can not recouer easilie againe by their owne trust, that which they have lost by those traitors mischiefes. And if unlist men ought not so to be handled at any mans hands, but onelie stand to the order of a law: how much more should true and faithfull subjects, who deserve praise, see no unquietnesse, nor be vexed with sedition, who be obedientlie in subjection, but rather seeke iust amends at false rebels hands, and by law obtaine that they lost by disorder, and so constrain you to the uttermost, to paie the recompense of wrongfull losses, because ye were the authors of these wrongfull spoiles.

An argument from equitye & bright dealing even with the burnt.

Then would ye some perceiue the commonwealths hurt, not when other felt it who deserved it not, but when you smarted who caused it, and stand not & looked upon other mens losses which ye might pitie, but tormented with your owne which ye would lament. Now I am past this mischief, which ye will not hereafter denie, when ye shall praise other mens foresight, rather than your wicked doings, in bewailing the end of your furie, in whose beginning ye now reioise. What saie ye to the number of vagabonds and loitering beggers, which after the overthrow of your campe, and scattering of this seditious number, will swarme in euery corner of the realme, and not onelie lie loitering vnder hedges, but also stand sturdie in cities, and beg boldlie at euery doore, leauing labour which they like not, and following idleness which they should not? For euery man is easilie and naturallie brought from labour to ease, from the better to the worse, from diligence to slothfulness: and after warres it is commonlie seene, that a great number of those which went out honest, returne home againe like roisters, and as though they were burnt to the warts bottome, they haue all their life after an vnauoie smeeke thereof, & smell still toward daiesleepers, pursepickers, highwaie robbers, quarrellmakers, yea and bloudsheders too.

As what shifts soldiers fall after discamping and ceasing from warres.

Do we not see commonlie in the end of warres more robbing, more begging, more murdering than before, and those to stand in the high waie to aske their almes, whome ye be affraid to saie naie vnto honestlie, least they take it awaie from you violentlie, and haue more cause to suspect their strength, than pitie their need? Is it not then daile heard, how men be not onelie pursued, but utterlie spoiled, & few make ride safe by the kings highwaie, except they ride strong, not so much for feare of their goods, which men esteeme lesse, but also for danger of their life, which euery man loueth. Who is vndone at home and loiterers linger in streets, lurke in alehouses, range in highwaies, valiant beggers plate in towns and yet complaine of need, whose staffe if it be once hot in their hand, or sluggishness byed in theirosome, they will neuer be allured to labour againe, contenting themselves better with idle beggerie, than with honest and profitable labour. And what more noisome beasts be there in a commonwealth? Whores in houses sucke out the honie, a small matter, but yet to be looked on by good husbands. Caterpillers destroy the fruit, an hurtfull thing, and well shifted for by a diligent ouerser. Diuers beverme destroy cozne, kill pulleins, engines and snares be made for them.

But what is a loiterer? A sucker of honie, a spoiler of cozne, a stroier of fruit, a waister of monie, a spoiler of vittels, a sucker of bloud, a breaker of orders, a seeker of bycakes, a queller of life, a basilisk of the commonwealth, which by companie and sight doth poison the whole countrie, and staineth honest minds with the infection of his venime, and so draweth the commonwealth to death and destruction. Such is the fruits of your labour and trauell for your pretended commonwealth, which iustice would no man should taste of but your selues, that ye might trulie iudge of your owne mischief, and fraie other by example from presuming the like. When we see a great number of flies in a yeare, we naturally iudge it like to be a great plague, and hauing so great a swarming of loitering vagabonds, ready to beg and biall at euery mans doore, which declare a greater infection, can we not loke for a greuouser and perillous danger than the plague is? Who can therefore other wise deeme, but this one deadlie hurt, wherewith the commonwealth of our nation is wounded, beside all other is so pestilent, that there can be no more hurtfull thing in a well gouerned estate, nor more thowne into all kind of vice and varulinesse: and therefore this your sedition is not onelie most odious, but also most horrible, that hath spotted the whole countrie with such a staine of idleness.

There can be none end of faults, if a man rehearse all faults that do necessarilie follow this vnrulie sturdinesse. For not onelie vagabonds wandering and scattering themselves for mischief, shall run in a mans eyes, but also disorder of euery degree shall enter into a mans mind, and shall behold hereby the commonwealth miserable decayed by you, who should as much as other haue kept your selues in order in it. Neither be the magistrats duly obeyed, nor the lawes iustlie feared, nor degrees of men considered, nor masters well serued, nor parents trulie reuerenced, nor lords remembred of their tenants, nor yet either naturall or ciuill law much regarded. And it is plainlie vnpossible that that countrie shall well stand in gouernement, and the people growe to wealth, where order in euery state is not iustlie obserued: and that bodie cannot be without much griefe of inflammation, where anye left part is out of ioint, or not duellie set in his owne naturall place.

Wherefore order must be kept in the commonwealth like health in the bodie, and all the part of policie looketh to this end, how this temper may be safely maintained, without anye excess of vnrulie surableness, either of the one side, or of the other. And easie enough it is to keepe the same, when it is once brought into the meane, and to hold it in the state it is found in: but when it bursteth out once with a vehementie, and hath gotten into an vnrulie disorder, it spreadeth so fast, and ouersloweth all honest mens resisting so violentlie, that it will be hard to recouer the breach of long time againe, except with great great and wise counsell, which no doubt shall be in season vied, there be wonderfull remedies sought therefore. And even as a man falling, is easier holden by by staie, than when he is fallen downe he is able to rise againe: so is the commonwealth slipping, by the foresight of wisdom better kept from ruine; than when it is once fallen into anie kind of miserie, the same may be called againe to the old and former state. Now we not euidentlie know, that a man may better keepe his arme or his leg from breaking or falling out of joint, afore hurt come to it; than after the hurt it may safely and quietlie be healed, and restored to the former strength and health againe: And now through your seditious means, things that were afore quiet and in good order, lawes feared and obeyed, subiects ruled and kept in dutie, be all now in a great disorder, and like (if it be not holpen) to grow to wild-nesse, and a beuillinesse; seeing that neither common dutie can be kept, which nature prescribeth, nor common law can be regarded, which policie requireth.

How can yee keepe your owne if yee keepe no order?
Your wiues and children, how can they be defended from other mens violence, if yee will in other things beate all order? By what reason would yee be obedient of yours as seruants, if yee will not obeye the king as subiects? How would yee haue others deale orderlie with you, if yee will vse disorder against all others? Seeing then there is such a confusion now of things, such a turmoile of men, such a disorder of families; who can looke to liue quietlie a great while, who can thinke but that yee haue miserable tossed the commonwealth, and so vexed all men with disorder, that the inconuenience hereof cannot onelie nip others, but also touch you?

But now see how that not onelie these beclouded for mischaunces haue beuillie growne on yee, but also those commodities, which yee thought to haue holpen your selues and others by, be not onelie hindered, but also hurt thereby. The kings maiestie by the aduise, as: intended a iust reformation of all such things as poore men could trulie shew themselves oppressed with, thinking equalitie of iustice to be the diademe of his kingdome, and the safegard of his commons.
Which was not onelie intended by wisdom, but also set on with speed, and so entered into a due considering of all states, that none should haue iust cause to grudge against the other, when as euerie thing rightfullie had, nothing could be but unrightfullie rugged at. And this would haue bene done, not onelie with your glad and willing assent: but also bene done by this date almost throughout the whole realme: so that quietlie it had bene obtained without inconuenience, and speedilie without delay. And what sooner had bene done by the kings maiesties authoritie, that would by right haue remained for e-uer, and so taken in law, that the contrarie partie neither could by iustice, neither would by boldnesse haue enterprised the breach thereof.

But least wicked men should be wealthe, and they whose hearts be not trulie bent to obedience, should obtaine at the kings hands that they deser-ued not in a commonwealth, yee haue maruellouslie and worthilie hurt your selues, and grieuouslie prouoked (except the kings goodnesse be more vnto you than your owne deserts can claime) that yee be not so much worthe as to be benefited in anie kind, as yee be worthe to lose that yee haue on euerie side. Yee haue thought god to be your owne reformer, belike, not onelie unnaturallie mistrusting the kings iustice, but also cruellie and vnciuillie dealing with your owne neighbours. Wherein I would as yee haue hurt the whole realme, so yee had not enterprised a thing most dangerous to your selues, & most contrarie to the thing yee intended. If yee had let things alone, thought god by your selues to be redressed, and dutifullie looked for the performance of that, the kings maiestie promising reformation, they should not haue bene vndone at this time, as in a great sort of honest places they be; nor whole countries, who for their quietnesse be most worthe to be looked on, should haue bene vnprouided for at this date. But this commoditie hath happened by the waie, that it is euidentlie knowne by your mischaunce, and others dutie, who be most true to the king, and most worthe to be done for, and who be most pernicious and traitorous rebels. And it is not to be doubted, but they shall be considered with thanks, and find iust redresse without deserued miserie, & you punished like rebels, who might haue had both praise & profit like subiects.

For that as yee haue valiantlie done of your selues, thinke yee it will stand anie longer, than men feare your rage, which cannot indure long; and that yee shall not then bide the rigor of the law for your prouoked iniuries, as yee vied the furie of your braines in other mens oppressions: Will men suffer wrong at your hands, when law can redresse it, & the right of the commonwealth will mainteine it, and god order in countries will beare it? Yee amend faults as ill surgions heale sores, which when they come to be whole about, they rankle at the bottome, and so be saine continuallie to be soze, or else be mended by new breaking of the skin. Your redresse seemeth to you perfect and good, yee haue pulled downe such things as yee would, yee thinke now all is well: yee consider no further, yee seeke not the bottome, yee see not the soze, that yee haue done it by no law, yee haue redressed it by no order, what then? If it be no other, wise searched than by you, it will not tarie long so: either it will be after continuallie as it was afore your coming, or else it must be (when all is done) amended by the king.

Thus haue yee both lacked in the time, and mist in the doing, and yet besides that yee haue done, which is by your doing to no purpose. Yee haue done the things with such inconueniences, as hath bene both before rehearsed, and shall be after declared; that better it had bene for you, neuer to haue enioied the commoditie, if there be anie, than to suffer the griefs that will insue, which be vertie manie. In euerie quarter some men (whom yee set by) will be lost, which euerie one of you (if yee haue loue in ye) would rather haue lacked the profit of your inclosures, than cause such destruction of them, as is like by reason & iudge-ment necessarilie to follow. What commonwealth is it then, to do such abhominable enterprises after so vile a sort, that yee hinder that god yee would do, and bring in that hurt yee would not, and so find that yee seeke not, and follow that yee lose, and desire your selues by follie; rather than yee would be ordered by reason, and so haue not so much amended your old sores, as brought in new plagues, which yee your selues that deserue them will lament, and we which haue not deserued them may curse you for? For although the kings maiestie, as: intended for your profits a reformation in his commonwealth: yet his pleasure was not, nor no reason gaue it, that euerie subiect should buillie intermeddle with it of their owne head, but onelie those whose his counsell thought most meet men for such an honest purpose.

The kings maiestie, as: hath goodlie reformed an uncleane part of religion, and hath brought it to the true forme of the first church that followed Christ, thinking that to be truest, not that later mens fancies haue of themselves deuised, but that the apostles and their felowes had at Christs hand receiued, and willeth the same to be knowne and set abroad to all his people. Shall euerie man now that listeth and fantiseth the same, take in hand vncalled, to be a minister, niffer, and to set forth the same, having no authori-tie: & aie, though the thing were verie goodlie that were done, yet the person must needs do ill that en-terpriseth it, because he doth a god thing after an ill sort, and looketh but on a little part of dutie, considring the thing, and leaveth a great part unadvised, not considering the person: when as in a well and justitie done matter, not onelie these two things ought well to be weighed, but also good occasion of time, and reasonable cause of the doing, ought also much to be set before everie doers eyes. Now in this your deed, the manner is ungodlie, the thing unfor-ferable, the cause wicked, the person seditious, the time traitorous: and can ye possiblie by anie honest defense of reason, or anie good conscience religious-lie grounded, denie that this malicious and horrible fault, so wickedlie set on, is not onelie sinfull afore God, and traitorous to the king, but also dradlie and pestilent to the whole common-wealth of our coun-trie, and so not onelie overthroweth vs with the miserie, but also overthroweth you with the rage thereof?

The poke that rebels willfullie bring upon themselves.

Yet further see and ye be not wearie with the multitude of miseries, which ye have marvellouslie moued, that a poke ye willfullie do bring on your selues, in stirring by this detestable sedition, and so bring your selues into a further slauerie, if ye vse your selues into a further slauerie, if ye vse your selues often thus inobedientlie. When common order of the law can take no place in unrulie and disobedient subiects, and all men will of willfullnesse resist with rage, and thinke their owne violence to be the best iustice; then be wise magistrats compelled by necessitie to seeke an extream remealie, where meane waies helpe not, and bring in the martiall law where none other law serueth. Then must ye be contented to bide punishment without processe, condemnation without witness, suspicion is then taken for iudgement, and displeasure may be iust cause of your execution, and so without fauor ye find strictnesse, which without rule seeke violence. Ye thinke it a hard law and unsufferable. It is so indeed, but yet good for a medicine.

Desperat remedies for desperat diseases.

Rebels who thie to suffer extremite of punishment.

Desperate sicknesses in physicke must haue desperate remedies, for meane medicines will neuer helpe great griefes. So if ye cast your selues into such sharpe diseases, ye must needs loke for sharpe medicines againe at your physicians hands. And woorthie ye be to suffer the extremite in a commonwealth, which seeke to do the extremite, and by reason must receiue the like ye offer, and so be contenred to bide the end willinglie which set on the beginning willfullie. For no greater shame can come to a common-wealth, than that those subiects which should be obedient euen without a law, can not be contented to be ordered by the law, and by no means kept within their dutie, which should euerie waie offend rather than in their dutie. It is a token that the subiects lacke reason, when they forsake law, and thinke either by their multitude to find pardon, which cannot iustlie stretch to all, or else by strength to beare the stroke, which cannot prosper against a king.

The greatest shame that can come to a common-wealth.

They must needs little consider the miseries, who bring in this necessitie, rather to stand to the pleasure of a mans will, than to abide the reason of the law; and to be endangered more when an other man li-seth, than when himselfe offendeth. And this must necessarilie folow if your rebellion thus continue: and while ye seeke to throw downe the poke, which ye sanke your selues burdened withall, ye bring your selues in a greater bondage, leaning safetie and so-lowing danger, and putting your selues vnder the iustice of them whose fauour ye might easilie haue kept, if ye would willinglie and dutifullie haue ser-ued. Now the gentlemen be more in trust, because the commons be untrustie, and they get by seruice, which ye lose by stubbornnesse, and therefore must needs, if ye thus continue, haue more authoritie from the king: because ye would be in lesse subiection to the king, and that as ye will not do of your selues, ye must be compelled to do by others, and that ye refuse to do willinglie, thinke ye must be dradlie to do the same constrainedlie. Which when it cometh to passe, as wisdometh seeth in your faults that it must needs, what gaine ye then, or what profit can arise to you by rising, which might haue found ease in sitting still? And what shall ye be at length the better for this turmoile, which beside diuers other in-commodities rehearsed, shall be thus clogged with the unsufferable burden of the martiall law.

Gentlemen
more trustie because the commons be untrustie.

Marshall law
a burden vpon sufferable.

Yet there is one thing behind, which me thinketh your selues should not forget, seeing that ye haue gi-uen the cause, ye should dulie loke for the effect. Ye haue spoiled, imprisoned, and threatened gentlemen to death, and that with such hatred of mind, as may not well be borne. The cause therof I speake not on, which tried, will happilie be not so great: but see the thing, set murder aside, it is the heinouest fault to a priuat man. What could more spitefullie haue bene done against them, than ye haue vied with crueltie?
Can this do anie other but breed in their stomachs great grudge of displeasure toward you, and ingender such an hatred, as the weaker and the sufferer must needs beare the smart thereof.

Cruelty and extremity showed to the gentlemen by the rebels.

best kind of government.

The kings best kind of government is so to rule his subiects, as a father ordereth his children, and best life of obedient subiects is one to behaue himselfe to an other, as though they were brethren vnder the king their father. For loue is not the knot onelie of the common-wealth, whereby diuerse parts be perfectlie ioined together in one politike bodie, but also the strength and might of the same, gathering together into a small ronne with order, which scattered would else breed confusion and debate. Dissention we see in small houses, and thereby may take example to great common-wealths, how it not onelie decaith them from wealth, but also abateth them from strength. Thinke small examples to take place in great matters, and the like though not so great to follow in the both, and there by learne to iudge of great things vnknowne, by small things perceiued.
When brethren agree not in a house, goeth not the weakest to the walles; and with whom the father taketh part withall, is not he likeliest to preuaile: As it not wisdometh for the yonger brother, after the gods will of the parents, to seeke his eldres brothers fa-uour, who vnder them is most able to do for him: So seeke them both with honestie is wisdometh, to lose them both by fullennesse is madnesse.

The fruits of dissention.

Haue there not bene daile benefits from the gentlemen to you, in some more, and in some lesse, but in none considered, which they haue more friendlie offered, than you haue gentlie required? This must ye lose, when ye will not be thankfull, and learne to gaine new good will by desert, when ye forsake the old friendship vnproouoked. And ye must thinke that living in a common-wealth together, one kind hath need of an other: and yet a great sort of you more need of one gentleman, than one gentleman of a great sort of you. And though all be parts of one common-wealth, yet all be not like woorthie parts, but all being vnder obedience, some kind in more subiection one waie, and some kind in more seruice an other waie. And seeing ye be lesse able by monie and liberalitie to deserue good will than others be, and your onelie kind of desert is to shew good will, which honest men do well accept as much woorth as mo-nie, haue ye not much hindered & hurt your selues

Gentlemen
more trouble
because the country be vntuallie.

An. Reg. 3.

herein, losing that one kind of humanitie which ye haue onlie left, and turning it into crueltie, which ye ought most to abhor, not onlie because it is wicked of it selfe, but also most noisome to you.

I can therefore for my part thinke no lesse herein, if ye follow your stiffenesse still, & must needs iudge that ye haue wilfullie brought on your selues such plagues, as the like could not haue fallen on you, but by your selues. Seeing then thus manie waies ye haue hurt the common-welth of this whole countrie within, by destruction of shires, losing of haruest, wasting of vittels, decaying of manhood, vndermining of farmers, increasing of vagabonds, mainteining of disorders, hindring of redresses, bringing in of martiall law, and breeding continuall hatred among diuerse states: what thinke ye, I praise you? Judge ye not that ye haue committed an odious and detestable crime against the whole common-wealth, whose fartherance ye ought to haue tendered by dutie, and not to haue sought the hurt thereof with your owne damage?

Besides all these inward griefes, which enerie one seuerallie must needs feele with miserie, there happeneth so manie outward mishances among strangers to vs with vildaine; that if there were nothing ill within the realme which we should feele, yet the shame which doth touch vs from other countries, should not onlie moue, but also compell you hartlie to forsethinke this your rebellious sedition. For what shall strangers thinke, when they shall heare of the great misorder which is in this realme with such confusion, that no order of law can keepe you vnder, but must be faine to be beaten downe with a kings powder? Shall they not first thinke the kings maiestie, in whose mind God hath powred so much hope for a child, as we may looke for gifts in a man; either for his age to be little set by, or for lacke of qualities not to be regarded, or for default of loue to be resisted, and no notable grace of God in him considered, nor the worthinesse of his office looked vpon, nor naturall obedience due to him remembred?

Shall they not next suppose, small estimation to be giuen to the rulers, to whom vnder the king we owe due obedience, that can not in iust and lawfull matters be heard, nor men to haue that right iudgement of their wisdoms, as their iustice in rule, and foresight in counsell requireth: but rather prefer their owne fancies before others experience, and deeme their owne reason to be common-wealth, and other mens wisdoms to be but dreaming? Shall they not trulie saie the subjects to be more vnfaithfull in disobedience, than other subjects were ordeered be; and licence of libertie to make wild heads without order, and that they neither haue reason that vnderstand not the mischiefe of sedition, nor dutie which followeth their beaulinesse, nor loue in them which so little remember the common-wealth, nor naturall affection which will daile seeke their owne destruction?

Thus the whole countrie lacking the good opinion of other nations, is cast into great shame by your vnrulinesse, and the proceedings of the countrie, be they neuer so goodlie, shall be ill spoken of, as vnfit to be brought into life, and good things hereby that deserue praise, shall bide the rebuke of them that list to speake ill, and all things vntouched shall be boldlie maintained. Nothing may with praise be redressed, where things be measured by changeable disorder, rather than by necessarie life; and that is thought most politike, that men will be best contented to doe, and not that which men should be brought vnto by dutie. And with what dutie or vertue in ye, can ye quench out of memorie this foule enterpryse, or gather a good report againe to this realme, who haue so bilie with reproch slandered the same, and discreetly discredited it among others, and abated the good opinion which was had of the iust gouernment and ruled order vnder heretofore in this noble realme, which is now most gricuous, because it is now most without cause.

If this outward opinion (without further inconvenience) were all, yet it might well be borne, and would with ease decaye as it grew: but it hath not onlie hurt vs with voice, but endangered vs in deed, and cast vs a great deale behind the hand, where else we might haue had a iollie forebode. For that oportunitie of time which seldome chanceth, and is alwaies to be taken, hath bene by your stoward meanes lost this yeare, and so vainlie spent at home for bringing downe of you, which should else profitable haue bene otherwise bestowed, that it hath bene almost as great a losse to vs abroad, to lacke that we might haue obtained, as it was combrance at home, to go about the ouerthrow of you, whose sedition is to be abhorred. And we might both conuenientlie haue inuaded some, if they would not reasonably haue growne to some kind of friendship, and also defended others which would beside promise for times sake vniuersally set vpon vs, and casilie haue made this stormie time a faire yeare vnto vs, if our men had bene so happy at home, as our likelihood abroad was fortunat.

But what is it (I praise you) either to let slip such an occasion by negligence, or to stop it by stubbornnesse, which once past awaie, can be by no means recovered; no not though with diligence ye go about to reinforce the same againe? If ye would with wickednes haue forsaken your faith to your naturall countrie, and haue sought craftie means to haue vtterlie betrayed it to our common enemies: could ye haue had anie other speedier waie than this is, both to make our strength weake, and their weakenesse strong? If ye would haue sought to haue spied your countrie, and to haue pleased your enemy, and sold low their counsell for our hinderance: could ye haue had deuised of them anie thing more shamefull for vs, and ioisfull to them? If they which lie like spiels, and hearken after likelihoods of things to come, because they declare oportunitie of times to the enemy, are to be iudged common enemies of the countrie; what shall we reasonable thinke of you, who doe not secretlie betwixt the counsels of other, but openlie betraie the common-wealth with your owne deeds, and haue as much as lieth in you, sought the ouerthrow of it at home: which if ye had obtained at Gods hand, as ye neuer alloweth so horrible an enterpryse, how could ye haue defended it from the ouerthrow of others abroad?

For is your vnderstanding of things so small, that although ye see your selues not vnfit to get the upper hand of a few gentlemen, that ye be able to beat downe afore the kings power: ye and by chance ye were able to doe that, would ye iudge your selues by strength mightie enough, to resist the power of outward nations, that for praise sake would inuade ye? I saie, thinke trulie with your selues, that if ye doe overcome, ye be vnafire both by strength abroad, and displeasure of honest men at home, and by the punishment of God above. And now ye haue not yet gotten in deed, that your vaine hope looketh for by fanste: thinke how certeinly ye haue wounded the common-wealth with a sore stroke, in piorcing our enemies by our weakenesse to seeke victorie, and by our outward miserie to seeke outward glorie with inward dishonour. Which howsoeuer they get, thinke it to be long of you, who haue offered them victorie before they began warre: because ye would declare to men hereafter (belike) how dangerous it is to make sturres at home, when they doe not onlie make our selues weakie, but also our enemies strong.

Beside these, there is another sort of men desirous of advantage, and disdainfull of our wealth, whose greife is most our greatest hap, and be offend with religion, because they be drowned in superstition, men zealous toward God, but not fit to iudge, meaning better without knowledge, than they iudge by their meaning, wozthier whose ignorance should be taken awaie, than their will should be followed; whome we should more rebuke for their stubbornesse, than despise for their ignorance. These seeing superstition beaten downe, and religion set by, Gods word taking place, traditions kept in their kind, difference made betwene Gods commandements and mans learning, the truth of things sought out according to Christs institution, examples taken of the primitive churches vse, not at the bishop of Romes ordinance, and true wozship taught, and wil-wozship refused, do by blindness rebuke that as by truth they should follow, and by affection follow that as by knowledge they should abhorre, thinking vbiage to be truth, and scripture to be error, not weieing by the word, but misconstruing by custome.

Religion beareth the blame and is counted
the cause of rebellion, but amisse.

And now things be changed to the better, and religion trulier appointed, they see matters go awrye, which hurteth the whole realme, and they reioise in this mischefe as a thing wozthilie happened, mistaking the cause, and slandering religion, as though there were no cause whie God might haue punished, if their vied profession might still haue taken place. They see not that where Gods glozie is truest set forth, there the diuell is most busie for his part, and labourerth to corrupt by lewdnesse, that as is gotten out by the truth, thinking that if it were not blemished at the first, the residue of his falsehood should after lesse preuaile. So he troubleth by bitwaies, that he cannot plainlie withstand, and vseth subtiltie of sophistrie, where plaine reason faileth, and persuadeth simple men that to be a cause, which in deed can not be tried and taken for a cause. So he causeth religion which teacheth obedience, to be iudged the cause of sedition; the doctrine of loue, the seed of dissention; mistaking the thing, but persuading mens minds, and abusing the plaine meaning of the honest to a wicked end of religions overthrow.

The diuels sophistrie.

Examples.

The Jewes
ascribe their miserie to a false cause.

The heathens fond opinion of gods fauor-ing their cruelty against christians.

The husbandman had not so sone thowne seed in his ground, but steppeth by the enemy, and hee soweth cockle too, and maketh men doubt whether the good husband had done well or no, and whether he had sowne there good seed or bad. The farsifull Jewes in Egypt would not beleue Jeremie, but thought their plague and their miserie to come by his means; and leaning of idolatrie to be the cause of penurie, wherefore by willfull aduise they intended to forsake the prophets counsell, and thought to serue God most trulie by their rooted & accustomed idolatrie. When the christian men were persecuted in the primitive church, & daillie suffered martyrdome for Christs profession, such faire season of weather was for thre or foure yeares together, that the heathen iudged thereupon God to be delighted with their cruelty, and so were persuaded that with the blood of the martyrs they pleased God highlie. Such fantasies light now in papists, and irreligious mens heads, and ioine things by chance happening together, and conclude the one to be the cause of the other, and then delight in true wozshippers hurt, because they iudge curfodie the good to be bad, and therefore reioise in the punishment of the goodie. For they being fleshlie, iudge by outward things, and perceiue not the inward, for that they lacke the spirit and so iudge amiss, not understanding God, what diuersitie he suffereth to blind still the willfull, and how thorough all dangers he saueh his chosen.

And thus haue ye giuen a large occasion to stubborne papists, both to iudge amisse, and also to reioise in this wicked chance, contented with our mischefe, not liking our religion, and thinking God doth punish for this better change, and haue thereby an euill opinion of Gods holic truth, confirmed in them by no sure scripture, but by following of mischance, which they ought to thinke to come for the pride and stubbornnesse of the people, who doth not accept Gods glozie in good part, nor giue no due praise to their Lord and maker. What should I saie more? Be hurt euerie waie, the dangers be so great, and the perils so manie, which do daillie follow poor diuillish enterpryse, that the more I seeke in the matter, the more I continually see to saie. And what words can wozthilie declare this miserable beastlines of poyres, which haue intended to diuide the realme, and drine the one part for the killing of the other? For euen as concord is not onelie the health, but also the strength of the realme; so is sedition not onelie the weaknesse, but also the apostume of the realme, which when it breaketh inwardlie, putteth the state in great danger of recouerie, and corrupteth the whole commonwealth with the rotten surie that it hath bene long putrified withall. For it is not in sedition as in other faults, which being mischefeous of themselves, haue some notable hurt alwaies fast adioined to them: but in this one is there a whole hell of faults, not seuerallie scattered, but clustered on a lump together, and coming on so thicke, that it is impossible for a region armed with all kinds of wisdom, and strength thereto, to auoid the dangers that issue out thereof.

When sedition once breaketh out, see ye not the lawes overthrowne, the magistrates despised, spoiling of houses, murthering of men, waisting of countries, increase of disorder, diminishing of the realms strength, swarming of vagabonds, scarcitie of laborers, and all those mischefeous plentifulie brought in, which God is wont to scourge scuerelie withall, warre, dearth, and pestilence? And seeing ye haue these & murther, plague & famine, confusion and solenelle linked together, can ye loke for anie more mischefe in one shamefull enterpryse, than ye euidentlie see to grow herein? As for warre, although it be miserable, yet the one part getteth somewhat, and reioiseth in the spoile, and so goeth lustier awaie: and either increaseth his countrie with riches, or inhabits himselfe with glozie: but in sedition both parts lose, the ouercommer cannot stie, the ouercommed cannot spoile; the more the winner winneth, the more he loseth; the more that escape, the more infamous men liue; all that is gained is scarcelie saved; the winning is losse, the losse is destruction, both waist themselves, and the whole most waisted; the strengthening of themselves, the decaye of the countrie; the striving for the victorie, is a pzele to the enemy: and thoztie to saie, the bellish turmoile of sedition so farre passeth the common miserie of warre, as to saie himselfe is more heinous, than to be slaine of another.

A noble peace, that wealth bringeth thou in, both do all things flourish in field and in towne, what for wardnesse of religion, what increase of learning, what grauitie in counsell, what deuise of wit, what order of manners, what obedience of laws, what reuerence of states, what safeguard of houses, what quietnesse of life, what honoz of countries, what friendship of minds, what honestie of pleasure hast thou alwaies mainteined, whose happinesse we knew not, while now we see thy lacke, and shall learne by miserie to understand plentie, and so to auoid mischefe by the hurt that it bringeth, and learne to serue better, where rebellion is once knowen; and so to lue

¶ Thus far this necessarie treatise touching rebellion, penned by sir John Cheke, a gentleman euerie waie in complet sort satisfiing the report blayed abroad of him. For if there were no more testimonies extant in the world, but this onelie treatise discoursing Betts rebellion; it were enough to warrant no lesse true, than in common speech and writing is left witnessed of him. And suerlie it appeareth, that as in this gentleman there was an extraordinary heape of laudable gifts; so was there also in him the right vse of them all. Wherby he grew in such fauor with king Henrie the eight, that partlie for his absolute knowledge in tongues, speciallie in Greeke and Latine, and also for his integritie of life and religion; he was chosen scholemaster to yong prince Edward, to traine him vp in the right vnderstanding, both of forren languages, & the purenes of Gods seruice. Inasmuch that by his industrie such effects followed (God aboue prospering his actions) that the yong prince, when he came to the kingdom was mindfull of him, and among other (I will not saie gratuitously) there cause of desert maketh chal

In this place he caused trenches to be cast about a plot of ground, after the manner of a fortress, within the which he left certaine bands of men of warre to be a safeguard unto such as should passe to or from with vittells to furnish his campe. He staid not there past a daie & a halfe, but remoued to Ardencroft

The French king persecuted him in his former purpose, and made him a martyr.

a mile or little more beyond Margulsen; from thence he came with his armie, and lodged on a hill, somewhat more than a mile & a halfe from Hambleteue.
The French king hauing viewed the forts, caused fue and twentie peeces of artillerie to be planted against that fort, which was built in a place called the Almaine campe, but the Frenchmen named it Le fort de Selague, distant from Hambleteue about a quarter of a mile. The artillerie had not gone off little more than the space of two houres, but that Charles Sturton capteine of that pece, and George Willoughbie a gentleman associat with him, came forth to parke with the Constable, offering to yeld the fort into his hands, vpon condition they might depart with bag and baggage. But as they were thus in hand to make their composition, the Frenchmen thrust forward to the rampiers, and entered in plumps into the fortresse, due fourescore persons, & toke the rest prisoners. There might be in all within that pece two hundred and thirtie persons, men and women. This happened the foure and twentieth of August, being Bartholomew daie.

This done, the king caused part of the artillerie to be planted against the castell of Hambleteue, situated at the one end of the towne nere to the sea side. Towards night monsieur de Wandosme gaue an approach to the said castell, and they within by commandement of the lord Greie retired to the maine fort to helpe to furnish the same, wanting numbers sufficient to defend it. The next daie being the five and twentieth of August, the king caused approches to be made vnto the great fort, and the morrow after the batterie began most furiously.
The same daie after dinner, the king summoned them within to yeld; but the lord John Greie being generall (although he saw how weake the pece was of it selfe, & the lacke of sufficient numbers of men to resist such a puissant force, as the French king had there with him) would not yet hearken vnto anie talke, nor suffer the herald to come nere; for that he should not perceiue the weakenesse of the pece: and so he was commanded to get him thence with speed, or else they would cause him to be packing smallie to his ease. The French king soe offended here with, that his herald was so discourteouslie vfed, caused the batterie to be reinforced with great diligence, which dismounting their ordinaunce within, and beating downe their rampiers, made such breaches, that my lord John and the capteins within perceiued they were not able by anie meanes to defend the place anie longer. Herevpon they offered to render the fort to the king vpon composition: which in the end fell out to be thus, that the souldiers should depart with their liues saued, and that the generall (for honor sake) should haue one horse to ride on in his cosset, without sword or dagger, and likewise two other capteins with him: but as for the other souldiers, with the women and children, should depart on foot in their shirts, leauing all their goods and substance behind them. After it was agreed that the fort should be thus surrendered, there entered monsieur de Chatillon that was after admerall of France, and monsieur de Delle, latellie returned out of Scotland. The French souldiers entring by f stealth into the fort by the breaches, committed foule disorders, not onelie in ransacking the houses, but also in spoiling the souldiers by force, intreating them in most rigorous manner.

The French writers confesse, that it was pittie to see the poore men and women so miserable handled and abused as they were by the outragious souldiers that thus entered the fort, and sacked all that they could laie hands vpon. Monsieur de Delle saued a great number of women and yong maidens from the cruell hands of their aduersaries, causing them to passe forth by the breach, and presented them to the king, who appointed that they should be conueied in safetie, with all that they had about them, till they had gotten out of danger. Monsieur de Chatillon, by the kings commandement, caused all the rest within the fort to come forth, who passing thre and thre in a range came before the king, who stood there to behold them, with the whole armie placed so in order on either side the waie as they should come, that they might passe betwixt their ranks, as it were through a lane. They that came forth in this fort might be (as the French writers record) about seuen or eight hundred in all of men and women, wherof there were manie hurt and mained; some with halfe a shirt on to couer them, and diuerse stark naked. The lord John Greie being mounted on a curtaile, passing by the French king, and saluting him, was courteouslie of him embraced.

The morrow after was the fort of Blacknesse or Blaconnesse rendered to the French king, with like conditions as they of Hambleteue had rendered theirs. This was on the tuesday the seuen and twentith of August. The nine and twentieth of August sir Nicholas Arnault conueieng all the artillerie, munition, vittels, and goods out of Bullongne berg, caused fire to be set on that fort, and retired with all his souldiers and other people vnto Bullongne. Where-vpon shortly after the Frenchmen seized vpon the said place of Bullongne berg, & kept it. The French king leauing monsieur de Chatillon within Hambleteue with the old hands of the French footmen, returned towards Bullongne, & approaching within a mile and a halfe of the old man, meant to build there a fort on the sea side: but what through such harpe skirmishes as the Englishmen continually were redie to make with his men, and what through the abundance of raine which fell in that season, he was constrained to breake by his campe, and leauing strong garrisons both of horsemen and footmen in all those places, which he had in that season wonne out of the Englishmens hands, he returned himselfe with the princes of his blood into France.

In this meane time whilst the French king was thus occupied, to vse the oportunitie of time in recouering of those fortresses in Bullongnois out of the Englishmens hands, the kings maiestie and his councell were busie still in quieting his rebellious subiects here in England: and finally for meane of a full pacification, and to set all things in god frame and quiet rest, the king published his graces most generall and free pardon to all rebelles, so that they would forthwith (vpon publication of the same pardon) returne euerie man to his house and countrie; which they gladlie did: and so these seditious and most dangerous troubles were brought to end and pacified.

Also in this busie time Marie Steward queene of Scots was conueied by sea out of Scotland into France, and there on the nineteenth daie of April 1549, was married in our ladie church in Paris (with great triumph and solemnitie) to Francis the Dolphin, eldest sonne vnto king Henrie the second of that name French king. This conueieng of the yong queene is reported by one to haue bene pittulie wrought, at such time as the councell of England were in some expectation and hope to obtaine hir. Neuerthelesse the subtilt abuse of the French, and the trecherous forwardnesse of the Scots, oter-lie disappointed the honest and honorable purpose of the English. Now when the yong queene and hir traîne, with the gard of hir person (be they whom you will) were vnder saile, the English nauie was abroade, and lieng in wait to haue intercepted hir

In this trouble some yere also Edmund Bonner bishop of London preached a sermon at Paules crosse, for the which he was accus<sup>d</sup> unto the counsell by William Latimer parson of saint Laurence Pountneire, and John Hooper sometime a wylde Santurburie, and other commissioners at Lambeth, on the twentieth daie of that same moneth, and sent to the sparchallase. On the first of October he was deprived of his bishoprike, for disobeying the kings order in religion.]

How after that these hurle burlies were through-lie quieted, manie of the lords of the realme, as well councelloes as other, milking the government of the protector, began to withdraw themselves from the court, and retreating to London, fell to secret consultation for redress of things, but namelie for the displacing of the lord protector. And suddenly upon what occasion manie marvelled, but few knew. Ceverie lord and councello went through the citie weaponed, and had their servants likewise weaponed, attending upon them in new liveries, to the great wondering of manie. And at the last a great assemble of the said councelloes was made at the earle of Warwicks lodging, which was then at Cle place in Holborne, whither all the confederats in this matter came privilie armed; and finally concluded to possesse the towne of London, which by the policie of sir William Baulet lord treasure of England was peaceablie obtained, & who by order of the said confederats immediatlie removed sir John Sparham then lieutenant of the towne, and placed in that rowe sir Leonard Chamberleine. And after that the said councill was broken up at Cle place, the earle of Warwicke removed forthwith into the citie of London, and laie in the house of one John Pothe a citizen of London, who was then cheef master of the mint, kept at Suffolke place in Southwarke.
The lord protector hearing of the manner of the assemble of this councill, and of the taking of the towne, which seemed to him verie strange and doubt-full, did presentlie the said night remove frō Hampton court, taking the king with him, unto the castell of Windsoze, and there began to fortifie the same, and withall wrote a letter to that noble gentleman the lord Russell lord privie seale remaining as yet in the west countie, aduertising him of these troubles as followeth.

An answer to the lord protectors letter.

This letter of the lord protectors sent the first of October, the lord Russell returning answer againe vpon the eight of the said month, first lamented the beaute diffention fallen betwene the nobilitie and him, which he toke for such a plague, as a greater could not be sent of almighty God vpon this realme being the next waie (said he) to make vs of conquerors, flames; and like to induce vpon the whole realme an vniuersall thzaldome and calamitie, vnlesse the mercifull goodnesse of the Lord doe helpe, and some wise order be taken in staing these great extremities. And as touching the dukes request in his letters, for so much as he had heard before of the houle of the lords, and feared least some conspiracie had bene meant against the kings person, he hastid forward with such companie as he could make, for the suertie of the king as to him appertained. Now perceluing by the lords letters sent vnto him the same first date of October, these tumults to rise vpon priuat causes betwene him and them, he therefore thought it expedient, that a conuenient power should be leued, to be in a readinesse to withstand the twoway (what perils soeuer might insue) for the preservation both of the king and state of the realme from inuasion of forreyn enemies, and also for the staing of bloodshed, if anie such thing should be intended betwixt the parties in the heat of this faction. And this he thinking best for the discharge of his allegiance, humbly besought his grace to haue the same also in speciall regard and consideration; first, that the kings maiestie be put in no feare; and that if there be anie such thing, wherein he hath giuen iust cause to them thus to proceed, he would be conforme himselfe, as no such priuat quarrels doe rebound to the publike disturbance of the realme: certifieng moreouer the duke, that if it were true which he understood by the letters of the lords, that he should send about proclamations and letters for raising vp of the commons, he liked not the same. For withstanding he trusted well that his wisdom would take such a waie, as no effusion of blood should followe.

And thus much being conteined in his former letters the eight of October, in his next letters againe written the eleventh of October, the said lord Russell refusing to heare of the most reasonable offers of the lord protector made to the lords, wrote unto him and and promised to do, what in the uttermost power of him (and likewise of sir William Herbert joined together with him) did lie, to worke some honorable reconciliation betwene him & them: so as his said offers being accepted and satisfied, some good conclusion might insue, according to their god hope and expectation: signifieng moreover, that as touching the leueng of men, they had resolved to haue the same in readinesse for the benefit of the realme, to occurre all inconueniences whatsoever, that either by forren inuasion or otherwise might happen: & so hauing their power at hand to draw nere, whereby they might haue the better oportunitie to be solicitous and meanes for this reformation on both parts, &c. And thus much for the answer of the lord Russell to the lord protectors letters.

The good lord Russell a solicitor for peace betwene the lord protector and the lords.

The lords of the council assembled against the lord protector.

But now to proceed and go forward with the matter of the lords, who together with the earle of Warwike (upon what occasion God knoweth) were assembled at London (as ye haue heard) against the lord protector. When the king with his council at Hampton court heard thereof, first secretarie Peter with the kings message was sent vnto them, whome the lords notwithstanding deteined still with them, making as yet no answer to the message. Whereupon the lord protector wrote as followeth.

A letter of the lord protectors to the council at London.

The protectors letter to the lords.

M Lords we commend vs heartlie vnto you. And whereas the kings maiestie was informed that you were assembled in such sort as you do, and now remaine, and was aduised by vs and such other of his council as were then here about his person, to send master secretarie Peter vnto you with such a message, as whereby might haue insued the suertie of his maiesties person, with the preservation of his realme and subiects, and the quiet both of vs and your selues, as master secretarie can well declare to you: his maiestie and we of his council here do not a little maruell, that you staie still with you the said master secretarie, & haue not as it were boughsated to send answer to his maiestie, neither by him nor yet by anie other. And for our selues we do much more maruell and are sorie, as both we and you haue good cause to be, to see the manner of your doings bent with force of violence, to bring the kings maiestie & vs to these extremities.

No word hitherto sent from the lords to the lord protector what they required of him to do.

Which as we intend, if you will take no other waie but violence, to defend (as nature and allegiance doth bind vs) to extremitie of death, and to put all to Gods hand, who giueth victorie as it pleaseth him: so if that anie reasonable conditions & offers would take place (as hitherto none hath bene signified vnto vs from you, nor we do not vnderstand, what you do require or seeke, or what you do meane) and that you do seeke no hurt to the kings maiesties person, as touching all other priuat matters, to auoid the effusion of christian blood, and to preserve the kings maiesties person, his realme and subiects, you shall find vs agreeable vnto anie reasonable conditions that you will require. For we do esteeme the kings wealth and tranquillitie of the realme more than all other worldly things, yea than our owne life. Thus praieing you to send vs your determinate answer herein by master secretarie Peter, or if you will not let him go, by this bearer, we beseech God to giue both you and vs grace to determinate this matter, as maie be to Gods honor, the preservation of the king, and the quiet of vs all: which maie be, if the fault be not in you. And so we bid you most hartlie farewell. From the kings maiesties castell of Windsor the seuenth of October, 1549.

Your lordships loving friend Edward Sumner.

After the receipt of these letters, the lords seeming not greatlie to regard the offers contained therein, persisted in their intended purpose; and continuing still in London conferred with the maior of London and his brethren, first willing them to cause a good and substantiall watch by night, and a good ward by daie to be kept for the safeguard of the citie, and the ports and gates thereof: which was consented vnto, and the companies of London in their turnes warned to watch and ward accordingly. When the said lords and counsellors demanded of the lord maior and his brethren five hundred men to aid them, to fetch the lord protector out of Windsor from the king. But therevnto the maior answered, that he could grant no aid without the assent of the common council of the citie: whereupon the next daie a common council was summoned to the Guildhall in London. But in this meane time the said lords of the council assembled themselves at the lord maiors house in London, who was then sir Henrie Amcotes fishmonger, and John Poike and Richard Turke shiriffes of the said citie. And there the said council agreed and published forthwith a proclamation against the lord protector, the effect of which proclamation was as followeth.

The lords continue in their intended purpose against the lord protector.

The kings read to the lords.

The record of an enemy to the lord protector.

Some Statute of London made against the recorder of London because he was a papist and a traitor.

A proclamation on published against the lord protector.

- 1 That the lord protector, by his malicious and euill gouernement, was the occasion of all the sedition that of late hath happened within the realme.
- 2 The losse of the kings peaces in France.
- 3 That he was ambitious and sought his owne glorie, as appeared by his building of most sumptuous and costlie buildings, and speciallie in the time of the kings warres, and the kings soldiers vnpayed.
- 4 That he esteemed nothing the graue council of the counsellors.
- 5 That he sowed sedition betwene the nobles, the gentlemen, and commons.
- 6 That the nobles assembled themselves together at London, for none other purpose, but to haue caused the protector to haue liued within his limits, and to haue put such order for the kings maiestie as appertained, whatsoever the protectors doings were, which (as they said) were vnnaturall, ingrate, and traitorous.
- 7 That the protector flattered the council to the king, and did what in him lay to cause variance betwene the king and his nobles.

- 8 That he was a great traitor, and therefore the lords desired the citie and commons to aid them to take him from the king. And in witnesse and testimony of the contents of the said proclamation the lords subscribed their names and titles as followeth.

The lord Rich lord chancellor, the lord S. John lord great maister and president of the council, the lord re. Juelles of Northampton, the earle of Warwike lord great chamberleine, the earle of Arundell lord chamberleine, the earle of Shrewsburie, the earle of Southampton Marquisse, sir Thomas Cheinie knight treasurer of the kings house and lord warden of the cinque ports, sir John Cage knight constable of the tower, sir William Peter knight secretarie, sir Edward North knight, sir Edward Montague cheefe iustice of the common pleas, sir Rafe Sadler, sir John Baker, sir Edward Mottson, doctor Mottson deane of Canturburie, sir Richard Southwell.

After the foresaid proclamation was proclaimed, the lords of the most of them continuing and lieng in London, came the next daie to the Guildhall, during ring the time that the lord maior and his brethren sat in their court or inner chamber, and entered and continued a long while with them, and at the last the maior and his brethren came forth vnto the common counsell, where was read the kings letter sent vnto the maior and citizens, commanding them to aid him with a thousand men, as hath maister Fox, and to send the same to his castell at Windsoze: and to the same letter was adioined the kings hand, and the lord protectors. On the other side, by the mouth of the recorder it was requested, that the citizens would grant their aid rather vnto the lords: for that the protector had abused both the kings maiestie, and the whole realme, and without that he were taken from the king, made to vnderstand his follie, this realme was in a great hazard: and therefore required that the citizens would willingly assent to aid the lords with five hundred men: herevnto was none other answer made but silence. But the recorder (who at that time was a worthy gentleman called maister Wyke) still cried vpon them for answer.

At the last stepped by a wise and good citizen, named (as maister Fox saith) George Stablow, and said thus. In this case it is good for vs to thinke of things past to avoid the danger of things to come. I remember (saith he) in a storie written in Fabians chronicle, of the warre betwene the king and his barons, which was in the time of king Henrie the third, and the same time the barons (as our lords do now) commanded aid of the maior and citie of London, and that in a rightfull cause for the common weale, which was for the execution of diuerse good lawes, wherevnto the king before had given his consent, and after would not suffer them to take place, and the citie did aid the lords. Now it came to an open battell, wherein the lords prevailed, and took the king and his sonne prisoners, and vpon certaine conditions the lords restored againe the king and his sonne to their liberties. And among all other conditions, this was one, that the king should not onlie grant his pardon to the lords, but also to the citizens of London, which was granted, yea and the same ratified by act of parlement. But what followed?

Was it forgotten? No surely, nor yet forgotten during the kings life. The liberties of the citie were taken away, strangers appointed to be our heads and gouernours, the citizens given awaye bodie and goods, and from one persecution to another were most miserably afflicted: such it is to enter into the wrath of a prince, as Salomon saith; The wrath and indignation of a prince is death. Wherefore for so much as this aid is required of the kings maiestie, whose voice we ought to hearken vnto (for he is our high shepheard) rather than vnto the lords: and yet I would not wish the lords to be clearlie shaken off, but that they with vs, and we with them may loine in suite, and make our most humble petition to the kings maiestie, that it would please his highnesse, to heare such complaint against the gouernement of the lord protector as may be iustlie alledged and proved. And I doubt not but this matter will be so pacified, that neither shall the king nor yet the lords haue cause to seeke for further aid, neither we to offend any of them both. After this tale the commons staid, and the lord maior and his brethren for that time brake vp, and afterward communed with the lords.

The lords sat the next daie in counsell in the Star chamber, and from thence they sent sir Philip Hobbie with their letters of credence to the kings maiestie, beseeching his highnesse to giue credit to that which the said Philip should declare vnto his maiestie in their names: the king gaue him libertie to speake, and most gentlie heard all that he had to saie. And truly he did so wisely declare his message, and so grauely told his tale in the name of the lords, yea therewithall so vehementlie and grauenously against the protector, who was also there present by the king, that in the end, the lord protector was commanded from the kings presence, and shortly was committed to ward in a tower within the castell of Windsoze called Beauchamps tower. And sone after were staied sir Thomas Smith, sir Michaell Stanhope, and sir John Thyn knights, maister Challeie, maister Fisher, Maister of the priuie chamber, Craie of Reading, and diuers other gentlemen that attended vpon the lord protector. And the same daie the lords of the counsell came to Windsoze to the king, and the next daie they brought from thence the lord protector, and the other that were there staied, and conueied them through the citie of London, with as much wonderment as might be, vnto the tower, where they remained prisoners.

Touching the manner of the dukes coming to the tower from Windsoze, I find that it was on the fourteenth of October in the after none, at which time he was brought on horsebacke through Holburne, in at Newgate, and so to the tower of London, accompanied with diuerse lords and gentlemen with three hundred horse: the lord maior, sir Raife Warren, sir John Gresham, maister recorder, sir William Locke, and both the shiriffes, and other knights sitting on their horses against Soper lane, with all the officers with halberds, and from Holburne bridge to the tower, certeine aldermen or their deputies on horsebacke in euerie street, with a number of householders standing with billes as he passed. Shortly after the lords restored to the tower, and there charged the protector with sundrie articles, as followeth.

Articles objected against the lord protector.

In primis, you took vpon you the office of a protector and gouernour, vpon condition, expresselie and speciallie, that you would do nothing in the kings affaires publicke or priuatlie, but by the assent of the late kings executors.

2 Also you, contrarie to the said condition, of your owne authoritie, did staie and let iustice, and subuerted the lawes, as well by your letters as by your commandements.

3 Also you caused diuerse persons, being arrested and imprisoned for treason, murder, manslaughter and felonie, to be discharged and set at large, against the kings lawes and statutes of this realme.

4 Also you haue made and ordeined lieutenants for the kings armies, and other weightie affaires vnder your owne writing and seale.

5 Also you haue communed with the ambassadors of other realmes, discourting alone with them in the weightie causes of this realme.

6 Also you haue sometime rebuked, checked and taunted, as well priuatlie as openlie, diuerse of the kings most honorable counsellors, for shewing and declaring their aduises and opinions against your purposes in the kings weightie affaires, sateing sometimes to them, that you need not to open matters vnto them, and would therefore be otherwise aduised: and that you would, if they were not agreeable to your opinion, put them out, and take other at your pleasure.

7 Also you had and held against the law in your owne house, a court of requests, and thereby did in force diuerse the kings subiects to answer for their free holds and goods, and determined the same to the subuer-subuersion of the same lawes.

8 Also you being no officer, without the aduise of the counsell, or the more part of them, did dispose of the offices of the kings gift for monie, and granted leases and wards of the kings, and gaue presentations to the kings benefices and bishopricks, hauing no authoritie so to do. And further, you did meddle with the selling of the kings lands.

9 Also you commanded multiplication and alteration to be practised to abuse the kings coine.

10 Also you caused a proclamation to be made concerning inclosures, whereby the common people haue made diuerse insurrections, and leuied open war, and distressed and spoiled diuerse of the kings subiects, which proclamation went forth against the will of the whole counsell.

11 Also you haue caused a commission with certaine articles thereunto annexed, to be made out concerning inclosures of commons, high wales, decaying of cottages, and diuerse other things, giuing the commissioners authoritie to heare and determine the same causes, to the subuersion of the lawes and statutes of this realme: whereby much sedition, insurrection, and rebellion haue risen and growne among the kings subiects.

12 Also you haue suffered the rebels and traitors to assemble and to lie in campe and armoz against the king, his nobles, and gentlemen, without anie speedie subduing or repressing of them.

13 Also you did comfort and encourage diuerse of the said rebels, by giuing of them diuerse sums of your owne monie, and by promising to diuerse of them, fees, rewards, and seruices.

14 Also you in fauor of the said rebels did against the lawes cause a proclamation to be made, that none of the said rebels and traitors should be sued or vexed by anie person, for anie their offenses in the said rebellion, to the cleare subuersion of the same lawes.

15 Also you haue said in time of the rebellion, that you liked well the doings and proceedings of the said rebels and traitors, and said that the countenance of the gentlemen gaue occasion to the common people to rise: saying also, that better it is for the commons to die, than perish for lacke of liuing.

16 Also you said that the lords of the parlement were loth to incline themselves to reformation of inclosures and other things: therefore the people had good cause to reforme the things themselves.

17 Also you after the report and declaration of the defaults and lacks reported to you by such as did surueie Bullongne and the peeces there, would neuer amend the same defaults.

18 Also you would not suffer the peeces beyond the seas, called Pewbawen and Blacknesse, to be furnished with men and vittels; although you were aduertised of the defaults therein by the capitaine of the same peeces and others, and were thereto aduertised by the kings counsell: whereby the French king being the kings open enemy, was encouraged and comforted to win the said peeces, to the kings great losse, and dishonour of his realme.

19 Also you declared and published vnrulie, as well to the kings maiestie, as other the yong lords attendant vpon his graces person, that the lords of the counsell at London minded to destroye the king, and you required the king neuer to forget it, but to reuenge it: and likewise you required the yong lords to put the king in remembrance thereof, to the intent to make sedition & discord betwene the king and his lords.

20 Also where the kings maiestie plesed counsell, of their loue and zeale that they did beare vnto the king and his realme, did consult at London to haue communed with you, to the intent to moue you charitable to amend your doings and misgouernment: you hearing of the said assemble, did cause to be declared by letters in diuerse places the said lords to be high traitors to the king, to the great disturbance of the realme.

And thus much for these troubles of the lord protector, and articles against him obiected; to the end (as was doubted) that the same should haue cost him his life. But such was the pleasure of almighty God, disposing mens hearts as seemeth to him best, that at length, to wit, the first of February next, he was deliuered; and that night he supped at sir John Poynt one of the shiriffes of London, also the proclamation before set forth against him was reuoked & called in. And thus being againe restored, though not to his former office, yet vnto libertie, he continued therein for the space of two yeares and two daies, till new troubles (as after shall appeare) chanced to him, which as they were too heauie for him either to cast off, or carrie awaie; so were his lovers more readie to aggravate his burthen, than willing to ease him anie waie of the weight. So that this his exaltation & raising to dignitie, in respect of the short continuance thereof, as also for the enuie wherewith it was assailed, had bene better not to haue happened, than with such infelicite in so short a time to haue ended. But this fall from honor & aduancement with losse of life (than the which nothing more precious, nothing more delicious) grieved him the lesse: because he might perceiue (as some suspected) that rather of enuie than otherwise (reseruing the course of Gods iudgement and vengeance to the secrecie of his owne counsels) the same was deuised, persecuted, & finallye practised;

¶ The seventeenth of October, king Edward came from Hampton court to his place in Southwiche, and there dined, and after dinner he made maister Poynt one of the shiriffes knight, and then rode thorough the citie to Westminster. The lord maior of London for this yeare named sir Woland Hill, was a man of great charitie and compassion, euent and effectuell testimonies whereof he hath left in the world; some of whose good deeds partlie in his remembrance & partlie for others example are veredie recorded. This man caused to be made a causeie, commonlie called Duerlane pauement in the high waie from Storie to Pantwith, in length foure miles, for horse and man, with diuerse lanes on both sides the same causeie. He caused likewise a causeie to be made from Dunchurch to Branzen in Warwickshire, more than two miles of length, and gaue twentie pounds in monie towards the making of Hopton bridge, three miles from Countreie. He made the high waie to Kilborne nere to London. He made foure bridges, two of them of stone, containing eightene arches in them both, the one ouer the riuer of Senerne, called Achamburidge; the other Ternebridge, for that the water of Terne runneth vnder it; the other two of timber at Stoke, and built a good part of Stoke church. He builded one notable free schole at Wraiton in Shropshire, with maister and other, and sufficient stipends for them both, besides convenient lodgings for the same. He also purchased a free faire to the said towne, with a free market weeklie, & also a free market for cattell euerie

But now to returne to other doings. Whilste these huris and tumults were in hand, to the danger of the whole state, the wars against the Scots were nothing followed, according to the former purposed meaning of the counsell: so that it seemed necessarie to giue ouer the keeping of Haddington, the same being in deed more chargeable (as was thought) than profitable, sith the garrison there could not be bitted but with a great power to conduct the cariages in safetie, the enimies being still readie to take their advantage to distresse them upon anie opportunitie offered. It was therefore resolved, that the earle of Rutland should go thither to see the fortifications raised, and to conduct from thence the men & ordinance in safetie home into England. Whereupon the said earle with the Almans, and other souldiours then remaining on the borders, marched thither, and caused the bulwarks, rampiers, and trenches to be raised and filled flat with the ground, and bringing from thence all the men, artillerie and munition, bag and baggage returned vnto Barwicke without encounter, in peaceable and quiet maner.

Shortlie after this, the kings maiestie called his high court of parlement, which began at Westminster, the foure and twentieth daie of Nouember in this third yeare of his reigne, and there continued the same vntill the first daie of Februarie next following, which was in the beginning of the fourth yeare of his reigne. And among other things there enacted and concluded, one statute was made for the punishment of rebels, and vnlawfull assemblies: the which law was made by occasion of the late rebellion that happened in manner through the realme the yeare passed, & was not thought nor meant to haue touched anie noble man, speciallie such as the duke of Summerset was, which after (as it shall appeare) it did, and by that statute he was condemned within two yeares next after.

The nineteenth of Januarie, sir John Russell lord priue seale, was created earle of Bedford: and lord saint John lord great maister, was created earle of Wilshire: and sir William Paget, comptroller of the kings house, was made lord Paget. On the same daie at night, were murdered by saint Pauls church against the kings head without Petergate of London two capteins, that had serued the king of Bullongne and else-where, the one was sir Peter Gambo, the other Filicirga. Which murder was committed by Charles Canaro a Flemming, who came poss from Barwicke to do that act. On the morrow, he with three of his companie was taken in Smithfield by the lord Paget, and sent to Petergate, and the foure and twentieth of Januarie they were all foure, Charles Canaro, Balthasar Canaro, Nicholas Wisalneron, and Francis Deualasco, had in a cart to Smithfield. And by the waie at the place where the murder was done, Charles Canaro had his right hand striken off on the cart wheele, and then all hanged in Smithfield; who being exhorted to reconcile himselfe to God and the world by confessing his fault, by repenting himselfe of the offense, and asking forgiveness, that he might with a disburthened conscience resigne his soule into the hands of God, obstinatie and desperatie answered, that he would neuer repent him of the deed.]

About the same time, monsieur de Thermes that succeeded monsieur de Wesse in gouernement as general of the French forces in Scotland, came before Broughthcrag, where he did so much by batterie & other kinds of inforcement, that giuing an assault both with his Frenchmen and certaine Scots joined with him, the twentieth of Februarie, the fort was entered by fire force, and all within it either taken or slaine. Sir John Lutterell gouernour of that peece remained prisoner amongst the Frenchmen. Moreover, now after the end of the parlement, the earle of Marlowe, hauing then highest authoritie, and the rest of the lords of the counsell, calling to remembrance how the last yeare in the time of rebellion, the French king had entered Bullongnois, and wonne diuerse of the English forts there, being of great importance for defense of the towne and countrie, the default whereof was imputed to the negligent gouernment of the lord protector: and for so much as they well vnderstood that the French king vpon further practise had placed a capteine called the Reingraue, with diuerse regiments of Almaine lancequenets, and certaine ensignes also of Frenchmen, to the number of foure or five thousand at the towne of Hoguison, being the midwaie betwene Bullongne and Calis, to the great perill and danger as well of the countie of Bullongnois, as also of Calis, Gulesnes, and all the low countrie.

The king therefore for the defense of the said frontiers, caused all the strangers which had serued that yeare against the rebels, being to the number of two thousand, to be transported ouer the sea to the marches of Calis. And now at Christmas last past, by order of the said earle, and of the counsellors aforesaid, Francis earle of Huntington, and sir Edward Hastings his brother, sir James Croft, sir Leonard Chamberleine, and diuerse other capteins and souldiers, to the number of three thousand, were set ouer to the marches of Calis, to ioine with the said strangers, minding with as conuenient speed as they might, to remoue the campe, and otherwile to annoie the French. But in the meane time through the diligent trauell of certaine persons, speciallie of one Guidotti an Italian, and a Florentine borne, there was a motion made for a treatie to be had by certaine commissioners, appointed betwixt the kings of England and France, for the conclusion of some peace, vpon such reasonable conditions and articles as might be thought expedient for the present time; and to stand with the honor and commoditie of both the princes.

This motion toke such effect, that about the seventh daie of Februarie, certaine commissioners, appointed for this treatie, that is to wit, John the earle of Bedford, the lord Paget, sir William Peter the kings chiefe secretarie, and sir John Mason, arrived at Calis: by reason of whose coming, the earle of Huntington, and the armie sent ouer before for the defense of the frontiers were countermanded from anie attempt, so that little or nothing was done in that voyage, sauing certaine skirmishes at diuerse times, not much materiall to be witten of. These commissioners being thus arrived, passed from Calis to Bullongne, there to meet with the commissioners appointed for the French king, where as a certaine house was newlie erected for the said treatie to be had, which was vpon the side of Bullongne haueu next to France, where after diuerse meetings & conferences of the commissioners of either partie, a finall peace was at last concluded betwixt both the realmes. But the chief among other things, for the restitution of Bullongne and Bullongnois to the Frenchmen, which were vpon certaine conditions following.

First, that the French king should yeeld and paie to the king of England a certaine summe of monie, and the same to be paid at two payments, as it was then agreed: and for the same summe the king of England should render the towne of Bullongne, Sir John Lutterell prisoner.

and all the forts thereto adjoining, which he then in-toied, with all such artillerie and munition as was there found at the taking of the same to the French king. And for the sure payment of the said sum, the French king sent into England for hostages and pledges, the counte de Anguien, Lewis the duke of Clansome his brother, the Viscount of Chartres, and the duke de Anmale and others. And on S. Parkes daie next following, being the five and twentieth daie of Aprill, about eight of the clocke in the morning, the Englishmen did deliver to the Frenchmen the possession of Bullongne, and the castles and forts in the countie of Bullognois, according to the agreements and articles of peace afore mentioned. And the fifteenth daie next following the French king entered into the said towne of Bullongne with trumpets blowne, & with all the roiall triumph that might be, where he offered one great image of silver of our ladie in the church there, which was called our ladie church: the which image he had caused speciallie to be made in the honoz of the said ladie, and caused the same to be set up in the place where the like image before did stand, the which before was taken awaie by the Englishmen at the winning of the towne.

¶ On Candlemasse daie, William lord S. John earle of Wiltshire, lord great maister, and president of the counsell, was made lord treasurer. John Dudleie earle of Warwicke, lord great chamberleine, was made lord great maister. William Parre marquess of Dorhampton, was made lord great cham-berleine. Lord Wentworth was made lord cham-berleine of the household. Sir Anthoine Wingfield capitaine of the gard, was made comptrollor of the kings house. And sir Thomas Warcie knight, was made vicechamberleine & capitaine of the gard. And the earle of Southhampton were put off the counsell, and commanded to keepe their houses in London.
¶ On the 10 of Februarie, one Will a Suffolke man was hanged and quartered at Tyburne, for moving a new rebellion in Suffolke and Essex. This time, the lord maioz of London and the aldermen purchased all the liberties of Southwiche, which were in the kings hands.]

¶ Some after the aforesaid agreement betwene England and France was concluded, upon the fore remembered capitulations, because of suspicion of displeasure and hatred that was thought to remaine betwene the earle of Warwicke and the duke of Summerfet, latelie before delivered out of the tower, a meane was found that their friendship should be renewed through alliance, and a marriage was concluded betwene the earle of Warwicks eldest sonne, and the duke of Summerfets eldest daughter: the which marriage was solemnized at Shene, the king being then present. After the solemnitie of this marriage, there appeared outwardlie to the world great love and friendship betwene the duke and the earle, but by reason of carietales and flatterers, the love continued not long, howbeit manie did verie earnestlie wish love and amitie to continue betwene them. ¶ About this time was a new rebellion in Kent, but it was soon suppressed, and certeine of the chiefe were apprehended and put to death, namelie Richard Lion, Goddard Cozrain, and Richard Ireland. This yeare was a parlement holden at Westminster, where among other things by the authoritie of the said parlement, priests children were made legitimate, and blurie for the loane of monie forbidden.]

¶ On wednesdaie in Whitsuneweke, at a court of aldermen kept at the Guildhall, sir John Alisse knight, and maister of Blackwell hall, was sworn alderman of the Bridge ward without, to have iurisdiction of the borough of Southwiche, and this was he the first alderman that ever was there, who made up the number of six and twentie aldermen of London, whereas before that time had bene but five and twentie. Trinitie tearme was adourned till spichaelmasse, for that the gentlemen should keepe the commons from commotion. The cleventh of June being S. Barnabies daie, was kept hollidaie all London over: and the same daie at night, the high altar in Paules church was pulled downe, and a table set where the altar stood, with a velle drowne beneath the steps; and on the sondaie next a communion was song at the same table; and shortly after all the altars in London were taken downe, and tables placed in their rooms. This yeare was no such watch at Whitsunmas as had bene accustomed.

The thirtieth of Julie Thomas lord Wriothesleie erle of Southampton, knight of the garter, and one of the executors to king Henrie the eight, deceased at Lincolne place in Holborne, and was buried in S. Andrewes church there. Sir Andrew Jude for this yeare maioz of London, and Skinner, erected one notable scholshole at Tunbridge in Kent, wherein he brought up and nourished in learning great store of youth, as well bred in that shire, as brought from other countries adjoining. A noble act and correspondent to those that have bene done by like worthifull men, and other in old time within the same cite of London. He also builded almshouse for six poore almshouse people, nigh to the parish church of saint Helens within Bishopsgate of London, & gave land to the companie of the skinners in the same cite, amounting to the value of threescore pounds three shillings eight pence the yeare: for the which they be bound to paie twentie pounds to the scholemaister, and eight pounds to the vther of his scholshole at Tunbridge yearelie for ever, and foure shillings the weeke to the six poore almshouse people at S. Helens aforesaid, eight pence the pace wekelie, and five and twentie shillings foure pence the yeare in coles amongst them for ever.]

About this time there was at Feuerham in Kent a gentleman named Arden, most cruellie murdered and slaine by the procurement of his owne wife.
The which murder, for the horriblenesse thereof, although otherwise it may seeme to be but a private matter, and therefore as it were impertinent to this historie, I have thought good to set it forth somewhat at large, having the instructions delivered to me by them, that have used some diligence to gather the true understanding of the circumstances. This Arden was a man of a tall and comelie personage, and matched in marriage with a gentlewoman, young, tall, and well favoured of shape and countenance, who chancing to fall in familiaritie with one apostle a tailor by occupation, a blacke swart man, servant to the lord Poorth, it happened this apostle upon some mislaking to fall out with hir: but the being desirous to be in favour with him againe, sent him a paire of silver dice by one Adam Foule dwelling at the fleure de lice in Feuerham.

After which he resorted to hir againe, and oftentimes laie in Ardens house: in somuch that within two yeares after, he obtained such favour at hir hands, that he laie with hir, or (as the y terme it) kept hir, in abusing hir bodie. And although (as it was said) Arden perceived right well their mutuall familiaritie to be much greater than their honestie, yet because he would not offend hir, and so lose the benefit which he hoped to gaine at some of hir kents hands in bearing with hir lewenesse, which he might have lost if he should have fallen out with hir: he was contented to wink at hir filthie disorder, and both permitted, and also invited apostle verie often will shew you the cause. My maister yesternight did that he neuer did before: for after I was in bed, he rose up and shut the doores, and in the morning rated me for leauing them vnshut. And herewith Greene & blacke Will were pacified. Arden being redie to go home wards, his maid came to Greene & said; This night will my maister go downe. Whereupon it was agreed that blacke Will should kill him on Keinam downe. When maister Arden came to Rochester, his man still fearing that blacke Will would kill him with his maister, picked his horse of purpose, and made him to halt, to the end he might protrae the time, and tarie behind. His maister asked him why his horse halted, he said, I know not. Well (quoth his maister) when ye come at the smith here before (betwene Rochester and the hill fot ouer against Chetam) remove his shoe, and search him, and then come after me. So maister Arden rode on: and per he came at the place where blacke Will laie in wait for him, there ouertoke him diuerse gentlemen of his acquaintance, who kept him companie: so that blacke Will mist here also of his purpose.

Blacke will

After that maister Arden was come home, he sent (as he vsuallie did) his man to Sheppee to sir Thomas Cheinie, then lord warden of the cinque ports, about certeine businesse, and at his comming awaie, he had a letter deliuered sent by sir Thomas Cheinie to his maister. When he came home, his miste take the letter and kept it, willing his man to tell his maister, that he had a letter deliuered him by sir Thomas Cheinie, and that he had lost it; adding that he thought it best that his maister should go the next morning to sir Thomas, because he knew not the matter: he said he would, and therefore he willed his man to be stirring betimes. In this meane while, blacke Will, and one George Shakesbag his companion, were kept in a storehouse of sir Anthoine Agers at Dzeffon, by Greenes appointment: and thither came mistresse Arden to see him, bringing and sending him meat and drinke manie times. He therfore lurking there, and watching some opportunitie for his purpose, was willed in anie wise to be vp earlie in the morning, to lie in wait for maister Arden in a certeine brome close, betwixt Feuertham & the ferrie (which close he must needs passe) there to do his feat. Now blacke Will stirred in the morning betimes, but mist the waie, & taried in a wrong place.

Note here the force of feare
and a troubled

Maister Arden & his man comming on their waie earlie in the morning towards Honnelan, where sir Thomas Cheinie laie: as they were almost come to the brome close, his man alwaies fearing that blacke Will would kill him with his maister, feined that he had lost his purse; Why said his maister, thou folly knave, couldst thou not looke to thy purse but lose it? What was in it? Whye pounds said he. Why then go thy waies backe againe like a knave (said his maister) and seeke it, for being so earlie as it is, there is no man stirring, and therefore thou maist be sure to find it, and then conie and ouertake me at the ferrie. But neuerthelesse, by reason that blacke Will lost his waie, maister Arden escaped yet once againe.
At that time, blacke Will yet thought he should haue bene sure to haue met him homeward: but whether that some of the lord wardens men accompanied him backe to Feuertham, or that being in doubt, for that it was late to go through the brome close, and therefore toke another waie, blacke Will was disappointed then also.

Blacke will

Arden by the conspirators.

But now saint Valentines faire being at hand, the conspirators thought to dispatch their diuclish intention at that time. Posbie minded to picke some quarrell to maister Arden at the faire to fight with him; for he said he could not find in his heart to mur-ther a gentleman in that soft as his wife wished: although he had made a solemne promise to him, and he againe to him, to be in all points as man and wife together, and thereupon they both receiued the sacrament on a sundaie at London, openlie in a church there. But this deuise to fight with him would not serue, for maister Arden both then and at other times had bene greatlie prouoked by Posbie to fight with him, but he would not. Now Posbie had a sister that dwelt in a tenement of maister Ardens nere to his house in Feuertham: and on the faire euen, blacke Will was sent for to come thither, and Greene bringing him thither, met there with mistresse Arden, accompanied with Michaelel her man, and one of her maids. There were also Posbie and George Shakes-bag, and there they deuised to haue killed him in maner as after wards he was. But yet Posbie at the first would not agree to that cowardlie murdering of him, but in a furie frowning awaie, and went by the abbie street toward the holwer be lice, the house of the aforesaid Adam Foule, where he did often hoel. But before he came thither now at this time, a messenger ouertoke him, that was sent from mi-stres Arden, desiring him of all lones to come backe againe to helpe to accomplish the mater he knew of.

Whereupon he returned to his againe, and at his com-ming backe, he fell downe upon his knees to him, and besought him to go through with the matter, as if he loved him he would be content to do, sith as he had diuerse times told him, he needed not to doubt, for there was not anie that would care for his death, nor make anie great inquirie for them that should dispatch him.

Thus the being earnest with him, at length he was contented to agree vnto that horrible deuise, and thereupon they conueied blacke Will into maister Ardens house, putting him into a closet at the end of his parlour. Before this, they had sent out of the house all the seruants, those excepted which were pruiue to the deuised murder. Then went Posbie to the doze, and there stood in a night gowne of silke gir-ded about him, and this was betwixt six and seven of the clocke at night. Maister Arden hauing bene at a neighbors house of his, named Dumphin, & hauing cleared certeine reckonings betwixt them, came home: and finding Posbie standing at the doze, asked him if it were supper time: I thinke not (quoth Posbie) it is not yet readie. Then let vs go and plaie a game at the tables in the meane season, said maister Arden. And so they went straight into the parlor: and as they came by through the hall, his wife was walking there, and maister Arden said; How now mistresse Ales? But she made small answer to him.
In the meane time one cheined the tickert doze of the entrie. When they came into the parlor, Posbie sat downe on the bench, hauing his face toward the place where blacke Will stood. When Michaelel maister Ardens man stood at his masters backe, holding a candle in his hand, to shadow blacke Will, that Arden might by no meanes perceiue him comming forth. In their plate Posbie said thus (which seemed to be the watchword for blacke Wills comming forth) Now mate I take you sir if I will. Take me (quoth maister Arden) which waie? With that blacke Will stepped forth, and cast a towell about his necke, so to stop his breath and strangle him. Then Posbie hauing at his girdle a pressing iron of fourteen pounds weight, stroke him on the hed with the same, so that he fell downe, and gaue a great grone, insa-much that they thought he had bene killed.

led him out of his hand, laid him along, toke the monie out of his purse, and the rings from his fingers, and then comming out of the counting house, said; Now the feat is done, give me my monie. So mistres Arden gaue him ten pounds: and he comming to Greene, had a horse of him, and so rode his waies. After that blacke Will was gone, mistres Arden came into the counting house, and with a knife gaue him seven or eight picks into the brest. Then they made cleane the parlor, toke a clout, and wiped where it was bloudie, and strewed againe the rushes that were thuffed with strugling, and cast the clout with which they wiped the blood, and the knife that was bloudie, wherewith she had wounded hir husband, into a tub by the wel side; where afterwards both the same clout and knife were found. Thus this wicked woman, with hir complices, most shamefullie murdered hir owne husband, who most entirly loved hir all his life time. When she sent for two Londoners to supper, the one named Dune, and the other Cole, that were grocers, which before the murder was committed, were bidden to supper. When they came, she said: I maruell where maister Arden is; he will not tarie for him, come ye and sit downe, for he will not be long. Then Possibies sister was sent for, she came and sat downe, and so they were merie.

After supper, mistres Arden caused hir daughter to plaie on the virginals, and they danc'd, and she with them, and so seemed to protract time as it were, till maister Arden should come, and she said, I maruell where he is so long; well, he will come anon I am sure, I praie you in the meane while let vs plaie a game at the tables. But the Londoners said, they must go to their holls house, or else they should be shut out at doores, and so taking their leave, departed. When they were gone, the seruants that were not yssue to the murder, were sent abroad into the towne, some to seeke their maister, and some of other errands, all fauing Michaell and a maid, Possibies sister, and one of mistres Ardens owne daughters. Then they toke the dead bodie, and caried it out, to laie it in a field next to the church-yard, and soing to his garden wall, through the which he went to the church. In the meane time it began to snow, and when they came to the garden gate, they remembred that they had forgotten the keye, and one went in for it, and finding it, at length brought it, opened the gate, and caried the corps into the same field, as if were ten paces from the garden gate, and laid him downe on his backe streight in his night gowne, with his slippers on: and betwene one of his slippers and his foot, a long rush or two remained. When they had thus laid him downe, they returned the same way they came through the garden into the house.

They being returned thus backe againe into the house, the doores were opened, and the seruants returned home that had bene sent abroad: and being now verie late, she sent forth hir folks againe to make inqurie for him in diuerse places; namely, among the best in the towne where he was wont to be, who made answer, that they could tell nothing of him. When she began to make an outcrie, and said; Fewer woman had such neighbors as I haue, and herewith wept: in somuch that hir neighbors came in, and found hir making great lamentation, pretending to maruell what was become of hir husband. Whereupon, the maior and others came to make search for him. The satire was wont to be kept partie in the towne, and partie in the abbey; but Arden for his owne priuat lucre & couetous gaine had this present yeare procured it to be wholy kept within the abbey ground which he had purchased; & so reaping all the gaines to himselfe, and bereauing the towne of that portion which was wont to come to the inhabitants, got manie a bitter curse. The maior going about the satire in this search, at length came to the ground where Arden laie: and as it happened, Dune the groser getting sight of him, first said; Staie, for me thinke I see one lie here. And so they looking and beholding the bodie, found that it was maister Arden, lieng there throughlie dead, and viewing diligentlie the maner of his bodie & hurts, found the rushes sticking in his slippers, and marking further, espied certeine footsteps, by reason of the snow, betwixt the place where he laie, and the garden doze.

Then the maior commanded euerie man to staie, and herewith appointed some to go about, & to come in at the inner side of the house through the garden as the waie laie, to the place where maister Ardens dead bodie did lie; who all the waie as they came, perceived footings still before them in the snow: and so it appeared plainlie that he was brought along that waie from the house through the garden, and so into the field where he laie. Then the maior and his companie that were with him went into the house, and knowing hir euill demeanour in times past, examined hir of the matter: but she desired them and said, I would you should know I am no such woman. Then they examined hir seruants, and in the examination, by reason of a peece of his heare and blood found nere to the house in the waie, by the which they caried him forth, and likewise by the knife with which she had thrust him into the brest, and the clout wherewith they wiped the blood awaie which they found in the tub, into the which the same were thrown; they all confessed the matter, and hir selfe beholding hir husbands blood, said; Oh the blood of God helpe, for this blood haue I shed.

Then were they all attached, and committed to prison, and the maior with others went presentlie to the flower de lice, where they found Possibie in bed: and as they came towards him, they espied his hose and purse stained with some of maister Ardens blood. And when he asked what they meant by their comming in such sort, they said; See, here ye may vnderstand wherefore, by these tokens, shewing him the blood on his hose and purse. Then he confessed the deed, and so he and all the other that had conspired the murder, were apprehended and laid in prison, except Greene, blacke Will, and the painter, which painter and George Shakebag, that was also fled before, were neuer heard of. Whortlie were the sessions kept at Feuerham, where all the prisoners were acceigned and condemned. And thereupon being examined whether they had anie other complices, mistres Arden accused Bradshaw, upon occasion of the letter sent by Greene from Graues end, (as before ye haue heard) which words had none other meaning, but onelie by Bradshaws describing of blacke Wills qualities; Greene iudged him a mate instrument for the erection of their pretended murder. Whereto notwithstanding (as Greene confessed at his death certeine yeares after) this Bradshaw was neuer made priuie; howbeit he was vpon this accusation of mistres Arden, immediately sent for to the sessions, and indicted, and declaration made against him, as a procurer of blacke Will to kill maister Arden, which proceeded wholy by misunderstanding of the words contained in the letter which he brought from Greene.

Then he desired to talke with the persons condemned, and his request was granted. He therefore demanded of them if they knew him, or ever had anie conuersation with him, & they all said no. When the letter being shewed and read, he declared the borie truth of the matter, and vpon what occasion he told Cræne of blacke Will: neuerthelesse, he was condemned, and suffered. These condemned per- sons were diuerlie executed in sundrie places, for Michaell maister Ardens man was hanged in chaines at Feuertham, and one of the maids was burnt there, pitifullie bewailing hir case, and cried out on hir mistres that had brought hir to this end, for the which she would neuer forgive hir. Posbie & his sister were hanged in Smithfield at London; mistres Arden was burned at Canturburie the foure and twentieth of March. Cræne came againe certeine yeares after, was apprehended, condem- ned, & hanged in chaines in the high waie betwixt Wppring & Boughton against Feuertham; blacke Will was burnt on a scaffold at flashing in Ze- land. Adam Foule that dwelt at the house de lice in Feuertham was brought into trouble about this matter, and caried vpon to London, with his legs bound vnder the horse bellie, and committed to pri- son in the Sparthallie: for that Posbie was heard to saie; Had it not bene for Adam Foule, I had not come to this trouble: meaning that the bringing of the siluer dice for a token to him from mistres Ar- den, as ye haue heard, occasioned him to renew fa- miliaritie with hir againe. But when the matter was thoughtlie ripped vp, & that Posbie had cleared him, protesting that he was neuer of knowledge in anie behalfe to the murder, the mans innocencie preferred him.

This one thing seemeth verie strange and nota- ble, touching maister Arden, that in the place where he was laid, being dead, all the propoition of his bo- die might be seene two yeares after and more, so plaine as could be, for the grasse did not grow where his bodie had touched: but betwene his legs, be- twene his armes, and about the hollownesse of his necke, and round about his bodie, and where his legs, armes, head, or anie other part of his bodie had touched, no grasse growed at all of all that time. So that manie strangers came in that meane time, be- side the towne men, to see the print of his bodie there on the ground in that field. Which field he had (as some haue reported) most cruellie taken from a woman, that had bene a widow to one Cooke, and after married to one Richard Kead a mariner, to the great hinderance of hir and hir husband the said Kead: for they had long inioied it by a lease, which they had of it for manie yeares, not then expired: neuerthelesse, he got it from them. For the which, the said Keads wife not onelie exclaimed against him, in sheading manie a salt teare, but also cursed him most bitterlie euen to his face, wishing manie a vengeance to light vpon him, and that all the world might wonder on him. Which was thought then to come to passe, when he was thus murdered, and laie in that field from midnight till the morning: and so all that daie, being the faire daie till night, all the which daie there were manie hundreds of people came wondering about him. And thus far touching this horrible and heinous murder of maister Arden. To returne then where we left.

About this time the kings maiestie calling his high court of parliament, held the same at West- minster the three and twentieth daie of Januarie, in this fift yeare of his reigne, and there continued it, untill the fiftenth daie of Aprill in the first yeare of his said reigne. In this parlement the booke of com- mon praier, which in some part had bene corrected and amended, was newlie confirmed & established. ¶ In the end of this parlement, namelie the fiftenth of Aprill the infectious sweating sickness began at Shrewesburie, which ended not in the north part of England untill the end of September. In this space what number died, it cannot be well accounted: but certeine it is, that in London in few daies nine hundred and sixtie gaue vp the ghost. It began in London the ninth of Iulie, and the twelfth of Iulie it was most vehement: which was so terrible, that people being in best helth, were suddentlie taken, and dead in foure and twentieth houres, and twelue, or lesse, for lacke of skill in guiding them in their sweat. And it is to be noted, that this mortalitie fell chiefly: 10 or rather vpon men, and those also of the best age, as betwene thirtie & forty yeares. The speedie riddance of life procured by this sickness, did so terrifie people of all sorts, that such as could make thist, either with monie or frendship, changed their soile, and leauing places of concourse, betoke them (for the time) to a- bodes, though not altogether solitarie, yet lesse frequented: to conclude, manifold meanes were made for safetie of life. The first weeke died in Lon- don eight hundred persons.

The manner of this sweat was such, that if men did take anie cold outwardlie, it stroke the sweat in, and immediatlie killed them. If they were suffered to sleepe, commonlie they swoned in their sleepe and departed, or else died immediat- lie vpon their waking. But the waie to escape dan- ger was close keeping moderatlie with some ale and a little drinke, and the same to be possed ale, and so to keepe them thirtie houres, & then was the dan- ger past; but beware of sudden cold. Before men had learned the manner of keeping, an infinit num- ber perished. This disease at that time followed 20 Englishmen & none other nation; for in Antwerpe and other countries, our Englishmen being there a- mongst diuerse other nations, onelie our English- men were sicke thereof, and none other persons. The consideration of which thing made this nation much afraid thereof, who for the time began to repent and giue almes, and to remember God from whom that plague might well seme to be sent among vs. But as the disease in time ceased, so our deuotion in that time decayed. At this time also the king with the ad- 40 uise of his priuite counsell, and hauing also great conference with merchants and others, perceiuing that by such coins and copper monies, as had bene coined in the time of the king his father, and now were commonlie currant in the realme; and in deed a great number of them not worth halfe the value that they were currant at, to the great dishonor of the kings maiestie & the realme, and to the deceit & 50 no little hinderance of all the kings maiesties good subiects, did now purpose not onelie the abasing of the said copper monies, but also meant wholie to re- duce them into bullion, to the intent to deliuer fine and good monies for them. And therefore in the mo- neth of Iulie by his graces proclamation, he abased the peece of twelue pence, commonlie called a tes- ton vnto nine pence, and the peece of foure pence vnto thre pence. And in August next following, the peece of nine pence was abased to six pence, and the peece of thre pence vnto two pence, and the pennie 60 to an halfe pennie.

On the eleuenth daie of October, there was a great creation of dukes and earles, as the lord mar- quesse Dorset was created duke of Suffolke, the earle of Warwicke made duke of Northumberland, and the earle of Wiltshire made marquesse of Wilt- chester, & sir William Herbert maister of the hoise; he also made William Cicill his secretarie knight, 70 maister John Cheke one of his scholemaisters knight, maister Henrie Dudlie knight, & maister Henrie Heuill knight. The sixteenth daie of the said moneth being fridaie, the duke of Summerlet was againe apprehended, & his wife also, & committed to the tower; with him also were committed sir Michaele Stanhope,

Stanhope, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir Kase Wane, Sir Spiles Partridge & other for suspicion of treason and felonie, whereof they were all thought after indicted.
And so standing indicted, the second daie of December next following, the said duke was brought out of the tower of London with the ar of the tower borne before him, with a great number of billes, gleaves, halberds & pollaxes attending upon him, & so came into Westminster hall, where was made in the middle of the hall a new scaffold, where all the lords of the kings counsell sate as his iudges: and there was he arraigned and charged with manie articles both of felonie and treason. And when after much mild speech he had answered not guiltie, he in all humble manner put himselfe to be tried by his peeres: who after long consultation among themselves, gave their verdit that he was not guiltie of the treason, but of the felonie. The people there present (which was a great number) hearing the lords saie not guiltie, which was to the treason, thinking most certeinlie that he was cleerlie acquitted; and chiefly for that immediatlie upon the pronouncing of those words, he that carried the ar of the tower departed with the ar, they made such an outcrie and ioie, as the like hath not bene heard. Which was an evident declaration of their good willes and hartie favors unto him, whose life they greatlie desired to have saved, for that he had deserved right well of most (though the good gentleman had some privat e-nities) and had bene as a man maie iustlie saie:

Solamen magnum patrie, solamen amicis.

But neuertheless, he was condemned to the death, whereof shortly after he taised. The felonie that he was condemned of, was upon the statute made the last yeare against rebelles, and unlawfull assemblies, wherein amongst other things is one branch, that whosoever shall procure the death of anie counsellor, that euerie such attempt or procurement shall be felonie. And by force of that statute, the duke of Sommerfet, being accompanied with cer-teine others, was charged that he purposed and attempted the death of the duke of Northumberland, the lord marquisse, the lord of Denbroke, and others of the priue counsell, which by statute was felonie.

After the duke was thus condemned, he was againe returned to the tower, and landed at the crane of the vinetree, and so passed through London, where were both exclamations: the one cried for ioie that he was acquitted, the other cried out that he was condemned. But howsoever they cried, he was convicted to the tower of London, where he remained until the two and twentieth daie of Januarie next following. The duke being condemned (as is aforesaid) the people spake diuerslie, and murmured against the duke of Northumberland, and against some other of the lords, for the condemnation of the said duke: and also (as the common fame went) the kings maiestie toke it not in good part. Wherefore as well to remove fond talke out of mens mouths, as also to recreate and refresh the troubled spirits of the young king; who (as saith Grafton) seemed to take the trouble of his uncle somewhat heavilie: it was devised, that the feast of Christs nativitie, com-monlie called Christmasse then at hand, should be solemnlie kept at Greenwich with open household, and franke resort to court (which is called keeping of the hall) what time of old ordinarie course there is alwaies one appointed to make sport in the office, called commonlie lord of misrule: whose office is not unknowne to such as haue bene brought up in noble mens houses, and among great house-keepers, which be liberall feasting in that season. There was therefore by order of the counsell, a wise gentleman & learned named George Ferrers, appointed to that office for this yeare; who being of better credit & estimation than commonlie his predecessors had bene before, received all his commissions and warrants by the name of the maister of the kings pastimes: Which gentleman so well supplied his office, both in the way of sundrie sights and deuises of rare inuentions, and in act of diuerse interludes, and matters of pastime played by persons, as not onelie satisfied the common sort, but also were verie well liked and allowed by the counsell, and other of skill in the like pastimes: but best of all by the young king himselfe, as appeared by his princelie liberalitie in rewarding that seruice.

On mondaie the fourth of Januarie, the said lord of merie disposits came by water to London, and landed at the tower wharffe, entered the tower, and then rode through tower street, where he was received by Maule lord of misrule to John Pattard one of the shiriffes of London, and so conducted through the citie with a great compaign of young lords & gentlemen to the house of Sir George Warne lord maior, where he with the chefe of his companie dined, and after had a great banquet: and at his departure, the lord maior gaue him a standing cup with a couer of silver and guilt of the value of ten pounds for a reward, and also set a hogstied of wine, and a barrell of beere at his gate, for his traine that followed him. The residue of his gentlemen & ser-uants dined at other aldermens houses, and with the shiriffes, and then departed to the tower wharffe againe, & so to the court by water, to the great commendation of the maior and aldermen, and highlie accepted of the king and counsell.]

This Christmas being thus passed and spent with much mirth and pastime, wherewith the minds and eares of murmurers were metlie well appeased, according to a former determination as the sequele shewed: it was thought now good to proceed to the execution of the iudgement given against the duke of Sommerfet, touching his consulation & atteindoz of the felonie before mentioned. Whereupon, the two and twentieth daie of Januarie, then next following being fridaie, he was brought out of the tower, and according to the manner, deliuered to the shiriffes of London; and so with a great compa-nie of the gard & others with weapons, was brought to the scaffold where he should suffer, without changing either voice or countenance, other than he was accustomed to use at other times.

The same morning earelie, the constables of e-uerie ward in London (according to a precept directed from the counsell to the maior) stricke charged euerie household of the same citie, not to depart anie of them out of their houses, before ten of the clocke of that daie: meaning thereby to restraine the great number of people that otherwise were like to haue ben at the said execution. Notwithstanding, by seauen of the clocke, the tower hill was covered with a great multitude, repairing from all parts of the ci-tie, as well as out of the suburbs. And before eight of the clocke, the duke was brought to the scaffold, inclosed with the kings gard, the shiriffes officers, the warders of the tower, & other with halberds: where as he nothing changing neither voice or countenance, but in a manner with the same gesture which he commonlie used at home, kneeling downe upon both his knees, and lifting up his hands, commended himselfe unto God. After he had ended a few short prayers, standing up againe, and turning himselfe toward the east side of the scaffold, nothing at all a-bash'd (as it seemed vnto those that stood by) heisset with the sight of the ar, neither yet of the hangman, nor of present death, but with the like alacritie and cheerfulness of mind and countenance as before times

times he was accustomed to heare the causes & supplications of other, & speciallie of the poore (towards whome as it were with a certeine fatherlie loue to his children he alwaies shewed himselfe most attentive) he uttered these wordes to the people.

The words of the duke of Summerfet at his death.

Derelie beloued friends, I am brought hither to suffer death, albeit I neuer offended against the king, neither by word nor deed, and haue bene alwaies as faithfull and true vnto this realme, as anie man hath bene. But forsomuch as I am by law condemned to die, I do acknowledge my selfe as well as others, to be subiect thereto. Wherefore to testifie mine obedience which I owe vnto the lawes, I am come hither to suffer death, wherevnto I willingly offer my selfe with most hartie thanks vnto God, that hath given me this time of repentance, who might thorough sudden death haue taken awaie my life, that I neither should haue acknowledged him nor my selfe.

Whereouer (derelie beloued friends) there is yet somewhat that I must put you in mind of, as touching christian religion, which so long as I was in authoritie, I alwaies diligentlie set forth, and furthered to my power. Neither do I repent me of my doings, but reioise therein, sith now the state of christian religion cometh most nere vnto the forme and order of the primitive church. Which thing I esteeme as a great benefit giuen of God, both to you and me, most hartlie exhorting you all, that this which is most purelie set forth vnto you, you will with like thankfulness accept and embrace, and set out the same in your living: which thing if you do not, without doubt, greater mischief and calamitie will follow.

When he had spoken these wordes, suddenlie there was a great noise heard, whereupon the people were straight dviuen into a great feare, few or none knowing the cause. Wherefore I thinke it good to write what I saw (saith John Stow) concerning that matter. The people of a certeine hamlet which were warned to be there by sauen of the clocke to giue their attendance on the lieutenant, now came thorough the posterne, and perceiving the duke to be already on the scaffold, the foremost began to run, crying to their fellows to follow fast after. Which suddenness of these men, being weaponed with bills and halberds, & this running caused the people which first saw them, to thinke some power had come to haue rescued the duke from execution, and therefore cried Awaie awaie. Whereupon the people ran, some one waie, some an other, manie fell into the tower ditch, and they which tarried, thought some pardon had bene brought: some said it thundered, some that the ground moued, but there was no such matter.

This amazement of the people is in other wordes recorded by John Fox in the storie of this dukes troubles & death: which because they be effectually I thinke good to interlace. When the duke had ended his speech (saith he) suddenlie there was a terrible noise heard:

whereupon there came a great feare on all men. This noise was as it had bene the noise of a great storme or tempest, which to some seemed to be heard from a boue: like as if a great deale of gunpowder being inclosed in an armorie, and hauing caught fire, had violently broken out. But to some againe it seemed as though it had bene a great multitude of hostes men running together, or comming vpon them; such a noise was then in the eares of all men, albeit they saw nothing. Whereby it happened, that all the people being amazed without any evident cause, and without any violence or stroke stricken, they ran awaie, some into the ditches and puddles, they ran into the houses thereabout. Other some being affraid with the horrour and noise, fell downe groveling vnto the ground with their pollaxes & halberds, and most part of them cried out: Iesus saue vs, Iesus saue vs. Those which tarried still in their places, for feare knew not where they were. And I myselfe which was there present among the rest, being also affraid in this hurle burle, stood still altogether amazed, looking when anie man would knocke me on the head. It happened here, as the euangelists write, it did to Christ, when the officers of the high priests & Phariseis comming with weapons to take him, being astonished ran backe, & fell to the ground.

In the meane time, whilst these things were thus in doing, the people by chance spied one sir Anthoie Wotton riding vnto the scaffold: which was the occasion of a new noise. For when they saw him comming, they coniectured that which was not true, but notwithstanding which they all wished for, that the king by that messenger had sent his uncle pardon: and therefore with great reioicing and casting by the caps, they cried out; Pardon, pardon is come: God saue the king. Thus this good duke, although he was destitute of all mans helpe, yet he saw before his departure, in how great loue and fauour he was with all men. And trulie I do not thinke, that in so great slaughter of dukes as hath bene in England within this few peares, there was so manie weeping eyes at one time: and not without cause. For all men did see in the decaye of this duke, the publike ruine of all England, except such as indeed perceiued nothing. The duke in the meane time standing still, both in the same place and mind wherein he was before, taking his cap which he held in his hand, made a signe vnto the people that they should keepe themselves quiet: which thing being done, & silence obtained, he spake to them the second time in this maner.

The second speech of the duke of Summerfet to the people.

Derelie beloued friends, there is no such matter in hand, as you bainlie hope or beleue. It sameth thus good to almighty God, whose ordinance it is meet & necessarie that we be all obedient vnto. Wherefore I praie you all to be quiet, and without tumult: for I am euen now quiet, and let vs loine in praier vnto the Lord, for the preservation of our noble king, vnto whose maiestie I wish continually health, with all felicitie and abundance & all manner of prosperous successe: wherevnto the people cried out, Amen. Whereouer, I wish vnto all his counsellors the grace and fauour of God, whereby they may rule althings bprightlie with iustice, vnto whome I exhort you all in the Lord to shew your selues obedient, the which is also also verie necessarie for you, vnder the paine of condemnation, and also most profitable for the preferuation and safegard of the kings maiestie. And forſomuch as heretofore I haue had oftentimes affaires with diuers men: that it is hard to please euerie man that hath bene offended or injured by me, I most humbly require and aske them forgiuenesse: but especiallie almightie God, whome thoroughout all my life I haue most grauously offended. And vnto all other, whatſoever they be that haue offended me, I doe with my whole heart forgiue them.

And once againe (dearely beloued in the Lord) I require that you will keepe your selues quiet and still, least thorough your tumult you might cause me to haue some trouble, which in this case would nothing at all profit me, neither be anie pleasure vnto you. For albeit the spirit be willing and readie, the flesh is fraile and wauering, and thorough your quietnesse I shall be much more the quieter: but if that you fall vnto tumult, it will be great trouble & no gaine at all vnto you. Whereouer, I desire you to beare me witnesse, that I die here in the faith of Iesus Christ, desiring you to helpe me with your prayers, that I maie perseuere constant in the same vnto my liues end.

When he turning himselfe about knéled downe vpon his knees, vnto whome doctor Cox, which was there present, to counsell and aduertise him, deliuered a certaine scroll into his hand, wherein was contained a briefe confession to God. Which being read, he stood vp againe on his feet, without anie trouble of mind as it appeared, and first had the thriffes farewell, then the lieutenant of the tower, & certaine other that were on the scaffold, taking them all by the hands. Then he gaue the executioner monie, which done, he put off his gowne, and kneeling downe againe in the strab, untied his shirt strings: and then the executioner comming to him, turned downe his collar round about his necke, and all other things which did let and hinder him. Then he couering his face with his owne handkerchiefe, lifting vp his eyes vnto heauen, where his onely hope remained, laid himselfe downe along, shewing no manner of trouble or feare; neither did his countenance change, but that before his eyes were couered there began to appeare a red colour of his cheeks.

Thus this most meke and gentle duke lieng along and looking for the stroke, because his doublet couered his necke he was commanded to rise vp and put it off: & then laieng himselfe downe againe vpon the blocke, and calling thise vpon the name of Iesus, saing: Lord Iesu saue me, as he was the third time repeating the same, euen as the name of Iesu was in uttering, in a moment he was bereft both of head and life; and slept in the Lord Iesus, being taken awaie from all the dangers and euils of this life, and resting now in the peace of God: in the preferment of whose truth and gospell he alwaies shewed himselfe an excellent instrument and member, and therefore hath receiued the reward of his labours. Thus gentle reader thou hast the true historie of this worthie and noble duke, and if anie man report it otherwise, let it be counted as a lie.]

This duke was in high fauour and estimation with king Henrie the eight, of whome he receiued suche high & great preferments, by reason that he the said king had married ladie Jane his sister, by whome he had issue king Edward the first. He was not onely courtous, wise and gentle, being daily attendant at the court; but forward and fortunate in seruice abroad, as may well appeare in his sundrie volages, both into France and Scotland. He was of nature verie gentle and pitifull, not blemished by any thing so much, as by the death of the admerall his naturall brother, which could not haue bene brought to passe in that sort, without his consent. But of this good duke (to let passe multitude of wordes) maister Fox hath written no lesse trulie than commendable, & no lesse commendable than deserueble, and no lesse deserueble than profitablie in his historie, whereto I refer the reader for further knowledge. Neuerthelesse of this vertuous duke by waie of application I saie as sometime one said (verie aptlie as some thinke) of the gracions ladie 'An Bullen, out of the ancient and moderne chronicles, wherin is set downe the yeare of Christ, and of the king in which they executed that function.

Vpon the death of this duke of Summerſet protector of England, it shall not be vnfitting in this place to set downe all the protectors (whereof I can as yet haue intelligence) and who haue bene gouernors, regents, gardians, or deputies of the realme, and of the kings person during his minoirtie and time of his insufficiencie of gouernement; or else of his absence being out of the realme: wherof I haue made an especiall title in my Pantographie of England, in which this my collection of the protectors, although perhaps I shall not set downe all (for Barnardus non videt omnia) yet it is better to haue halfe a loose than no head, knowledge of some than of none at all. Thus therefore I begin.

Guendoline the daughter of Cozinens duke of Cornetwall (after the procurement of warre against hir husband wherein he was slaine) was by common consent (for that hir sonne Madzane which she had by Aocrine was insufficient by reason of his minoirtie to gouerne the kingdome) made by the Britons ruler of the Ile, in the yeare of the world 2894, and so continued the same by the space of fiftene yeares, vntill hir sonne came to lawfull age.

Martha (the widow of Guenteline the king) by reason that Sicilius hir sonne was not of age convenient to wield the scepter (as one being but seven yeares old) obtained the gouernement both of the realme and of hir sonnes person, which she most worthily deserued, being a woman of rare vertue and iudgement.

Elozed, Ethelred, or Edzed (for all these diuersities are found in authors) brother to Edmund king of England, while the sonnes of Edmund (Edwine and Edgar) were for their minoirties insufficient to dispose the kingdome, was appointed protector to his nephews, in the yeare of Christ 940, who about six or seven yeares after his protectorship toke on him the kingdome at Kingstone on Easter daie, in the yeare of Christ, as hath John Stow 946, as others haue nine hundred fortie seven.

Emma the queene of England, the widow of king Ethelred, and of Canutus, both kings of England iointlie, with Godwine earle of Kent had the gouernement of the realme vnder Hardiknute king Harold.

king of England, who began his reigne in the yeare of Christ 1041.

Harold the sonne of Godwine at the death of king Edward the Confessor (which fell in the yeare of Christ 1066, and the thir and twentieth yeare of the same king) was by the testament of the said king Edward appointed regent of the yong Edgar Atthe king (named heire in the life of the said Edward) and of the kingdome, after the death of king Edward, during the minozittle of the said Edgar. Beside which the like commending of the kingdome to this Harold, in respect of the queenes honour, as that before of the successors right, is set downe by one that liued at that time, and wrote the life of king Edward, of erle Godwine, and of his children, in these words. Porreclaq manu (meaning king Edward lieng on his death bed, and speaking in the behalfe of Githa the queene, sister to this Harold) ad predictum nutricium suum fratrem Haroldum; Hanc inquit cum omni regno tutandum tibi commendo, ut pro domina et sorore ut est fideli serues et honores obsequio, ut quoad vixerit a me adepto non priuetur honore debito. Commendo pariter etiam eos, qui nationem terram suam reliquerunt causa amoris mei, mihi que haec non solum sint obsequuti: ut si super ab eis sita volunt fidelitatis eos tuearis et retineas, aut tua defensione conductos cum omnibus que sub me acquisiuerunt cum salute ad propria transferari facias, &c. But he, when king Edward was dead, vsurped the crowne to himselfe, and shortly after lost both his life and his kingdome.

william fitz-

of Hereford.

Edo bishop of Baien, and William Fitzpohne the first, being earle of Kent, and chiefe iustice of England, and the second being earle of Hereford, were gouernours of the realme, in the yeare of our Lord 1067, and the first yeare of William the Conquerour, when he went into Normandie after the conquest and indifferēt quiting of the realme.

Lanfranke
archbishop of Cantuarburie.

Linfrañte archbishop of Cantorburie, as appears by Matthew Parker, Writing in this sort in the life of the said Linfrañke: Absente Gulielmo omnino Linfranco mandauit, qui summa prudentia cuncta moderatus, proceres & plebem in officio tranquille sine ulla motus atque tumultu continebat, adeo ut si quæ defectionis suspicio nascebatur, ad eam illius compescendam maximus & potentissimus quisque opem & adiumentum illi imperanti præstitit.

Sir Richard
Lucie chiefe iustice of England.

Sir Richard Lucie knight, chiefe iustice of England was protector of the realme in the twelwe yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the second, being the yeare of our Lord 1166, in the absence of the king when he was in Normandie, and in the parts beyond the seas. Which Lucie in the thirtenth yeare of the same king, being the yeare of our redemption 1167, did valiantlie resist, and politikelie vntwische the earle of Bullongne inuading the realme. He built the abbete of Leofnes or Westwood in the parish of Crith in Kent (as not in Southssex as some haue written) in the yeare of Christ 1178, being about the foure and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the second; and further built the castell of Angier in Essex, in the diocesse of the bishop of London. He had issue Godfreie bishop of Winchester, and three daughters, who after the deathe of Godfreie their brother were his heires: the eldest daughter of which Sir Richard Lucie, was married to Robert the first called Fitzwater: the second daughter Auelina, was married to Riuers, of whome issued John de Riuers: the third daughter Rose, was married to Richard Warratine, son to king John, as appeareth by a deed (belonging to my selfe, who had the reuerie of Leofnes) beginning thus: Rosa de Doster quondam uxor venerabilis viri Richardi filij regis de Chiltun.

Hugh Huddle
bishop of Durham.

Richard the first, upon his departure forth of the realme to take his iourne into the holie land. For in his absence he appointed this Hugh to haue the rule of the north parts, as chiefe iustice & warden of the realme from Yumber to Scotland, deliuering to him also the keeping of the castell of Winchester, the other parts of the realme, with the custodie of the tower, he assigned to the gouernement of William Longchampe bishop of Elic, whome he made chiefe iustice and warden of those east, south and west parts, making him also his chancellour: who being a man of great diligence and knowledge in the administration of things, was yet verie factious and desirous of rule, honour and riches, farre aboue all measure. And with these two bishops he linked in authoritie by commission Hugh lord War-dolph, William sparthall the great, earle of Here-ford, Strigull or Penbroke, Geoffrey Fitzpeter, and William Brewter, barons, men of great honor, wisdom & discretion. This the king did in the yeare of Christ 1190, and the first yeare of his reigne.

Walter de Conſtantis ſometimes chancellor of England, biſhop of Lincoln, and now archbiſhop of Roane, upon theſe miſdemours; of the proud biſhop of Elie William Longchamp, about the yeare 1192, had the cuſtodie and gouvernement of the realme committed unto him, whileſt king Richard the firſt remained ſtill in the holie warres: who being called from that place in the yeare of Chriſt 1193 (with Cleane: mother to the king) to come to king Richard then impriſoned in Auſtria, the archbiſhop of Canturburie Hubert ſucceeded him in the yeare 1194, whome the ſaid archbiſhop of Roane procured to be inſtalled in the ſee of Canturburie, which Walter de Conſtantis (as hath Euereſden) was made biſhop of Lincoln in the yeare 1183, and the next yeare after biſhop of Roane.

Hubert Walter, or Walter Hubert (for such a transmutation of the name is viced amongst historians) was made (upon the discharge and going of Walter archbishop of Roane beyond the seas to king Richard) gouernor and protector of the realme, before the returne of Richard the first into England after the said kings imprisonment (by the duke of Austria and the emperour) procured by Suanicus bishop of Glasterburie and Welles, a kinsman to the emperour, wherof our moderne printed chronicles nor our ancient writers, except one, make any mention. This Hubert died at his manor of Tenham, and was buried at Cantarburie in the fourth wall, in the yeare of our redemption 1205, the third ides of Iulie being the seventh yeare of king John.

ther to Richard the first, was made protectresse of England, after the departure of hir son into France, when he had bene deliuered out of prison : in which office she continued during the life of hir sonne, which he ended in Poitiers in those French warres, by a hurt receiued from one that discharged a crossbow against him, on a fridaie as he besieged Chalons.
Touching whose death (sith I am now in hand with the same) it shall not be amisse to set before such feuerall verses composed by seuerall men in seuerall soyts, as I haue read, and are not yet made common death and place of buriall, as hereafter followeth:

Sic loca per trina se sparsit tanta ruina, which mostlie used a rinting kind of Latine verses, induced into the west part of the world by the barbarous Gothes) in his greater historie of the life of king Richard in manner and forme following:

Ad Chalm cecidit rex regni cardo Richardus, His ferus, his humilis, his agnus, his leopardus, Cafus erat lucis, Chalmus per secula nomen Non intellectum fuerat, sed nominis omen Non patuit, res clausa fuit, sed duce cadente Prodiit in lucem, pro casu lucis adeptus.

Besides which verses of two severall men, it pleaseth my pen to ad also the third mans dowing, as well for that the number of thre is the holie number, as for that there is nothing so sweet, but that varietie doth refresh it: yet especiallie sith it is delightfull to see the severall inventions of manie wits, this third poet therefore, exclaiming against the daie in which the said king Richard the first receiued his death wound (being on a fridaie) doth thus write:

*O veneris damnoſa dies! o ſidus amarum!
Ille dies tua nox fuit, & Venus illa venenum, Ille dedit lathum, ſed peſsum ille dierum, Primus ab undecimo, quo vita victicum ipſum Clauſe utrag die; homicida tyrannide mira Traſſigitur, clauſus excluſum, teſtis opertum, Prouidus incautum, miles inimicus inermem.*

This queene Cleanoꝝ the protectresse died in the yere of Christ 1205, being the seuenth of king John.

Ceſſerie Fitzpeter lord Ludgershall, who was by Richard the first made chiefe iustice of England, after the remouing of Hubert the archbishop of Canturburie, and was in the first yere of king John girded by him with the sword of the earldome of Cefſer, was also protector of the realme. Who being a man of great power and authoritie, was by nature gentle, by birth noble, in the lawes cunning, in reuenues great, and to all a good iusticer. This man was a hyde to king John, to reſtreine his insolencie; since he was confederat and alied in friendship & blood with all the nobilitie of England: & for that cause was greatlie feared of the k. who said of him, as he did before of the archbishop Hubert, that he then did fullie reigne, when they two were dead. For turning to those which stood by him, when news was brought vnto him of the death of Fitz Ceſſerie, he sware by Gods feet, that he was then king & lord of England, and not before. Which words he would not vse, when the archbishop Hubert died; because this man was yet liuing, whome the king (as is alreadie said) greatlie feared. And therefore vpon the death of the archbishop, he did onclie saie that he began to reigne; but not vpon this mans departure out of the world, he said he was become a full lord & absolute king of England. This Ceſſerie Fitzpeter died in the yere of our redemption 1212, being about the fourteenth yere of the reigne of the said miserablie afflicted king John, who died in the yere of Christ 1216; whose death I haue bene the willinger here to mention; because I would set downe his epitaph (not else before set downe in our English chronicles) as I find the same of ancient report:

*Hoc in ſarcophago ſepelitur regi imago, Qui moriens multum ſedauit in orbe tumultum, Et cui connexa dum vixit probra manebant, Hunc mala poſt mortem timor eſt ne ſata ſequantur.
Qui legiſ hac metuens dum cernis te morituum, Diſcito quid rerum pariat tibi meta diurnum.*

This Ceſſerie Fitzpeter married Beatrice, daughter and heire of William lord Saie, by whom he had issue, Ceſſerie Hardentle earle of Cefſer, & Matw married to Humfreie de Bohuns, by whome the Bohunes became earles of Cefſer.

William Parthall ſurnamed the great, being erle of Penbroke, was made protector of the realme, a person of the king, after that the king (being nine yeres of age) was crowned in the yere of our Lord 1216. Which office this William (being also marſhall of England) used so honorable, that he recovered a great part of the nobilitie (which toke part with Lewes son of the French king against king John father to this Henrie) to assist the young king Henrie against the said Lewes: who in the time of the said John had obtained a great part of the kingdome of England. By which means the said Lewes was expelled, and the kingdome whole recovered to the vse of the said young king Henrie the third.

This William Parthall married Isabell daughter and heire to Richard Strangbow earle of Penbroke, who made him a happy father in the multitude of his children. For by hir he had five sonnes, all which were in succession marſhals of England, and earles of Penbroke; and five daughters. The sonnes were William, Richard, Gilbert, Walter, and Anselme; who all dieng without issue, the inheritance was deuolued to the five sisters, which were, Matw the eldest, married to Hugh Bigod, in hir right earle marſhall; Jone the second, married to Maraine Pontenſie, in hir right also earle of Penbroke, as hath Nicholas Trivet; Isabell the third, married to Gilbert de Clare earle of Glouceſter; Sibill the fourth, married to William Ferrers erle of Warbie; & Que the fifth daughter, married to William de Berehuse, or de Baulie. This William the great died in the yere of our redemption 1219, being the third (as hath Nicholas Trivet) or the fourth (as hath Matthew Westminster) yere of the reigne of the said king Henrie the third, and was buried at the new temple, on Ascension daie, being the seuenteenth calends of Aprill: of whome was made this epitaph by Geruafius Melkeleie, taking vpon him the person of the earle marſhall:

Sum quem Saturnum ſibi ſentit Hibernia, Solem Anglia, Mercurium Normannia, Gallia Martem.

Which signifieth that he was a sharpe corrector and ruler of the Irish, an honor & glorie to the English, a counsellor and dispatcher of the affaires of Normandie, a warlike knight and invincible captain against the Frenchmen.

Petrus derupibus, or Peter of the Roch, being bishop of Winchester, was after the death of William Parthall earle of Penbroke advanced to the protectorship of the king; because that the young king was almost destitute of any of his owne kindred that might worthilie haue the rule of his person. For his mother queene Isabell was newlie married to Hugh Bune earle of March in France. This bishop of Winchester (who was both a wise and a stout prelat) being now in possession of the king, and mistrusting that he had entred into a more weightie office than he might well discharge, if all things were not done according to the fauor of the nobilitie, procured diuerſe graue and honorable men to be preferred to the kings counsell, as to be associats to him in the administration of the weale publike; and so entred into the administration of his new atchliued honor. Which yet he did not long intole.

But as the bishop was at the first careful to plant such of the nobilitie about the king, for the support of the realme; so yet himſelfe being a Calcoine, did after in the riper yeres of the king prefer to offices about the king such Calcoins as both were of his owne blood and kindred; and by these extrordinarie dealing procured the nobilitie with an hard and vndutifull course to oppose themſelues against the king. This Peter was advanced to the seat of Winchester, in the yere of our redemption 1204, being about the first yere of king John. After which he went to Rome, and being a prelat more fit to fight than to preach, for Mars than for the muses; did returne from Rome in the yeare of Christ 1205, being about the seventh yeare of king John. He remained bishop about two and thirtie yeares, and died at his manour house of Fernham, on the fift ides of June, in the yeare of our Lord (as haue Matthew Paris and Matthew Westminster) 1238, being the two & twentieth yeare of Henrie the third. Who somewhat before his death, about the one and thirtieth yeare of his bishoprike, went into the holie land with the bishop of Excester. He builded, and indued with possessions manie religious houses: amongst which he founded Nitchfield in Hampshire; of which Peter de la Roches, of the rocks, Matthew Paris maketh a more large discourse.

Hubert de Burow
earle of Kent of Kent.

Hubert de Burow, constable of Dover castle, earle of Kent, and chiefe iustice of England, being of great account in the realme for his probitie and goodnesse, was made protector of the king and kingdom, in the yeare of our redemption 1221, being the fift yeare of king Henrie the third. This man in the yeare of Christ 1221 (being the same yeare in the which he was made protector) married at Poike, Margaret, sister to Alexander king of Scots. And here I thinke it not amisse to saie somewhat touching the issue of this Hubert of Burow, who in a certene namelesse booke (caried about in the hands of all men) treating of the nobilitie (created since the invasion of William Conqueror) is said to die without issue: which cannot possible be so, if that be true which I haue seene: which I am led by manie reasons to beleue to be most true.

For I haue read of two children which this Hubert had, whereof the one being a sonne, was called Richard de Burow, who was knighted by Henrie the third (as it seemeth to me) after the death of his father: if this Richard be not the same John, of whose Matthew Paris writeth, that in the yeare of Christ 1229, Rex Anglorum Henricus, in die Pentecostes Iohannem filium Huberti Anglie iusticiary cingulo militari donauit tertio nonas Iuny. The other child was a daughter called Margaret, married to Richard heire to the earldome of Glocester, as noteth Iohn Beuer in these words: Richardus heres comitis Glouernie Margaretam filiam Huberti de Burgo comitis Cantie in uxorem accepit. This Hubert of Burow was a verie old man, who after manie persecutions by the king, and after so manie chances of both fortunes, departed this world on the fourth ides of Maie, in the yeare of our redemption 1243, being the seuen and twentieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third at his manour of Wansford, or Wansford. Whose bodie was honozable caried to London, and there buried in the church of the frier preachers, to whom in his life he had giuen great gifts; and amongst other things, his goodlie place which stood not far from the palace of earle Richard of Cornwall (as I with some probable reasons coniecture) nere vnto Westminster, which afterward the archbishop of Poike did procure. His wife the countesse of Kent, being likewise verie old, a woman that kept verie great hospitalitie, and that was well beloued, died in the yeare of Christ 1259, being the thre and fortieth yeare of Henrie the third, about sixtene yeares after the death of the earle his husband.

Walter Greie
Poike.

Walter Greie archbishop of Poike was made protector of the realme in this sort. The French king hauing vnjustlie giuen the earldome of Poitiers to his brother Adolphus; Hugh Bume earle of March (the greatest of the nobilitie in that prouince) would not do homage vnto Adolphus; but wrote his letters to his son in law king Henrie the third. (whose mother Eleanor he had married) that if he would come into those parts, he should haue both aid of men, and furniture of war for the perfect restoring of those dominions to the crowne of England. For which cause Henrie the third assembling his power, did with his brother Richard (then lately returned fro Jerusalem) depart the realme in the yeare of our redemption 1242, being the six & twentieth yeare of his gouernment into Poitiers, & left the administration of the kingdom to Walter Greie archbishop of Poike, whilst he should remaine in those parts. Which office the said archbishop held also in the yeare of Christ 1243, being the seauen and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the third. Of this man is more mention made in my collection of the chancellors of England; in this place onelle further setting downe, that this Walter died in the yeare of Christ 1255, being about the nine and thirtieth yeare of this Henrie the third, as hath Anonymus M. S.

Eleanor daughter to Keimond earle of Poince, wife to king Henrie the third and quene of England, with Richard earle of Cornwall the kings brother (to whose custodie was committed Edward Longshanks, being after king of England by the name of Edward the first, son to the said king Henrie) were (in the yeare of our redemption 1253, being the seuen and thirtieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third) appointed gouernors and protectors of the realme in the kings absence, whilst he went into Gascoine, whither he went to pacifie the nobilitie, and to keepe the same in safetie from the French. And because my pen hath here fallen vpon Richard earle of Cornwall, I determine to say somewhat of him in this place, not hauing other occasion offered to me therfore. This Richard the son of king John was borne in the yeare of Christ 1208, being the tenth yeare of the reigne king John. He was made (and so called) earle of Poitiers by Henrie the third, about the ninth yeare of his reigne, in the yeare of Christ 1225, who also that yeare with his vncle William earle of Sarisburie went into Poitiers, where he was iustlie receiued: he putteth the earle of March to flight, he recovereth that which was lost in Gascoine, he went into the holie land, refuseth the kingdom of Apulia offered vnto him, he is chosen empero, and receiueth that honoz at Colen, being there crowned king of the Romans: he subdued Alfonso competitor with him for the empire, he after returneth into England: he is an enemy to Simon Montfort and the barons rebelling against his brother king Henrie the third; he is taken prisoner by the barons, and is afterward deliuered: he was created knight and earle of Cornwall in the yeare of our redemption 1225, as hath Matthew Westminster, but as saith William Packington, he was created earle of Cornwall in the yeare of Christ 1227. He married foure wiues, if that Elizabeth his first wife and Isabell the widow of Gilbert de Clare were not all one woman. But leauing that to further knowledge, I do for this time make them but one person; for so in truth it must be, whatsoeuer other wise shall be shewed in mistaking their names. Elizabeth that was his first wife, as noteth Leland, was buried in the quere of Welsland, being that woman which is called Isabell, and was the daughter of William Sparshall earle of Denbroke surnamed the great: and the widow of Gilbert de Clare earle of Glocester was married to this erle of Cornwall, in the yeare of our Lord 1231 being the sixteenth yeare of king Henrie the third.

This Isabell died in the yeare of our redemption 1240, being the foure and twentieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, after this manner. For the being great with child, and nere to the time of hir deliuerance, fell into Acetum inferum, or the picket, hickect, and deliuering a child into the world, which had life, and was baptised by the name of Nicholas, they both presentlie died thereupon. Which thing when the earle vnderstood being then on his iourneie into Cornwall, he burst out in teares, and greatlie lamented that losse. Wherefore hastily returning, and leauing his former iourneie, he honorablie buried his wife at * Welland or Beauleu, an house of religion builded by king John from the foundation, and replenished with Charterhouse monks.

His second wife was Sinthia or Sanctia, daughter to Richmond earle of Province, and sister to the queene of England, wife to king Henrie the third, brother to the said Richard earle of Cornwall, who married the said Sinthia in the yeare of our redemption 1243, being the seuen and twentieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third. Leland also appointeth to him the third wife, which was Beatrix de Hammas, whom he calleth queene of Almaine, & wife to king Richard, brother to Henrie the third. Which ladie died in the yeare of our redemption 1277, being the first yeare of Edward the first, and was buried at the friers minors in Drford. This noble Richard erle of Cornwall died in Februarye at Berkhamsted, in the yeare of Christ 1271, in the five and fiftith yeare of king Henrie the third, as saie Matthew Paris and Marchew Westminster: but Nicholas Triuer referreth his death to the yeare 1270, being the foure and fiftith yeare of Henrie the third: and the chronicle belonging to Guesham to the yeare 1272, being the six and fiftith yeare of Henrie the third. After whose death his hart was buried in the friers minors of Drford, and his bodie committed to the earth in the monasterie of Hales (being Charterhouse monks) which he had builded at his charge of 10000 marks, which at this daie at five shillings the ounce of silver amounteth to the summe of twentie thousand pounds. He had two sonnes, the one called Henrie by his first wife Isabell; the other called Edmund de Almaine by his second wife Sinthia. Henrie was slaine by Simon and Guic of Pontfort sonnes of the last Simon Pontfort earle of Leicester, in the life of his father Richard in Italie at Aiterbo, in the yeare of our redemption 1270. Which fact being done in saint Splucsters church as he was at masse, occasioned the townesmen to paint the manner of his death on the wall of the church: and that picture being beheld by a certeine versifier, he was baged thereupon to compose these following verses:

*Regis Theutonici Richardi clara propago, Sternitur Henricus, velut hac designat imago, Dum redit à Tripoli, regum fulvus comitus, In crucis obsequio patitur sub gente nociva, Irruit in templum, post missam, stirps Guenelonis

His bones were brought into England, and buried in the monasterie of Hales, where his father was after also buried: but his hart was bestowed in a gilt cup, and placed beside the chaine of saint Edward the Confessor in Westminster abbeye. The other sonne to this Richard earle of Cornwall was Edmund of Almaine, who after the death of his father was inuested with the honor of the earldome of Cornwall, being borne at Berkhamsted in the yeare of our redemption 1250, being the foure and thirtieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, to whom his uncle Bonifacius bishop of Canturburie was godfather, and called him Edmund in the honor of saint Edmund archbishop of Canturburie and Confessor. This Edmund earle of Cornwall married the daughter of Richard earle of Clare, of whome shall be moze spoken when we come to treat of him as protector of England.

Bonifacius the archbishop of Canturburie, with others which follow, were protectors of the realme after this maner, as I haue gathered. It was ordeined in the parlement at Drford called Parlementum infanum, that the king should chuse forth twelue persons of the realme, and the communalitie of the land other twelue, the which hauing regall authoritie in their hands, might as gardians of the kingdome take in charge vpon them the gouernment of the realme, & should from yeare to yeare ppointe for the due election of iustices, chancellors, treasurers, and other officers, and further ppointe to see to the safe keeping of the castels belonging to the crowne.

These foure and twentie persons appointed to that function, began to order all things at their owne pleasure: in the meane time not forgetting to vse things chieflie to their owne aduantage, as well in prouiding excheats and wards for their children and kinfolks, as also in bestowing of patronages of churches belonging to the kings gift, vnto their owne liking. So that these prouiders which should haue made careful and beneficiall prouisions for the realme, made speedie and plentifull prouision for them and theirs, in somuch that neither king nor Christ could get anie thing from these protectors. Where be that write, how that there were but twelue or thirtene chosen to be gouernors at this time (which for this present I demie to be the truer opinion) whose names are as follow: Bonifacius archbishop of Canturburie, the bishop of Worcester, Roger Wigod earle of Hereford, and marshall of England, Simon de Pontfort earle of Leicester, Richard de Clare earle of Gloucester, Humfreie Bobune earle of Hereford, Richard Fitzalane earle of Arundell, sir John Danfell chiefe iustice of England, sir Roger lord Spertimer, sir Hugh Wigod, sir Peter de Saunoe, sir James Audleie, & sir Peter de Pontfort. To these (as some saie) was authoritie onlie giuen to punish all such as trespassed in the breach of anie of the constitutions of the parlement of Drford. Others say that they were made rulers & protectors of the realme, and to dispose thereof, because the king was much misleied in the gouernment of the kingdome by the peruerse counsell of his flatterers. Which twelue gouernors I suppose did not long continue: for being euerie one priuatlie for himselfe, and so not iointlie for the common-wealth, they grew diuided, and that the one labored to set vp, the other sought to pull downe.

Bonifacius archbishop of Canturburie the second time, & the bishop of Worcester, with sir Phillip Basset, or rather sir Hugh Wigod made chiefe iustice of England by the barons, were appointed in the yeare of our redemption 1260, being the fortie and fourth of king Henrie the third, to haue the gouernment of the realme in the absence of the king, whilst he remained in France at Paris about the affaires of Normandie: at that time a peace was made betwene the kings of England and France.

Gilbert de Clare the second of that name that was earle of Gloucester and Hertford, was the sonne of Richard de Clare erle of Gloucester and Hertford, which died in the yeare of our redemption 1262, being the fortie & first yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, and was buried at Tewkesburie, with a great image of silver and gilt vpon his tome, and the same sword and spures which he did weare in his life time. Of which Richard these verses were composed for his probitie and rarenesse of vertuous manners maners and conditions, and set vpon his tome:

Ere pudor Hyppoliti, Paridis genas, sensus Physis, Aeneas pietas, Hectoris iracundia.

This Gilbert (I saie) the sonne of the said Richard was after the death of Henrie the third (which happened in the yeare of our Lord 1277, & in the seuen & fiftith yeare of the reigne of the said king Henrie) in the absence of king Edward the first in the holie warres made gouernour of the realme, vntill the returne of the said king Edward into England, to which function he was appointed by king Henrie the third, lieng on his death-bed: who caused the said Gilbert to sweare to keepe the peace of the land to the behoefe of Edward his sonne. Which he did most faithfully, vntill the second daie of August, in the second yeare of the said king, in which the said king Edward landed in England, being in the yeare of our redemption 1274, at what time the king was honorablie interteined of the said Gilbert, and John earle of Murraine (a supporter to him in the charge of the kingdome) at the castell of Tunbridge in Kent, and Wigate in Shurre, which Gilbert with the other piers of the land, immediatlie after the death of king Henrie the third, assembling at the new temple bake the old seale of king Henrie, made a new seale in the name of king Edward, and appointed faithfull officers for the sure keeping and obseruing of the treasure, the riches, the peace, and the lawes of the kingdoms.

This Gilbert had two wiues, his first wife was Alice the daughter of Hugh le Bzane erle of March, by whom he had issue a daughter, that was countesse of Fife in Scotland: his second wife was Ione the daughter of king Edward the first, called Ione of Acres, by whom he had one sonne, called Gilbert the third, earle of Gloucester and Hertford, who married Maud the daughter of Richard earle of Ulster in the yeare of Christ 1308 at Waltham, by whom he had issue a sonne, John bozne in the yeare of Christ 1312, being in the first yeare of Edward the second, that died without issue; after the death of which Gilbert the third, his lands and earldomes of Gloucester and Hertford came to the sister of the said Gilbert the third, who was slaine in the battell of Striueling against the Scots in the seuenth (or as others haue the eight) yeare of king Edward the second, whom the Scots would gladlie haue kept for rancome if they had knowne him: but he had forgotten to put on his cote of armes to shew what he was, after which he was brought into England and was buried at Tewkesburie, vpon whose death the two earldomes of Gloucester and Hertford were so dispersed, that there was neuer anie to this daie, that iointlie succeeded or possessed them both. Thus hauing digressed from Gilbert the second, in treating of his sonne Gilbert the third, let vs againe returns to him. He besides his sonne Gilbert the third, had by his wife Ione three daughters; Celenor, first married to Hugh Spenser, second sonne to Hugh Spenser earle of Gloucester, and after his death to William Zouch; Margaret married to Piers de Caueston earle of Cornewall, and after to Hugh Audelcie; and Elizabeth or Isabell married in the yeare of our Lord 1308, being the first yeare of Edward the second, to John the sonne of Richard earle of Ulster. This Gilbert the second, before the marriage of his second wife, was on the fiftenth kalends of August diuorced from Alice his first wife, in the yeare of our redemption 1271, being the six and fiftith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third; and after in Westminster church the last of Aprill married his second wife, about the eighteenth yeare of Edward the first being the yeare of Christ 1290, which Gilbert the second, being taken atwaie by vntimelie death, departed this world in the yeare of our redemption 1195 (being the thre and twentieth of the reigne of the said Edward the first) who was in word & deed, in commandement and authoritie the greatest person of the kingdome, next to king Edward the first: for which cause he well deserued to haue his sepulture among his worthe ancestors.

Edmund earle of Cornewall, of whom there is somewhat spoken before, being the sonne of Richard king of Almaine, and earle of Cornewall brother to Henrie the third, married Margaret the daughter of Richard de Clare erle of Gloucester, he was made protektor of the Realme by Edward the first in the fourteenth yeare (as some saie) or in the fiftenth, as others saie (for there is so much disagreement amongst authozs for the accounts of yeares, as it passeth anie one man to reconcile them in all points) when the said king went into Aragon to reconcile the two kings of Arragon & Naples. He continued in this office in the yeare of Christ 1287, or 1228, as hath Treuet, being the sixteenth yeare of Edward the first, in which he subdued Rife ap Iwerdach the Welsh prince, rebelling against Edward the first, and ouerthrew the castell of Dyffillane (as hath the said Nicholas Treuet) he was lord of Wallingford, did much cost therevpon, and died without issue, as hath Matthew Westminster, in the yeare of Christ 1300: but as hath Thomas Walsingham 1301, leauing the king of England his heire. Yet are there some pedegrees and other authozs, and those not the meanest, which saie that he had a daughter, Isabell married to Rojice Fitz Harding lord Barkleic: so that these authozs, which saie that he died without issue, are to be vnderstood of the issue male, & not of the heire generall: for they account him to die without issue, which leaueth no posteritie to continue his title of honor. The which thei meaning they make more plaine, in that they saie that after his islesse death, the earledome came to the crowne. And here bicause there is mention made of Wallingford, I will set downe what Leland hath written touching the same, bicause I desire to make common, and to preserve all whatsoeuer monuments of Leland that come vnto my hands: thus therefore he writeth of Wallingford in his commentaries of England, written in the yeare of our redemption 1542, being the foure and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the eight in these wordes.

The towne of Wallingford hath bene a verie notable thing and well walled. The ditch of the towne, and the cress wherevpon the wals stand, be yet manifestlie perceived, and begin from the castell, going in compasse a good mile and more, and so continueth to Wallingford bridge, a large thing of stone ouer the Thames. There remaine yet the names of these streets amongst others. Thamesstreet, Fishstreet, Woodstreet, Goldsmiths row. And by the patents and donation of Edmund earle of Cornewall and lord of the honour of Wallingford, it appereth that there were fourtene parish churches in Wallingford: and there be men yet alieue that can shew the places and churchyards where they stood, at this time there are but thre parish churches. The towne and the castell was soze defaced by the Danes warres, yet they maeklie florished in the time of Richard king of the Romans earle of Cornewall, and brother to Henrie the third, he did much cost vpon the castell which ioineth to the north gate of the towne, and hath thre ditches (as vpon the cress of the same may appere) large and deepe, about each of the two first ditches (on the cress of the ground cast out) runneth an embatteled wall now soze in ruine, and for the most part defaced. All the goodlie buildings, with the tower and dungeon, be within the third ditch. There is also a collegiat chapell amongst the buildings within the third ditch. Edmund earle of Cornewall son to Richard king of Romans was the first founder and indower of this college. Prince Edward the blacke (as one told me) augmented this college. There is a deane, foure priests, six clerkes, and foure choristers. The late deane before doctoz London that now is, builded a faire steeple of stone at the west end of the collegiat chapell, to the making whereof he defaced (as it is said without licence) a pace of the kings lodging on the east end of the chapell. The deane hath a faire lodging of timber within the castle, and to it is ioined a place for the ministers of the chapell. Thus much Leland for Wallingford, & thus much I for Edmund earle of Cornewall and lord of Wallingford.

Edward of Carnaruan prince of Wales, sonne to Edward the first, was in the yeare of our redemption 1295, being the five and twentieth yeare of Edward the first, protector of England, in the absence of his father in Flanders, who because he was of tender yeares, had as tutors and governours appointed unto him Richard bishop of Durham (Eulogium hath the bishop of London) William Montacute, with diuerse other knights, as Reigbold Greie, John Giffard, & Alan Plunket, being wise, discret and expert soldiers.

Piers or Peter de Cauesfone a Gascoine bozne, whome king Edward the second so tenderlie loued as that he preferred him before all men, was appointed gardian of the realme in the first yeare of the said king Edward the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1308, when the king went into France and there abroad to marrie Isabell daughter to Philip king of France, before that the said Edward was crowned king of England, as hath Radulphus Higden. Of this Piers I will here saie little, because I haue spoken more largelie of him in my panto-graphie of England.

John de Droghensford bishop of Bath and Wells, was in the yeare of our redemption 1313, being the first yeare of king Edward the second, made protector of the realme in the absence of the said king Edward the second, and his wife quene Isabell, who went into France to solemnize the coronation of Philip (sonne to Philip king of France) who was at that instant created king of Navarre. This Droghensford was the fourteenth bishop of Bath & Wells. Great contention was there betwene him and the deane and priests of that church. He succeeded in the bishoprike Walter Houelshab. This Droghensford held the bishoprike about nineteene yeares, he beautified the same with manie goodlie buildings, procured manie priuileges vnto it, and greatlie cralted his kindred. He was buried at Welles before the high altar of saint John Baptist.

Henrie Lacie or Lacie earle of Lincoln, and of Salisburie, baron of Halton and of Pontfract, corruptlie called Pomestret, and constable of Chester, was made protector of the realme in the first yeare of Edward the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1310, whilst the king remained in the warres of Scotland. Which Henrie died shortly after in the same yeare, and was buried in the new worke of Paules, who carried for his armes the purple lion contrary to the cote his ancestors had borne before. This man had done great seruice in the warres in the time of Edward the first, he married Margaret the daughter and heire of William Longespée earle of Salisburie, and had by hir a daughter named Alice, married to Thomas Plantagenet earle of Lancaster, Leicester, and Darbie. This Henrie (as I haue learned of other and read in Leland) had issue a bastard sonne, and hauing amongst manie other lordships the manour of Grantchester besides Cambridge, he gaue the same with other lands vnto that bastard, and commanded that the same Lacie so set by in Grantchester, should for himselfe and his successors euer name their sonnes and heires by the names of Henrie, which hitherto hath bene religiouslie obserued amongst them. And this was the originall of the houses of the Lacies in Grantchester, as Leland learned of him which was then heire of those lands.

Gilbert de Clare the third earle of Gloucester of that name, after the death of Henrie Lacie, was chosen gouernour of the realme (the king being still in Scotland) during the time that the king should make his abode in that countrie. Of this man see before in the discourse of his father Gilbert the second earle of Gloucester and Hertford, and protector of the realme.

Edward prince of Wales and duke of Aquitaine, coming out of France with Isabell in the second yeare of Edward the second, his father was after his landing in England and the taking of his father made gardian of England vnder his father, which office he did not long continue: for deposing his father from the kingdome in the yeare of Christ 1326 he assumed the crowne himselfe in his fathers life.

Walter Keinolds archbishop of Canturburie was with others appointed gardian of England on this sort. Edward the third as before attending to the crowne in the yeare of our redemption 1327, or as some others more trulie saie 1326, being fourtene yeares of age did then begin his reigne. But because he was so young (not being of power or policie to welde so great a charge) it was decreed in this first yeare of his reigne, that twelue gouernours of the greatest lords within the realme should possesse the gouernement, untill he came to riper yeares, whose names were as insuech: Walter archbishop of Canturburie, the archbishop of Poike, the bishop of Winchester, the bishop of Hereford, Henrie earle of Lancaster, Thomas Brotherton earle marshall, Edmund of Woodstocke earle of Kent, John earle of Warren, the lord Thomas Wake, the lord Henrie Percy, the lord Oliver de Ingham, and the lord John Rothe, who were sworn of the kings counsell and charged with the gouernement of the kingdome as they would answer for the same. But this ordinance continued not long, for in the second yeare of this king, Isabell the kings mother and the lord Roger Mortimer took the whole rule into their hands, in such sort that the king and his counsellors were in all affaires of state, and otherwise, onelie gouerned by their direction. Of this Walter Keinolds the archbishop, because he was sometime chancellor, and sometime treasurer, is more mention made in the large volume of the liues of the chancellors.

John of Eltham earle of Cornewall sonne to Edward the second, had in the fourth yeare of king Edward the third being the yeare of our redemption 1330 the gouernement of the realme committed vnto him, whilst king Edward the third had passed the seas onelie fiftene houres in his companie, apparelled in clothes like vnto merchants, which office the said John of Eltham executed untill the returne of the said king, and before that also when the said Edward the third, in the second yeare of his reigne, did before this time go into France to do his homage. He was made earle of Cornewall in the second yeare of king Edward the third, being the yeare of Christ 1328, and died at Barwik, others saie at S. Johns towne in Scotland, in the month of October 1336, being the tenth yeare of Edward the third, and was honorable buried at Westminister, for the solemnization of whose buriall the king came came out of Scotland about the feast of the Epi-

Edward the Blacke prince, eldest sonne to Edward the third, being about the age of nine yeares, was in the twelfth yeare of his father, being the yeare of our redemption 1338, or as saith Matthew Parker 1337, made gardian of England in the absence of his father being as then sailed into Flanders to procure the Flemmings to aid him against the French king. Under which prince as some write (or rather as I for the time take it) equall in commission to him it seemeth that John archbishop of Canturburie had the cheefest rule of the land, because that king Edward after his returne into England, which was about the fourteenth or the fifteenth of his reigne, charged the said bishop with certeine negligences which he used in collections of monie, whilest he had the chiefe rule of the land, when he was in the warres of France. Wherefore the words of Matthew Parker in the life of the said John Stratford (saieing that the king held a parlement, in which Omnem regni curam & gubernationem archiepiscopo commisit) must needs be intended that he had that charge under or equallie with the said Blacke prince, as chiefeest counsellor to support the tender yeares of his sonne.

After which also in the yeare of our redemption, as hath the same Matthew Parker 1342, being about the fiftenth of the said Edward the third, the king committed the care & gouvernement of the kingdome to the said archbishop, whilest the king was beyond the seas in the warres: for thus writeth the said Parker, fol. 257. Ac paulo post nulla purgatione indicata (speaking of the said bishop vniuersitie accused to the king) aut recepta, omnibus pene parlamentis ordinibus pro ar-chiepiscopo deprecantibus, rex eum sua sponte legitime purgatum & excusatum pronuntiavit, eumque multo magis charum quam ante habuit, omnibusque gerendis in Angliarebus se in militia absente prefecit. Of which archbishop being sometime chancelor, and treasurer of England shall be set downe a more large discourse in my large booke of the liues of the chancelors.

Lionell third sonne to Edward the third, was in the ninth yere of the reigne of the said king Edward the third, being the yeare in which the word became fleshy 1345, made gardian of England, in the absence of his father, who as then was sailed into the parts (beyond the seas) of Flanders. Of this man there is more spoken in my following treatise of the dukes of England.

Henrie lord Persie, & Rafe lord Beuill, when Edward the third was sailed into Normandie, were in the twentieth yere of the reigne of the said Edward the third, being the yeare of our redemption 1346, appointed to be gardians of the realme in his absence with the archbishop of Doke, the bishop of Lincoln, and Thomas Hatfield bishop of Durham.

Thomas of Woodstocke being verie yong was made custos or gardian of England, in the yere that God toke on him the forme of a seruant 1359, being the thre & thirtieth of the reigne of the said king Edward the third, when he sailed into France with a 1100 ships. Of this man is more spoken in my discourse of the dukes of England, set downe in the time of queene Elizabeth: and in my treatise of the conestables of England, set downe in the time of Henrie the eight pag. 867.

John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, fourth sonne of Edward the third, because the king his father was feeble and sicklie (being now about thre score & five yeares of age, though Bodinus in his Methodo historiae saie that he died in his climactericall yeare of thre score and thre: for the truth is, that the said Edward the third was fourtene yeares old when he began to reigne, and he reigned about one and fiftie yeares, which make of his age thre score and five yeares) but especiallie for the sorow which the king inwardlie conceiued for the death of that worthy prince his son, commonlie surnamed the Blacke prince. This John of Gaunt (after the death of the said Blacke prince, which died in the yeare of Christ 1376, being the fiftith yeare of the reigne of Edward the third, whose death was deemed to be hastned by the said John of Gaunt aspiring to the crowne, the plat whereof though it toke not effect in the life of the said John, yet it was performed in his sonne Henrie of Bullingbrooke, who deposed Richard the second) was appointed by his father Edward the third to haue the rule of the realme vnder him, the which he continued during his fathers life, which was not a full yeare after that he had made the said John of Gaunt gouernour of England. After which death of king Edward the third, when Richard the second, a child of eleuen yeares of age began his reigne, in the yeare of our redemption 1377, in the first yeare of the said Richard the second, after his coronation, the said John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, & Edmund of Lang-leie earle of Cambridge brother to the said John of Gaunt, were appointed to haue the gouernement of the kings person, and the administration of the common-wealth. But shortly after, in the same yere of the king, in the yeare of our redemption 1378, the said John of Gaunt gaue vp the same office. Of this man is more said in my treatise of the dukes of England.

William Courtnie bishop of London (but short-lie after his protectorship advanced vnto the see of Canturburie, in the yeare of Christ 1381, about the ninth of Januarie, being about the fourth of Richard the second, was made gouernor of the realme in this maner. After (as is before said) that the duke of Lancaster had wiselie weied the sickle estate of the realme, and considered that by the euill gouernment of the nobilitie, and inconstant mind of the yong king, there must needs fall a change of the estate, & doubting that if any thing succeeded otherwile than the nobles liked, the cause and negligence might be imputed to him, as one who chiefe had the government in his hands (and thanks howsoeuer the state was ruled he looked for none) did in the end after a few months authoritie (wholie mistaking the maners of the court, which commonlie are not of the best in the minority of princes) surrender his protectorship, and obtained licence of the king to depart, and so got him quietlie to his castell of Kenelworth, permitting others to haue the whole swaie of the kingdome.

Notwithstanding all which, in the second yeare of Richard the second, about the yeare of Christ 1379 being not altogether carelesse of the kings well doing; this duke before his departing to Kenelworth, caused certeine graue persons with his full consent, to be ordeined, which should haue the gouernement of the kings person, and administration of the common-wealth. The names of whome were, William Courtnie before mentioned, Edmund Mortimer earle of March, Rafe Ergumne bishop of Salisburie, and William lord Latimer, with others, of whome for the most part the people had conceiued a good opinion: yet because the said bishop of Salisburie, and the lord Latimer were associat to the rest, and of equall authoritie with them, the commons murmured greatlie against them. The cause for which they so mistaked the lord Latimer, was for that he had sometimes bin too much fauouring to dame Alice Piers, concubine to king Edward the third, to whome the said lord Latimer was chiefe chamberleine, & therefore was of him best beloued, which two persons, the lord Latimer, and dame Alice, were by parliament in in the fifth yeare of Edward the thirde removed from the king, for that they miscounselled him, but expectallie sith much mischief grew in the realme by the same Alice Piers. For she being now exalted in pride by overmuch love of Edward the thirde, would beyond the modestie and maner of women, sit in indgement with the kings iustices, he with the doctors in the consistorie, turne sentences to what she the would, and require manie things dishonest in themselves, and dishonourable to the king. Which woman, an old written chronicle belonging to the house of Cuesham, hath delivered to me these words: Alicia Piers regis concubina supra modum mulierum nimis supergressa sui etiam sexus & fragilitatis feminine immemor, nunc iuxta iusticiarios regis nunc in foro ecclesiastico iuxta doctores sedendo, & pro defensione causarum suaderet, & etiam contra iura postulare minime verebatur, unde propter scandalum perierunt ab illo (which was the king) penitus amoveri in parlamento tento anno Domini 1376 & 50 Ed. 3. Thus that autho.

And here before I go any further with my protectors, because some curious heads that find not all these matters in the records of the tower, which they daile turne with a churlish hand, or else thinke that nothing may be knowne out of the walles of their office, will seeme to seeke a knot in a rush, and saie that I in compasse of some few lines have written a contrarietie, in saieing that John of Gaunt thirdest after the kingdome, and for that cause hastened the death of his elder brother prince Edward the blacke as Richard the thirde did the death of his brother George duke of Clarence, which intent could not possible be in John of Gaunt, as appeareth by my olone following words: where I saie that he gaue over the protectorship of his nephue, because he would avoid all suspicion of euill gouernement: which he would neuer haue done if he had so intent, that place being so apt for the execution of his purpose, and might giue occasion to him that netier ment any such matter before, to attempt it being in that place, as Richard duke of Yorke did attempt, but not perfoyme it, in the time of Henrie the first; and as Richard duke of Gloucester, being in the same office of protectorship, did not onelie attempt it, but brought to perfection. Whereunto I answer, that all this is no contrarietie, but onelie a manifest shew and confirmation, the one part of my words to the other. For sith he could not in the life of his father Edward the thirde before the crowning of king Richard the second (as Richard the thirde did) attaine the crowne, he would not now attempt it (the king being once crowned, and in full possession of the kingdome) so rashly and vnadvisedly (as did Richard duke of Yorke against Henrie, for which he was in the end haine) least that thereby his part might seeme to carie the face of a rebellion, as in truth it should haue done. For whosoeuer either for colour of God, bene- fit to their countrie, or for whatsoeuer cause, lift up the sword against a crowned king, sitting at the sterne of gouernement, being one of the gods of the earth, the same must needs tend vnto a rebellion, which John of Gaunt would not seeme to execute, & for that cause leauing off his purpose at that time, he did in the end also leaue the whole matter to his son to perfoyme, especiallie sith he afterward perceived Richard the second so much to fauor, and further him with monie, munition, and men, to recouer the kingdome of Castile & Arragon in Spaine, in the right of the wife of the said John of Gaunt. To whom and to his wife (as hath Henrie Knighton) king Richard the second gaue a severall crowne of gold to honour them withall, & to shew how interlie he loued them when they both went into Spaine. And for these causes the said John of Gaunt refused the oportunitie of time & place in the king his nephues minority to execute it. But did he cease it for so. For that sparke although it were a little cooled, was not utterlie quenched, because he hastened the same in his son, whom he not onelie persuaded, but furthered (after the banishment of his said sonne Henrie of Bullingbroke by Richard the second in the life of the said John of Gaunt) to returne into England, and after his death to chalenge by sword the earldome of Lancaster his right inheritance, and vnder the same to reuenge the death of the duke of Gloucester and others: and by that means, when Richard the second was out of the realme of England in Ireland, the said Henrie Bullingbroke sonne of John of Gaunt entered the realme, put downe the king, and got the crowne which his father sought. Thus this much digressing from the protectors, and to returne to that course which I haue in hand, I will leaue the discourse of policies to obtaine kingdoms, because they be no balles for me to bandie, and follow on my former intent as ineter for my simplicitie.

Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwick was in the thirde yeare of Richard the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1380, made protector in this sort. In the parlament holden the same yeare, at the speciall sute of the lords, and of the commons, the bishops and barons chosen (as you haue heard) before by John of Gaunt to be protectors of the realme, were removed, and the earle of Warwick especiallie elected to that function, to remaine continuallie with the king as cheefe gouernor of his roiall person; & one that should giue answer to all foreigners repairing thither, vpon what cause soeuer their coming were; hauing further as ample gouernment of the kingdome giuen vnto him, as the other removed gouernors had. Being placed in that office by the duke of Lancaster, he died the first ides of Aprill, in the yeare of Christ 1401, being the thirde yeare of Henrie the fourth. He married Margaret, the daughter of William lord Ferrers of Grobie; by whome he had issue, Richard earle of Warwick.

Thomas Fitzalane otherwile called Arundell bishop of Elie, the two and twentieth that inioind that seat, being two and twentie yeares of age, and the son of Richard Fitzalane earle of Arundell & Warren, was with others made protector of England in this sort. At a parlament holden at London in the tenth yeare of Richard the second, being the yeare of Christ 1386, were certeine gouernors of the kingdome elected, because the treasure of the realme had bene imbeilled & lewde wasted, nothing to the profit of the king and kingdome, by the couetous and euill gouernment of the deposed officers, which were Michaell de la Pole earle of Suffolke lord chancellor, John Fitzham bishop of Durham lord treasurer, & diuerse other persons that ruled about the king.

Now the gouernors elected by this parlament were in number thirtene; and by name Thomas Arundell bishop of Elie, then made lord chancellor; John Gilbert bishop of Hereford made lord treasurer; and Nicholas abbat of Waltham at that time made keeper of the priuie seale; William Courtenie archbishop of Canturburie, Alexander Bevil archbishop of Yorke, Edmund Langley duke of Yorke, Thomas of Woodstocke duke of Gloucester, William bishop of Winchester, Thomas bishop of Excester, Richard Fitzalane erle of Arundell, John lord Deuereur, and Reinold lord Cobham of Starbozow. These were thus by parlament chosen to haue vnder the king the whole oversight and gouernment of the realme, as by their commission in the statutes of the tenth yeare of the said Richard the second it doth in the printed booke appeare.

Edmund Langley duke of York, uncle unto Richard the second, was in the eighteenth yeare of the said Richard, being about the yeare of our redemption 1395, ordeined lord gardian of England, in the kings absence in the realme of Ireland. This protector caused a parlement to be assembled at Westminster: where he dealt so effectualie, notwithstanding the untowardnesse of the burgeses, that a tenth was granted by the cleargie, and a fiftenth by the tempoꝛaltie; but not without protestation, that those payments were granted of a mere freewill, for the loue they bare to the king, and to haue the affaires in Ireland to succeed the better. After this, about foure yeares; king Richard the second in the two and twentieth yeare of his reigne, in the yeare of Christ 1399, making another viage into Ireland (being the last and most unhaple that euer was to him, for before his returne he had in effect lost his realme, which after his coming he lost in deed) did againe in his absence substitute this Edmund duke of York as chiefe gouernor of England. Who in the absence of the king, assembled a power of men against Henrie of Bulkingbroke, now entered into the land to challenge the dukedome of Lancaster after the death of his father John of Gaunt, and vnder that colour to vsurpe the crowne. Which Edmund passing into Wales in the three and twentieth yeare of Richard the second, was receiued into the castell of Barking, where remained untill the coming of Henrie of Bulkingbroke. Whom when he perceiued (for the power which the said duke of Lancaster had assembled from all parts of the realme) that he was not of sufficiencie to resist; he came forth into the church that stood without the castell, and there fell to parley with the duke of Lancaster; after which he did neuer forsake the duke of Lancaster, untill he came to the crowne. Whp, if he had faithfullie stood vnto his nephew, might perhaps haue saued vnto him both his crowne and life. Of this man is moꝛe said in my treatise of the dukes of England.

Jone de Barmures sometime widow to Henrie
the fourth.

Jone de Barmures sometime duchesse of Britaine, (widow to Philip Montfort, as saith Hypodigma; but Walsingham in his historie calleth him John duke of Britaine; being also the widow of king Henrie the fourth) was substitute gouernor of the realme by his son in law king Henrie the first, king of England, in the third yeare of his reigne, being the yeare from the birth of the Medias 1415, when the said Henrie the first toke his iourne into France to conquer the same. This woman in the seuenth yeare of Henrie the first, which was in the yeare of Christ 1419, being suspected (as saith John Stow) to practise withcraft against the king, was committed to the custodie of John Willeam, or rather John Welham, who appointed nine seruants to attend vpon hir, and brought hir to Beuenfete castell to be gouerned vnder his prouidence. But shortly after clearing hir selfe, she was deliuered. This ladie died at Hauering at the bolwe in Essex the ninth of Iulie in the seuenth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred thirtie and seuen, and was buried at Canturburie with hir husband king Henrie the fourth.

John de
Plantagenet
duke of Bed-
ford.

John duke of Bedford son to Henrie the fourth, & brother to h. Henrie the first, was in the fourth yeare of the reigne of the said Henrie, being the yeare of our redemption 1416, by parlement appointed regent of the realme, to inioie the same office so long as the king was imployed in the French wars. Which place he possessed accordinglie; and in the ninth yeare of the victorious prince, king Henrie the first, being gardian of England, he, with Henrie Beauford bishop of Winchester uncle to Henrie the first, and Jaqueline duchesse of Holland remaining then in England, were godfathers, and godmother to Henrie, after king by the name of Henrie the first, the son of Henrie the first; Henrie Chichele archbishop of Canturburie baptizing the child. In the tenth and last yeare of Henrie the first, this John with a strong power conueied quene Katharine wife to Henrie the first, from Southampton into France. This man being duke of Bedford, earle of Armon and of Bendall, constable of England, and warden of the marches of Scotland, died the fourteenth daie of September at Rome in 30. maner, who (having also bene regent of France, a most valiant gentleman, and one that kept the parts beyond the seas in great obedience to the crowne of England) had for his yearelie pension 20000 crownes at the least. After whose death all things went backward, and the English lost all that they had beyond the seas, Calis, & those dominions onlie excepted.

This man (I saie) died in the yeare of our redemption 1435, being the thirteenth yeare of the unfortunate government of the deposed king Henrie the first, and was honorablie buried at Rome in our ladie church there. Touching whome it shall not grue me to set downe the answer of a French king lately in our age made to one of his nobilitie, saing vnto the king (then being in the said ladie church of Rome, and beholding the tome of this John of Bedford) that it were conuenient that the same tome were defaced and pulled downe; since he was the onelie man that brought the greatest damage that euer happened vnto France. To whom the king said; Hold thy peace loke, God forbid that euer we should do such reproch to him being dead; whome the proudest of our nation durst not looke in the face when he was liuing. This duke John married the second yeare of Henrie the first, in the yeare of Christ 1423, Anne the daughter of John duke of Burgogne, who died in the tenth yeare of Henrie the first, in the yeare of Christ 1433, after which he married Jaques daughter to Peter earle of S. Paule in the same yeare, and yet died without issue. Of this man is mention made in my former discourse of the constables of England, pag. 868.

Humfreie duke of Gloucester brother to Henrie the first, and uncle to Henrie the first, was in the tenth and last yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of our Lord 1422, made regent of England, vpon the removing and departure of John duke of Bedford with quene Katharine, wife to Henrie the first into France. In which yeare (happening the lamentable death of that worthy prince king Henrie the first) the said Henrie vpon his death-bed appointed this Humfreie to be protector of the realme; which he did exercise in the time of the minority of Henrie the first, from the time of his first enterance into the kingdome. Who at that time taking vpon him that function, called vnto him graue and wise counsellors; with whose support he might with better honor to the realme, and benefit to the subjects, rule the ship of this kingdome, sailing in the dangerous waues of the kings infancie. By which means holding the sterne thereof, directed by the course of iustice, he did most honorablie during his life discharge the dutie of so weightie an office. Who in the fourteenth yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of our Lord 1439, did with five hundred saile land at Calis, and for eleven daies spoiled the lott countries and so by Calis returned againe into England. This man in the five & twentieth yeare of king Henrie first, being the yeare of Christ 1447, was in his castell of Ales in Millhoire, & coming from thence to the parlement was lodged in the hospitall, and arrested by John lord Beaumont high constable of England. But on the foure and twentieth daie of February he died for sorow as some said, and as John Stow hath noted, because he might not come to his answer. Other write that he was murdered in the night by the queens procurement, to the great griefe of the commons, and in time following to the bitter destruction of the king and the queene. He was duke of Gloucester, and also in the right of his wife duke of Holland and Zeland, earle of Penbroke, lord chamberleine of England, and protector of the realme, being highly esteemed of learned men, himselfe also not meanlie furnished with knowledge, having rare skill in astrologie, wherof beside manie other things he compiled a singular treatise, obtaining the name of Tabula directionum, touching whose death I have read these verses following in John Whethamsted:

*Aemula fors varijs signanter honoribus altis Causavit misere mala multos flere ruinae, Latus erat Iulius, undus meus Ptolomeus, Fulsus Tarquinius, exul factusque Tydens, Dux nimis prope iam dictus tempora vita Complevit tristis, heu indignatio regis Causa fuit magna, maior detractio falsi, Plebs et inuncta fallaci et insidiosa, Nam regis patris, quamvis et proximus haeres, Tunc fueratque sum consulor in ordine primus, Vir prudensque pius, vir doctus et ingeniosus, Non tamen erubuit, nec pertimuit, ne pepercit Hunc accusare falsè de prodicione, Discre quodque suam clam vellet tollere vitam Et sibi surripere violenter iura corona.
Dixit argentum, proprium qui capiat in usum, Desiderat medium quo vindicet aptius ipsum, Sic regem plures comitantes collaterales Se tantum praedonem, mediat frans, dat dolum ipsum, Fidior in regno regi duce non fuit isto, Plisus fide stabili aut maior amator honoris, Et tamen et pro dolo voto potiretur iniquo, Fraudem consiluit, cum fraude dolum sociavit, Sicque ducem falsi maculans cum prodicione Obtinuit votum, praedator eratque bonorum Illius, et tristis obijt dux criminis expertus.*

Which duke Humfrie was buried at saint Albons, being without issue, after he had married two wives; whereof the first wife was Jacoba or Jaqueline (daughter and sole heire of William of Bauler) being then the lawfull wife to John duke of Habant then living, which wife this Humfrie married in England in the yere of our redemption 1424 being the third yere of king Henrie the first, upon which grew great warres, and Humfrie duke of Gloucester challenged the combat of the duke of Burgognie, taking part with his cousine John duke of Habant. But in the end the duke of Gloucester left his wife at Mons & returned into England, and shæ into Gaunt, and so into Holland, & the combat staied by means of the duke of Bedford brother to the duke of Gloucester. But after (as it seemeth) the duke of Gloucester was divorced from this dutchesse, and then married Cleano: Cobham (whome he had tenderlie loved as his paramour before that) in the yere of our redemption 1428, being the first yere of the reigne of king Henrie the first. This woman in the nineteenth yere of the said Henrie the first (upon the taking of Henrie Bullingbroke for practising necromancie, thereby to consume the king) fled in the night to Westminster for sanctuarie, which caused hir to be suspected of treason. Whereupon Bullingbroke confessing that he wrought the same at the procurement of the said Cleano:, desirous to know to what estate she should come unto, the said dame Cleano: did oftentimes for the same fact appeare before the bishop, and in the end was consulted. After which in the twentieth of Henrie the first she did great penance therfore, and so escaped with hir life. And here because I have said somewhat of Jaqueline dutchesse of Holland, I thinke it not amisse to adde a little more of hir, being a woman of great beautie, and desire of change in performing the pleasures of the flesh: therfore I will set downe what I have seene written under the pictures of hir and hir husband Francis in this sort.

Thomas Beaufort duke of Excester (appointed to that office by Henrie the first on his death-bed) was with Henrie Beaufort bishop of Winchester great uncle to king Henrie the first in the yere of our redemption 1422, being the first yere of the reigne of king Henrie the first (then but nine months old) made protector and gardian of the person of the yong king, to see him tenderlie and carefulle brought up and instructed in all such parts as were to be required in the person of a monarch. Which office he left about the fourth yere of king Henrie the first, and died on feluyeres daie at his manor of Crantwich in the said first yere of Henrie the first, being the yere of our redemption 1446: he married Margaret the daughter of Thomas Beuill of Hornesbie.

Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwicke son of the former Thomas Beauchampe, being beyond the seas, and there deputie for John duke of Bedford (being regent of France) did (whilest the said regent was come ouer into England) obtaine manie castels in his deputiethip; who being thus imploied in the foren warres, was in his absence out of his countrie (for his singular wisdom and valor) ordered by the three estates of the realme of England in open parlement, to be gouernor of the person of the yong king Henrie the first, in the place of Thomas Beaufort duke of Excester lately deceased: which Richard did not yet forthwith hasten his returne into England, but remained in France for a season, enlarging inlarging the same of his martial exploits. This his election to the protectorship of the kings person, was in the first yere of Henrie the first, being the yere of our redemption 1426. He died in the yere of our Lord 1439, being the seuententh yere of the deposed king Henrie the first, at Rome in porman die the last date of Maie, as hath John Stow; and the fourth of October next following his corps was honozable conueied, as well by land as by water from Rome to Warwicke, and there honozable buried in the college of our ladie church founded by his noble ancestors. He married two wiues, the first Elisabeth daughter and heire of Thomas lord Barbleie; by whome he had three daughters, Margaret married to John lord Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, Cleane married to Thomas lord Kose, and Elisabeth married to George Peuill lord Latimer. His second wife was Isabell the daughter and heire of Richard lord Spenser, by whome he had issue Henrie duke of Warwicke, and Anne married to Richard Peuill earle of Salisburie.

Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke.

Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke, sonne to Richard earle of Cambridge, and father to Edward the fourth king of England, notwithstanding that he made challenge to the crowne against Henrie the first, then in possession thereof, as heire to the house of Yorke, and was to be preferred before the house of Lancaster; and notwithstanding that he was by parliament appointed to weare the crowne after the death of Henrie the first: yet after all this, in the three and thirtieth yere of the same king, being the yere of our redemption 1455 (such was the imperfection of the king to gouerne) he was appointed protector of the realme, ruling the same at his owne disposition. Which office he did not long inioie, and that most worthilie: for the next yere after being the foure and thirtieth of king Henrie the first, and the yere of our redemption 1456, he was depriued from the same, and quene Margaret wiue to Henrie the first toke againe the absolute regiment into his hands: which duke after in the nine and thirtieth of king Henrie the first, being the yere of our redemption 1460, the thirtieth date of December, being lord of Wakefield, was there with his sonne the earle of Rutland slaine at the battell commonlie called the battell of Wakefield; of which I haue read these verses in Whethamsted once abbat of saint Albons:

Anno milleno centum quater quoque sena,

He married Cicilie daughter to Kase Peuill first earle of Westmerland, by whome he had issue Edward duke of Yorke, earle of March, and after king of England by the name of Edward the fourth: George Plantagenet duke of Clarence, Richard Plantagenet duke of Gloucester, after king of England by the name of Richard the third: three daughters, Anne married to Henrie Holland duke of Excester, Elisabeth married to John de la Pole duke of Suffolke, and Margaret married to Charles duke of Burgognie.

George Plantagenet duke of Clarence.

George Plantagenet duke of Clarence, and constable of England, sonne of the foresaid duke of Yorke, and brother to king Edward the fourth, with Richard Peuill earle of Warwicke (who set by and pulled downe kings at his pleasure) were after the flight of Edward the fourth out of England into Burgognie to his brother in law (in the tenth yere of the reigne of the said king Edward, being the yere of our redemption 1470, when Henrie the first had by their means readepted the kingdome) made gouernors of the land, which office they inioied not long. For the said Edward the fourth returning into England, in the eleuenth yere of his reigne, being the yere of our redemption 1471, reconciled to him the duke of Clarence, did againe put downe king Henrie the first, and due the said earle of Warwicke (sitting awaite) at Barnet field (on Easter day) by one of the men of his campe. After this, on the fifteenth date of Januarie began a parliament; in the eighteenth yere of the reigne of king Edward the fourth, being the yere of our redemption 1478, where this duke of Clarence was attainted of treason, and the eleuenth of March following he ended his life in a but of malineise, and was buried at Ekelesburie beside his wife, who being with child died by poison a little before him. Of this man see more in my discourse of the constables of England pag. 869.

Richard Plantagenet third sonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was constable of England and gouernour of the person of the king, of whome is more spoken in my discourse of the constables of England pag. 869. But here mentioning the constables of England, I thinke it better now than not at all, to mention also some imperfection and default in my former discourse of the said constables, let downe by me before in pag. 865. Which default of mine in that place grew by reason of ouermuch hast, which I used in sudden seeking for the same, whereby (according to the old prouerbe) I brought forth a blind whelp. For in the former description I haue omitted diuerse the which were constables of England, the names of which were Henrie the first in the life of his father, Sigellus, and Robert de Dilie, with others of that line in descent, which Sigellus I can not as yet learne to be anie other but Sigellus de Dilie, brother to Robert de Dilie that came in with the Conqueror, who gaue Wrothshire vnto the said Robert.

Besides which, if it shall seeme to anie that I haue in my former treatise rashlie written I know not what, & that here I make Henrie the first constable in his father the Conquerors time, & by contrarietie thereto did before make Walter constable also in the Conquerors and William Rufus his time: let them know that there is no contrarietie herein. For Walter might first be constable, & then Henrie the first, and both they in the Conquerors time, this office being taken from the first, and given to the latter by the Conqueror. After whose death William Rufus might take it from his brother Henrie, because he would not make him too great in England, for doubt least he might hereby put the crowne in hazard, being fauoured of the people as one borne in England, and for that cause might restore that office to Walter. Againe it maie be, that some men reading that I haue before set downe, that Matw the emperesse gaue the constableship to Spilo the son of Walter in the first of king Stephan, and that king Stephan toke that office from Spilo in the first yere of his reigne, and gaue it to Walter Beauchampe, will condemne me therefore of like vnadvised writing: because it seemeth thereby that Stephan toke it from Spilo before that Spilo had it. Which is not so, for I can proue with some reason and authoritie, that Spilo had it a little before the death of king Henrie the first, and also after his death in part of the first yere of king Stephan, being witness to a deed by king Stephan, made and dated the first of his reigne, to to which he subscribed his name Milo Constabularius, after which king Stephan might in that yeare take that office from him, and so he did. Which Pawd the emperesse understanding, and finding Aplo (now fallen from king Stephan) one which assisted hir, the better to confront Stephan, gaue the constestable ship to Aplo (accounting hir selfe as quene) in the first of Stephan.

This being thus spoken in defense of that which before I haue written pag. 866. let vs go to our other matter concerning the constestables not mentioned before in the said discourse, wherein I find my selfe in a marvellous laberinth (out of which I doubt that the best antiquaries cannot lose themselves, no not he which thinketh and saith that he can controll all men, for I suppose he will be lame in this matter) how all these could be constestables, vnlesse that in the time of Henrie the first, and of king Stephan, as it is most likelie, there was chopping & changing, putting in and taking out, setting vp and pulling downe one man in diuerse yeares of one and the selfe same king: for king Stephan was sometime a king, and sometime as no king, and then againe a king. And so likewise was it with Pawd the emperesse at the same time, bearing hir selfe sometime as quene, and then dejected as no quene. But be it as it will be, I will here set downe what I find in ancient charters and pedegrees touching the constestables of England not before mentioned, leauing the same to others (either to order for succession of time, or to amend for truth of matter) who peraduenture reading these things, which I haue scene and will here set downe, can bestow them in better order than I can, which I earnestlie praye them to do, whereby truth maie be brought to light and perfection; which as yet touching these constestables set downe in this place, seemeth to be obscured and confused untill the time that Roger Fitz Piles had that office: for from his time the same is without all controuersie sufficientlie knowne. Wherefore, here before I enter into the descent of the de Dilies, who were constestables of England, I will set downe a strange note of thre persons witnesses to a deed, dated Primo Stephani, anno Dom. 1136, who do all subscribe their names as constestables. Which charter being the same wherein king Stephan gaue the manor of Sudton or Sutton to the house of Winchester, the same was amongst other witnesses thus signed, Robertus de Peer constabularius, Milo constabularius, Brientius filius comitis constabularius: all who could not be constestables of England at one time. Wherefore sauing correction I suppose that it is out of all controuersie, that neither the first nor the last of these thre were constestables of England, but of some other places, as of Douer or other castles. And so to that which I haue further to saie of the kings constestables in one descent and succession of the de Dilies, being learned the kings constestables, both in ancient charters and pedegrees, whereof Nigellus before mentioned seemeth to be one.

This Nigellus was constestable of England in the yeare of our redemption one thousand one hundred and one, being the first yere of king Henrie the first, as may appeare by a deed of confirmation made by Henrie the first touching the cathedrall church of Dorwich, whereof I thinke good to saie somewhat to bring in the profe that this Nigellus was constestable. This church was built for the most part in the time of William Rufus, by Herebert de Losinga the first bishop of Dorwich, who translated the see from Ely into Dorwich, in the yeare of Christ 1094, which church being finished and consecrated to the holie trinitie, was afterward confirmed by Henrie the first, and Pawd his wife, in the first yeare of the said Henrie, being the yeare of our redemption 1101, to the charter thereof signed by king Henrie & Pawd his wife, were manie bishops, noblemen and abbats witnesses, amongst whom are these two set downe; Nigellus Constabularius, and Rogerus Cancellarius, of which Nigellus thus writeth Leland in his commentaries on the song of the swan in the word Isidis insula: Erat Roberto frater Nigellus nomine, de quo fama non admodum multa refert, which I suppose is this Nigellus de Olie the constestable, as I before said.

Robert de Olie, sonne of the said Nigellus, did succeed his father, and was as may appeare by some authoys (who tearme him accordingly) great constestable of England. This man together with his wife Edith were the founders of the religious house of Dineie, touching whome I shall not graue to set downe what I haue gathered out of Leland and others. This Edith obtained of hir husband to build a church in the Isle of Dineie in Dorsetshire, to our sauiour Christ, about the yeare of our redemption 1129, being about the nine and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the first, which church did after grow to be of great renoume and building, the occasion of building whereof is set downe by others in this sort. Edith being in great estimation with Henrie, first married the said Robert de Olie by the kings procurement, which Robert began the priore of the blacke canons of Dineie by Dorford, amongst the Isles made by the riuer of Isis or Wolfe. This Edith used oftentimes to walke out of Dorford castell with hir gentlewomen for to solace and recreate hir selfe. At what time at a certeine place, as often as she came by the same, certeine pies assembled themselves in a tree, where they chattered and as it were spake vnto hir. This ladie much maruelling at the matter, happening so continuallie at one time in one place after one order, and with one maner of foules, was manie times astonished and feared therewith, esteeming it a verie strange wonder. Whereupon she sent for one Radulph or Rafe a chanon of saint Frideswide in Dorford, a man of vertuous life & hir confessor, asking his counsell vpon the same. To whom he answered (after that he had scene the order of those pies onelie chattering at hir comming thither) that she should build some church or monastrie in that place. Whereupon she intreated hir husband to build a priore, and so he did, making that Radulph the first priore of that house. All which matter, that is the coming of Edith to Dineie, Radulph waiting on hir, and the tree with the pies were all extant (at the generall dissolution of the abbetes in the time of Henrie the eight) to be scene painted on the north side of the high altar, in the arch of the wall ouer Ediths tombe in Dineie priore, vpon which tome there laie a stone image of Edith in the habit of a dovnelle holding a hart in hir right hand. This Robert de Olie was buried in Dineie in the verie middle of the presbiterie, vnder a flat marble stone; whereupon was a flowred crosse portraied, which Robert had issue Henrie de Olie, baron of Hochinton, & the kings constestable, which married Margerie the daughter of Humfrie de Bohune, by whome that Henrie had issue Henrie de Olie baron of Hochinton, and the kings constestable which died without issue. Thus this much by waie of digression, touching the constestables of England, left out in my former discourse of those officers. And so againe to the protectors.

Katharine the daughter of Ferdinando king of Spaine, and wife to king Henrie the eight, was (in the absence of the said king beyond the seas in the the warres of Turwine and Carneie) made regent of the realme, in the yeare of Christ 1513, and the first yeare of king Henrie the eight, she had bene the widow of Arthur prince of Wales, eldest sonne vnto king Henrie the seauenth, and eldest brother to king Henrie

Henrie the eight, who after the death of that Arthur was by dispensation of the pope married to Henrie after king, by the name of Henrie the eight, being younger brother of the said Arthur, from which king Henrie she was afterward not onelie divorced, in the one and twentieth of his reigne, being the yeare of Christ 1529, but after by parlement also in the foure and twentieth of the kings reigne, in the yeare of Christ 1532, disgraced from the name of quene, and from thenceforth appointed onlie to be called the princeesse dowager of prince Arthur, about five yeers after which she died on the eight of Januarie, being the yeare of our redemption 1535, which was the seauen and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the eight, and was honourable buried in the abbeye of Peterborough, for which cause afterward in the generall dissolution of the abbeies, when all those houses were spoiled, this abbeye was not onelie for hir buriall there spared and not defaced, but also further honored with a greater title, and turned into a bishoprike, by the said king Henrie the eight.

Katharine Par, the daughter of sir Thomas Par, lord of Kirkbie Kenball, and wife to king Henrie the eight, was by patent made protectresse of the realme of England, when king Henrie the eight went in person to the wars of Bullongne, on the thirteenth of Julie in the yeare of our redemption 1544, being the six and thirtieth yeare of the triumphant reigne of the said king. This ladie Katharine being the lord Latimers widow, was married to the king at Hampton court, one the twelfe of Julie being the five and thirtieth yeare of his reigne, and the yeare of Christ 1543, who hauing no issue by the king, was after the kings death married to Thomas Seimer knight, lord Seimer of Sudleie and high admirall of England.

Edward Seimer knight, vicount Beauchampe earle of Hertford, & after duke of Summerfet, was protector of the kings person, and of the kingdome, in the first yeare of king Edward the sixt, his nephew which was in the yeare of our redemption 1546, the king being then but nine yeares old. Of this man is moze spoken in my following discourse of all the dukes of England by creation or descent since the conquest, with which duke of Summerfet, the last in office of protectorship, Francis Thin knitteth by this simple discourse of the protectors of England of the kings person.

Curtis, alderman of London committed to ward for breuerend sword and signes to the lord chancellor.

Anno Reg. 6.
Sir Rafe Wane & other executed.
House blowne up with gunpowder.

Muster of horsemen before the king in Greenwich park.

Dukes.

¶ On the 17 of Februarie, on which date were receiued the bookes of the reliefe of all the wards of London, towards the new hospitals, by the kings commissioners, the counsell dined at maister Compers the shiriffe, and after dinner maister Thomas Curtis alderman came thither to speake with the lord chancellor for a matter he had depending afoze him in the chancerie, but for his misdemeanour in words and signes to the lord chancellor at that time, the said maister Curtis was committed to ward in the Fleet. The six and twentieth of Februarie, sir Rafe Wane and sir Miles Partridge were hanged on the tower hill; & sir Michaell Stanthope with sir Thomas Arundell were beheaded there. The last of Aprill, through negligence of the gunpowder makers, a certeine house nere the tower of London, with the last of powder was blowne up and burnt, the gunpowder makers being fiftene in number, were all slaine.

The sixteenth of Maie was a godlie muster of horsemen made before the king, in the parke at Greenwich, under the kings banner his band of pensioners, in number a hundred and fiftie, euerie pensioner two great horses and a gelding, the lord Wale their lieutenant. The duke of Northumberland, great maister of the kings household under the white lion & the ragged staffe fiftie. The duke of Suffolke under the unicorn in the starre a hundred and ten. The lord marquisse of Winchester, high treasurer, under his banner the falcon, one hundred men. The marquisse of Northampton high chamberleine under the maidenhead a hundred. The earle of Bedford lord priuie seale under the goate a hundred. The earle of Marwicke maister of the kings horses under the white lion fiftie. The earle of Huntington under his banner fiftie. The earle of Rutland under the peacocke fiftie. The earle of Penbroke under the greene dragon fiftie. The lord Darcie under the maidens bodie fiftie. The lord Cobham under the Saracens head, fiftie. The lord Clinton lord admirall under the anchor, fiftie. The lord warden of the cinque ports, under the rose in the sunne beames, one hundred.

¶ Not long after the death of the said duke of Summerfet and his complices, it chanced the reuerend father in God maister doctor Ribleie then bishop of London, to preach before the kings maiestie at Westminster. In the which sermon he made a fruitfull and godlie exhortation to the rich, to be mercifull vnto the poze, and also to moue such as were in authoritie, to trauell by some charitable waie & meane, to comfort and relieue them. Whereupon the kings maiestie being a prince of such towardnesse and vertue for his yeares, as England before neuer brought forth, and the same also being so well reteined and brought vp in all godlie knowledge, as well by his dere vncle the late protector, as also by his vertuous and learned schoolmaisters, was so carefull of the godd gouernement of the realme, and chiefe to do and prefer such things as most speciallie touched the honor of almightie God. And vnderstanding that a great number of poze people did swarme in this realme, and chiefe in the cite of London, and that no good order was taken for them, did suddenlie and of himselfe send to the said bishop as soon as his sermon was ended, willing him not to depart, vntill that he had spoken with him (and this that I now write was the verie report of the said bishop Ribleie) who according to the kings commandement gaue his attendance. And so soon as the kings maiestie was at leasure, he called for him, and made him to come vnto him in a great gallerie at Westminster, where (to his knowledge) and the king also told him so, there was present no mo persons than they two, and therefore made him sit downe in one chaire, and he himselfe in another, which (as it seemed) were before the comming of the bishop there purpose set, & caused the bishop (maugre his teeth) to be couered, and then entered communication with him in this sort.

First giuing him most hartie thanks for his sermon and god exhortation, he therein rehearsed such speciall things as he had noted, and that so manie, that the bishop said; Trulie, trulie (for that was comonlie his oth) I could neuer haue thought that excellencie to haue bene in his grace, that I beheld and saw in him. At the last, the kings maiestie much commended him for his exhortation for the reliefe of the poze. But my lord (saith he) ye willed such as are in authoritie to be carefull therof, and to deuise some godd order for their reliefe, wherein I thinke you meane me, for I am in highest place, and therefore am the first that must make answere vnto God for my negligence, if I should not be carefull therein, knowing it to be the expresse commandement of almightie God, to haue compassion of his poze and needy members, for whome we must make an account vnto him. And trulie my lord, I am before all things most willing to trauell that waie, and I doubt

But to returne where we left. By example of the charitable act of this vertuous young king, Sir William Chester knight and alderman of London, and John Galthrop citizen and draper of the said citie, at their owne proper costs and charges made the hiche walles and way on the backside that leadeth from the said new hospitall, unto the hospitall of saint Bartholomewes, and also covered and baued the towne dych from Aldersgate to Fleetgate, which before was verie noisome and contagious to the said hospitall.

Richard C. As
Sci. Bookmaker.

This hospitall being thus erected and put in good order, there was one Richard Casell alias Caseller, thoomaker, dwelling in Westminster, a man of great trauell and labor: in his facultie with his owne hands, and such a one as was named the cocke of Westminster, for that both winter and summer he was at his worke befoze foure of the clocke. in the morning. This man thus trulie and painfullie labouring for his liuing, God blessed and increased his labours so abundantly, that he purchased lands and tenements in Westminster, to the yeatlie value of fouzte and foure pounds. And hauing no child, with the consent of his wiife (who seruiued him, & was a vertuous & good woman) gaue the same lands wholie to Chyffis hospitall aforesaid, to the reliefe of the innocent and fatherlesse children, and for the succoz of the miserable, fouze and sicke, harborzed in the other hospitals about London, whose example God grant manie to follow.

I. Stow. 1053.
A monster.

The third of August, at Widdenton eleven miles from Oxford, a woman brought forth a child which had two perfect bodies from the navel upward, and were so joined together at the navel, that when they were laid in length, the one head & bodie was eastward, and the other west: the legs for both the bodies grew out at the midst where the bodies joined, and had but one issue for the excrements of both bodies: they lived eighteen daies, and were women children. The eight of August were taken at Quinborough three great fishes called dolphins: & the weeks following at Blackwall were six more taken, and brought to London, the least of them was more than arie horse. ] ship about this season there were three notable ships set forth and furnished for the great adventure of the unknowne voyage into the east by the north seas. The great doer and encourager of which voyage was Sebastian Cabato an English man, borne at Bristow, but was the sonne of a Genowaite. These ships at the last arrived in the coun-trie of Spolcoua, not without great losse and danger, and namelie of their capteine, who was a worthy and adventurous gentleman, called sir Hugh Willoughbie knight, who being tossed and driven by tempest, was at the last found in his ship frozen to death and all his people. But now the said voyage and trade is greatlie advanced, and the merchants adventuring that waie, are newlie by act of parliament incorporated and indued with sundrie privileges and liberties.

Three marriages between great estates.

About the beginning of the month of Maie next following, there were thre notable mariages concluded, & shortly after solemnized at Durham place. The first was betwene the lord Gilsford Dublete, the fourth sonne of the duke of Northumberland, and the labie Jane, eldest daughter to Henrie duke of Suffolke, & the ladie Francis his wife, was the daughter of Marie second sister to king Henrie the eight, first married to Lewis the French king, and after to Charles Brandon duke of Suffolke. The second marriage was betwene the lord Herbert, son and heire to William earle of Penbroke, and the ladie Katharine, second daughter of the said ladie Francis, by the said Henrie duke of Suffolke. And the third was betwene Henrie lord Hastings, sonne and heire to Francis earle of Huntingdon, and ladie Katharine yongest daughter to the forenamed duke of Northumberland.

These marriages were compassed & concluded chiefly vpon purpose to change & alter the order of succession to the crowne, made in the time of Henrie the eight, from the said kings daughters, Marie and Elizabeth, and to conuerte the same immediatlie after the death of king Edward to the house of Suffolke, in the right of the said ladie Francis: wherein the said young king was an earnest trauelier in the time of his sickenesse, & all for feare that if his sister Marie, being next heire to the crowne, should succeed, that she would subuert all his lawes and statutes made concerning religion, wherof he was most carefull: for the continuance whereof he sought to establish a meet order of succession, by the alliance of great houses by waie of marriage, which neuertheless were of no force to serue his purpose. For tending to the disheritting of the rightfull heirs, they proued nothing prosperous to the parties: for two of them were some after made frustrate, the one by death, the other by diuorſe.

In the meane while, the king became euerie daie moze sicke than other of a consumption in his lungs, so as there was no hope of his recouerie. Whereupon those that then bare chiefe authoritie in counsell, with other prelates and nobles of the realme, called to them diuerse notable persons, learned as well in diuinitie as in the lawes of the land, namelic bishops, iudges, & other, who fell to consultation vpon this so weightie cause, and lastly concluded vpon the deuise of king Edwards will, to declare the said lady Jane, eldest niece to king Henrie the eight, and wiue to the said lord Wilford, to be rightfull heire in succession to the crowne of England, without respect had to the statute made in the five and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the eight: the true meaning of which statute they did impugne and ouerthrow by diuerse subtilt finisier constructions of the same, to disherit the said kings daughters, to whom the succession of the crowne of England of right appertained, as well by the common lawes of this realme, as also by the said statute made in the said five and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie, as aforesaid. To which new order of succession, all the said kings counsell, with manie bishops, lords, doctors and iudges of the realme subscribed their names, without refusal or anie, except sir James Hales knight, one of the officers of the common plaes, who being called to the counsell, would in no wise giue his assent, either by word or writing, as ye shall heare moze in the history of queene Marie.

Now when these matters were thus concluded, and after confirmed by a number of hands, as aforesaid, then the noble prince king Edward the first, by long lingering sicknesse and consumption of his lungs aforesaid, approached to his death, and departed out of this life the first daie of Iulie, in the seventh yeare of his reigne, and seventeenth of his age, after he had reigned and noble gouerned this realme six yeares, five moneths, and eight daies. And a little before his departing, lifting vp his eyes to God, he prayed as followeth.

An entail is a legal arrangement that binds the land of a deceased person to a specific line of heirs, typically the eldest son, for a specified period of time. The land is passed down from generation to generation, and the heirs are bound to use the land in a certain way. The land is not sold or transferred to anyone else until the death of the last heir.

Odd God, deliuer me out of this miserable and wretched life, take not my will, but thy will be done.

Lord I commit my spirit to thee, oh Lord thou knowest how happie it were for mee to be with thee: yet for thy choicens sake if it be thy will, send me life and helth, that I maie trulie serue thee. Oh my Lord blesse thy people, and saue thine inheritance.
Oh Lord God, saue thy chosen people of England. Oh my Lord God defend this realme from papistrie, and mainteine thy true religion, that I and my people maie praise thy holie name. And therewithall he said, I am faint, Lord haue mercie vpon me, and take my spirit.

Thus did this good young king yeld vp to God his ghost the first daie of Iulie (as before is mentioned) whome if it had pleased God to haue spared with longer life, not unlike it was, but he should haue so gouerned this English common-wealth, that he might haue bene comparable with any of his noble progenitors: so that the losse of so towarlike a young king, greatlie discomfited the whole English nation, that looked for such a reformation in the state of the common-wealth at his hands, as was to be wished for of all good subiects: which bred such a liking in them toward him, that euermore they verie traitorous rebels his name yet was had in reuerence, although otherwise they neuer so much forgot their dutie both towards him and other, appointed to gouerne vnder him, through a malicious and most wilfull error; as if his tender yeares had not sufficientlie warranted his roiall authoritie, but that the same had bene insarpred by others against his will and pleasure.

And as he was intierlie beloued of his subiects, so with the like affection of kindnes he loued them againe, of nature and disposition make, much inclined to clemencie, euer hauing a regard to the sparing of life. There wanted in him no promptnes of wit, gra-uitie of sentence, ripenesse of iudgement, as his age might beare, saueur and loue of religion was in him from his child hood, his skill and knowledge in sciences, besides his other excellent vertues, were such, that to them he seemed rather bozne than bought vp.
I made some verie strange, that in his young yeares (as maister Fox reporteth of him) he could tell and recite all the ports, hauens, and creekes, not withint his owne realme onelie, but also in Scotland, and likewise in France, what comming in there was, how the tide serued in euerie of them; moreouer, what burthen, and what wind serued for the com-ming into each haue: also of all his iustices, magistrates, gentlemen that bare any authoritie within his realme, he knew their names, their housekeeping, their religion and conuersation what it was. He had a singular respect to iustice, a vertue most commendable in a prince, and chieftie to the dispatch of pozemens lites. He perfectlie understood the Latine tong, the French, the Graeke, Italian, and Spanishe, neither was he ignorant (saith Cardanus) in Logique, in the principles of naturall philosophie, or in musicke.

To conclude, his towarlineesse was such in all heroicall vertues, noble gifts, and markable qualities conuenient for his princelie estate, that so much was hoped for in his roiall person (if he had liued till triall might haue bene had of the poze) as was to beloued for in anie one prince that euer had rule ouer this noble realme. The eight of Iulie, the lord maior of London was sent for to the court, then at Greenwich, and to bring with him six aldermen, as manie merchants of the Staple, and as manie merchant aduenturers, vnto whom by the counsell was secretlie declared the death of king Edward, & also whom he had ordeined to the succession of the crowne by his letters patents, to the which they were sworn, and charged to keepe it secret. But now to proceed with the doings that followed. Immediate after the death of this so worthy a prince king Edward, the aforesaid ladie Jane was proclaimed queene of this realme by the sound of trumpet, that is to saie, the ninth daie of Iulie, at which proclamation were present the lords of the counsell, the maior of London, with others.

The eleauenth of Iulie, Gilbert Pot, dialuer to Simon Sanders blitener, dwelling at St. Johns head within Ludgate, who was accused by the said Sanders his maister, was set vpon the pillorie in Cheape, with both his eares nailed, and cleane cut off, for words speaking at time of the proclamation of ladie Jane. At the which execution was a trumpet blotie, and a herald read his offense, in presence of one of the shiriffes, &c. About five of the clocke the same daie in the afternone, Pinion Sanders, master to the said Gilbert Pot, and John Owen a gunner, comming from the tower of London by water in a wherrie, and shoting London bydge, towards the blacke friers, were drowned at saint Maries Locke, and the wherriemen saued by their ores.

The ladie Marie, a little before lieng at Honesdani in Hartfordshire, hauing intelligence of the state of the king hir brother, and of the secret practise against hir: by the aduise of hir friends, with all speed toke hir iourne toward hir house of Kenninghall in Kent folke, intending there to remaine, untill she could make hir selfe more strong of hir friends and allies, and withall wrote vnto the lords of the counsell in forme as followeth.

A letter of the ladie Marie sent to the lords of the counsell, wherein she claimeth the croune now after the decease of hir brother king Edward.

My lords we greet you well, and haue re-ceiued sore aduertisement, that our dearest brother the king our late fourreigne lord is departed to Gods mercie: which newes, how they be woofull to our heart, he onelie knoweth, to whose will and pleasure we must and doe humble submit vs, and all our wils. But in this so lamentable a case, that is to wit, now after his maiesties departure and death, concerning the croune & gouernance of this realme of England, with the title of France, and all things thereto belonging that hath bene prouided by act of parlement, and the testament and last will of our dearest father, besides other circumstances aduan-cing our right: you know, the realme, and the whole world knoweth, the rolles and records appeare by the authoritie of the king our said father, and the king our said brother, and the subiects of this realme, so that we verelie trust that there is no true subiect that is, can, or would pretend to be ignorant thereof: and of our part we haue our selues caused, and as God shall aid and strength vs, shall cause our right and title in this behalfe to be published and proclaimed accor-dinglie. And albeit this so weightie a matter seemeth strange, that the dieng of our said brother vpon thursdaie at night last past, we hitherto had no knowledge from you thereof: yet we consider your wisdomes and prudence to be such, that hauing estones amongst you debated, pondered, and well the sixt.

She certifieth the lordes that she knoweth what is intended against hir.

She chargeth the lordes upon their loialties to cause hir right to the regement to be proclaimed.

The lordes aduertise the ladie Marie that the ladie Jane is quene.

A subtill shift to proue the ladie Marie illegitimate.

weighed this present case with our estate, with your owne estate, the commonwealth, and all our honours, we shall and may conceiue great hope and trust, with much assurance in your loialtie and service, and therefore for the time interpret and take things not to the worst, and that ye yet will like noblemen worke the best. For the lesse, we are not ignorant of your consultations to vnder the provisions made for our preferment, nor of the great bands and provisions forcible, whereunto ye be assembled and prepared, by whome, and to what end, God and you know, and nature can feare some euill. But be it that some consideration politike, or whatsoeuer thing else hath moued you thereto, yet doubt you not my lords, but we can take all these your doings in gracious part, being also right readie to remit and foliie pardon the same, with that frellie to eschew bloudshed & vengeance against all those that can or will intend the same, trusting also assuredlie you will take acceptance this grace and vertue in good part, as appertineth, and that we shall not be enforced to vse this seruice of other our true subiects and frends, which in this our iust and rightfull case, God (in whome our whole assistance is) shall send vs. Wherefore my lords, we requite you, and charge you, and euerie of you, that euerie of you of your allegiance which you owe to God and vs, and to none other, for our honour, and the seruice of our realme, onelie imploye your selues and forthwith vpon recett hereof cause our right and title to the crowne and government of this realme, to be proclaimed in our cite of London, and such other places as to your wisdoms shall seme good, and as to this case appertineth, not failing hereof, as our verie trust is in you: and thus our letter signed with our owne hand shall be your sufficient warrant in this behalfe. Given vnder our signet at our manoir of Kenningall the ninth of Iulie 1553.

To this letter of the ladie Marie, the lords of the counsell answered againe as followeth.

MAdam, we haue receiued your letters the ninth of this instant, declaring your supposed title, which you iudge your selfe to haue to the imperiall crowne of this realme, and all the dominions thereto belonging. For answer therof, this is to aduertise you, that forsomuch as our soueraigne ladie quene Jane is, after the death of our soueraigne lord Edward the first, a prince of most noble memorie, inuested and possessed with the iust and right title of the imperiall crowne of this realme, not onelie by god order of old ancient good lawes of this realme; but also by our late soueraigne lordes letters patents, signed with his owne hand, and sealed with the great seale of England, in presence of the most part of the nobles, counsellors, iudges, with diuers other graue and sage personages, assenting and subscribing to the same: we must therefore, as of most bound dutie and allegiance, assent vnto hir said grace, and to none other, except we should (which faithfull subiects cannot) fall into greuous and vnspokeable enormities. Wherefore we can no lesse do, but for the quiet both of the realme and you also, to aduertise you, that forsomuch as the diuorcie made betwene the king of famous memorie king Henrie the eight, and the ladie Katharine your mother, was necessarie to be had, both by the euerlasting lawes of God, and also by the ecclesiasticall lawes, and by the most part of the noble and learned vniuersities of chifflendow, and confirmed also by the sundrie acts of parlements, remaining yet in their force, and thereby you iustlie made illegitimate, and vnder the crowne imperiall of this realme; and the rules, dominions, and possessions of the same: you will vpon iust consideration hereof, and of diuers other causes lawfull to be alleged for the same, and for the iust inheritance of the right line, and goodlie orders taken by the late king Edward the first, and greatest personages aforesaid, surcease, by any pretense to ber and molest any of our soueraigne ladie quene Jane hir subiects, from the true faith and allegiance due vnto hir grace, assuring you, that if you will for respect thew your selfe quiet and obedient (as you ought) you shall find vs all, and seuerall, readie to do you any service that we with dutie may, and to be glad of your quietnesse, to prelerue the common state of this realme, wherein you may be otherwise greuous vnto vs, to your selfe, and to them. And thus we bid you most hartlie well to fare. From the towre of London this ninth of Iulie.

Tour ladies frends shewing your selfe an obedient subiect,

Thomas Canturburie, the marquisse of Winchester, John Bedford, William Northampton, Thomas Cle Chancellor, John Northumberland, Henrie Suffolke, Henrie Arundell, Francis Shrewsburie, William Penbroke, Cobham, R. Rich, Huntington, Darcie, Cheineie, R. Cotton, John Gates, William Peter, William Cecil, John Cheke, John Mason, Edward North, Robert Wolues.

All these aforesaid, except onelie the duke of Northumberland, and sir John Gates, were either by speciall fauour, or speciall or generall pardon, discharged for this offence against hir committed, after hir comming to be quene. But now vpon the recett of this answer, vnderstanding by hir frends that she could not lie in suertie at Kenningall, being a place open & easie to be approached, she remoued from thence vnto hir castell of Fremingham, standing in a wood countrie, & not so easie to be inuaded by hir enemies. So sone as the counsell heard of hir sudden departure, and considering that all came not to passe as they supposed; they caused speiallie a power of men to be gathered together. And first they agreed that the duke of Suffolke father to the new made quene, should haue the conduct and leading of the armie.

But afterward it was deuised and decreed vpon further considerations, and by the speciall means of the ladie Jane his daughter, who taking the matter heauilie, with weeping teares, made request to the whole counsell, that hir father might tarrie at home in hir companie. Where vpon the counsell persuaded with the duke of Northumberland, to take that vantage vpon him, saying, that no man was so fit therefore: because that he had achieved the victorie in Suffolke once already, and was therefore so feared, that none durst once lift by their weapon against him: besides that, he was the best man of warre in the realme, as well for the ordering of his campes and souldiers, both in battell and in their tents, as also by experience, knowledge and wisdom; he could both animate his armie with witty persuasions, and also pacifie and allate his enemies pride with his stout courage, or else to dissuade them (if need were) from their enterpryse. Finally, said they, this is the short and the long, the quene will in no wise grant, that hir father shall take it vpon him: wherefore (quoth they) we thinke it good, if it may please your grace, it lieth in you to remedie the matter. With these & the like persuasions the duke was allured to put himselfe desperatlie vpon hazard:

Insomuch that he remained vpon their talke, and said: Well then, sith yee thinke it good, I and mine will go, not doubting of your fidelitie to the quene maiesie, matieſſe, which now I leaue in your cuſtodie. So that night he ſent for both lordes, knights, and other that ſhould go with him, and cauſed all things to be prepared accordingly. Then went the counsell in to the ladie Jane, and told hir of their concluſion, who humbly thanked the duke for reſeruing hir father at home, and beſeched him to uſe his diligence: where, to he answered, that he would do what in him laie. The morrow following, great preparation was made, the duke earlie in the morning called for his owne harnesse, and ſaw it made readie at Durham place, where he appointed all his retinue to meet. The ſame daie carts were laden with munition and artillery, and ſield peeces were ſet forward.

The ſame forenoone the duke moued effſoones the counsell to ſend their powers after him, as it was before determined, the ſame to meet with him at Newmarket, and they promiſed they would. He ſaid further to ſome of them: My lordes, I and theſe other noble perſonages, with the whole armie that now go forth, as well for the behalfe of you & yours, as for the eſtabliſhing of the queenes highneſſe, ſhall not onelic aduenture our bodies and liues amongſt the bloudie ſtrokes and cruell aſſaults of our aduerſaries in the open fields: but alſo we do leaue the conſeruacion of our ſelues, children, and families at home here with you, as altogether committed to your truth and fidelities: whome, if we thought ye would through malice, conſpiracie, or diſſention leaue vs your friends in the byers, and betraie vs; we could as well ſundrie waies foreſee and provide for our owne ſafeguards, as anie of you by betraieſing vs can do for yours. But now vpon the onelic truſt and faithfullneſſe of your honours, whereof we thinke our ſelues moſt aſſured, we do hazard our liues. Which truſt and promiſe if ye ſhall violate, hoping thereby of life and promotion: yet ſhall not God count you innocent of our bloods, neither acquite you of the ſacred and holie oth of allegiaunce, made ſwre by you to this vertuous ladie the queenes highneſſe, who by your and our intieſement is rather of force placed therein, than by hir owne ſeeking and request. Conſider alſo, that Gods caule, which is the preferment of his word, & feare of papists entrance, haſty bene (as ye haue here before alwaies laide) the original ground wherevpon ye euen at the firſt motion granted your goodwills and conſents thereunto, as by your handwritings appeareth; and thinke not the contrarie, but if ye meane deceit, though not ſo with, yet hereafter God will reuenge the ſame.

I can ſaie no more, but in this troubleſome time wiſh you to uſe conſtant hearts, abandoning all malice, enuie, and priuat affections. And therewithall the firſt courſe for the lordes came vp, wherefore the duke ſhut vp his talks with theſe wordes. I haue not ſpoken to you in this ſort vpon anie miſtruſt I haue of your truths, of which alwaies I haue euer hitherto conceiued a truſtie confidence, but I haue put you in remembrance thereof, what chance of variance ſo ener might grow amongſt you in mine abſence: and this I praie you, wiſh me not worſe good ſped in this ſortie, than ye would haue to your ſelues. My lord, ſaith one of them, if ye miſtruſt anie of vs in this matter, your grace is farre deceived, for which of vs can waſh his hands cleane thereof? And if we ſhould ſhynke from you as from one that were culpable, which of vs can excuſe himſelfe to be giſtelle? Therefore herein your doubt is too farre caſt. I praie God it be (quoth the duke) let vs go to dinner: and ſo they ſat downe. After dinner the duke went in to the queene, where his commiſſion was by that time ſealed, for his lieutenantſhip of the armie, and then toke his leaue of hir, and ſo did certeine other lordes alſo.

Then as the duke came through the counsell chamber, he toke his leaue of the earle of Arundell, who praied God be with his grace, ſaieng he was ſorie it was not his chance to go with him and brace him companie, in whose preſence he could find in his heart to ſpend his blood euen at his ſet. Then the earle of Arundell toke Thomas Louell the dukes boie by the hand, and ſaid; Farewell gentle Thomas with all my heart. Then the duke, with the lord markeſſe of Northampton, the lord Greie, and diuerſe other toke their charge, and went to Durham place, and to White hall, where that night they muſtered their men: and the next daie in the morning the duke departed with the number of ſix hundred men, or thereabouts. And as they rode through Shorbiſch, ſaid the duke to the lord Greie; The people preſe to ſee vs, but not one ſaith God ſped vs. The ſame daie ſir John Gates and other went out after the duke.

Now as the duke went forward on his waie (with his commiſſion from the whole counsell, and his warrant vnder the broad ſcale of England, without miſtruſt of that which after fortune to his owne deſtruction, as in the hiſtorie of queene Marie ſhall appeare, accompanied with no ſmall number of lordes and gentlemen, hauing notwithstanding his times preſcribed, and his iourneies appointed by the counsell, to the intent he would not ſeeme to do any thing but vpon warrant) what a do there was, what ſirring on euerie ſide, what ſending, what riding and poſting, what letters, meſſages, & inſtructions went to and fro, what talking among the ſouldiers, what harburning among the people, what faire pretences outwardlie, inwardlie what priuite practiſes there were, what ſpeeding and ſending forth ordinance out of the towre, yea euen the ſame daie that queene Marie at euen was proclaimed queene, what rumors, and comming downe of ſouldiers as there was from all quarters, a world it was to ſee, and a proceſſe to declare, enough to make (as ſaith maſter Fox) a whole volume, euen as big as an Atlas.

The greateſt helpe that made for the ladie Marie, was the ſhort iourneies of the duke, which by commiſſion were assigned vnto him before, as aboue is mentioned: and happilie not without the politike forecaſt of ſome in fauour of the ladie Marie: for the longer the duke lingered in his voiſage, the ladie Marie the more increaſed in puiſſance, the hearts of the people being mightilie bent vnto hir. Wherevpon ſhe in the meane time remaining at Fremmingham, and hearing of this preparation againſt hir, gathered together ſuch power of the noblemen & other hir friends in that cuntry, as ſhe could get. And firſt of all, the noblemen that came vnto hir aid, were the earles of Suſſer, Bath, and Driford, the lord Wentworth, ſir Thomas Cornewallis, ſir Henrie Farningham, ſir William Malgraue, with diuerſe other gentlemen and commons of the counties of Northfolke and Suſſolke. Here (as maſter Fox noteth) the Suſſolke men being the firſt that reſorted to hir, promiſed hir their aid and helpe to the uttermoſt of their powers, ſo that ſhe would not go about to alter the religion which hir brother had eſtabliſhed, and was now uſed and exerciſed through the realme. To this condition ſhe agreed, with ſuch promiſe, as no man would haue doubted that anie inuocation of matters in religion ſhould haue followed, by hir ſufferance or procurement during hir reigne: but how ſone ſhe forgot that promiſe, it ſhall ſhortlie after plainelie appeare.

In this meane ſeaſon, the lord Windſor, ſir Edmund Beckham, ſir Robert Marie, and ſir Edward Baſſings, called the commoners of the ſhire of Buckingham; vnto whome ſir John Williams, which afterward was lord Williams of Thame, ap in m m m y. and and sir Leonard Chamberleine, with the cheefe power of Wiltshire. And out of Northamptonshire came sir Thomas Tresham, and a great number of gentlemen out of diuerse parts, whose names were too long to rehearse. These capitaine with their companies being thus assembled in warlike manner, marched forward towards Northfolke to the aid of the ladie Marie, and the further they went, the more their power increased.

The lords of the councill suspecting that all would go against them, procla-
med the ladie Marie quene.

About this time sir Shypps well manned, that were appointed to lie before Portsmouth, and to haue taken the ladie Marie if she had fled that waie, were by force of weather driuen into the haven, where one maister Jerningham was raising power on the ladie Maries behalfe, who hearing thereof, came thither.
Whereupon the capitaine toke a bote and went to the ships, but the sailers and souldiers asked maister Jerningham what he would haue, and whether he would haue their capitaine or no, and he said yea. Marie said they, ye shall haue them or we will throw them into the bottome of the sea. But the capitaine said forthwith, that they would serue quene Marie wil-linglie, and so brought forth their men, and conueted with them their great ordinance. Of the comming of these ships the ladie Marie was wonderfull ioyous, & afterward doubted little the dukes puissance: but when newes thereof was brought to the tower, each man there began to draw backward: and ouer that, word of a greater mischance was brought to the tower: that is to saie, that the noblemens tenants refused to serue their lords against quene Marie.

The duke thought long for his success, and wrote somewhat sharpe to the councill at the tower in that behalfe, as well for lacke of men as munition, but a slender answer had he againe. And from that time forward, certaine of the councill, to wit, the erle of Penbroke, and sir Thomas Cheineie lord warden, and other, sought to get out of the tower to consult in London, but could not. On the sixteenth of Julie, being sundaie, doctor Kibble bishop of London, by commandement of the councill, preached at Pauls crosse, where he vehementlie perswaded the people in the title of the ladie Jane, late proclaimed quene, and inuied earnestlie against the title of ladie Marie, &c. The same sixteenth of Julie, the lord treasurer was gone out of the tower to his house in London at night, and forthwith about seauen of the clocke the gates of the tower vpon a sudden were shut vp, and the keyes bozne vp to the ladie Jane, which was for feare of some packing in the lord treasurer: but he was fetched againe to the tower about twelue of the clocke in the night.]

The lords of the councill, being in this meane while at London, after they vnderstood how the better part of the realme were inclined, and hearing euerie daie newes of great assemblies, began to suspect the sequell of this enterprise. So that providing for their owne suertie, without respect of the duke (who now was at Burie) they fell to a new councill, and lastlie by assent made proclamation at London in the name of the ladie Marie, by the name of Marie quene of England, France, & Ireland, defender of the faith, & of the churches of England & Ireland supreme head. Of which proclamation, after the duke of Northumberland, being then at Burie, was aduertised by letters of discomfort from the councill, he incontinentlie, according to the new order recei-ued from them, returned with his power againe to Cambridge. Now so sudden change of minds forthwith appeared in his armie, that they which before seemed most forward in that quarrell, began first to flee from him, & so euerie man shifting for himselfe, he that late before was furnished of such multitude of souldiers, was suddenlie forsaken of all saving a few, whose perills were ioined with his.

But now before I proceed anie further in the historie of quene Marie, who was now rescued and proclaimed quene, as then to succeed his brother, I will speake somewhat of the learned men that wrote & published anie pamphlets or treatises in his daies, as in deed there were manie: but for that the more part of them died in quene Maries time, or in the quenes maiesties time that now is, or else are yet liuing, I do omit those here, meaning to speake of them hereafter, if God shall permit, as occasion maie serue. For the residue that ended their liues in this kings daies, these I find: David Clapham a lawyer and well sene in the Latine tong, wrote sundry treatises; Robert Talbot a prebendarie of Northwich, verie skilfull in antiquities; Edward Hall a counsellor in the common law, but excellent-lie sene in histories, wrote a notable chronicle of the union of the two houses of Yorke & Lancaster.

Furthermoze Richard Tracie of Codrington in Gloucestershire, an esquier, and verie well learned, sonne to William Tracie; doctor Joseph an excellent preacher; George Jole a Bedfordshire man, that wrote diuerse treatises concerning diuinitie, and died either in the last yeare of king Edward, or in the beginning of quene Maries reigne, as appeareth by maister Bale; Alexander Birkleie a Scot, a notable poet, and a good rhetorician, departed this life in the yeare one thousand five hundred fiftie and two; William Hugh a Northfolke man, wrote, besides other things, a notable treatise called the trowbled mans medicine, he deceased by the burking of a veine, in the yeare one thousand five hundred fortie and nine; Thomas Sternehold bozne in South hampton, turned into English meter seuen & thirtie psalmes chosen forth of Dauid psalter. Of strangers that liued and died here in this kings daies, excellentlie learned, and renowned for such treatises as they published to the world, Martine Bucet and Paulus Fagius are most famous. To end now with this part of the booke concerning king Edward, I haue thought good to set downe Ierom Car-dans verses, written as an epitaph of him (and recoded by maister Fox in his historie) as here followeth:

*Flete nefas magnum, sed toto flebilis orbe Mortales, vester corrui omnis honor.
Nam regum decem, & inuenimus flos, & flosque bonorum, Delicia seculi, & gloria gentis erat.
